According to the foregoing exposition, which we most certainly believe to be true, and not only justified but demanded by the connection,—it will be seen that Christ's precept is only against the abuse, and not against the legitimate use, of the Phrenological faculties. It is aimed against the abuse of combativeness and destructiveness; more particularly the latter. But the science itself tells us to avoid the abuse of the faculties. Christ tells us the same; therefore they are in perfect harmony.

HOPE.

Ever bright and joyous hope! the star of life! Miserable indeed would we be without thee! Extinguish the hope of at last resting in Heaven and meeting all that are dear to us there, and what should we be? Dark despair would seize us and we should sink down in our sorrow. What then would be our object in living and toiling in this mundane sphere? In our deepest sorrows, bright-winged Hope is ever our comforter; it points to the unclouded future, and teaches us to look forward for something higher and better. 'It is the star that shines in the dim-kenned future, ever directing the way-farer of earth upward and onward to the land of the soul—the haven of rest.' Man is a creature of hope.

When the soldier leaves his home, to enter the strife of war, is he not urged on by the hope of obtaining peace and liberty for his country and honor for himself? When the mother consigned her beloved child to the tomb, does she not think upon the time that is to come, when she will meet that child, never more to be separated from it? Hope cheers the weary student as he toils by his midnight lamp. Is there a hope so sweet and yet so pure and holy, as that of again being united, in Heaven; with our dearest friends; in that celestial abode, where no evil can come to darken the soul with sorrow? Such bright hopes are ours. Then let our motto be, 'Hope on, Hope ever.'

THE SECOND DEATH.

BY REV. J. N. PARKER.

And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God: and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works. And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire. Rev. xx: 11-15.

The portion of Scripture which has now been read, and which is to be the theme of our remarks at this time, is, for two particular reasons, deserving our prayerful and candid attention. The first of which is, that we may thereby if possible arrive at its true meaning, and thus be enabled to give a reasonable view of the subject when we are questioned concerning it by our opposers. And the second reason why the subject contained in the text is deserving our particular attention, is, that many, very many professing Christians firmly and conscientiously believe, that in the words of our text exists an insurmountable objection to the doctrine of universal grace and salvation. Now just so long as mankind believe that the words of our text stand opposed to the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all men, just so long will they be prejudiced against our whole system of faith, and thus be kept from coming to a knowledge of that truth which will make them free indeed.

In the examination of the subject before us, I earnestly solicit your undivided attention, and, if you have preconceived opinions, or prejudices in your minds in relation to the scripture under consideration, lay them for the time being entirely aside, and let us go to the work before us earnestly praying that the divine blessing may rest upon us, that our minds may be fitted for candid inquiry after truth, and that wherever and whenever truth is found, we and all men may have moral courage sufficient to enable us to stand forth boldly in its defence.

The first thing necessary in the investigation of our subject, is to decide the question—when the book of Revelation was written. This, as Dr. A. Clarke has justly observed, is extremely necessary in order to understand its contents. You will perceive by reference to our large Bibles, that the date of the book is fixed in the year of Christ 96. Thus showing, acknowledging the correctness of the data, that the Mosaic dispensation had been done away twenty-six years before the Revelation was written. The date, to which I have referred as being set to the book in the sacred volume, and which fixes it in the year 96 of the Christian era, is of human origin, and the validity of it, is not only to my mind, but to many others, seriously questioned.

Dr. Clarke, in his introduction to this book, in noticing the various opinions which have existed in ancient time in reference to its date, says, in substance, that although those who believed it to have been written after the Jewish nation was destroyed, were the most numerous, yet, those who were of the contrary opinion were the most respectable, and best informed. He gives it as his settled conviction that the Revelation was written before the Levitical priesthood closed. I therefore take the ground that the book from which we have selected our text was written before the Jews as a nation were scattered, and their rights and privileges brought to an end. But I do not wish you to take my assertion for the correctness of this position, but I wish to direct your careful attention to the writings contained in the book itself in proof of it.

The Revelator commences the book in the following language. 'The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass; and he sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John: Who bare record of the word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ, and of all things that he saw. Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep these things which are written therein: for the time is at hand.' In closing the book, the Revelator says, 'He which testifieth these things saith surely I come quickly.'

Here the Revelator declares that the time of the fulfilment of the things contained in the book was at hand, and also, 'he that testifieth these things saith surely I come quickly.' Now with such expressions as these to guide us, which is the most reasonable and consistent, to suppose that the things and events made known to John were what were soon coming upon the idolatrous Jews; or that they were not to transpire until thousands of years had passed away?

But again; to show that the events contained in the Revelations were soon to take place, I refer you to the prophecy of Daniel, in order to illustrate the truth of the position. You recollect that in the vision of the prophet Daniel, in which it was made known to him that seventy weeks were to pass away before the Messiah should come to finish sins, and bring in everlasting righteousness, he was commanded to seal up the vision, because the time was afar off. These seventy weeks are to be understood as denoting a period of time equal to 490 years. Daniel was commanded to seal the vision, and this too, recollect, on account of the length of time which was to transpire before its fulfilment. Keeping this in our minds, let us refer to the prophecy under consideration. In the xxii chap. after the spirit had made known to John the contents of the book, he saith directly to him, 'seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book for the time is at hand.' Now I appeal to the good sense of my hearers, whether it is in accordance with any known rule of biblical interpretation, to have the vision of Daniel sealed on account of the four hundred and ninety years which were to intervene before its fulfilment, and that of John not to be sealed for the time was at hand for its accomplishment, when in fact thousands of years were to pass away which must have been the case unless the book of Revelation was written before the wars of the Jews and the Romans?

Another reason why I believe the book of Revelation was written before the dispersion of the Jews, is, the similarity there is existing in the language made use of by the Saviour in reference to the judgment which was coming immediately upon the Jewish nation, and the language of the Revelator. In the last chapter the spirit saith to John, 'Behold I come quickly and my reward is with me, to give to every man according as his work shall be.' Compare this with the language of the Saviour, in reference to his coming at the destruction of the Jewish state, a coming which was to take place during the natural lives of some who listened to his voice, as recorded in Matt. xvi: 27, 28, 'For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then shall he reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you there be some standing here who shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.' Here you perceive that almost the precise words of the Saviour are used by the Revelator, and it is a mystery to me how any person can receive the language of both as divine testimony, without coming to the conclusion that it must necessarily and inevitably refer to one and the same event.

The Revelator, also, in the first chapter in noticing the events which should take place at the time of the fulfilment of the book, says: 'Behold he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him; and all the kindred of the earth shall wail because of him.' Compare this with the language of the Saviour in reference to things which he declared should come upon the generation of men living on earth in his day—see Matt. xxiv: 30, 'And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory.' And immediately after the Saviour declares, 'Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled.' In the Revelation all the kindreds of the earth were to wail, and in Matthew the language is, that all the tribes of the earth were to mourn—in both places the events described were to take place at the coming of the Son of man, and in both places the Son of man is figuratively represented as coming in the clouds of heaven.

From the passages quoted, it must, I think, be obvious to all, that there is so great a similarity existing between the language of the Revelator and that of Christ, in reference to the coming calamities of the Jews, that the Revelation must have been written before those days of trouble came upon the house of Israel.

But I have one other reason, which is also derived from the book-containing our text, to give why I believe the Revelation was written previous to the abrogation of the Mosaic dispensation, and then I am done with this part of my subject.

The Revelator says: 'And there was given me a reed like unto a rod; and the angel stood, saying, rise and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein. But the court which is without the temple, leave out, and measure it not; for it was given unto the Gentiles; and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months.' (See chap. xi: 1, 2.)

Here then is proof sufficient to settle all controversy relative to the questions whether the book of Revelation was written before or after Jerusalem was destroyed. Direct reference was here made to the temple, which must be the temple at Jerusalem, and entirely destroys the speculative idea that the temple had been mouldering in the dust of the earth twenty-six years before John was commanded by the angel to rise and measure it with the reed given him for that purpose. And in relation to being trodden under foot by the Gentiles, we find that the Saviour used language to the same import when speaking of the days of trouble which were soon to come upon the Jews. He said: 'And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the time of the Gentiles be fulfilled.' Luke xxi: 25.

We have been thus particular in attempting to decide the question relative to the time the book from which we have taken our text, was written, and it is believed that evidence sufficient has been adduced to satisfy every unprejudiced mind that it was written before Jerusalem was trodden under foot by the Gentiles, or in other words, before it was besieged and destroyed by the Romans. It was necessary, if possible, to settle this point before we could well proceed in the explanation of our subject. We now pass to a more close investigation of the text.

The text after giving a description of the events or circumstances which were to take place at its fulfilment, brings the scene to a close in the following important language—This is the second death. You must readily perceive that there could be no propriety in speaking of a second death, unless there had been a first death. And it must also, I think, be evident to all, that in order to be a second death, there must not only have been a first death, but it must also have been a resemblance to the second. Now I can behold no consistency in the opinion held sacred by a majority of professing Christians, that the death of the body is to be considered the first death, and the eternal death of the soul in hell the second, inasmuch as there is no similarity existing between them—the one affecting the body, the other the mind only. I believe that there must be a likeness, a similarity existing between the second death spoken of in our text, and the first death, and the phrase second death implies there must have been.

Therefore, before coming direct to the inquiry, what is to be understood by the phrase 'second death,' let us devote a few moments to the inquiry which presses itself into our notice, namely, what is, or what was the first death? You must all perceive that this query is clearly connected with our subject, and that if satisfactorily answered, it will assist us not a little in arriving at the truth of our text, particularly in relation to the proper understanding of the 'second death' there spoken of.

We learn from sacred history, that at the death of King Solomon, a request was made by the twelve tribes to Solomon's son, who reigned in his father's stead, to lighten their burdens. In consequence of a neglect or a refusal on the part of the king so to do, ten of the tribes revolted and made Jeroboam their king. These ten tribes continued to become more and more corrupt until they were carried from the land of their nativity, by the king of Assyria, and their country was given into the hands of strangers. The two tribes who did not revolt were those of Judah and Benjamin. They continued to enjoy the privileges peculiar to their fathers for a season, but ere long they, too, forsook the true worship of the sanctuary; polluted the temple with service rendered to idols, until the measure of their iniquity was full, when Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, went up against them with a mighty army, demolished the great and beautiful temple, built by Solomon, which had been standing as the pride and glory of the nation for 520 years, and carried the people away captive into Babylon.

Here, then, at this time, we learn from sacred history, that the Jews as a nation had ceased to exist. They were dead as a nation. This I believe to be the first death. But I ask you not to receive my assertion for the truth of the position I have taken, namely, that the Babylonian captivity is to be regarded as the first death, in contradistinction to the second death spoken of in our text. But let us appeal to the Scriptures for proof.

Direct to the point is much of the xxxvii. chap. of Ezekiel. The prophet says—'The hand of the Lord was upon me, and carried me out in the spirit of the Lord, and set me down in the midst of the valley which was full of bones. And caused me to pass by them round about: and behold there were very many in the open valley: and lo, they were very dry. And he said unto me, Son of man, can these bones live? and I answered, O Lord God, thou knowest. Again he said unto me, Prophecy upon these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord God unto these bones; Behold, I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live: and I will lay sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ye shall live; and ye shall know that I am the Lord. So I prophesied as I was commanded; and as I prophesied, there was a noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone. And when I beheld, lo, the sinews and the flesh came upon them, and the skin covered them above; but there was no breath in them. Then said he unto me, Prophecy unto the wind, prophesy, Son of man, and say to the wind, Thus saith the Lord God; Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. So I prophesied as he commanded me, and the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army. Then he said unto me, Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel: behold, they say, Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost: we are cut off for our parts. Therefore prophesy and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves. And shall put my spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I shall place you in your own land; then shall ye know that I the Lord have spoken it, and performed it, saith the Lord.'

From the Scripture which has now been quoted, we learn that the house of Israel, the Jews, while in the Babylonian captivity, were represented as in a state of death—they were called 'the slain,' and were described as 'being dead' and in 'their graves.' Now these are all highly figurative expressions, and were used to represent the state of moral death and degradation into which the Jews as a nation were plunged. No person of information will question the tenability of the position I have taken, viz. that the Jews while in bondage under Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, are in the Scriptures represented as being dead and in their graves.

Here, then, we find that the house of Israel, the Jews, even while they tabernacled in the flesh, were dead and in their graves, in the sense in which these words were used in the Scriptures, and by which we understand that they had forsaken the worship and service of the one living and true God, and had become wicked and corrupt in the land of the heathen, where they bowed down to gods made with hands. But did they always remain in this state of death? We answer no. It was prophesied of them, as has been read in your hearing, that they should again live. This prophecy was fulfilled. After seventy years had passed away, through which the galling yoke of bondage had pressed heavily upon them, God in his providence wisely ordered that Babylon should fall, and become subject to the neighboring provinces. Cyrus, king of Persia, went to war against Babylon, and notwithstanding her strong fortifications, her walls and her towers, yet she was now subdued by the Persians while in her meridian glory. The Jews were rescued, and in accordance with the edict of Cyrus, they again returned to Jerusalem where lay the mouldering remains of the temple in which their fathers once delighted to worship.

The Jews were now subject to Persia. They were allowed to rebuild the temple, and to live in the happy enjoyment of that religion and those laws which were once the pride and glory of their fathers. For three hundred years the Jews, after their return from Babylon, enjoyed almost uninterrupted tranquillity, being governed by their high priests, though subject first to Persia and the latter part of the time to Syria. We learn from history that the persecutions of Antiochus, the 4th, who ruled in Syria, were so severe to the Jews, that at the expiration of the 300 years, they rebelled, and after a war of twenty-six years, the province of Judea became independent, being governed by kings or rulers chosen by the people.

Thus we perceive that history accords with prophecy, and we have the united testimony of both, that the Jews came forth from their state of death again to the enjoyment of life, and the privileges of a nation. They enjoyed the right of an independent state for the space of 126 years when Judea was reduced to a province of the Roman Empire. The Jews from this time forth were subject to the Romans, yet still they were allowed to have a form of government, peculiar to themselves; to have their priests and high priests, and in relation to all matters of a local nature, to be governed by their laws.

This was their condition when the Saviour made his appearance in our world.

In proof that I am correct in the statement that the Jews, when Christ was upon earth, had laws of their own, and existed in many respects as an independent nation, notwithstanding they were subject to the Roman Empire, I refer you to the conversation between the Jews and Pilate, the Governor of Judea, in reference to the trial and condemnation of Christ. After the Saviour was betrayed into the hands of the Jews, they delivered him into the hands of Pilate. Pilate saith unto them, 'what accusation bring ye against this man?' They answered and said unto him, 'if he were not a malefactor we would not have delivered him up unto thee. Then said Pilate unto them, take ye him and judge him according to your law. The Jews said unto him it is not lawful for us to put any man to death.'

From what has now been said, we learn that the Jews as a nation had been in a state of death, represented as a valley of dry bones, and in their graves; that they were brought up out of their graves; to the enjoyment again of life and the blessings of a nation, and that they thus existed when Christ made his appearance to put away the law with all its forms and ceremonies, and to establish in its stead the Gospel. Be it understood then, that that state in which the house of Israel was, when looked upon by the prophet as a valley of dry bones, is to be considered as the first death in contradistinction to the second death spoken of in our text.

We come now directly to the inquiry, what shall we understand by the second death, mentioned in the Scripture under consideration?

You will bear in mind the fact, that the 'lake of fire' and the 'second death,' are synonymous expressions. As I have attempted to show that the national death of the Israelites in Babylon was the first death, I will now assume the position, and attempt to prove, that the final overthrow of the Jewish nation—the destruction of the Mosaic institutions, and the suffering which came upon the Jews at that time, is to be considered the second death alluded to in the text. 'The lake of fire' is the 'second death.' This being the case, can we deduce evidence from the Scriptures which will justify us in the belief that temporal judgments are ever represented by such expressions as lake of fire, or furnace of fire, which evidence is necessary in order to substantiate the position we have taken, namely that the judgment which came upon the Jews, or their final national destruction, was the second death.

It is necessary in this part of our subject that we proceed with the utmost caution, for I think I may safely say, that in most minds, the greatest difficulty that exists in relation to a correct understanding of the text, is the phrase 'lake of fire.' Now if we find that similar expressions are used in the Scriptures to set forth God's temporal judgments upon the children of men, we shall thereby be assisted in coming to correct conclusions in regard to our text.

In Ezekiel, xxii chap. we read as follows, 'And the word of the Lord came unto me saying; Son of man, the house of Israel is to me become dross, all they are brass, and tin, and iron, and lead in the midst of the furnace; they are even the dross of silver. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, because ye are all become dross, behold, therefore, I will gather you into the midst of Jerusalem. As they gather silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and tin, into the midst of the furnace, to blow the fire upon it, to melt it; so will I gather in mine anger and in my fury, and will leave you there and melt you. Yea, I will gather you, and blow upon you in the fire of my wrath, and ye shall be melted in the midst thereof; as silver is melted in the midst of the furnace, so shall ye be melted in the midst thereof; and ye shall know that I the Lord have poured out my fury upon you.' Here, in this testimony of holy writ, we have a highly wrought and figurative representation of the judgment which God inflicted on the Jews in Jerusalem. Jerusalem was the place in which God's furnace was said to be; there did he declare by the mouth of his prophet that he would gather the house of Israel, or the Jews, into the 'furnace, and blow upon them, and melt them.'

No person will question, but that this language has direct reference to the punishment which God inflicted upon the Jews at the time their nation was destroyed. And is there not a strong similarity existing between this language of the prophet, and the terms 'second death,' and 'lake of fire,' which occur in our text? Both are highly figurative, and both, no doubt, were spoken in reference to the same event. But there are other scriptures which go directly to show that the temporal judgments of Jehovah upon the children of men, are represented in language equally as strong as is found in the passage under consideration.

In the xxxiv chap. of Isaiah, the prophet gives a most vivid description of the judgment that was soon to come upon Bozrah in the land of Idumea. He speaks of the great slaughter that should take place, the slain were to be cast out of the city, the air should be polluted with the offensive smell which should arise, and the mountains were to be melted with their blood. In reference to the events which were to transpire within the city, the prophet says: 'And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch.'—(Would it not be a lake of fire?) 'It shall not be quenched night nor day: the smoke thereof shall go up forever, from generation to generation it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it forever and ever.'

Here in this description given by the prophet of the awful judgment which was pending upon the idolatrous city of Bozrah, we find as strong, as sublime, and as figurative language used to represent the temporal judgments of that city, as is found in our text. The rivers were to be turned to pitch, and the dust of the earth to brimstone, it was to burn and consume them.

If such, then, were the figures used to represent the calamities or judgment sent upon that ancient city, it is going farther than we are justified by Scripture, to affirm that the lake of fire, which was the second death, referred to by the Revelator, was none other than those days of trouble, or that awful judgment which came upon the Jews at the time Jerusalem was destroyed? In reference to the destruction of Jerusalem, Christ said, 'Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world, to this time, no, nor ever shall be,' which could not be true if the common idea of the doctrine of endless misery be true. Had I time I might refer your attention to other scriptures similar to those already quoted, but I forbear.

It now devolves upon me to notice some of the particulars mentioned in the text, in order to understand their bearing upon that death which came upon the Jewish nation, at the time of its overthrow, and which is by the Revelator termed 'the second death.'

And first, what are we to understand by 'the dead small and great' standing before God? By 'the dead small and great,' the Revelator designated the Jews. They were dead in trespasses and sins; they had put the Lord of Life to death, and the measure of their iniquity was fast filling up, when the just judgments of heaven should be poured upon their heads.

Again, what shall we understand by the language which says that the sea, and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them? By this I understand that it was impossible for any to escape the just punishment of their sins. Though they might endeavor to secrete themselves, yet God would surely bring them to judgment. In proof that this was the meaning of the Revelator, I refer you to the language of the Most High by his prophet Amos, and in reference to the same judgment upon the Jews which we are now considering. He says, 'And I will slay the last of them with the sword, and he that fleeth of them shall not flee away, and he that escapeth of them shall not be delivered. Though they dig into hell, thence shall mine hand take them; though they climb up to heaven, thence will I bring them down. And though they hide themselves in the top of Carmel, I will search and take them out thence, and though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them.' Amos ix: 1, 5.

This language, or these expressions used to represent the hiding places of the wicked, and the assurance that they should be brought forth to punishment, are as strong, and in fact very similar to that part of our text which says, that 'the sea, and death, and hell delivered up the dead which were in them,' and by it we understand, that it was, and should be, impossible for those wicked and idolatrous Jews to escape the just punishment of their sins. Though they might call upon the rocks and the mountains to fall upon them, though they might, as is figuratively expressed by the prophet to whom we have referred, be in the bottom of the sea, or dig down to hell, yet they should be brought forth from their hiding places and just punishment be executed upon them.

Lastly, what shall we understand by the books which were opened? No person will deny but that the books here referred to, or spoken of, are figures; no one believes that they were literal books; what then I inquire do they represent?—You will bear in mind that the text, declares first that the books were opened, and then in distinction from these there was another book opened which was 'the book of life.' The dead or idolatrous Jews were judged out of those opened first and which we believe to be figures of the book of God's remembrance, or his eternal purpose to mark iniquity against the transgressor. By the book of life I understand, is meant the Gospel. The Gospel is, by the Revelator a number of times represented under the figure of the 'book of life.' Paul in his epistle to the Philippians, calls the Gospel the book of life. By having their 'names written in the book of life' simply means that they were Christians; that they had through faith, and corresponding good works, entered into the peaceful kingdom of the Messiah, or into the Gospel dispensation. All whose names were not found written in the book of life were cast into the lake of fire. This was true in relation to the Jews to the very letter; for all who rejected the Messiah, were at length taken by the Roman army, their temple and city destroyed, and they made to pass through a series of awful sufferings, represented by the lake of fire in the text.

Those Christians who remained faithful and true to the cause of Christ unto the end, or until the time arrived when the Jewish dispensation should be brought to a close, suffered none of that misery and woe which came upon the Jews. They had been quickened in spirit, renewed in mind, and raised from the beggarly elements of sin and unbelief, to a realizing sense of the high and holy principles of the Gospel of life and salvation. This is what the Revelator terms the first resurrection.—'Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power.' Rev. xx: 6.

In the light of our subject this is made to appear perfectly plain. Those Christians who had been morally raised to the enjoyment of the privileges of the Gospel, on such the 'second death,' or that destruction which befel the Jews, had no power, it effected them not. So entirely exempt were they from it, that not one of their number was taken by the Romans, but all escaped; while the unbelieving Jews were cut off—their nation entirely destroyed and they scattered to the four winds of heaven.

The 'second death' which came upon the Jews as a nation, at the time of their final overthrow, we have now seen was of the same nature or kind with the first which came upon them in Babylon, but still it was more awful, inasmuch as it effected them a much longer duration of time. But in this, as in all the ways of God to man, is heavenly wisdom made to appear, inasmuch as the rescue from the latter, shall be more glorious than that from the former. From the first death they were brought forth to the enjoyment of national life and prosperity; but from the 'second death'—the final disorlution of their nation, from that blindness which a wise Providence saw fit to bring upon them, they shall come forth to the enjoyment of life and blessings which shall never end. This is plainly implied in the language of the Saviour when he declared that the time should ultimately come when they should say 'blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.' Matt. xxiii: 39.

I have now brought our subject to a close. I have given you, what I sincerely believe to be the true meaning of the scripture which has been the theme of remark. Mankind are fallible creatures. We are all liable to err in judgment, hence I ask you not to receive as true, the exposition which has been given of the text, because I have said it was so, but examine it for yourselves, and if you can find a better, or more reasonable view of the subject, embrace it. I do not say that I have given a true explanation of the text, but that I have given what I believe to be the truth. There is a difference of opinion existing in the denomination of Christians to which your speaker belongs in reference to this subject. But all who thus differ, explain the text in such a way as to agree with the language of inspiration that the time shall come when 'there shall be no more death.'

Therefore, though we read of deaths and second deaths, and though there may be an hundred deaths, yet the idea extant in our world, that there is to be an eternal death, is extremely futile; it is entirely out of the question, for if there is truth in the divine testimony the time will come when Christ will have 'destroyed death the last enemy—all things shall be subdued unto Christ, when he himself shall also become subject unto the Father, that God may be all in all.' 1 Cor. xv: 26, 28.

What a glorious prospect is here presented to our view. By the eye of faith we are enabled to look forward through the vista of the future, and behold a world of sinful, erring creatures like ourselves raised from death temporal of the body, freed from death spiritual of the soul, and from all death or deaths to which in the flesh we may have been subject, and made the immortal recipients of the fadeless joys of heaven.

Finally my friends, I leave the subject with you, praying that you will candidly consider what has been said, and that that wisdom which is from above may direct you into all truth. Amen.

THE INVALID POETESS.

Consumption is wasting the form fair and fragile,
To free the pure mind fain to travel the skies;
The heart swells in throes, as storm-waves high and agile,
Yet patient and tranquil the poet-girl lies.

Unmoved, who could witness the tremulous fingers,
Clasp'd o'er the wan brow, or on pained temples preet,
The cheek's hectic bloom that delusively lingers,
And fitful commotions that heave the faint breast?

O'er fortunes adverse, persecutions, bereavements,
Her spirit, upborne, on religion's wings, rose;
Heaven's promises sure have undying endearments,
Which woo the worn soul to sweets courts of repose.

Sustained in the valley of perishing pleasures,
Where clouds banish sunbeams, and flowers fall away,
Hope mounts to the throne of immutable treasures,
And reigns in a realm where no joy can decay.

Her songs' dearest themes are the chaplets unfading,
That bloom on the borders of Canaan's green shore,
The light of whose glory, thought's visions pervading,
Elicits glad anthems her lyre loves to pour.

Yet, not from the earth whence her beauties are taken
That find admiration which erst was delight,
A view of rich landscapes a strain can awaken,
And beam of mild Luna make morn of the night.

And if, while reclining on wearisome pillow,
A glimpse is obtained of bright cloud and blue sky,
She snatches her harp from the cypress and willow,
And sings till the numbers on fainting lips die.

The lay of the wild-bird, the murmur of waters,
Bring childhood's companions, its gardens and streams,
Faith now numbers those among Zion's fair daughters,
And love visits these in its fay-fashioned dreams.

A breeze from fresh meadows, from lilies or roses,
The radiance of gladness can light on her eye;
Of the lone, hallow'd grove that her altar encloses, Low, musical zephyrs most sacredly sigh.

From the fullness of feeling the lachrymal torrent
O'erfloweth anon the soft orbs' azure glow;
To stay the sad tide, and calm grief's ruffled current,
Imparts the best solace my being doth know.

Meek, invalid guest!—much endeared by long presence,
Though loved ere beheld, and in fancy embraced,
Proximity favors the full coalescence
Of sentiment, sympathy, friendship and taste.

My bosom to soothe on my last bed and lowly,
O, grant a kind friend, gracious Giver, above!
Who may love me, as I, through thy providence holy,
This fated young flower of Parnassus do love.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF ODD FELLOWSHIP.

BY BR. W. K. TAYLOR, M. D.

It was on a cold and stormy night in the month of December, 183— that, having as I supposed, completed my business for the day, I was seated in my elbow-chair before a blazing fire of wood, which seemed to bid defiance to the rude blasts of the storm without, recounting to my family a scene of destitution, suffering and distress, which in the prosecution of my professional duties, I had that day witnessed, (and alas! such scenes form a part of the every-day life of the physician) when a violent ringing of the door-bell caused me to start suddenly from my seat and thrusting my feet into my slippers, I proceeded to the door to ascertain the cause of such a call at that late hour and on such a night. On opening the door a gust of wind extinguished my lamp and in an instant enveloped my person in the driving snow. I addressed the person whom I could dimly perceive standing without, requesting him to enter—but my voice was unheard amid the roaring of the storm. However, shaking the snow from his garments he entered the hall, and closing the door I led the way to the parlor, when I recognised him as Mr. V., a young and enterprising merchant of M— street, with whom I was slightly acquainted. He requested me to accompany him immediately to his residence, and upon my inquiring for what member of his family my services were required, he informed me that it was not for his family, but for that of one who though a stranger, was yet a brother—one to whom he was linked by the mystic ties of 'Friendship, Love and Truth.' This language was new to me—for at that time I knew little of Odd Fellowship or of the members of the order—as such—but while I was preparing to accompany him, he informed me of some of the circumstances of the case, and I soon felt my heart warming towards him and his brethren—coworkers in this 'labor of love.'

I learned that Mr. Collins was a native of the state of Pennsylvania, and had been bred to the mercantile business. At an early age, he married a young and accomplished lady, 'nursed in the lap of luxury and ease,' who brought him a considerable fortune which he invested in his business. For several years all went on prosperously, and he already anticipated the time when he should retire from active business, to the enjoyment of that 'otium cum dignitate,' to which every one looks forward with a greater or a less degree of hope, when in an evil hour he was induced, by the hope of rapidly acquiring a fortune, to engage in some of the many wild speculations which were at that time so much in vogue.—He risked his all—and he lost it. Ruined in property, dispirited in mind, and with a delicate wife and four children dependent on his exertions for a maintenance, he resolved to leave the scene of his former prosperity and recent misfortunes, and in some distant place seek to retrieve his broken and shattered fortunes.

In accordance with this resolution, he had removed to the city of — in the hope of procuring such employment as would enable him to support his family in comfort.—Unfortunately he arrived just as the business season was closing, and being totally unacquainted in the city, and withal somewhat diffident, he had been entirely unsuccessful, had expended his scanty stock of money—ay, even to the last cent, and still was apparently no nearer the attainment of his object than when he arrived, and moreover was gradually failing in health and strength, as he saw his every hope blasted, and his delicate and patient wife denying herself food—lest the little ones should suffer from hunger.

It was at this period, that his landlord, failing to receive the few shillings due for the week's rent of the single room he occupied, seized every thing upon which the law could lay its iron hand, and thrust him and his family into the street. It was night, and although he and his wife entreated to be permitted to stay until morning, yet this hard-hearted, this inhuman man relented not,—Out they must go—But where? Alas! he knew not. There was but one person with whom he was sufficiently acquainted to ask even the poor boon of a shelter for the night. This was a poor colored man who had formerly lived in the family of Mrs. Collin's father—and who from regard for her they knew would cheerfully bestow his mite upon them in this their urgent need. But he lived in a distant quarter of the city,—the snow lay deep upon the ground, and the night was an inclement one for females and children to venture out. But 'necessity knows no law'—so taking each a child in their arms, and leading the others by the hand, they set out for the dwelling of their quondam friend.

They had not advanced far on their difficult and toilsome way when the little girl of four years became unable to proceed further on foot, and the father was obliged to take her also in his arms, and thus burdened struggle onward through the already deep-fallen snow. But long ere they had reached their destination, the wife and mother, previously exhausted as she was, by care and anxiety, as well as abstinence from food, sank fainting in the snow. Here then, they were under the necessity of remaining a considerable time, whilst the husband unavailingly endeavored to restore his wife to consciousness—when at length, happily for them, Mr. V., who had been visiting a sick brother, chancing to pass near, was attracted by the distressful cries of the children to inquire into their situation, and before he had heard many sentences from the lips of the agonised husband and father, his sympathies were strongly excited, and hastening to the nearest house, he soon procured assistance and conveyed the distressed family to his own residence.

Arrived there, efforts were promptly made for the relief of the unconscious mother and her half-frozen children, and on removing her frozen garments, her husband's Card of Clearance from a Lodge of Odd Fellows in Philadelphia, was found carefully pinned to the inside of her dress; and on inquiring of Mr. Collins, it was discovered that he had long been a member of the Order, but never having had occasion to avail himself of its benefits, it had not occurred to him to seek the aid of his brethren in the city. Here then Mr. V. found a new incentive to obey the promptings of his kindly heart. He, whom he had assisted as a stranger had proved himself as a Brother!

Finding that Mrs. C., though conscious, was feverish and ill, Mr. V. set out in quest of a physician. On my arrival at his residence, I found Mrs. Collins in such a state of feverish excitement as led me to fear that her previous sufferings would be followed by an untoward event, and the result justified my fears, for in a few hours, she yielded up her spirit in giving birth to a premature child, which died almost ere it saw the light.

On the second day after her death, the funeral was appointed; and by invitation from Mr. V. I attended, and much to my surprise, found a large number of the Brotherhood assembled, to render the last sad duties to the departed mother and her child. A most impressive discourse was pronounced by the Rev. Dr. J. (also a Brother of the Order) and during the services, many an eye, albeit unused to the melting mood, was suffused with tears.

Mr. Collins, on whom sorrows and afflictions had well nigh done the work of disease, insisted on seeing the body of his departed companion committed to the dust, and when he saw the partner of his joys and of his sorrows, her who had so often lain in his bosom, deposited in her long home, beneath the 'clouds of the valley,' his strength forsook him, and he was conveyed to Mr. V.'s in a state of insensibility, which was followed by an illness of many weeks' continuance, during which time he received every attention from his brethren, which kindness and sympathy could dictate. Immediately upon his recovery, he was offered a situation in an extensive mercantile establishment, at a salary sufficient to enable him to support his family in comfort and respectability. In this situation he acquitted himself so much to the satisfaction of his employers that at the expiration of two years he became a member of the firm, and when I last saw him, some few months since, he told me he should ever bless the day that he became an Odd Fellow.

These, reader, were my first impressions of Odd Fellowship, and when I saw so many of its members emulating each other in extending kind offices to their afflicted brother and his family, and saw that they 'wearied not in well-doing,' but on the contrary, so long as their aid was needed, so long was it cheerfully rendered, not, as to a stranger, but as to one to whom they were united by ties strong and during as life itself, then I determined that if these were the deeds inculcated by the principles of the Order, that I too would 'go and do likewise'—that I too would become an Odd Fellow.—[Gavel.]

WOMEN AND MARRIAGE.

I have speculated a great deal upon matrimony. I have seen young and beautiful women, the pride of gay circles, married, as world says—well! Some have moved into costly houses, and their friends have all come and looked at their fine furniture and splendid arrangements for happiness, and they have gone away and committed them to their sunny hopes cheerfully and without fear. It is natural to be sanguine for the young, and at such times I am carried away by similar feelings. I love to get unobserved into a corner and watch the bride in her attire, and with her smiling face and soft eyes moving before me in their pride of life, weave a waking dream over her future happiness, and persuade myself that it will be true. I think how they will sit upon the luxurious sofa as the twilight falls, and build gay hopes, and murmur in low tones the now forbidden tenderness; and how thrillingly the allowed kiss, and the beautiful endearments of wedded life will make even their parting joyous, and gladly will they come back from the crowd and the empty mirth of the gay to each other's quiet company. I picture to myself that young creature, who blushes even now at his hesitating caress, listening eagerly for his footsteps as the night steals on, and wishing that he would come; and when he enters at last, and, with an affection as undying as his pulse, folds her to his bosom, I can feel the very tide that goes flowing through his heart, and gaze with him on her graceful form as she moves about him for the kind offices of affection, soothing all his unquiet cares, and making him forget even himself in her young and unshad-owed beauty.

I go forward, forward for years, and see her luxuriant hair put soberly away from her brow, and her girlish graces ripened into dignity, and her bright loveliness chastened with the gentle meekness of maternal affection.—Her husband looks on her with a proud eye and shows her the same fervent love and the delicate attentions which first won her, and fair children are growing up about them, and they go on full of honor and untroubled years, and they are remembered when they die!

I say I love to dream thus when I go to give the young bride joy. It is the natural tendency of feeling touched by loveliness, that fears nothing for itself; and if ever I yield to darkened feelings, it is because the light of the picture is changed. I am not fond of dwelling on such changes, and I will not minutely now. I allude to it only because I trust that my simple page will be read by some of the young and beautiful beings who daily move across my path; and I would whisper to them, as they glide by joyously and confidently, the secret of an unclouded future.

The picture I have drawn above is not peculiar. It is colored like the fancies of the bride; and many, oh! many an hour will she sit, with her rich jewels lying loose in her fingers, and dream such dreams as these. She believes them too—and she goes on for the while undecieved. The evening is not too long while they talk of plans for their future happiness, and the quiet meal is still a pleasant and delightful novelty of mutual reliance and attention. There comes soon, however, a time when personal topics become bare and wearisome, and slight attentions will not alone keep up the social excitement. There are long intervals of silence, and detected symptoms of weariness, and the husband, first, in his manhood, breaks in upon the hours they were wont to spend together. I can not follow it circumstantially. Then comes long hours of unhappy restlessness, and terrible misgivings, of each other's worth and affection, till, by and by, they can conceal their uneasiness no longer, and go out separately to seek relief, and lean upon the hollow world for the support for which one who has promised to be their lover and friend could not give them!

Heed this, ye who are winning, by your innocent beauty, the affection of a high-minded and thinking being.—Remember that he will give up the brother of his heart with whom he has had even a fellowship of mind, the society of his cotemporary runners in a race of fame, who have held with him a stern companionship; and frequently in his passionate love, he will break away from the arena of his burning ambition, to come and listen to the 'voice of the charmer.' It will bewilder him at first; but it will not long. And then, think you that an idle blanching will chain the mind that has been used for years to an equal communion? Think you he will give up for a weak dalliance, the animating theme of men, and his search into the mysteries of knowledge? Oh, no, lady! believe me, no! Trust not your influence to such light fetters. Credit not the old-fashioned absurdity, that woman's is a secondary lot, ministering to the necessities of her lord and master. If your immortality is as complete, and your gift of mind as capable as ours, I would charge you to water the undying bud, and give it a healthy culture, and open its beauty to the sun; and then you may hope that when your life is bound with another, you will go on equally, and in friendship that will pervade every earthly interest.—[N. P. Willis.]

AN AMUSING ANECDOTE.

We transfer to our columns the following amusing story, from the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser:

'We notice in an Eastern paper a report of a recent action against a London chemist, on account of a hair dye that instead of turning complainant's whiskers to a jetty blackness had raised a blister, in consequence of which, whiskers, skin and all had peeled off. This case reminds us of another attempt at hair dyeing, the consequences of which, if not so distressing, were serious enough to the party. In a country village in this State, some twenty years ago, the village Doctor was chosen Deacon in the Congregational church. The Doctor, though a hale, hearty man, had turned gray in very early life, and at the time we speak of, his locks had become of almost snowy whiteness. He was a gallant man, though a sincere Christian, and his hoary honors somewhat annoyed him. So to grace his new dignity, the night before the Sabbath when 'the sacrament,' as the communion was termed, was to be administered, he undertook to dye his hair to a becoming brown, more suitable to his age. We know not what application he made use of, but during the morning service, while the new Deacon sat under the pulpit, as was customary, the action of the light rapidly worked a chemical and almost magical change in the outward adornment of his head. Some of the locks deepened into a rich brown, while others flashed into a fiery red, and some gently subsided from their pristine whiteness into a most delicate pea green. All unconscious of these variegated honors, at the close of the ordinary service, the Deacon undertook to officiate, bearing round the consecrated bread and wine. The communicants were humble, sincere Christians, feeling deeply the solemnity of the occasion, but the new Deacon's hair was too much for most of them. There was a grim relaxation of the features of the older among them, who might have sat for pictures of the old covenanters, while the younger could scarcely refrain from an unequivocal smile. The venerable apostolic man, who ministered to the congregation, and who, with the most fervent piety had a quick sense of the ludicrous, soon noticed the unwonted bearing of his flock, and its cause, and as the Deacon returned to the table, quietly requested him to refrain from farther service in favor of an old brother, to supply whose place and infirmities of age, he had been chosen. The next day when the Doctor started to visit his patients, his head was clothed with a nicely fitting new black silk skull cap, and several months elapsed before he again officiated as Deacon.'

EDITORIAL COURTESIES.

It is certainly delightful to contemplate the interchange of good feelings and friendly civilities, so generally manifested by the editorial fraternity in their professional relations to each other. This characteristic is the more commendable, when the diverse aims and conflicting interests of parties might seem to excuse a more antagonistic and belligerent character in their professional intercourse, and absolve them from the exercise of those mild amenities and kindly charities that serve to make our earthly pilgrimage pleasant, and tend in some degree to vindicate their title to a common brotherhood. This pervading disposition among our brethren of the press serves also to divest sectarian and partisan warfare of much of its acrimony; and unpalatable truth, like disagreeable but wholesome medicine, is more likely to have its appropriate effect, when offered in an attractive form, than if made repulsive and nauseous by the very manner of its presentation. We are led into these agreeable and self-laudatory reflections by a paragraph we have lately noticed in the papers, in which an Alabama editor has occasion gently and kindly to admonish a rival contemporary. The beneficent spirit which it evinces well illustrates and confirms the truth of our remark, and we commend it to the study of our editorial brethren, in the belief that they will continue in the exercise of those professional courtesies and refinements which so adorn their intercourse with each other, and which are so beautifully exhibited in the paragraph to which we have alluded. Here it is:—[Banner.

'There is a certain Galloway, a thing of the Florence Gazette, and jackass of Florence; sore eye to the present generation, and chokedamp to nature; in brief, a long-legged, lank-sided, sore-shinned, big-footed, goggle-eyed, maggot-eaten, hip-shotten, knock-kneed, gander-shanked, ill-natured, devil-ridden puke of creation that we will be compelled to notice in our next number.'—Itawambian.

CHEAP BAROMETER AND WEATHER GLASS.—Happening into the office of a friend, we observed an ordinary Cologne bottle, suspended on the window casing, nearly filled with a substance resembling an incipient crystalline process. On making inquiry as to its uses, we learned that it was used for barometric purposes, and was a very accurate indicator of the weather. Having been obligingly furnished with the mode of constructing such an instrument, we herewith publish it for the particular benefit of all those who wish to be 'weather wise':

Take a long Cologne bottle and put into it two ounces of common gin; then pulverize and add two drachms of camphor, half an ounce of purified nitre, and the same quantity of ammonia. Then cover the mouth of the bottle with a piece of bladder or parchment, perforated in several places with a needle. When the solid portions settle and the liquid becomes clear, fine weather is indicated, and the reverse when the storm-king is abroad.—Twenty-four hours before a storm, the composition will be in a state of fermentation. In serene and hot weather, the solid portion will sink close to the bottom. The wind will always blow from the quarter opposite to the side to which the substance cleaves.

GOD'S PLEASURE.

The Supreme Being has said by the mouth of one of his prophets, that his counsel shall stand and that he will do all his pleasure, a truth which no believer in the existence of an all-wise and all-powerful God, can reasonably deny; and now the question comes up, what is the Lord's pleasure relative to the final destiny of the children of men?

For an answer to this question, we will not go to the different members of the different churches in the land, but to the records of the Deity's revealed will, and there evidence may be found in which may be placed the confidence of all men; and therefore let us listen to the instruction thereof. Eph. i: 9, 10.—'Having made known to us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself: that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him.' Here the apostle declares that God's will is made known, even the mystery of that will, and what is it? That in 'the dispensation of the fulness of times'—during the period of the Gospel dispensation; during the time of the mediation of our Saviour between God and man, he might gather all things in Christ, whether they were things in heaven or in the earth. Such is the pleasure of the Supreme Being relative to the final destiny of mankind, and it must and will be accomplished for he has said; 'my counsel shall stand and I will do all my pleasure.'

Thus, how plainly is the salvation of the intelligent creation taught by the Scripture! So plain, that there is not room left for even the bare semblance of a lingering doubt; sufficiently plain to carry conviction of its truth to the heart of every sensible man. And why should so many doubt its truth? Why so many declare the doctrine of Universalism false, in view of the positive nature of the scriptural evidence by which it is sustained? Why so many who are ever ready to lift up their voices and declare it false? The reason is obvious:—Because of prejudice, superstition, or inattention. With prejudice and superstition afar; aided by reason and reflection, the final salvation of the whole human family can not be a matter of doubt.

But an objection may be made to the argument drawn from the pleasure of the Lord, by saying, that it is the pleasure of the Supreme Being, that all men should now abstain from sin, but they do not; and hence, though it may be the pleasure of the Lord that all mankind should finally be saved, yet they may never be saved, even as all men do not now abstain from sin.

This objection is somewhat plausible at the first view, but when examined carefully, it will be observed to be without any good foundation. Respecting the pleasure of the Lord in reference to man's present abstinence from sin, we will illustrate it in this manner. Your child is disobedient—it is your pleasure that it should be obedient—but it is not obedient, and therefore it never will be! So it is God's pleasure that mankind abstain from sin, but they do not, and therefore they never will! Here you have the nature of the objection, and does it possess a firm and substantial foundation? one which should lead the mind to doubt the salvation of the whole human race? To the similitude and we will see:—

Your child is disobedient. It is your pleasure that it should be obedient; and you have the power to make it so; and how will you do it? By the employment of the best means, of course. When? In the twinkling of an eye? No. But in your own good time, as directed by your better judgment, you will take the correcting rod, and with that and your instruction, make your child obedient to all of your requirements. So mankind committed sin. It is God's pleasure that they should abstain from it; and he has the power thus to make them, and will he do it? Yes, for he has declared that he will do all of his pleasure. But how will he accomplish this work?—the abstinence of mankind from sin? By the employment of the best means, of course. When? In the twinkling of an eye? No. But in his own good time, and according to his own good pleasure, he assures that he will turn the hearts of the children of men as the rivers of water are turned; that their wills shall be subject to his will; and of course they will sin no more.

Thus our brother's objection is at once discovered to be without any judicious foundation, and the argument from the pleasure of God in favor of the salvation of all mankind, remains in full force and may be stated in few words. 1. It is God's pleasure that all men should be gathered together in Christ our Saviour. 2. God says by the mouth of his prophet:—My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure? Then, we ask, will all men be gathered together in Christ? S. J. G.

VERY MANLY!

'Austin's Voice to Youth.'—This is a Universalist book, written by a Universalist minister. School districts who wish to have their scholars nurtured up in this doctrine, had better put it in their libraries—for although the 'pill' of Universalism is 'coated' over with the 'sugar' maxims of virtue, yet the picra is there; and if given freely will no doubt do its work. Read for instance, the chapter on 'Religious Opinions,' pp. 100, 101. Query.—Is the Superintendent of Common Schools aware that such is the character of one of the books he has recommended?

The above precious display of manliness and candor, forms an editorial item in the Northern Christian Advocate, (Methodist) of the 6th inst. It is a perfect specimen of the low and pitiable appeals to the prejudices of the ignorant portion of the community, for which a certain class of Methodist preachers have long been notorious. I would inform my neighbor Rounds that his advice to introduce the Voice to Youth into school libraries comes altogether too late. It has long since been adopted by most of the school libraries in this State, as a standard work—with the commendation too, of many who sympathize with him in religious tenets—and the demand for it is constantly increasing. I thank this Methodist Editor for informing his readers that the Superintendent of common schools, has 'recommended' this book for school libraries. This recommendation of the Hon. Secretary of State and Superintendent of Common Schools, will have more weight with people of common sense, than the impotent slurs of all the Methodist Editors in the Union.—The publishers of the Voice should be truly grateful to Br. Rounds for thus rendering his assistance in increasing its circulation.

The State Superintendent must surely feel highly complimented by the high estimation in which his intelligence and impartiality are held by the Editor of the Northern Christian Advocate, who virtually charges him with recommending a book of the character of which he was ignorant, and at the same time attempts to seduce him from faithfulness to the high trust confided to him, by a dishonorable appeal to the religious prejudices which it was supposed he harbored. The meaning of his language is something like this:—'Good Mr. Superintendent, you must be a very blockhead to recommend this Voice to Youth for school libraries. You must have been stupidly ignorant of its 'character!' Why—mirabile dictu!—it was 'written by a Universalist minister!!' 'And as you, undoubtedly, like many of us evangelicals, have a pigmy soul and giant prejudices, this annunciation above will be abundant sufficient to induce you to kick it out of every library forthwith.'

In his attempt at wit, Br. Rounds selected a very expressive and appropriate figure, highly complimentary to Universalism. 'Picra' is a good old fashioned medicine, which in its operation cleanses the system from all impurity and disease, and renders it healthy and vigorous. That Universalism has this purifying effect upon the public body, wherever given 'freely,' is a well attested fact. Could certain individuals of the Methodist ministry take a dose of this spiritual 'picra,' occasionally, it would no doubt operate very favorably in purging away some of those peculiar 'infirmities' which have led so many of their brethren to ruin! As to Methodism I know of no drug which more truly represents it than the poisonous opium—which first excites and then stupifies and prostrates the whole system. When taken 'freely,' opium excites to phrenzy and death,—a characteristic of Methodism, which has alas! been proved too fatally, by many a poor maniac and suicide!

If Br. Rounds wishes to compare the operation of the 'pill' given by Methodists, with that administered by the Universalists, let him some leisure afternoon, walk with me through the State Prison within sight of our doors. I think an abundance of melancholy and truthful examples will be found of the effect of his medicines, both on ministers and people, to seal his lips forever on this subject. Let us see how a paraphrase of the language at the head of this article will sound, which shall be true, to the letter:

'Life of Newton.—This is a Methodist book, written by a Methodist minister—which many have been deceived into reading under the supposition that it was the life of Sir Isaac Newton, whereas it is the biography of a Methodist preacher. School districts who wish to have their scholars nurtured up in this doctrine, had better put it in their libraries. For although the 'pill' of Methodism is 'coated' over with the 'sugar' of most seductive errors, teaching men that they can 'roll sin as a sweet morsel under their tongue' through life, and by a brief repentance at death, escape all punishment, here and hereafter, yet the poison is there; and if given freely; will no doubt do its corrupting work, as our prisons will abundantly testify. Query.—Is the Superintendent of Common Schools aware that this Methodist book, and many other partialist works of a sectarian character, have been assiduously thrust into our school libraries?' J. M. A.

APOLOGY,

We owe an apology to many of our friends, correspondents and readers, and in fact to the public, for seeming neglect for some two months past. Many private letters of friends and some on business remain unanswered; a number of communications from correspondents have not been examined sufficiently to decide for or against their admission; others that are defective, but yet have merits, we have not had time to correct, nor yet to write the authors stating the facts; many topics of general, and some of particular public interest or denominational importance, and some new publications, we have been unable to notice, and in fact have been unable to devote the time that it required to the editorial department of this paper.

Our only apology is, that an unexpected and uncommon press (though it is common for us to have a large amount) of business, some professional, but mostly secular, has completely engrossed our time, taking us, as it were, by storm and compelling us to surrender unconditionally, leaving us no chance even for capitulation. Our health, too, during some part of the time, has been unequal to our task, although we have in no case neglected meeting our regular appointments for the Sabbath, however distant they might be. We hope and trust the greatest hurry and pressure of business for the season is now past, with the exception of attendance on the State Convention and such Associations as we can and must attend, and that we shall find time hereafter to do a little better justice to our department of the paper. Thanks to such correspondents as have supplied our wants with articles prepared and fitted for publication. Some articles, unfit as they were for the compositor, we have stolen time to fit, and others lay on and under the table. Thanks also to such of our Corresponding Editors as have furnished their usual quota of matter. One in particular has never, for a single week, left his department vacant. Others perhaps did not know of our state of health and entire occupancy otherwise. Possibly they considered our office a sinecure. If so, they were entirely mistaken. There is not one of our humblest correspondents but what receives quite as liberal a salary, both from public and publisher as ourself. And we hope all will cheerfully help to bear the burden devolving on us as a denomination, or brotherhood of believers.

We hope to be able to answer some of our private correspondents, ere long, and to do a little better by our publications than of late. But the latter must remember that we can not answer all of them privately that we do not publish; and that but little over half the communications received find their way to the public eye and ear.

ANOTHER NEW PAPER.

Br. L. S. Everett, whose removal from Salem we announced some weeks since, has removed to Buffalo and issued proposals for publishing a new religious journal to be entitled 'The Western Evangelist,' and devoted to liberal Christianity, and the social, moral and intellectual improvement of mankind. It is to be published weekly on an imperial sheet, (about the size, we take it, of the Trumpet of the N. Y. Christian Messenger,) with new type, &c. Br. Everett is to be both Editor and Publisher, and to furnish subscribers with the paper at $2 per annum in advance, to which 25 cents will be added for every three months delay of payment. Every ten subscribers obtained entitles the agent to one copy.

Br. E. is an active man and a capable writer; and if another paper of the kind is needed in this State, will undoubtedly meet with success in his new undertaking.

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

Are hereby respectfully informed that there is an exceeding dearth in our copy drawer at the present time. We have not heard from some of them for a long, long time—from some that used to contribute very generously. For that reason we have been 'backward about coming forward,' to ask them for their acceptable assistance.—Our present necessity obliges us to individualise somewhat, as far as initials go. We hope Br. J. S. K., who used to send us an excellent batch now and then, has not entirely forgotten us. Br. A. R. B. has been a long time absent from our columns, too. It is true he is a long distance from us, but we'll willingly bear the expense of postage on all that he will send; shall we not hear from him soon? If we remember right, Br. J. L. of Ulysses, intimated that we should hear from him—hope we shall. Those brethren in the western part of the State who generously extended the helping hand in the early part of the volume, have our thanks for their kindness, and though we do not like to 'ride a free horse excessively,' they need not be afraid to give us another lift.

We should not object to hear from some of our Corresponding Editors a little more frequently, but as they, one and all, kindly tendered such services as they would be able to render, the present year, without fee or reward, we feel a delicacy about urging them. If they would all keep us as well supplied as one has, we should have no lack for matter or variety. But brethren, co-editors and all, help us—help the cause, when you can consistently with your avocations and situations, and believe us grateful for your favors past and—to come. W.

Harpers Publications.

PICTORIAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND. The first number of this work has just appeared. It is published in octavo form, and is printed on paper of a very fine quality, and new type. This number contains 80 double column pages, is profusely illustrated with fine wood engravings and embraces 'an introductory view of the original population and primitive history of the British islands, the civil and military transactions, history of the religion and the constitution, government and laws' of its early inhabitants.

The leading design of this work is to present a HISTORY OF THE PEOPLE, as well as a HISTORY OF THE KINGDOM, pursuing the investigation of the past, and the progress of the country and its inhabitants, in various interesting directions, to which the authors of the most popular of existing English histories have only slightly and incidentally referred. The narrative of political movements and changes, of foreign and domestic wars, of contests for power in which the people have only had to obey and suffer, will be found given with the fullness which the importance of these subjects demands. The work will be derived throughout, as far as possible, from original authorities and other authentic monuments of the past, compared with, and read by, the light of the latest inquiries by which the critical spirit of modern times has illustrated ancient annals. But a large body of facts not comprehended under this head, forming a most essential part of the moral and social history of the country, will also be presented in ample detail.

To be completed in about 40 numbers, at 25 cents per number, forming four large elegant volumes.

No. 54 (and the last) of the elegant edition of the ILLUSTRATED BIBLE, contains the remainder of the concordance, a beautiful presentation plate, the meeting of Jacob and Joseph, small title page to the Old Testament, order and names, and number of chapters of the Old and New Testaments and the Apocrypha, family record of marriages, births and deaths, Christ healing Bartimeus, full title pages of the Old and New Testaments, &c.

We have seen a copy of this magnificent work bound at Mr. Beesley's, who can furnish either bound or unbound volumes. Numbers 25 cents each.

Part XIV of the Dictionary of PRACTICAL MEDICINE contains and treats upon four species of insanity, and some four or five other diseases. This is a valuable work.—Price 50 cents per number.

BOARDING OUT or domestic life, is a neat 12mo volume of 128 pages, by the author of 'Keeping house and house keeping,' &c., &c. These volumes always contain something interesting, useful and instructive, specially to the young. 38 cents.

No. 12 of the ILLUSTRATED WANDERING JEW, is got up in the usual neat style of the preceding numbers. 25 cts. RICHELIEU, is number 16 of the pocket edition of Select Novels. It is a tale of France, by James. Two volumes in one, containing 506 pages 12mo. for 25 cents. All the above works for sale by G. N. Beesley, this city.

The May No. (11) of the FARMER'S LIBRARY is published. Thae's principles of Agriculture occupies about 60 pages of this number, and treats upon the method of raising various grains, and plants which are particularly useful to the agriculturalist. The Monthly Journal contains an article entitled 'Desultory hints to farmers—labor saving,' &c., by Horace Greeley. A variety of other subjects relating to grains, cattle, &c., are treated upon. For sale by G. N. Beesley.

WAR WITH MEXICO.—Our readers have already seen by the secular papers that war in real earnest has already commenced between the United States and Mexico.—War is a great evil and its existence at any time and in any country to be deplored. We hope this will soon terminate—that our country's honor will not be tarnished, and that all existing difficulties will be adjusted between this country and all others where any misunderstanding exists, and peace universal prevail.* To the secular press we must refer our readers for the items of news in relation to the war.

¶ We have frequently been requested to write something on the subject of the Second Death, but have delayed from time to time for a more convenient season.—Not knowing when we shall find time to write, or that, if we do, we can say any thing more pertinent, or as much so as Br. Parker's ingenious and well written discourse on the subject, we have transferred it to our columns from the Christian Messenger, not doubting our readers will be highly gratified and edified thereby. Let no one neglect to give it a careful and prayerful perusal. D. S.

Removals.

Br. C. S. Brown from Cortlandville to Harford, Cortland county. Union and Messenger please copy.

Br. E. Guilford from Ashfield to West Cummington, Mass.

Br. A. C. Barry we understand leaves this week for Richmond, Va., where he is to commence his labors next Sunday. May the Lord bless him and the society to which he goes to proclaim the Gospel of peace and salvation.

No. 7 of MAUNDER'S TREASURY OF HISTORY is received from Daniel Adee, publisher, 107 Fulton street, N. York. This number concludes the history of England, embracing a period of time from the year 1795 down to the last year (1845). The history of Ireland is commenced and relates events which transpired in that country from A. D. 432 down to 1361. It is interesting, yet concise, being so much interwoven with the previous history of England. 25 cents per number—12 numbers complete the series.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The Central Association of Universalists in New York, will hold its annual session in Lebanon Centre, Madison county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday, 3d and 4th of June, 1846.

The several societies within the bounds of the Association, are requested to send two delegates each, to represent them in Council. Brethren—will you do it?

E. M. WOOLLEY, Standing Clerk.

OTSEGO ASSOCIATION.

In accordance with adjournment, this Association will meet at Richfield Springs, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday (24th and 25th) of June. The Council will convene at 8 o'clock on Wednesday morning; public religious services at half past ten o'clock, when the occasional sermon will be delivered by Br. A. C. Barry.—The society of Richfield hereby extend a cordial invitation to ministering brethren and friends to come up to this annual feast. A committee of arrangements may be found at the church. O. WHISTON, Stand. Clerk.

MOHAWK RIVER ASSOCIATION.

The Mohawk River Association of Universalists will hold its annual session at Newport village, Herkimer co., on the second Wednesday and following Thursday, 10th and 11th, of June next. Services to commence at 11 o'clock, A. M. of Wednesday. Delegates from the different societies are requested to be there so that the Council can convene and organize at 8 o'clock in the morning. Each society is urgently solicited to send two delegates to represent them in the Council. The Clerks of the different societies are also requested to furnish their respective delegates with statistics of the condition of their societies, the number of members, the amount of preaching they enjoy, and finally their present condition and future prospect.

Our friends at Newport will be in readiness to receive us; come then brethren, from the east, the west, the north and the south, preachers and laymen, and their associates; come all who conveniently can, and hear the occasional sermon by Br. D. Skinner. J. D. HICKS, S. Clerk.

NOTICE.

The Buffalo Association of Universalists will hold its annual session at Aurora, Erie county, on the second Wednesday and Thursday (10th and 11th) of June. It is earnestly desired that every society within the limits of the Association will be fully represented, and that the delegates will be prepared with full statistics. Ministers and others from abroad may call on the writer, the first house north of the Universalist church.

S. GORF, Standing Clerk.

NOTICE.

The Christian Universalist Association for Canada West, will hold its annual session in the village of Bloomfield, Prince Edward District, on Friday, Saturday and Sunday the 12th, 13th and 14th of June next. A general attendance of friends is expected. Ministers and members of all denominations are respectfully invited, and ministering brethren from the States are urgently solicited to attend. Bloomfield is situated about 40 miles south west from Kingston and 4 miles from Picton, between which place and Kingston a line of steamboats run daily.

Friends will be at the wharf on the arrival of the boats to convey our brethren from a distance to the place of the meeting of the Association. Per order,

Bellville, May 15, 1846. DAVID LEAVITT, S. Clk.

Trumpet, Messenger, and Luminary please copy.

DEDICATION AND CONFERENCE.

The meeting house recently erected at Edmeston Centre, Otsego county, will be dedicated to the service of God on Wednesday 17th of June.

A Conference of this Association will meet for this occasion and continue during Wednesday and Thursday, 17th and 18th. O. WHISTON, Standing Clerk.

CONFERENCE.

A Conference of the Hudson River Association of Universalists will be held at Porter's Corners, in Greenfield, the third Wednesday and Thursday (17th and 18th) of June. An invitation is extended to all, either in or out of the Association, who can make it convenient to attend.

Porter's Corners is about eight miles from Saratoga Springs, and it is hoped that friends who intend to visit this celebrated watering place this season, as many of them as can, will find it convenient to do so at that time, and meet with us on that occasion. All such will be gratuitously and cheerfully transported from the Springs to the place of meeting and back. Our friends from Greenfield will be in waiting, on the afternoon of Tuesday, the day previous to the meeting; and visiting friends who desire to go, will please report themselves at Huling's Book Store, on Broadway, opposite the American Hotel.

J. A. ASPINWALL, S. Clerk.

MISSIONARY NOTICE.

There will be a special meeting of the 'Missionary Society of the Cayuga Association of Universalists,' in the 'Union Hall' at Lansingville, on Wednesday, June 3d, at 9 o'clock, A. M. As the business which is to come before the society is important, it is hoped that every delegate will be present; and it is desirable that the delegates should be prepared to give such information as will enable the Board of Officers to send a Missionary immediately into the field, which is now white, already for the harvest, and only wants a skilful reaper to yield an abundant increase.

LOVE TO GOD AND MAN.

BY REV. J. B. SAX.

May love supreme our bosoms fill,
To God our heavenly king,
And to his temple may our hearts,
Most holy incense bring.

May universal love to man—
That love which Jesus felt, —Fill all our souls, and cause the ice
Of selfishness to melt.

O, then shall peace in mighty floods,
And happiness in streams,
Descend upon us from the Lord,
Above our fondest dreams.

Joy, in perennial, vernal bloom,
Shall in our breasts abide,
And bound in wreaths about our heads,
Will every sorrow hide.

Celestial music, soft and sweet,
Will bring us sleep at night,
And angels voices sweetly call,—
To view the morning light.

And spirits bright, shall whisper peace,
As in the breeze they hide,
While angels with effulgent robes
On every sunbeam ride.

FASTIDIOUSNESS.

'There is an evil which I have seen under the sun and it is common among men.' Eccl. vi: 1.

MR. EDITOR,—There is a sort of lukewarm piety, or more properly speaking, a purblind morality, which is so very delicate in its feelings, so wonderfully fastidious in its taste, that the plain spoken words of truth, give great offence to it, though spoken in behalf of its possessor. It is of no use to its owner, and certainly of no value to the cause of religion: I have reference to that kind of feeling so often displayed by many, when strong truths are set forth in plain and forcible language, in opposition to error and misrepresentation. There are many who profess to be warm and most ardent supporters of Universalism, who belong to this class of people. For instance, they go to church, and if the preacher should happen to wax a little warm in defence of his cause against the vile misrepresentations and slanders so plentifully poured out upon us by our adversaries; and if he should perchance make use of a few strong terms, and some very emphatic phraseology, in a moment they begin to tremble and faint, particularly if any orthodox friends happen to be present; and are ready to go away and say, 'Well, I declare, that is too bad! Mr.—put on most too hard, this morning! For my part, I like a doctrinal sermon once in a while; yet I think practical preaching is better calculated to advance our cause now.' Or if this be not the language, it is something like this. 'I really think Mr.—is most too combative. I really can not see the necessity of giving us doctrinal discourses so often; or if there is, he need not make use of such strong phraseology!' Now I ask if this is right? Is not our cause as strong a cause, as good a cause, and one every way as efficient to promote the welfare and happiness of mankind, as the miserable system of partialism? and if so, is it not every way worthy of as warm a support? Shall we, as a denomination, sit still and hear the aspersions cast upon us as God's creatures, that we are neither a praying nor a religious people, that we take not the Bible for our standard of faith; or if do, that we grossly misrepresent its statements: that we are corrupt in our religious and moral principles, and that there is but one step between us and infidelity, or down right atheism? Are we to be held up as every thing that is vile, Sabbath after Sabbath, from the pulpit, and week after week by the popular orthodox journals of the day; and must we sit still and directly sanction such things by a mute indifference, or not opening our mouths? If such be the case, then we had better ground arms at once, and yield the point in controversy between us and our orthodox neighbors.

I would simply ask the question, how we as a denomination, have arrived at the point of respectability we now occupy, if it was not by the much censured doctrinal preaching? Manfully and heroically has every inch of the ground been disputed from the days of father Murray down to the present moment; and it has been the bold and fearless declaration of the doctrine of universal salvation, in opposition to the threadbare and absurd theories of our opponents, that has caused men to listen, to think, and to act, by throwing off the shackles that bound them and enlisting under our banner in the glorious cause of free and impartial grace. And now shall we for fear of giving offence to a few weak nerves, cease to boldly proclaim our principles, and fearlessly vindicate our cause, by casting back the reproaches heaped upon us, at the door of their rightful owners where they belong? Shall we compromise the matter with our enemies, by meekly and quietly holding our tongues after so much hard labor has been expended to establish our principles and build up our cause? Shall we meanly, timidly, and ingloriously shrink from defending the cause that receives the support of so many great and wise and good men of the age? I hope not! I know not! People who take offence at doctrinal preaching can be but of little service to any cause. If they be but timid supporters of God's truth, such support in the eyes of God I fear is hardly acceptable. If our cause be the cause of truth, it must succeed, despite all opposition, for 'the eternal years of God are hers.'

Our orthodox neighbors sometimes put on grave faces, and with serious looks talk about dangerous truths that must not be proclaimed to the people; but I have yet to learn there is any such thing as a dangerous truth! or that there are any such things in our keeping. Truth is truth, and as such can not be proclaimed too often, nor maintained too manfully; and shall we light our candle and put it under a bushel? Did Christ fail to tell the Scribes and Pharisees what he thought of them, through fear? Never. Did Peter and Paul and Barnabas fail to 'wax bold,' when warning the people, or defending themselves against persecutions? Never! Let any one read the sermon on the day of Pentecost, or any of the preachings and defences of Paul and his collaborators, (Stephen, for instance,) and ask himself the question. No! death itself did not restrain nor terrify them; much less the fear of giving offence to men. Jesus failed not tell the Scribes and Pharisees that they were whited sepulchres, full of dead men's bones; that they were inwardly full of hypocrisy and deceit; that their fathers had killed the prophets; that they were a generation of vipers; that upon them should come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom they slew between the temple and the altar; and further, that they were of their father the devil, and his lusts they would do!

Surely, here is an example for boldness in preaching which ought to be more fearlessly followed than is generally done. Not that I would wish to be uncharitable at all; but there is, as many must be aware, a sad deficiency in the proper understanding and explanation of many of the strong doctrinal passages on which the superstructure of Universalism is laid, even among many of its most zealous members. This should not, or would not be, were it not that ministers are sometimes too much afraid of offending the delicacy of their hearers, or the hearers themselves were too exquisitely tender in this matter. Christ severely rebukes this sort of feeling in the 11th chapter of Matthew. He tells his disciples they should be hated of all men for his name sake; but he continually tells them to 'fear not.' The disciple is not above his Master nor the servant above his Lord. In another place he tells them, 'If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you.' In Matthew he goes on to say; that whosoever confessed him before men, he would confess them before his Father in heaven; and whosoever denied him before men, he would deny them before his Father in heaven. He did not come to bring peace, but a sword; and that his cause would be the means of setting men at variance with each other: that a man's foe should be those of his own household. He admonished them, that he that loves father or mother, or son, or daughter more than him is not worthy of him; and he that takes not up his cross and follows him is not worthy of him; and he concludes by telling them that he that by rejecting or forsaking, or feeling ashamed of him, should find his life, should lose it, but he that stood up boldly and manfully in his cause, not shrinking or fearing the reproach of others, if he lost his life, should find it. Let the class of people of whom I am speaking bear these things in mind, and endeavor to profit thereby, by not being ashamed of God or his cause.

E. CASE, JR.

Clinton L. Institute, May 9th, 1846.

WISE CONCLUSION!

A Universalist and Methodist were in conversation the other day in a neighboring county, on the subject of religion, when the latter gentleman quoted the sin against the Holy Ghost as proof positive against our faith. 'There!' said he, 'that is a knock down argument for you!' To which our friend replied, 'But you certainly sing,

'Life is the time to serve the Lord,
The time to ensure the great reward;
And while the lamp holds out to burn
The WILEST sinner may return.'

The wilest sinner is certainly not worse than the one who sins against the Holy Ghost—he must be the very man indeed.' The Methodist upon this, found that his throat was very much stopped up—and after sundry a-hems and attempts to clear his pipes, came to the following luminous conclusion: 'Well, you know we sing a great many things that are not true.' Rather an honest confession if it was forced; and we think it will be much more acceptable to God than the worship carried on by songs that are false in principle. Our Universalist friend says that the Methodist has looked dry at him ever since the conversation alluded to. He is hardly to be blamed for such looks under the circumstances.

THE NATURAL AND MORAL WORLD CONSIDERED.

A SERMON, delivered in the Universalist Church in Fulton, Sunday morning, May 3d, 1846; and published by request.

BY REV. L. M. HAWES.

'For lo! the winter is past, the rain is over and gone. The flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land.'
Solomon's Songs ii: 11, 12.

In selecting these beautiful words as our motto on the present occasion, it is almost needless to say, that they now have their literal fulfilment. We are all aware that another winter is past, and numbered among the times and seasons that have been, but are not. We have experienced its furious storms and its biting frosts; and we have sighed for the return of spring. At length she has come. Stern winter has relaxed his grasp upon our land, and the flowers which he scattered with an icy hand, again appear in their wonted vigor and beauty.—The songsters of the grove have also resumed their places in our midst, and their music again breaks the monotony of forest, grove and glen. The beasts of the field now venture abroad to bask in the sunbeams, or crop the verdant lawn. The veriest insect that creeps or flies, filled with new life, now comes forth to the banquet which nature spreads for all. The little rivulets have broken their icy fetters, and are pursuing their accustomed courses in laughing melody. In fine, there is nought in nature that does not exhibit new life, new beauties and new charms. We ourselves join in and partake of the general vivacity. The glad voices that ring out upon the balmy air from hamlet or cot, tell us of the rejoicing hearts of those who dwell therein. It is the natural effect which the return of spring occasions, and we can not resist it upon ourselves.

Nor are we left merely to admire this joyous season, to express our delight at the gladdening scene which opens to our view on every hand. Great and useful lessons of instruction may we learn herefrom. Who can go forth at this season to behold the beauties of nature—to admire the vegetable world with its endless variety, and not be led to the conclusion, that there is a God, infinite in wisdom, power, and goodness? Philosophise as we may, how can we come to the belief that matter could have created itself? That the infinite variety which obtains in the animal, mineral, and vegetable kingdoms, is the result of chance? That from a finite cause, nay, from no cause, have sprung such infinite results? The minutest flower that sips the morning dew—the smallest plant that grows beneath our feet, bear the impress of their divine Author. The beauty, order, and variety, that pervade the vegetable world, from the towering oak of the forest, to the most humble plant in nature's garden, all bespeak the existence of a Creator who is perfect in all his attributes.

What, save infinite wisdom, could have produced an infinite variety? What but omnipotence could have called this variety into being? And what else than unbounded goodness could have made every thing subservient to some good end? Nothing formed in vain. The various kinds of vegetables existing in every part of the globe, for the benefit of man and beast, are greatly illustrative of the provident care of the Creator, and are continually reminding us of the fact, that nothing has been created in vain. In the language of another,—'the cow-pastures in the cavity of the valley; the bounding sheep on the declivity of the hill; the scrambling goat browses among the shrubs of the rock; the duck feeds on the water plant of the river; the hen with attentive eye, picks up every grain that is scattered and lost in the field; the pigeon of rapid wing collects a similar tribute from the refuse of the grove; and the frugal bee turns to account even the small dust of the flower. There is no corner of the earth where the whole vegetable crop may not be reaped. Those plants which are rejected by one are a delicacy to another.' How clearly and familiarly does this language set forth the truth, that every thing in the natural world is designed to contribute to some benevolent purpose?

But let us see how man in common with the beasts, is made the partaker of benefits derived from the vegetable world. It is well known that the two principal component parts of atmospheric air, are oxygen and nitrogen. The former is essential for the support of animal life; while the latter, of itself, is incapable of being made subservient to this object. Now were there no means of restoring the oxygen which is taken from the atmosphere by respiration and combustion, we know not how soon animal life would cease. But we learn from chemistry that 'the leaves of trees, and other vegetables, give out during the day a large portion of oxygen gas, which, uniting with the nitrogen thrown off by animal respiration, keeps up the equilibrium, and preserves the purity of the atmosphere.' Again, we learn from the same source, that the atmosphere contains some portion of 'carbonic acid,' and 'carburetted hydrogen gas,' both of which are prejudicial to animal life. As these are continually being produced, they would soon prove fatal to both man and beast, were it not that vegetables are so constituted as to require them for food and growth. To say nothing of the various other ways by which mankind derive incalculable benefit from the vegetable kingdom, we may discover in the instances, its utility in contributing so essentially to their good. It may be inquired why vegetation does not always flourish in all parts of the earth? Why should it ever decay and die? What is it, we inquire, that makes spring so joyous a season? What but the reappearance of verdure and flowers? What but the absence of these for a period, causes us to hail its return with so much joy? Again, the decomposition of vegetation serves to enrich the soil, and thus prepare it for the greater benefit of man. True, the plant that now flourishes, being watered by gentle showers and strengthened by the sun's invigorating rays, must return to earth, and mingle with the dust. And yet from its ruins another springs up to flourish in its place.—No part of vegetation is entirely destroyed; not even the leaves that fall from the trees in autumn, it is only a change which the whole undergoes.—Hence the poet hath aptly said—

'Organic form with chemic changes strive,
Live but to die, and die but to revive;
Immortal matter braves the transient storm,
Mounts from the wreck, unchanging but in form.'

If these are some of the lessons of instruction which we may gather from a contemplation of the works of creation, and the laws pertaining thereto, then are we not strongly invited to devote some portion of our time to their examination? If our minds are led from nature, up to nature's God—if from the objects presented to our view in the natural world, we may form some correct opinion of their great Creator—if from their variety, order, beauty, and utility, we are led to behold some of the perfections of the Invisible, and to render unto him that praise and adoration which is due, then indeed, we shall have gained much. If we thus learn the impartiality and the infinite goodness of our Creator, truly great will be our knowledge.—We shall have found a starting point from which we can not easily go astray. We shall have laid the foundation, upon which to rear the superstructure of a correct religious faith.

We shall have placed the corner stone in the temple of religious freedom; and as we progress with our spiritual building, we may gain additional aid and receive greater strength from the volume of divine inspiration. Let us not fail then to study God's 'Elder Scriptures,' the book of nature, and here gather those evidences of divine wisdom, power, and goodness, which so fully abound. Let us remember as we gaze upon the variegated scenery of nature, that it bears the impress of divinity—that the seal of Him who is all-wise and good is placed upon it. Let it inspire us with a reverential awe for its divine Author—teach us to adore the high and holy One—instruct us to possess humility, gratitude, and love, and make us wiser and better.

Thus far we have endeavored to draw instruction from our text taken in its literal and natural sense. May we not now, by accommodation consider it in a moral point of view. It hardly need be said, that the moral world has its autumn, and winter, its spring, and summer. There are periods when the human mind seems possessed of but little moral life and vigor. There are seasons when the flowers of peace and happiness are withered and dying; when the knell of departed and departing joys, is pealing its notes of sorrow in the ears of the well-wishers of humanity—when prejudice, superstition, and bigotry, seem to have bound the mind fast in their icy chains, and frozen the tender sympathies of the human heart. Such a period may truly be denominated a moral winter. That such a period has been, must be obvious to all who are capable of viewing moral subjects in their true light, who have sought moral reformations upon principles of liberality, of justice, and kindness, and have beheld with pleasure, the salutary changes which have occurred in the moral world within the last few years. We do not say that these changes have been as great as is desirable, or as they are yet to be; but we do believe that the moral winter is past, and the reign of prejudice and error is over and gone.

Who does not know, that the principles upon which moral reformations are based, and wrought out, at the present day, are to a considerable extent, very different, from those employed for the same purpose, a few years since? Then, such reformations were sought only by appeals to the lower or animal propensities of man. They were sought through the medium of such motives as 'play round the head, but come not near the heart.' Fear was the great incentive to produce obedience and correct moral action; and was deemed no less the palladium of religious, than civil liberty. Coercion was the mildest method of securing loyalty and submission, in church as well as in state. But we rejoice that a change for the better has taken place—that mild measures are being adopted—the law of kindness is beginning to be appreciated—that man has come to be considered capable of being influenced by gentleness and love. Indeed the spring time of truth and kindness seems to have arrived in the moral world, and we believe the summer is not far distant. How should the heart of the philanthropist and the Christian, swell with joy, as they turn their eyes from the 'cloud begirt centuries of the past,' and behold the dawning of that moral light which betokens the approach of a more glorious era.

As evidence of the change which has occurred, we can not forbear to cite, first, the oft mentioned temperance reformation, with which our country has so signally been blessed within the last few years. Truly it has caused the flowers of sobriety and peace to spring up in our midst. The human tongue long employed to chant the lascivious song, has been heard to make music of a nobler and purer kind; and the rough hoarse voice, coming up from the ditch on the way-side, has been changed to melody not unlike that of angel voices. And how has all this been accomplished? What motives have been employed, what principles recognised in this work? Kindness and love have been the only effectual weapons used in this reformation. With these, the temperance reform has achieved a victory which has astonished the world, and put to shame the advocates of a purely coercive system. We are not unwilling that law should undo what ever it has done amiss. If men have legally violated the principles of that moral code written by the finger of Jehovah upon the human mind, then let the law withhold that license, by which, they have thus transgressed. But we would not leave that for the law alone to do, for which, in all ages of the world it has proved insufficient.

To change the heart, or the moral sentiments, to produce a genuine moral reformation, is more than human laws alone can accomplish.

Again, we may be convinced of the truth of our position, by a glance at the present treatment of that unfortunate class of persons, whom mental insanity has rendered the objects of our sympathy. From a late report of Dr. Brigham, the Superintendent of the N. Y. State Lunatic Asylum, we learn that under a course of mild treatment, which has been adopted in the management of the inmates of this institution, one hundred and thirty five have recovered, and seventy eight improved, during the past year. To show the liberal and enlightened views of Dr. Brigham, which he holds in common with many others, let us attend to the following brief extract from his report. In speaking of the causes of insanity, and the education best calculated to prevent it, he says—'We regard the religious education, which teaches of our duty to God, and our obligations to our fellow-men, obedience to the precepts of the Gospel, and that we do not live wholly for ourselves, as the most effectual safeguards against insanity. It is this, and this alone that can give men that Christian courage that will enable them to bear the contraries and ills of life without danger to their mental peace. But while many, very many, become insane for the want of religious instruction, we have no doubt, others are made so, by that which is erroneous, and by the untimely and too urgent inculcation of peculiar religious views. Thus we regard the teaching of the extreme danger of committing the unpardonable sin, and of being under the influence and in the possession of the devil.' Thus much from the pen of Dr. Brigham, who is acknowledged to be an 'able and accomplished' man. And what do we learn from such a fearless avowal of his sentiments, with reference to the subject upon which they are expressed? What important fact are we taught, when men of influence come out, and frankly express their opinions, though they strike at the root of long-cherished and time-honored theories? Does it not plainly teach us that a change is being wrought—that improvement is being made—that a new and happier era is dawning upon us, whose approach like that of the natural sun in the eastern horizon, dispels the clouds of ignorance, and bids moral darkness to flee away? Does it not tell us that a chord has been touched in the human heart, with which, every pulsation in the moral universe, will sooner or later beat in unison? That the cure for mental and moral diseases, grows not in the soil of unkindness and unjust severity; but is found in abundance in the Gospel of peace and salvation? And does it not teach us moreover the reason why there have been so many failures when moral reformations have been attempted in by gone years? Does not a knowledge of the true method to be pursued, enable us to understand why weeks and months have been spent in fruitless efforts to reform mankind?

The truth is these efforts have been misdirected, hence their failure. They have not been made in the spirit of the Gospel, have not been based upon the principles recognised therein, and consequently they have produced little, or no good. It matters not with how great zeal and sincerity they have been made; or however great the necessity for a reformation, they have been unsuccessful, not having been properly directed.

As another evidence of the salutary change which is being wrought, we may advert to the increasing abhorrence of the 'death penalty.' We are aware of the opposition with which the proposal to abolish this penalty meets; but we are also aware of the fact, that there are scores of individuals, who now ably and eloquently stand forth in its defence, where not one could be found a few years ago to speak in its favor. Nor are these individuals found only among some one particular class of persons, or denomination of Christians; but they are among all of every class and denomination. To some, it may be somewhat satisfactory to know, why we view the change taking place in the public mind on this subject, with so much pleasure. Having many reasons we might assign, we shall only give the following, viz., that the manner in which this subject is beginning to be considered, affords ample evidence, that the time is not far distant, when the practice of taking life for any crime, (which we hold to be unnecessary, and anti-Christian,) will have been abolished. A law, whose penalty is so severe as to overlook, and even prevent the reformation of the criminal—and a practice which is too pernicious to come before the world, ought not to exist. A custom that savors of retaliation and revenge can find no countenance or support in the Gospel. He whose precepts we ought to cherish, and whose examples we should endeavor to imitate, has left us no authority for such a practice. But on the contrary, he has taught us not to return evil for evil, but to love our enemies, bless them that curse us, and do good to them that hate us.—Taking the rule here prescribed as the one by which we ought to be governed, how can we inflict punishment upon the criminal, further than his reformation requires? And here allow me to inquire, how Christians, holding to the belief, that there is no moral change after death, but that an eternity of woe, awaits those who die impenitent—how can such give their sanction to a practice, which sometimes, as they believe, hurries the condemned criminal out of the world, unprepared for such an event? And if he has truly repented and given good evidence of his reformation, why in the name of humanity, and Christianity, should he not be permitted to live?

For these reasons then, briefly expressed, we view with pleasure the change which public sentiment is undergoing on this subject. This together with other important moral changes, some of which we have named, are to us good evidence that the doctrines of the Saviour are being understood and obeyed. That the hallowed sentiments of kindness and love, are being cherished, and exhibited in human action. That the voice of charity and forgiveness, is yet to be heeded by every child of erring humanity, and peace and joy dwell in every bosom. Amen.

BR. C. S. BROWN AND ELDER HOLMES.

BR. SKINNER—I think it my duty to speak a few words in my own defence, in relation to the circumstances existing between me and Elder Holmes. From the impression that he has given to the public through his paper and yours, they would be likely to think that I considered the terms which he proposed to me in relation to the publication of his sermon were perfectly fair and equal; and that I made a permanent agreement that his sermon should be published in the Magazine and Advocate on those terms. In relation to the conversation at his house before witnesses, to which he refers, I would also refer to the same, and observe that he did not consider the terms equal himself. When I proposed to him to have both sermons published in the Methodist paper at Auburn, he observed that he had no control over that paper; I also observed that I had no control over yours, but I presumed you would be perfectly willing to do what was honorable and right. He at this time, I think, intimated that if Mr. Taintor's sermon was more lengthy, so as to occupy the same space with his, it would then be equal. We did not come to any conclusion at this time; but he was to write to me, which he did, and I believe you have had those letters, but not my replies; therefore was not able to judge in relation to the agreement. Now it appears to me that I made no agreement that any one could reasonably find fault with.

It is true I was anxious at the time that both sermons should be published, for reasons which the public can not know from that sermon as it is now published. As he attacked me publicly by name in the sermon, when he delivered it, I felt it my duty to defend myself, particularly on that point. He says in his reference to me, in that sermon, that Mr. Brown of Cortlandville says, 'that the government of God is strictly paternal,' &c. It is true, I did say so in my sermon which he heard, and I stand pledged to prove the position before any enlightened community. For I consider that on this point rests all true Christianity, and that the moment we give up this great leading feature in the doctrines which Christ taught, we descend into barbarism and superstition. If it is not true, what did Jesus mean when he said, 'If ye being evil know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give good things to them that ask him?' What did he mean in saying, 'Be merciful as your Father in heaven is merciful?' And further I say, if the character of God is not paternal, we make Christianity but no better than Paganism.

I also told Mr. Holmes that I thought he had misrepresented Universalism, and therefore felt anxious, that his mistakes should be corrected; for I was willing then to consider them mistakes, and am anxious to view them in that light now. And as he said then that he did not intend to misrepresent, I hope he will not adopt any course to compel me to believe that he did. After we had passed two or three letters, he says, 'I must know whether my sermon is to be published or not.' In my reply, I think I said, send your manuscript; we will publish it at some rate. When he handed me the manuscript, he observed it was so lengthy that he thought it would have to be divided. Here I observed, that I would do the best I could in getting it published. But as I had no authority over your press, and had not yet consulted you on the subject, and as I told him then, I had not written to you; it is certainly very strange that he should intimate that I thought the terms were fair and equal.—Furthermore, on reading the manuscript, I found those points that had a direct reference to me, were omitted; and therefore I did not feel any particular interest in its publication, farther than as it concerned the denomination to which I belonged.

I trust that Mr. Holmes will do me the justice to present this subject between him and me just as it is before the public. I was sorry that Mr. Skinner represented me as accepting a one-sided proposition against Universalism to my injury. For it appears to me that I have endured the scoffs and insults of the unbelieving Jews sufficiently for 18 years past to satisfy him that I was not disposed to give an opponent an advantage which he would not in exchange. * * * And that I had pledged myself to his terms.

I was anxious to convince Mr. Holmes of his error, well knowing, if he looked upon Universalism as he represented it, that his prejudices must be very strong against us. And as I consider that when truth can have anything like an equal chance with error, there is no danger of defeat.

One word in relation to Mr. Holmes' proposition to meet me in a public debate. Although I should be willing to meet him on the great question of endless misery, yet, as it would save much time, and perhaps unpleasant feeling, I would say,

That if he will offer one or more arguments against Universalism that has not been published in some form in our papers, and answered; and further, if he will publish the replies in some of the Methodist journals, side by side, that the public may have a fair chance to judge, I will agree to publish the same, either in pamphlet form, or in some public journal, where the Universalists can have an opportunity of reading. C. S. BROWN.

N. B. As he says Universalism has been refuted a hundred times, we do not wish the trouble of replying to those arguments that have been replied to one hundred times. C. S. B.

A REMEMBRANCE.

BY MISS LAURA EGGLESTON.

Many years have elapsed, since I resided in the pleasant village of Y., Connecticut. The good 'auld land' of steady habits; and famous in gone by days, for 'blue laws.' In the vicinity where my parents resided, most of our neighbors were rigid Presbyterians. It was there, that I had spent the gladsome and sunny days of infancy and childhood. There, have I rambled, in the groves and fields, seeking out the first vernal gems, and fragrant chaplets, to beautify my rural sports and childish pastimes. O, joyous were those hours to me; for I loved charming sounds, the melody of birds:—the murmuring of the streams;—and the deep toned breathings of heaven's pure breezes.—But ere I had reached the age of ten, a gloomy cloud o'erspread the bright sky of my pleasures; and changed my joys to gloom. I began to mentally suffer, from the withering influence of error. My weekly and Sabbath school teachers, had instilled into my young, and tender mind, the most fearful conceptions of Deity;—I was familiar with every item of the old Westminster Catechism—I had heard the name of Universalism mentioned but seldom, by our aged minister; and then, in terms of abhorrence. The Deacon, I recollect, once called it a damnable heresy. About four miles from our village, was a small settlement called Woolcoats-ville; where were a few believers in Universalism; who, on a certain occasion, went to Hartford, and procured the sainted Bisbe, to come out, and preach several sermons in Woolcoats-ville. I recollect well, that several pious ladies, called at my father's house, bitterly lamenting the fate of Woolcoats-ville;—'Surely,' said one lady, 'No females of good morals, and piety, will go to the champion of infidelity.' If any of our young gentlemen had the temerity to listen to his ungodly lectures, why,—they were classed with deists.—One young gentleman did go, to the much feared meeting, to gratify his curiosity to hear something new. After listening to the first discourse delivered by the preacher he called at my father's; and was asked by some one how he liked the sermon; his response was, 'very well.' 'Mr. B.'s preaching was new to me;—he was eloquent in language; and very familiar with the Bible.—He spoke like an angel. But, still it may not be true. However, I shall go again, to hear his message,—it sounds so charming.' Many years have past since those words were uttered, but often they sound in the halls of memory. Though a child, when I heard them, yet have I not forgotten them.

Yes; the Gospel, pure, supernal,
Sounds sweet and charming to the ear;
The goodness of the king Eternal,
Will charm the soul and banish fear.

He came; the learn'd, the good and gifted,
A herald of the cross divine;
In Zion's courts, his voice he lifted,
In strains of eloquence sublime.

His message was of peace and gladness,
The boundless love of God, his theme;
He hush'd the dismal wail of sadness,
And led to Truth's unsullied stream.

Long years have pass'd away, and Bisbe
Has gone, to wear the crown alone;
But oft these thrilling words are with me,
'It sounds so charming;—God is love.'

O, blessed be the Gospel ever,
Of God's unbounded love to man,
It sounds so charming; who would ever,
Distrust the good and heavenly plan?

Yet it hath often been assailed,
By Error's hosts on every hand;
But being true it hath prevailed,
And firm as heaven will ever stand.

The 'Rose of Sharon,' decks our borders;
The flowers of hope spring up and bloom;
And mercy comes in holy orders,
To fling a halo over the tomb.

Soon shall the prince of life Eternal,
Make every heart a tuneful lyre;
'Twill sound so charming and supernal,
When all shall praise the heavenly sire.

We copy the following from the Religious Recorder (Presbyterian) paper published at Syracuse. It is really a good article and we only wonder that so thorough a Universalist one should be admitted into the columns of a Partialist paper. 'Stand from under' good Partialist brethren, such articles as this placed too frequently before your readers, with a little reason and reflection to aid, will sap the very foundation of your towering fabric of endless woe, and cause it to tumble about your ears with a terrible crash.

By the by, the Recorder is about the only partialist paper that condescends to exchange with us.

HUMAN PATERNITY.

Mal. ii: 10. 'Have we not all one Father?'

Malachi was the last of the Prophets in the old dispensation, previous to John the Baptist, the forerunner of our Saviour. In the context he gives directions to the ministers of God, and reasons with them concerning what they should teach and preach to the people. i: 4-9.

The sentiment of the text is:

The near and dear relation between God and man.

A few considerations will be presented which show that mankind have a common origin, that they all have one Father.

Some who profess to believe the Bible, seem to suppose there are different races of men, of various species of the genus humanum. Such endeavor to show the propriety of one race or species having authority over the others. They even profess to claim the divine right of property in some of their fellow men. It is true while some men are white, others are yellow, red, brown and black. There is a great variety in the forms and features, language and customs of men. There is a difference in the color of the hair, and the eyes, in the stature, and weight of men.

But all show they have a common origin, but one Father, from the fact that all men have the same general features and forms, and the same intellectual and moral powers.

They are all alike accountable, and immortal. According to the Bible accounts of creation, God made the great progenitors of the human race in his own image and likeness, and breathed the breath of life into a human body of his formation, of the dust of the earth, which was to be the tent for the sojourn of the immortal and Godlike human mind. The first human pair are parents to all mankind. 'God hath made of one blood all the nations of men.' We his offspring are. Though we as individuals, have not all the same immediate natural earthly parents, yet we all have the same spiritual and heavenly Parent. Especially they who have been born from above, of God, have in a peculiar sense one Father in heaven. Such the Saviour directs us to supplicate in prayer. 'Our Father which art in heaven.'

IMPROVEMENT.

Have we all one Father? Then he loves all alike. He is no respecter of persons. 'He so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life.'

Have we all one Father? Then he has a right to govern all men, and require obedience of all men, and all should obey.

Have we all one Father? Then we all belong to him, body and spirit are his. He will watch over us. He will call us to account. He will judge us. He will condemn us for our disobedience and enmity of heart, if we don't love and obey him. He will reward or punish us according to our deeds. We should feel our dependence on him. We should love and reverence him. We should fear to offend him. We should not dishonor his name, and our paternity. We should not only bear his intellectual but his moral image. We should keep in view the provision he has made in our elder Brother's death for our pardon and reconciliation with him.

All men are equal. They are intimately related to each other. There is a common brotherhood of man.

All have the same inalienable rights, to life, liberty and property.

We should all prepare to go home to heaven, to be with our Elder Brother, and all our equal brethren above in our Father's house of many mansions, to be joint heirs with him forever. A. C. L.

MARRIAGES.

In Oxford, by Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Mr. SAMUEL A. WILLIAMS, of Woodhull, Stenben county, to Miss LYDIA M. STRATTON, of the former place.

In Preston, by the same, Mr. JOHN DAVIDSON, Jr., of Sherburne, to Miss MARY E. BROWN, of Preston.

At Chenango Forks, Broome county, April 8th, by the same, GEORGE M. HARRINGTON, Esq., of Oxford, to Miss MARLYN A. BAGLEY, only daughter of T. Bagley, Esq., of the former place.

In Oxford, April 22d, by the same, Mr. JOSEPH W. HAMILTON, of Smithville, to Miss LOUISA STRATTON, of Oxford.

In Oxford, May 8th, by the same, Mr. ALEXIS MILLER, of Smithville, to Miss JULIA A. MILLER, of the former place.

At Eagle Harbor, Orleans county, on the 25th ult., by Rev. T. J. Smith, Rev. U. CLARK, Pastor of the First Universalist Church, Lockport, to Miss ELIZA CHUBB, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Smithville, July 23d, 1844, ELIHU YALE, son of Ransom and Mary Jane Yale, aged 2 years and 10 months.

In McDonough, August 6th, 1844, WILLIAM HENRY, son of Thurston and Lydia Willcox, aged 2 years.

In Smithville, August 7th, 1844, LEWIS, son of Edward and Hannah Willcox, aged 1 year, 4 months and 7 days.

In Smithville, January 4th, 1845, Mrs. ANNE COWLES, widow of Timothy Cowles, aged 91 years.

In Norwich, May 30th, 1845, Mrs. VIOLET CHAPIN, wife of Seth Chapin, aged 71 years.

In Preston, on the 23d of January last, ANDREW FITCH, son of Paul R. Jr. and Melissa Miner, aged 8 months and 20 days.

In Marshall, March 24th, 1846, Mrs. OLIVE, wife of Br. Oliver Sabin, in the 71st year of her age.

The disease which terminated her earthly existence was consumption, which preyed upon her for many years, and which she bore without a murmur and with Christian resignation. She died as she had lived, a Universalist indeed, having embraced the doctrine many years ago. Her cheerful smile has welcomed many a herald of the cross to the hospitalities of their home, and she ever rejoiced in the prosperity of the doctrine. She has left behind her an aged and infirm husband and a numerous family of children to mourn her loss, and also a large circle of acquaintances who are ready to say, Blessed is the end of the righteous; for it is peace. J. P.

In Orion, Oakland county, Mich., May 11th, of the liver complaint, JERUSA ADALINE, wife of Wm. A. Nelson, and daughter of Calvin and Lydia Bowen, of Deerfield, Oneida county, N. Y., aged 28 years and 11 days. She lived and died in the full belief of a universal Redeemer.

At Sharon Springs, July 24th, 1845, SARAH HELEN, only child of Martin and Lois Stevens, aged 15 years.

'So fades the lovely blooming flower,
Frail smiling solace of an hour;
So soon our transient comforts fly,
And pleasure only blooms to die!

THE TWO MOTTOES.

Two young men were standing in the booking-office of the Cernay diligences, having taken places in one that was about to start for Kaysersberg. They were apparently of the same age—perhaps four-and-twenty; but there was a striking difference in their persons, and in the expression of their countenances. The shorter of the two was slightly made, pale, and dark, betraying his southern origin at a glance, by his quick movements and impatient gestures. His companion tall, fair, and blooming, was a good specimen of that mixed race of Alsace, in which the vivacity of the French is tempered by the equanimity and good humor of the Germans. At their feet were two small portmanteaus, to which the addresses were affixed by sealing-wax. On one might be read, Henri Fortin, of Marseilles; and on the seals were the words 'My Right.' On the other was written, Joseph Mulzen, of Strasburg; and the motto on the seals was 'Charity.'

The clerk had inscribed their names on the list, and was adding the quantity of luggage belonging to each, when Henri asked to have it weighed. The man replied that it would be done at Kaysersberg; but the Marseillais objected, alleging the inconvenience of such a formality amid all the bustle of arriving, and insisted upon its being done at once, saying he had a right to require it. The office-keeper, with equal obstinacy, refused to comply, and a warm and angry discussion ensued. Joseph tried to put an end to it by observing that they had barely time to dine before the diligence started; but Henri, who prided himself upon acting up to his motto, never would yield when he thought himself in the right; and unfortunately he seldom thought otherwise. At length the man, tired of the debate, quitted the office, and as his assistant spoke nothing but German, Henri decided upon following his cousin, on whom he vented his ill-humor.

'You would make a saint swear at your indifference,' cried he, as soon as they were alone. 'Not even to support me against that obstinate fellow.'

'I thought he needed support more than you,' said Joseph laughing; 'for you piled up arguments against him as though your fortune or your honor depended on the result.'

'Then you think it would be better not to assert one's rights.'

'When those rights are not worth asserting.'

'That is like you,' interrupted Henri with warmth; 'you are always ready to give up to every one: you would be trampled on before you would dream of defending yourself. Instead of looking upon the world as a field of battle, you seem to consider it as a drawing room, where civilities are exchanged.'

'Not so,' said Joseph; 'but as a ship full of passengers, who ought to show mutual kindness and forbearance.—Every man is my friend until he declares himself my enemy.'

'And I think every man my enemy until he has declared himself my friend. I have always found this sort of prudence the most successful; and I will advise you to adopt the same when we arrive at Kaysersberg. We shall meet there with the other heirs to our uncle's fortune, and depend upon it they will do all in their power to secure the best share; for my part I am resolved not to make the slightest concession.'

The young travellers had now reached the inn where they intended dining. On entering they found the public room empty; but at the farther end was laid a table for three persons. Henri desired the landlady to bring plates for Joseph and himself.

'Excuse me, sir,' said the woman; 'but you can not be served here.'

'Why not?' asked the young man.

'Because the persons for whom the table is laid have requested to dine alone.'

'Then let them stay in their own room,' returned Henri sharply: 'this is the public room and the public table, and surely every traveller has an equal right to enter and to be served here?'

'What does it signify whether we dine here or in another room?' asked Joseph.

'And what is it to those persons if we choose to remain here?'

'They came before you, sir,' remonstrated the landlady.

'Then it is the first come who give the law in your house?'

'They are known to us besides.'

'Their money is not better than ours, is it?'

'It is our interest to oblige our customers.'

'And all other travellers must obey their caprices?'

'You can be waited on in another apartment.'

'With the remnants from the table of your privileged guests, I suppose?'

The landlady seemed hurt, and said, 'If monsieur thinks he can not have a dinner at the White Horse, there are other inns in Cernay.'

'Very true,' replied Henri, taking his hat and walking out, regardless of his cousin's attempts to detain him.

Mulzen knew by experience that the best way to act with his cousin was to leave him to himself until the fit was over, for every attempt at reasoning only added fuel to the fire. He decided, therefore, upon remaining where he was, and requested to have dinner served immediately in another room. He was about to go thither, when the persons who were expected made their appearance; they were an old lady with her niece, and an elderly gentleman, who seemed to be their protector. The landlady was giving them an account of what had passed, but perceiving Joseph, she left off abruptly. The latter bowed, and was leaving the room, when the old gentleman stopped him.

'I am very sorry,' said he in a friendly tone, 'for the dispute that has taken place. We had requested to dine alone, to avoid the company of certain individuals whose free manners and conversation might be disagreeable to these ladies, but not to drive other travellers away, as your friend seems to have supposed; and as a proof of it, I hope you will oblige me by sitting down to table with us.'

Joseph thanked him, and endeavored to excuse himself, saying, that far from feeling offended at their desire to be alone, he thought it a very natural and proper precaution; but M. Rosman, which was the name given by the ladies to their protector, insisted in so frank and good humored a manner, that Joseph thought it best to comply. The old lady, who seemed little used to travelling, sat down opposite to him with her niece, and gave utterance to a deep groan.

'Are you very tired, Charlotte?' asked M. Rosman.

'Am I tired!' repeated the old woman; 'is that a question, after being shaken all day in that swinging diligence, eating out of my regular hours, running all manner of risks; for I am sure it is a wonder we were not upset fifty times; the diligence was always leaning to one side. I would give a good year of my life for this journey to be at an end.'

'Happily for us, dear aunt, you can not make such a bargain,' said the young lady, smiling affectionately at her.

'Yes, yes, you may laugh,' returned Madame Charlotte, trying to look displeased; 'young girls are afraid of nothing now-a-days! They travel by railway, by steamboat—they would go by balloon if they could! It is the Revolution that has made them so bold. Before the Revolution, the most courageous were content to travel in a cart or on a donkey—and then not unless it was absolutely necessary. I have often heard my dear departed mother say that she had never travelled otherwise than on foot.'

'But then she never went farther than the chief town of the department,' observed M. Rosman.

'She was not the less a worthy and a happy woman,' replied Madame Charlotte: 'when a bird has built its nest, it remains in it. The present fashion of being always on the move, diminishes the love of fireside enjoyments: people get so used to be away from their homes, that they cease to care for them, and find a home everywhere. It may be more advantageous to society, but it makes individuals less happy and contented.'

'Come, come, Charlotte—you have quite a spite against travelling, because of the jolts,' said M. Rosman, smiling. 'I hope this soup will dispel some of your prejudices; it could not be better even at Fontaines. I appeal to your impartiality.'

The conversation was continued in the same unembarrassed and cheerful manner; and Mulzen, who at first had discreetly kept silent, soon felt quite at home. M. Rosman frequently addressed himself to him; and they were talking like old friends, when it was announced that the diligence would start in a few minutes. They quickly settled with the landlady, and hastened to the office.

As Joseph arrived, he saw his cousin hurrying towards the same place. Whilst he had partaken of an excellent dinner, Henri had been running from one inn to another, without finding anything prepared; and as the time was gone, he had been forced to purchase a small loaf and some fruit to appease his hunger. This anchorite's repast had by no means improved his temper; which Joseph perceiving, forbore to make any remark; nor had he time, for the other passengers had already taken their places. As the cousins were preparing to follow, they were stopped by the office-keeper, who said he had made a mistake in booking them, for the diligence was already full.

'Full!' cried Henri; 'but you have taken our fare?'

'I am going to return it to you, sir.'

'Not at all!' said the Marseillais; 'when you took my money, you engaged to convey me to Kaysersberg. I have a right to go, and go I will.' And thus saying, he took hold of the leathern strap, and mounting to the top of the diligence, took possession of the only seat that was not yet occupied. The person to whom it belonged requested him to give it up; but Henri refused decidedly, saying that no one had a right to make him come down, and that if force were attempted, he also would use force. In vain did Joseph remonstrate, and urge him to give up the contested place—the contradiction he had met with, added to his frugal meal, had completely soured him, and he persisted in his refusal.

'Let each have his right!' cried he; 'that is my motto—yours is charity. Be as charitable as you like; for my part I only pretend to be just. I have paid for this place; I have a right to it; and I mean to keep it.'

The dispossessed traveller urged priority of possession; but Henri who was a lawyer, answered him with scraps of law; and thus they continued exchanging angry explanations, recriminations and menaces. Madame Charlotte, who heard all from the coupée, groaned audibly, and began to exclaim against travelling in general, and public conveyances in particular. At length Joseph, seeing the disputants becoming more violent, proposed to the office-keeper to hire a cabriolet, in which he and the ejected traveller might follow the diligence. The expedient was adopted, and they all set off.

It was November: the air, already cold and damp when they quitted Cernay, became freezing at the approach of night. In vain Henri, accustomed to the sun of Provence, buttoned his coat up to his chin: he trembled from head to foot in the chilling night fog. His face became almost blue; his teeth chattered; and, to add to his discomfort, a small drizzling rain began to beat in his face, and soon penetrated his garments. His next neighbor, who was well sheltered under an ample and warmly-lined cloak, might have given him a share of it, without inconvenience to himself; but he was a stout elderly shopkeeper, very careful of himself, and very indifferent about others. When Henri had taken such forcible possession of another's place, he applauded him, saying that each travelled for himself. The young man then thought his maxim perfectly just—now he had a practical illustration of it. Once during the journey his corpulent companion turned to look at him, and observing his miserable condition, said, 'You look as if you were cold, sir?'

'I am wet to the very bones,' replied Henri, scarcely able to speak.

The shopkeeper drew his warm cloak more tightly around him, as if he enjoyed it the more from the contrast, and remarked philosophically, 'It is very injurious to get wet: when you travel again, I would advise you to get a cloak like mine; it is warm, and not dear," and having delivered himself of this sage advice, he again buried his chin in the warm folds of his cravat, and resumed his comfortable doze.

It had long been dark when they arrived at Kaysersberg. Henri, half dead with cold, hastened to the kitchen of the inn, where a fire was blazing brightly. Among the travellers who surrounded it, he perceived Joseph Mulzen and the stranger whose place he had taken: the cabriolet had brought them a nearer way across the country, and they had arrived full an hour before the diligence. Joseph, seeing the state his cousin was in, gave him his place near the fire; but as for his companion, he could not refrain from laughing heartily. "Upon my word," said he, "I ought to be very much obliged to the gentleman.—Without his usurpation, I should have been frozen like him, instead of being here warm and comfortable." The Marseillais, too much out of temper to make any reply, sat down and warmed himself as well as he was able. As soon as he had in some measure recovered himself, he asked for a room and a bed; but there had been a fair at Kaysersberg, and the inn was full of persons, who intended leaving the town the following day. Joseph and his companion, although they had arrived earlier, had only found one very indifferent bed, which the former, with his usual good nature, had given up to the stranger. After a great deal of bustling and searching, however, it was found that there was still one bed disengaged; but it was in a room already occupied by four pedlars, who declared they would not admit any one else.

"Have they engaged the room for themselves alone?" asked Henri.

"No," said the innkeeper; "each pays for his bed."

"Then what reason do they give for refusing to admit another?"

"None at all; but as they seem to be quarrelsome fellows, no one wishes to interfere with them."

"For my part," said Henri, "I shall not sit here all night because those insolent fellows choose to monopolise more beds than they can use. Show me to their room, and let them oppose me if they dare."

"Take care, Henri," said Mulzen; "they are low, vicious men, and will probably insult you."

"And is it because of their vices that I must lose my rest?" he asked angrily. "Not I, faith! I shall go to bed in defiance of them." And taking his travelling-cap, he was leaving the room, when M. Rosman, who had come to look after his luggage, and had heard the words exchanged between the cousins, accosted them in his usual pleasant and friendly manner.

"You are at a loss for beds, I perceive, gentlemen?" he said.

"I shall not be so long," replied Henri, going towards the door.

"Stop a moment," said M. Rosman; "those men may handle you more roughly than you would like. You will find it difficult to convince them that you have an equal right with them. If you will accept a bed at my house, it is at your service. I reside only a few doors from here, and shall feel pleasure in accommodating you."

The young men bowed, and thanked him; but there was a marked difference in their manner of doing so.—Joseph look pleased and grateful; whilst Henri, who had not forgotten that M. Rosman was the cause of his having lost his dinner at Cernay, was constrained, though polite.

"You are very obliging, sir," said he, softening his tone; "but I should be sorry to put you to any inconvenience; besides, I think it will not be amiss to give those fellows a lesson, and teach them to respect the rights of other travellers." And bidding them good-night, he left the room.

Joseph, fearing the consequences, followed his cousin; but whether they were drowsy, or that the resolute air of the Marseillais deterred them, the pedlars only muttered a little; and Henri took undisturbed possession of his bed. Seeing there was nothing to fear, Joseph returned to the kitchen, where M. Rosman was waiting for him.

On reaching the house of the latter, they found Madame Charlotte and Louise preparing tea before a bright fire of pine cones. M. Rosman said a few words in a whisper to the ladies, who received Joseph with courtesy, and made him sit down to the table with them. Louise poured out the tea, and Madame Charlotte, seating herself in her easy chair, complained that she still felt the motion of the diligence, and that the bubbling of the kettle reminded her of the noise of the wheels. She asked Joseph what had become of the young man who had taken an outside place by assault; and M. Rosman answered by relating what had passed at the inn.

"He seems determined to have wars and contentions wherever he goes," observed the old lady; "if he continue he will be feared by everybody."

"A better heart than his could scarcely be met with," said Joseph; "but unfortunately he is determined to act up to his favorite motto—'Let each have his right.'"

"Whilst yours is—Charity," said the old woman smiling; "we heard it all at Cernay."

"Do you travel together?" asked M. Rosman.

"We are cousins," replied Joseph, "and have come to Kaysersberg to be present at the opening of a will, which takes place to-morrow morning."

"A will?" repeated Madame Charlotte in surprise.

"That of our late uncle, Dr. Harver."

The two ladies and M. Rosman exchanged looks.

"So you are the doctor's relatives?" said the latter; "well chance could not have directed you better. I have long been your uncle's most intimate friend."

This species of recognition served as an introduction to speak of the departed. Mulzen had never seen his uncle, but he had felt for him that respectful affection that nature seldom fails to establish between distant members of the same family. He listened with deep interest and emotion to the details of his life, and the particulars of his last moments; and after one of those long, unreserved conversations, from which all restraint is banished, and in which hearts are laid open without disguise, Joseph retired to his chamber, delighted with his new friends, who on their part were equally delighted with the young man.

It was late when he rose next morning, the fatigue of the previous day having made him oversleep himself. He dressed in haste, intending to call on his cousin, that they might go together to their uncle's lawyer; but on descending to the parlor, he found the latter there, together with Henri, who had been sent for, and M. Rosman.—Madame Charlotte and Louise soon joined them; and when all were assembled, M. Rosman, addressing himself to the young men, said—"No one here is ignorant of what brings you to Kaysersberg, gentlemen; for my sister-in-law, Madame Charlotte Revel, and her niece, Louise Armand, whose guardian I am, are also come to be present at the opening of the will of their brother and uncle, Dr. Harver."

The young men bowed to Madame Charlotte and Louise, who returned their salute.

"I thought," continued M. Rosman, "that as chance had brought hither the parties interested, the doctor's last directions might be read at my house."

Henri bowed his assent; they all sat down; and the notary was about to break the seal, when he stopped and said—"This will is already of an old date, and during the few last months of Dr. Harver's life, he frequently expressed his intention of destroying it, so as to leave to each of his heirs the share assigned them by law. I can only attribute his not having done so to the suddenness of his removal. I thought it my duty to declare this; and now I ask all the parties interested, who are here present, if they are willing, with one accord, to destroy this will, without knowing which of them is enriched or set aside by it?"

This unexpected proposal was followed by a pause.—Mulzen was the first to break silence.

"For my part," said he modestly, "having no special claim to my uncle's regard, I can not think it any sacrifice to accept of an equal share, and I willingly agree to the proposal."

"As far as I am concerned," said Madame Charlotte, "I have not the slightest objection."

"And I consent to it in my ward's name," added M. Rosman.

"There remains only this gentleman, then," said the notary, turning to Henri, who seemed somewhat embarrassed.

"Like my cousin," said he, "I have no reason to expect a decision in my favor; but on that very account I withhold my consent. Whatever may have been my uncle's intentions, his will should be regarded as sacred. To alter it would be neither just to the testator nor to the unknown legatee."

"In that case let us say no more about it," said the notary; "unanimity could alone legitimise such a proceeding. Let each have his right, as the gentleman requires, and be so good as to listen."

"Of the four individuals who have any claim to my fortune, I am only acquainted with two—my sister, Charlotte Revel, and my niece, Louise Armand; but as these two have long had but one interest and one heart, there is only Louise Armand to inherit on that side. It was my first intention to leave all I possess to her; but of my two unknown nephews, one may be equally worthy of my regard: the difficulty is to distinguish between them."

"Not being able to do it myself, and knowing the tact and intelligence of my niece Louise, I leave it to her judgment, and declare my sole heir whichever of the cousins she chooses for her husband."

A long pause followed the reading of this singular will. The young men seemed embarrassed, and Louise's eyes were fixed on the ground.

"The doctor has given my niece a difficult task," said Madame Charlotte at length.

"Not so difficult as you imagine, my sister," said M. Rosman smiling. "I have long known the contents of Harver's will; and the inquiries I made in consequence, have satisfied me that, however she may choose, she has nothing to fear."

"Then let the young lady decide," said the notary laughing; "since it is all in safety, it can only be a matter of inspiration."

"You must decide for me, aunt," said Louise in a low tone, hiding her face in Madame Charlotte's bosom.

"My dear child," said the latter, "it is very embarrassing. I really do not know—"

Pronouncing these words, with a look of uncertainty, she glanced at Mulzen. Henri perceived it, and exclaimed, "I see your choice is made, madame; and though I must regret it, I can not but approve of it. Mademoiselle," he added, taking Joseph's hand, and leading him to the young lady, "your aunt has seen and judged aright: my cousin is more worthy than I."

"What you say proves the contrary," said Madame Charlotte with emotion; but we already knew M. Mulzen; and—you deserve that I should be candid with you."

"Say on," interrupted Henri.

"Well, then, his motto gives me confidence—yours makes me fear: he promises indulgence—and you justice. Alas! my dear sir, justice may suffice for angels, but we poor mortals need charity."

"Perhaps you are right, madame," said Henri pensively; "since yesterday, it seems as if everything had conspired to teach me this lesson. My determination to defend my rights has, in every instance, turned against me, whilst my cousin's generous behavior has always been to his advantage. Yes, Joseph is right; his motto comes nearer to the divine precept. Christ did not say—'Let each have his right; but 'LOVE YOUR NEIGHBOR AS YOURSELF.'"

ELOQUENT SILENCE.—In the dreadful earthquake which destroyed the city of Carraccas in 1812, with forty thousand inhabitants, the clock of the cathedral was stopped, it is supposed, by the first shock. The tower in which the dials are placed, one fronting each quarter of the heavens, remained standing. Although the clock has been repaired and set going again, one of these dials has never been disturbed. The hands still point to the hour and minute of the earthquake.

THE STATE CONVENTION.

The Universalist Convention of the State of New York held its annual session at Newark, Wayne county, last week. We have just returned from the meeting; and a glorious and happy meeting we had. Harmony and peace pervaded our councils and our assemblies. The season was charming, the weather delightful, the congregations large, the services interesting and instructive; and we trust some good was done in the holy cause of truth and righteousness. About forty ministering brethren were present, and a respectable number of lay delegates, though we regret to say some of the Associations were not represented in the council.

Tuesday was devoted to the Sunday School Association, and at evening an excellent discourse on that subject from Br. H. L. Hayward, was listened to with great pleasure by a large audience, which we hope soon to be able to lay before our readers. Wednesday and Thursday were devoted to the business of the Convention and the worship of the common Father of our race. Sermons were preached by Brs. J. M. Austin, J. Moore, G. W. Montgomery, T. J. Sawyer, and D. Skinner, and listened to with great attention; and, with the exception of the last, all very good. Br. Sawyer's was on the subject of Education, and a deep interest was manifested in that subject by nearly all who heard him. We trust ere long to lay it before our readers.

We have not time this week for an extended notice of the meeting, but hope to present our readers with the entire minutes next week.

The Convention adjourned to meet at Scipio, Cayuga county, next year.

D. S.

THOMAS PAINE.

There was a period when the above named individual stood high in the estimation of the American people, being a companion of those fearless and patriotic men who first struck for that freedom which is our dearest inheritance; and had he continued on in that noble course in which he had for a while deflected his footsteps; had he maintained his integrity, his name would have been enrolled with that number, upon which the historian dwells with the highest pleasure. But at an after period, becoming the favorite of those who, in imagination, dethroned the Almighty and declared Reason as the sole and only God of the Universe, he struck out for himself a pathway which, as the reader is well aware, led him the downward course to shame and degradation. He soon descended to his sepulchre, unhonored; save by a few who set the Saviour and Christianity at defiance.

In taking up a copy of Mr. Kneeland's paper, published in Boston, bearing the date of '37, we learn somewhat respecting Mr. Paine's history beyond the tomb. We say the history of Mr. Paine, perhaps more properly speaking, we should say, the history of his remains. But these remains are no more or less than the dust which once formed his person, and according to the Atheistical creed these remains constitute the man in his new and eternal state of being—an everlasting unconsciousness—and consequently we are right in saying that we have learned something of the history of Mr. Paine beyond the shadowy sepulchre. We believe however that he did not fully subscribe to such a creed, but represented himself as a Deist, yet such was the creed of many of his admirers. But here is an extract from the paper of which we have spoken.

'It will doubtless be recollected by many, that all, or nearly all, of Paine's bones, were very improperly carried to England by Cobbet; and we are informed that the skull, and all the other bones which were found on Cobbet's premises after his death, were seized by the sheriff for Cobbet's debts, and are now, or were lately, held by him as security for a part of their payment, hoping and expecting no doubt, that the admirers of Paine's sentiments would come forward and relieve them from durance vile, and give them decent sepulchre.'

Reader; think of the above, and think of it seriously. The skull of Thomas Paine; that dome of those noble thoughts and sentiments which burst forth in his political writings; that hall where ideas and conceptions were framed worthy of a being endowed with the most noble powers; but at an after period, the court within which Christ and Christianity were drawn, tried, and condemned; and from whence issued that bitter and persecuting decree against the religion which is to purify and redeem the world, and to place upon man the crown of perfection—that skull in the hands of a sheriff as security for the payment of a few paltry dollars and cents! That arm which he raised against him who spake as never did man before; that hand which wielded that pen directed against Prophet and Apostle, the subject of an execution issued from a court of justice, and perhaps ere this sold under the hammer!

Reader; seriously consider the matter and then say, what thinkest thou of those who raise their hands and voices against the great Founder of the faith of Christianity and also against the purposes of that Being whose hand can be stayed by none, and whose judgments are upon principles firm and immutable?

It seems to us that the admirers of Mr. Paine's Theological works; those deep-read and profound men who place so great a value upon the Age of Reason, are not in possession of an over-share of gratitude, for they have not only neglected to raise a monument in commemoration of his name and services, but also have suffered his bones to be taken by a public officer as security for the payment of debts contracted by a disciple of his own school. 'Ye lights of the world! ye demigods of fame! where is your gratitude for the services of your great and worthy benefactor? Restir yourselves and redeem those pledges forthwith from their 'durance vile,' for as long as they remain in such hands and for such purposes your veneration and gratitude will be questioned. A word to the wise (!) is sufficient! S. J. G.

COMMON SCHOOL MANUAL.

Rev. A. C. Barry has issued proposals for publishing a work with the above title, and we doubt not from his well known abilities and the interest he has manifested in the cause of common schools, that the work will be a good one and well adapted to the end proposed.

'The COMMON SCHOOL MANUAL will consist of a series of religious exercises for the use of Common Schools.—The following will be the order of each exercise:—

1. Appropriate selections from the Psalms, to be read, alternately, by the teacher and scholars.
2. A form of prayer.
3. A hymn set to music.

In addition to the regular exercises, there will be exercises for various occasions—for the commencement of a term—examinations—celebrations—exhibitions—on the sickness of a teacher or scholar, or on the occasion of the death of either.

Many of the tunes and hymns will be entirely original. The author has been induced to undertake the preparation of such a work, by the conviction that it was needed—that there was an existing want in schools which it would supply. And he is happy in being able to present the following concurrence from the Hon. S. S. Randall, Deputy Superintendent of Common Schools of the state New York:

State of New York—Secretary's Office,
Department of Com. Schools, Albany, Apr. 20, '46.

Dear Sir:—I concur fully with you with reference to the utility and beneficial effect upon our common schools generally, of a well executed work such as that which you propose: and should be sincerely glad to see the experiment tried. We are, in my humble judgment, devoting too disproportionate a share of time, in our elementary institutions of learning to the mere culture of the intellect—losing sight of the important fact that the foundation of character and usefulness must be laid in the moral and religious nature. Let the young obtain a clear conception of those magic words—truth, duty, obligation and responsibility in connection with the soul's immortality,—and the work of intellectual advancement becomes an easy and an attractive task. Without this 'the blind lead the blind' and error and vice are the result.

Sincerely Yours, S. S. RANDALL.

We sincerely hope the work will be published, and that it will meet with a favorable reception and be instrumental of much good in training the youth of our land to high and noble moral principles. D. S.

A STRAY LEAF.

A man perhaps may thank his former sin by his present piety and religion; but this is one of those rules which are far from working both ways. We have never yet seen a man who could thank his former piety and religion for his present sin, although there are not a few who would wish to do it.

The sun still shines with its accustomed brilliancy, though perhaps its rays may be partially obscured by the intervention of a cloud. So God is still good, though our iniquity may partially veil that goodness from our sight.

'I belong to the church,' said one, as he poured forth slander upon his neighbor's name. 'I do not belong to the church,' said another, as he put bread into the mouth of the famishing orphan. Which was the Christian?

A man of nobility and a noble man. The difference between the two is about as great as that between a horse chestnut and a chestnut horse. That will do. S. J. G.

BR. EVERETT'S NEW PAPER.

We can not but look upon the scheme of starting another Universalist paper in this State as a sort of Utopian affair. There are already three (one too many) and what in the name of common sense do we want of another, so long as those that are now in existence obtain such a meagre support. Br. E. professes to have the advancement of the cause at heart in the undertaking. But will the reducing of the circulation of the other papers, (and it will undoubtedly have that effect) thereby detracting from their support and in consequence reducing the means of the publishers for making them good papers—what they ought to be—will this we say, have the effect to advance the cause in reality? It strikes us forcibly that it will have a contrary effect.

We have understood that Br. Everett is so placed (in a pecuniary point of view) in the world that he will not be very likely to want for the necessities of life. Could he not then, assist the cause of Universalism just as much, yea more, in some other way? And that too, while the present Universalist publishers who are dependent upon their business and really need all the patronage and assistance they now get; yes, and more too, to give them even a decent living, while Br. E. has enough and to spare.

We think the paper is not needed, and the scheme uncalled for, and to say that we wish it success, while it is needlessly taking the bread from our and other publisher's mouths and withal doing the cause little or no good in the abstract, would be saying that which we do not feel. We would much rather see Br. Everett abandon the project and let it alone. We do not offer these remarks from any unfriendly feelings towards Br. E. but from what we sincerely believe to be our duty to ourselves and the cause. Br. Skinner noticed the prospectus of the 'Western Evangelist' last week, and since writing the foregoing we have received a copy of the paper. It is a very comely folio sheet and if it could have such a support as would be necessary, it would no doubt advance our common cause. But the question is can it get that support, without materially injuring other papers? We have no desire to detract to any, what papers they shall take, or shall not take; we only hope that Universalists in N. Y. State will see the justice of sticking to the old established papers which have borne the burden and toil of the day, in fighting the battles of the cause for years, with little or worse than little pecuniary success to their publishers, and let new and needless projects take care of themselves. W.

Harpers Publications.

D'AUBIGNE'S DISCOURSES, by Baird, is a handsomely executed 12mo volume of 466 pages, containing some seventeen discourses and essays by the above named French Reverend. This talented man is the author of the history of the great Reformation, and the President of the Theological Seminary, Geneva, Germany. These discourses are translated from the French by Charles W. Baird. From a hastily running the eye over them, they appear to be able essays, and directed chiefly to the up-building of the Lutheran Reform and the pulling down of Popery. At Beesley's.

PRAIRIE LAND, by Mrs. Farnham, is neatly bound in muslin, containing 400 12mo pages. It is a description of prairie life in Illinois—full of incident, relating to the inhabitants, their manners and customs, descriptions of the face of the country during the various seasons of the year, fruits, birds, animals, &c., &c. Those who have examined it more carefully than we have had opportunity to do, say it is very interesting. It is only 50 cents, at Tracy's or Beesley's.

No. 79-80 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE is issued in the usual beautiful style of previous numbers, and contains notes on 'Julius Cæsar,' and a part of the tragedy of 'Antony and Cleopatra.' 25 cents at Beesley's.

No. 82 of the Library of Select Novels is the BUSH RANGER of Van Dieman's Land, by Charles Rowland, Esq., author of the 'Tales of the Colonies,' &c. Full of incident and interest. 25 cents, at Beesley's.

The Harpers have also issued No. 2 of their beautiful edition of the PICTORIAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND, which gives a history of national industry, literature, science, and the fine arts, manners and customs and condition of the people to the year A. D. 449. Book II is then commenced and is to contain a period of history from the arrival of the Saxons to the arrival of the Normans 449-1066. Book II begins with 'civil and military transactions.' 25 cents per number.

No. 13 of the pictorial WANDERING JEW is also published with its usual profusion of engravings. 25 cents.

No. 81 of the Library of Select Novels is EMILIA WYNDHAM, by the author of 'Two old men's tales,' 'Mount Sorel,' &c. A great quantity of reading for 25 cents.

No. 83 is the chronicles of CLOVERNOOK 'with some account of the Hermit of Bellyfulle,' by Douglas Jerrold. One shilling. All of the above to be had at Beesley's.

THE UNIVERSALIST'S ASSISTANT.—We see by the East-papers that Br. D. Forbes is about publishing a new work of the above title. We know not the size or cost of the work. It is spoken of as a valuable and interesting book.

We received some weeks since, and ought to have noticed sooner, a pamphlet of 34 pages, published at Chicago, Ill., containing two ordination sermons, the one by Br. Wm. Rounseville at the ordination of Br. D. P. Bailey of Warrensville, in December last; the other by Br. A. Pingree, at the ordination of Br. G. W. Lawrence, in January last; together with the charges and right hand of fellowship to the candidates on those occasions. They are interesting and able performances.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT IN MICHIGAN.—The Legislature of Michigan has abolished the law inflicting capital punishment, and substituted imprisonment at hard labor for life, in the room thereof. Is not this a dangerous experiment? Will not every body now be tempted to commit murder for the sake of the pleasure of committing it and the very comfortable and light penalty of hard labor in the Penitentiary during the full term only of their natural lives?

To the calls of Brs. A. B. Grosh and G. L. Demarest I answer: Nothing new to record about the Steuben Association. No new preachers—no organization of new churches or societies, or Sunday schools, or erection of meetinghouses, to my knowledge. A. Urson, S. Clerk.

Removals.

Br. E. Case, Jr., having returned from Clinton to Lockport, N. Y., wishes all papers and letters directed to him at that place.

Br. A. M. Worden having engaged to labor for a time with the First Universalist society in Nicolville, St. Lawrence county, desires all letters and papers directed to him at that place.

Br. H. Van Campen has removed from Portageville to Gainesville, N. Y., and wishes to be addressed accordingly.

Mr. G. N. Beesley has laid on our table the June No. of those excellent monthlies, Graham's Magazine and the Columbian Magazine. Both beautifully embellished with engravings and filled with reading matter. 25 cents per number.

☞ We have received five dollars of Br. H. B. Soule, as his subscription to the Clinton Theological Institute.

ONTARIO ASSOCIATION.

The place of meeting of this Association is changed from Geneva to Fairport. It will be held on the second Wednesday and Thursday, 10th and 11th of June inst.

NOTICE.

The Steuben Association will meet at Howard on the first Wednesday and following Thursday (1st and 2d) in July next.

I presume directions are unnecessary. Any person arriving within the bounds of the county may be directed straight to Howard. But I suppose, fashion will have it, that I should say, 'Ministering brethren and friends are earnestly invited to attend.' How is this? Can there be a Universalist preacher, or layman, or sister, who can make it convenient to attend our Association or conference meetings, that must receive a formal invitation before they will venture to meet with us? I believe not. We are always glad to meet our brethren and sisters and ministers, at all times, and especially on occasions like these. And we believe it is so understood, and received, generally. So, if I have made this notice longer than usual, I have expressed my mind.

A. Urson, S. Clerk.

ST. LAWRENCE ASSOCIATION.

This Association will hold its next annual session in the village of Malone, Franklin county, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday (24 and 25) of June next. Our several societies, (and there are sixteen in fellowship with this body,) are entitled to two delegates each. Shall we have a full delegation this year? And will the clerks of all the societies send in full statistical information—such as Br. Grosh desires for his next Register, (see Mag. and Adv. No. 19, current year,) and as will enable me to report to him immediately after the close of our meeting? Brethren, one and all, let us remember our next associational meeting and faithfully discharge our respective duties appertaining thereto.

W. H. WAGGONER, S. Clerk.

Canton, May 27, '46.

MOHAWK RIVER ASSOCIATION.

The Mohawk River Association of Universalists will hold its annual session at Newport village, Herkimer co., on the second Wednesday and following Thursday, 10th and 11th, of June next. Services to commence at 11 o'clock, A. M. of Wednesday. Delegates from the different societies are requested to be there so that the Council can convene and organize at 8 o'clock in the morning. Each society is urgently solicited to send two delegates to represent them in the Council. The Clerks of the different societies are also requested to furnish their respective delegates with statistics of the condition of their societies, the number of members, the amount of preaching they enjoy, and finally their present condition and future prospect.

Our friends at Newport will be in readiness to receive us; come then brethren, from the east, the west, the north and the south, preachers and laymen, and their associates; come all who conveniently can, and hear the occasional sermon by Br. D. Skinner. J. D. Hicks, S. Clerk.

NOTICE.

The Christian Universalist Association for Canada West, will hold its annual session in the village of Bloomfield, Prince Edward District, on Friday, Saturday and Sunday the 12th, 13th and 14th of June next. A general attendance of friends is expected. Ministers and members of all denominations are respectfully invited, and ministering brethren from the States are urgently solicited to attend. Bloomfield is situated about 40 miles south-west from Kingston and 4 miles from Picton, between which place and Kingston a line of steamboats run daily.

Friends will be at the wharf on the arrival of the boats to convey our brethren from a distance to the place of the meeting of the Association. Per order, Bellville, May 15, 1846. DAVID LEAVITT, S. Clk.  Trumpet, Messenger, and Luminary please copy.

CONFERENCE.

A Conference of the Chenango Association of Universalists will be held in the Baptist meeting house in the village of Pitcher, on the second Tuesday and Wednesday (9th and 10th) of June. Ministering brethren and all friends are invited to attend.

J. T. GOODRICK, Standing Clerk.

DEDICATION AND CONFERENCE.

The meeting house recently erected at Edmeston Centre, Otsego county, will be dedicated to the service of God on Wednesday 17th of June.

A Conference of this Association will meet for this occasion and continue during Wednesday and Thursday, 17th and 18th. O. WHISTON, Standing Clerk.

CONFERENCE.

A Conference of the Hudson River Association of Universalists will be held at Porter's Corners, in Greenfield, the third Wednesday and Thursday (17th and 18th) of June. An invitation is extended to all, either on or out of the Association, who can make it convenient to attend.

Porter's Corners is about eight miles from Saratoga Springs, and it is hoped that friends who intend to visit this celebrated watering place this season, as many of them as can, will find it convenient to do so at that time, and meet with us on that occasion. All such will be gratuitously and cheerfully transported from the Springs to the place of meeting and back. Our friends from Greenfield will be in waiting, on the afternoon of Tuesday, the day previous to the meeting; and visiting friends who desire to go, will please report themselves at Huling's Book Store, on Broadway, opposite the American Hotel.

J. A. ASPINWALL, S. Clerk.

NOTICE.

☞ Br. T. J. Sawyer authorises us to receive subscriptions or donations to the Theological Institute. Any one who may wish can therefore remit direct to this office, and the receipt of the money will be acknowledged in the Magazine and Advocate.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. JOHN D. CARGELL will preach at Bridgewater on the first Sunday (7th next) in June.

Br. J. T. GOODRICK will preach in Harpersville, on Sunday, June 7th, at 10 o'clock A. M., in New Ohio at 2 o'clock P. M. and at Page Brook at 5 P. M. Also, on the second Sunday at Phettyplace school house in Norwich.

The EDITOR will preach at Little Falls next Sunday and at Ilion the Sunday after.

Br. J. S. KIBBE will preach in Mottville on the first Sunday in June.

Br. ABBOTT will preach in Mottville on the third Sunday in June.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Rise! listen, ye rulers, of our happy nation;
The mild voice of mercy invoketh an ear;
Commissioned by Heaven to sway legislation,
In high halls of justice behold her appear.

She pleads for the erring, the lost and degraded,
In Pity's soft voice and mellifluous strain;
Reform them, she crieth, whom guilt hath deep shaded,
Let all castigation be used to reclaim.

The Father of mercies, Heaven's great Legislator,
In Love's shining letters his statutes hath penned—
In Truth's sacred book, and the bright page of nature,
We read he is love, and humanity's friend.

O! then shall our country, of freedom the dower,
The fair gems of science encircling her brow,
Illum'd by supernal Christianity's power,
Still at the dark altar of cruelty bow!

The fell code of Draco has long here prevailed,
And hurried the victims of crime to the grave;
Sweet Mercy has pleaded, but utterly failed
To use her mild rod the lost sinner to save.

Ye wise, good and learn'd, who preside o'er the nation,
Rise, abrogate laws that our natures degrade;
Let Mercy in triumph assume her high station,
With Justice's bright sword on her meek bosom laid.

When shall the death penalty useless and cruel,
With the monster Revenge from our blest land go down?
The sceptre of Justice display Mercy's jewel,
And the pearls of forbearance her diadem crown?

Our beautiful clime soon shall wisdom rule over,
In Mercy's regalia so fair and sublime,
The pure plants of virtue crimes' dark waste shall cover,
And goodness be crowned with fruition divine.

LAURA EGLESTON.

MINUTES

Of the Second Annual Meeting of the Western New York U. S. S. Association, held at Alexander,
May 13 and 14, 1846.

Met Wednesday noon, 13th. Meeting called to order by Br. S. R. Smith, President.

Br. S. R. Smith appointed Moderator, and Br.
U. Clark, Clerk.

Committees on adjournment, on giving a compendium of the reports of schools, and on nomination of officers, appointed.

Delegates from Buffalo and Alexander answered to the call for representatives.

Adjourned.

Met Wednesday afternoon.

Minutes of the last annual meeting read and approved.

Reports read from several schools.

Brs. S. R. Smith, A. Bean, and H. B. Torrance appointed a committee to report on recommending a uniformity of books to be used in Sunday schools.

On motion of Br. Clark,

Resolved, To amend that portion of the Constitution which makes the limits of this Association to include all the territory 'lying west of Cayuga Lake,' and in place thereof substitute 'west of Genesee River.'

On motion of Br. L. S. Everett,

Resolved, That the time has fully come when the present safety and future progress of our cause, in a great measure, depend on a successful prosecution of the Sabbath school enterprise; and

That in view of the foregoing fact, we earnestly recommend the immediate organization of schools in all the societies within the limits of this Association.

Committee on the nomination of officers for the ensuing year, report the names of the last year.

Report adopted.

Committee on adjournment report, That this body hold its next annual meeting at Perry, Wyoming county.

Recess till Thursday morning. Br. A. Bean,
Moderator pro tem. Prayer, Br. S. Goff.

Reports from the different schools called for, and the substance nearly as follows:

Buffalo—Scholars, 138; average attendance, 78; number of verses committed by the whole during the year, 49,745: officers and teachers, 43; library, 327.

Rochester—Scholars, 106; average attendance, 38; teachers, 20; average attendance, 10; library, 80.

Lockport—Scholars, 60; average attendance, 40; teachers, 10; library, 160.

Niagara Falls—Suspended at present, for the want of a place of meeting.

Pavilion—Scholars, 70; teachers, 10.

Perry—Scholars, 55; teachers, 10; library, 160.

Aurora—Scholars, 25; teachers, 4; library, 70.

Boston—Scholars, 50; teachers, 6.

The following schools have been organized during the past year:

Alexander—Scholars, 60; teachers, 6. Java— scholars, 25; teachers, 4. Rushford—scholars, 30.
Ridgeway and Fairhaven.

It is believed that there are schools at Middle-port, Clarendon, and Churchville, but no definite report.

On motion,

Resolved, That this Association send two delegates to the State S. S. Association, about to convene at Newark, to report in regard to the organization and condition of this body, and suggest such measures as may be deemed expedient to unite and co-operate in our common cause.

Brs. U. Clark and J. R. Johnson appointed as delegates.

Resolved, That all the ministers within the bounds of this Association be again requested to deliver a discourse during the year to their respective congregations in behalf of the Sunday school cause.

Br. W. B. Cook appointed to deliver the next colonial address.

The meeting then listened to the annual address of Br. J. S. Brown.

Moved, that the thanks of this body be returned to Br. Brown, for his interesting and instructive discourse, and that he be requested to furnish a copy for publication in the Western Luminary, with a request from this body that the Magazine and Messenger copy the same.

On motion of Br. Brown,

Resolved, That the superintendents of Sunday schools, or, in their absence, the resident pastor, be requested to make out a report to this body in annual convention, at least four weeks before the annual meeting.

Minutes of this meeting read and adopted, with a request for their publication in the Western Luminary, and other State papers.

Adjourned to meet at Perry, May, 1846.

U. CLARK, Secretary.

REMARKS.—Though the delegation of this meeting was not as full as was expected, yet we trust that a profitable and interesting session was enjoyed by all present. We are unable to account for the absence of many of our ministering brethren, but we trust it is not owing to a want of interest in our cause. The brethren in attendance were Brs.
S. R. Smith, L. S. Everett, J. S. Flagler, S. Goff, W. B. Cook, J. R. Johnson, J. S. Brown, E. W.
Reynolds, J. Stebbins and U. Clark.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Reynolds, Johnson, Clark, Brown; and in a social conference spirited addresses by all the brethren present.

The progress of our cause reported generally onward. The society at Alexander, under the labors of Br. Cook, is highly flourishing; and long will they have our gratitude for the zeal with which we were cordially and hospitably received. Blessings crown them, and all the efforts put forth for the everlasting Gospel.—[Luminary. U. C.]

UNIVERSALISM SPREADING SECRETLY.

We have reason to believe that Universalism is spreading secretly in the various churches of the partialist faith. We know not how large a proportion of their members are secretly Universalists, but we are persuaded there are many such. It was formerly an offence worthy of excommunication, for a member of a partialist church even to believe in Universalism, if he scarcely breathed the fact to any body, but now, in many churches, it is no offence to proselyte other members to the same faith.

See the following article which we copy from the 'Christian Herald.'

'UNIVERSALISM IN THE CHURCH.—That a man may be a believer in the doctrine of the final salvation of all men, and be a Christian, is admitted.
But that the doctrine is both false and dangerous is perfectly clear. Should a member of a church cherish this doctrine as his own private sentiment, and do no harm by proclaiming it, I think it should not be made the occasion of trial or of discipline.—
But when one in his private intercourse and public communications, labors to promulgate Universalism, the case is far otherwise. The private opinion is one thing, while the bad use he makes of it is another and quite a different thing. No person can, in my humble opinion, talk and proclaim so great an error, and so mischievous—so full of infidelity respecting the absolute necessity of regeneration, faith, and a holy life in order to salvation, and yet be a good, harmless and sincere Christian.

Such a Universalist will corrupt the youth, stag-ger the weak, weaken the energies of the church, and in fact pull down more Christianity than a good minister can build up in a time of no more than ordinary revival. There can be no ground for a doubt that all such troublers of the church ought forthwith to be labored with, and, if they can not be reclaimed, be rejected from the church. The longer they are suffered to go on, the worse the consequences are, and the more likely they are to produce divisions and contentions in the church.
One such person, suffered to go on, is enough to bring ruin upon any church. He is a heretic, and, after the first and second admonition, must be rejected, according to Paul.'

A man may be a Christian and still be a believer in the salvation of all men! This is a fact which the partialist churches are now willing to concede.
If a man cherishes the doctrine as his own private sentiment, and does no harm by proclaiming it, it should not be made the occasion of trial or discipline.
Thus, we see, the world is coming on. The sin, then, does not consist in believing the doctrine, but in bringing others to believe it. But if a man may believe it, and be a Christian, it probably will not hurt him. We are not able to see, if Universalism does not hurt one man, why it should another? If it does not hurt the first man in the church, it will not hurt the second. If it will not hurt a man to believe it, it surely will not hurt one to convert him to it. Why then is it an offence to seek to convert a man to it?

Some hard things are said about Universalism in the above extract, but we must expect them.
They are put in to make the concession passable—to ease it along. We can not expect all the good things in one article: and when we get a concession from an enemy in our favor, we must expect him to say a few hard things to offset it.—Trumpet.

We should have all communications with men as in the presence of God; and with God as in the presence of man.

SNAKES IN THE GRASS—DISTRICT SCHOOL LIBRARIES.

Br. SKINNER:—An article appeared in the 47th number of the last vol. of the Magazine and Advocate, copied from the New York Observer, the subject of which was 'More Snakes in the Grass,' and the signature, 'A Country Pastor.' You commented upon it at the time, as did subsequently your correspondents, 'E. M.,' 'J. M. Day,' and 'J. Gage, 2d,' in the 2d, 13th, and 18th numbers of the present volume; and in the 21st number it was indirectly, if not directly, referred to, by 'J. M. A.,' in his communication upon the 'Voice to Youth.' It has been handled plainly, pointedly and severely, but justly. Some may think it has already received more notice than it deserved.—But as it has been endorsed by several secular journals, and by the self-styled evangelical portion of the religious press somewhat generally, all of whom are engaged in a common warfare against the 'Voice to Youth,' and other publications not tinctured with popular sectarianism, and as the Secretary of State, in the very face of his own refusal to exclude these works from the libraries of Common Schools, is coaxed, and teased, and threatened, to induce him to reverse his decision, as I conceive without substantial reasons, I have arrived at a different conclusion.

My knowledge of 'A Country Pastor' and others enlisted with him, fully satisfy me that they are making a most bare-faced, shameless, thorough, determined and extensive effort to trample upon the laws regulating the choice of books in our district libraries, and to compel us to sustain their narrow, selfish and abhorrent doctrines! Enough can be presented to convince most unprejudiced minds, that our country has never been disgraced by men who more fervently seek, step by step, to destroy the spirit of our free institutions and force us legally to support their absurd and cruel dogmas!

It is not often that I select matter for Editors to publish. But believing that the importance of the subject of the controverted works, when considered in all its bearings and ulterior objects, demands that both sides should be presented to your readers, I am exceedingly anxious that you should copy in your paper of next week, the articles I send you, (or all that is important in them,) from the New York 'Journal of Commerce,' upon 'State Irreligion—District School Libraries,' and from the Universalist Union, upon 'School Libraries—The New Movement,' and 'The Spirit of Proscription at Work.' By so doing I know you will highly gratify many subscribers in Chenango county and elsewhere. They will aid in preparing a way for a correct appreciation of the import of other matter I will furnish you in a few days, some of which has never been made public.

Fraternally Yours, J. T. GOODRICH.

STATE IRRELIGION—DISTRICT SCHOOL LIBRARIES.

We have observed with deep anxiety, the working of the District School Library system in New York and other States. Conducted on just principles, it seemed to promise much for the intellectual and moral improvement of the rising generation. Controlled for evil purposes, we have all along looked upon it as an engine of destruction, not less fatal than would be the Croton flowing into our city, if its sources were poisoned, and its now pure and healthful streams made to convey the seeds of death to all our abodes.

At least it is a most difficult and delicate trust to manage; and the public officer having the matter in charge is entitled to a candid and charitable construction of his acts, in a matter of such responsibility and difficulty. His position is an anomalous one. His decision is final in reference to the reading matter of the great mass of the people, especially the young; and yet he is not an officer of the people, but holds his place at the will of the Legislature. He may or may not have the talent or discrimination to discharge his solemn trust wisely; but whether he has or not, through what direct channel can the people reach his ear, and what remedy have they, except by a change of legislators, though he were to taint every stream of knowledge with fatal error?

It is time attention were turned to the management of this trust. In the State of New York, where perhaps $1,000,000 have been expended for books in District Libraries, some 2,000,000 of books, good or bad, are thus accessible to the mass of our youth. If we mistake not, the controlling influences in this department at the outset where highly sectarian and anti-evangelical. Now, it would seem, they verge toward infidelity, or its counterpart, Universalism. It becomes those who have any regard for the right moral culture of the young, to keep a careful look out on the conduct of public officers having this trust in charge.

The principles which seem to have controlled the selection of books, hitherto, so far as religion and morals are concerned, we can not but regard as dangerous and unwarrantable. Indeed, the arrangement, by which the dictum of one man may control the popular reading of a State, and that, too, notwithstanding the preferences, and against the expressed will of a majority of the people, is an anomaly in our government. A civil officer becomes a Pope, whose bull is final on points of religious doctrine. He issues his index expurgatorius, avowedly excluding every book containing an 'evangelical' sentiment as 'sectarian,' and deliberately places his imprimatur on books which hold up to scorn the doctrines which are dear to the hearts of 'the great body of Christians.'

These are grave charges; we wish they were not true. But the evidence before us of their verity is palpable. We give it in a very condensed form.

The Superintendent of Common Schools in this State, having been appealed to as to the character of two books in quite general circulation in the schools, declares them to be 'eminently adapted to the cultivation and improvement of the moral and intellectual faculties of the young. Neither can either of them be regarded as sectarian, or in any respect immoral or injurious.' What will be the surprise of the reader to learn that the books thus receiving official sanction, are essentially infidel and Universalist in their teachings—exalting Reason at the expense of Revelation—assailing the idea of human depravity, and undermining confidence in the doctrine of endless punishment for the incorrigibly wicked! Such is their character, as might be shown by abundant quotations. And yet, says the Superintendent, there is nothing 'sectarian or injurious' in them, and they are 'eminently adapted to the improvement of the moral faculties of the young.'

But this is not the worst aspect of the case. Standard treatises, which are and have been for centuries the common property of Christians of every name, are repudiated as 'sectarian,' which the Superintendent defines as 'recognizing the religious tenets solely of those who are denominated Evangelical Christians.' Such books as Pilgrim's Progress, Baxter's Saint's Rest, Abbot's Young Christian, &c., are to be rejected from school libraries and put in the pillory of this new Index Expurgatorius, 'especially in districts where any of the inhabitants profess religious views in opposition to those held by the great body of Christians,' (we quote official language,) while books which oppose views universally 'held by the great body of Christians' are admitted with the sanction and approval of the State.

If we understand the principle thus avowed, 'any' individual who hates religion has it in his power to control the reading of a district, especially so far as the exclusion of every thing of a religious character is concerned, whatever may be the wishes of all the district besides. This is all that infidelity or irreligion usually demands. But more than this: an artful writer can instil positively erroneous sentiments into his works, and they may enter every district school, under the sanction of the Superintendent, though half or nine-tenths of the inhabitants of the district are opposed. Is this so? What then has become of our fundamental principle, which recognize majorities, and not single irresponsible wills, as the arbiters in questions of difference? If 'the great body of Christians' are thus the footballs of little knots of infidels, and in a Christian State their principle are to be the scoff and contempt of its officers, does it not become them to seek proper methods of guarding their rights, and resisting encroachments which even papal power would hardly dare make, even in its own dominions.

If the people prefer for their children the means of making them pirates, rather than the means of salvation; if they wish infidel teachings rather than those of a pure, catholic Christianity; if the people desire the fountains of juvenile learning poisoned and corrupted, they will sustain and sanction the existing principles and administration of this branch of public service; if not, they will search out the nature and extent of the evil, and apply the remedy.

From the Universalist Union.

SCHOOL LIBRARIES—THE NEW MOVEMENT.

No one, we trust, indulging a laudable interest in the perpetuity of the religious privileges so happily secured to the inhabitants of this country, will complain of the attention we are just now giving to the subject involved in this article, or the space we occupy in copying the sayings and doings of others, in relation to it, whose conduct and measures, in our humble estimation, should be scanned with a watchful eye.

As we have before intimated, touching this subject, there is a body of strenuous professors whose efforts at religious domination have been unwearied in the past. They relax no efforts now. Defeat in any movement for the attainment of their favorite object only stimulates them to increased exertions upon some other and new cue. And so far as perseverance is concerned, their example is worthy of all imitation by the friends of religious liberty.

Formerly they did possess an extensive and controlling influence, generally; and in many places an exclusive direction of not only religious, but civil, affairs. Who has forgotten the virtually established religion of New England—of Connecticut in particular—when you were compelled by law, to support the prevailing religion, which was Presbyterian or Congregational, (at least was based on the old Saybrook Platform,) and if objected to, on conscientious scruples, or other grounds, the officer was by law bound to levy on any thing you possessed, even to the mechanical tools of the suffering poor! Many a time have we listened to the bitter revelations of a gray haired friend, whom we several years since followed to the grave, (in Connecticut,) of the trials and persecutions he had met with in earlier life, religiously; how he had been prosecuted for a minister-tax, which he could not conscientiously pay, and even had his mechanical tools—he was a carpenter—taken from him, when actually poor and a family dependent upon his daily labor! Fervently would the old man thank God for the dawn of a brighter day, and ardently would he plead with those about him to guard well the religious privileges they were enjoying, and watch with a jealous eye every movement that had a bearing towards an encroachment upon them.—Years of careful observation of men and things has satisfied us of the importance and necessity of the old man's advice.

Within our recollection, the statute books of old Connecticut have been disgraced with the odious 'stand-up law,' by which every voter must rise up in town and State meetings, to be gazed at, and brow beat, and cowered down, by any combination that might exist, perhaps by his own employer, on whom he was dependent for his daily bread; and by laws which compelled every man to pay a ministering tax to the Presbyterian order, unless he took the trouble to certificate-off, and actually united himself to some other religious organization!

But happily 'progress' has been stamped upon the present century. These dark spots upon our history are disappearing before the advancing light of true religious and civil freedom. And just in proportion as this renovating light is dispensed abroad, are the desperate struggles of those who would continue these chains upon the mind, increased. Let the real friends of freedom of thought and opinion, however, be vigilant—be faithful—and this light will continue to advance, till every vestige of that spirit of domination is banished, and men be inclined to do right for the sake of the right—be induced to practice the golden rule of doing unto others as they would that others should do unto them.

We briefly alluded last week to this spirit of domination of which we speak—of its more recent indications, touching the District School Library question. It is the same spirit which originated all the excitement about the Bible in Public and Ward Schools of this city, based upon the objections of the Catholics to having Reading and Lesson books placed in the hands of their children, which ridiculed or denounced their own faith. Every hobby with the abettors of this spirit, has had, and must have, its day. Their indefatigable efforts were put forth at the establishment of the District School Library system, to introduce their sectarian publications, but without success. Subsequently came up the 'hue and cry' of excluding the Bible from Common Schools by Catholic and infidel influence, as they were pleased to characterize it. As the interest of that card began to subside, they cast about for something else by which to 'agitate.'—Most fortunately for them, a 'World's Convention' assembled about that time, and some fanatical unbeliever—(there can be fanatics in unbelief as well as belief)—pronounced a pauegyric upon Combe's Constitution of Man, and set it forth as an admirable work, to promote infidelity! Whereupon a new order of tactics was introduced. The cry of infidel influence in the District School Library was set up, and has been industriously plied ever since. The charge, that 'Combe on the Constitution of Man—the book of all others recommended by infidels themselves'—is extensively introduced into School Libraries, has been rung in all its changes throughout the community! With the New York Observer, it has passed into a kind of stereotype saying, not only through its acknowledged editorials, but through its varied correspondence, not excepting the 'Country Pastor'! Pretty clearly indicating the source of the articles, independent of all other considerations! Austin's Voice to Youth, as our readers are already advised, has been coupled with it. And Smith's Causes of Infidelity Removed, has been named—just named—though compared with either of the others, is decidedly the most sectarian, and of course the most objectionable, on the grounds they claim, and ask action.

But it is not so much that these two or three volumes have found their way into District School Libraries, that we hear all this commotion. No—far, very far from this. It is rather that 'standard treatises, which are and have been for centuries the common property of Christians'—in other words, that decidedly sectarian works, strongly inculcating all the horrible features of self-styled orthodoxy, are excluded; it is that the introduction of some two or three volumes (whose general spirit and philanthropy opposes the spirit of dictation of which we are treating,) should be made the pretext—the precedent—of introducing the American Tract Society and other 'evangelical' works into the Libraries! Let the Superintendent of Common Schools, just say to the abettors of these movements—'Introduce just such works as you please, gentlemen,—and we will be bound you will hear no complaint of Combe, or Austin, until they think they have secured influence, or moulded feeling, sufficiently to sustain them in throwing all works out but just their own publications! This may be deemed severe judgment, but do not facts warrant it all? Look at their whole career. Carefully analyze the recent criticisms upon the works alluded to, and in every item named, with bare one exception, you will find the whole 'head and front' of the offence is, that their incidental reasoning upon general themes, carried out, might sap the foundation of orthodoxy! The whole resolving itself at once into this pretty little specimen of Protestant Infidelity!—'We are orthodox; all others are heterodox'—which is not a whit better than Roman Infidelity, according to our religious arithmetic!

Another view should not be forgotten. The few works forming the ground of the present movement were never published to subvert sectarian purposes—they do not labor to that end—they strive to advance human happiness—to promote virtue and righteousness, upon general grounds. While the other works labor sedulously to the end of sectarian interest. They are published expressly for its advancement.

But we have not room to continue these observations now. We desire to introduce to the reader the principal portion of an article which appeared in the Journal of Commerce of the 8th inst., and which may be regarded as a kind of 'tender' to the Observer articles. We desire this for three reasons—first, it will illustrate some of the foregoing observations, and establish their correctness. Second, we wish to show the spirit which is already at work against public officers who dare to differ with self-styled orthodoxy; and third, to preserve it in our columns for future reference. In some future time its preposterous positions will be looked upon with no less wonder than the community now scan the history of the Salem witchcraft.

Austin's Voice to Youth and Combe's Constitution of Man, infidel in their teachings and tendencies! Surely the man who can prefer such a charge must be mad with bigotry and sectarian spleen.

But read the writer in the Journal. He gives no name—not even an initial—and it can hardly be wondered at. It is a kind of warfare that a Christian should blush to be known in, at this day of light and boasted liberty. That it should appear in the Journal of Commerce, will not be surprising at all, with any one acquainted with the conduct of the editors of that Journal, in that famous Eight Dollar transaction with us. A Journal that can receive Eight Dollars—(an extortionate price, by the way)—for a specified labor, and then fail in its engagements, and in addition keep the money, must be a very appropriate medium for such cantings as are contained in the article in question. See the article, headed—'State Irreligion,' &c.

THE SPIRIT OF PROSCRIPTION AT WORK.

In copying the State Superintendent's letter recently, alluding to Austin's Voice to Youth and another work, we hinted at the proscription he was exposing himself to, in thwarting, in the least, the purposes of an ambitious and power-seeking religious aristocracy. We expressed a hope that his decision was maturely arrived at, and that he had taken his stand in full view of the formidable array he would be likely to encounter. We still indulge the same hope. But we can already see that he will need all his energy and decision of character to withstand the influences that will be brought to bear upon him and against him. Already has the ban of proscription been uttered—evidently in its first object, to intimidate him and accomplish its object, if possible, through that channel; or, that failing, then to alarm the 'evangelical' portion of community, and direct, as far as possible, their combined influence to his removal! Is this doubted by any one? Just look, then at the language we copy this week from the Journal of Commerce. Look at the course of the New York Observer. Is it said that the thing all emanates from the editorial closet of the latter paper? So much the greater need of watchfulness. For when designing men, in their efforts to accomplish favorite objects, choose as their mouth piece, a widely circulated journal, distinguished for its bigotry and exclusiveness, which repeatedly misstates its opponents, and seldom, if ever, allows its readers to see more than one side of a question—there is so much the more danger.

The spirit of which we speak is loud in declaiming against Popery—its bulls of denunciation and proscription—forgetting that its own spirit would shame the Pope himself—that it is Popery, or worse than Popery, in every thing but the simple name!

The spirit and aim of the Journal article can not be mistaken. The curse is pronounced upon the Superintendent, and every influence will be brought to bear upon him—in pleadings or threatenings—to secure their object—the introduction of 'evangelical' works into the School Libraries, or the removal of the Officer, or a change in the management of the business! The Observer can plead, while the Journal can threaten. No matter if the pleadings and threatenings both emanate from the same source, if they but accomplish their purpose by one or the other means!

We only hope the Superintendent will remain firm to the duties of his station—act independent of all sectarian or party influence, either 'evangelical' or anti-evangelical, and preserve the School System to its original purpose—a fountain at which all may drink, without offence, who are disposed to do to others as they would that others should do to them.

And above all, let every lover of equal rights and freedom of opinion, stand by him faithfully. If it has come to this, that a responsible public officer can not express an opinion in respectful terms, when directly appealed to, without being denounced as a Pope, with all the reproachful appurtenances, merely because he happens to contravene the selfish wishes of the appellants, we think it high time for the friends of freedom to look about themselves, and watch with argus-eyes, the developments of such principles.

MINUTES

The council was then fully organized by the appointment of Br. JOHN MOORE, of Troy, Moderator; Br. P. PRICE, New York, Clerk, and Br. J. S. BROWN, of Perry, Assistant Clerk.

Br. A. C. Barry, submitted his resignation as Standing Clerk, which was accepted, and a vote of thanks tendered for the faithful discharge of his duties.

Br. H. L. Hayward was appointed Standing Clerk of this body.

Minutes of last session read and approved.

The Buffalo Association asked the fellowship of this body which was granted.

Appointed Brs. Potter, Cobb and Abbott, Committee on adjournment, who reported Scipio, N. Y. as the place. Report accepted and subsequently adopted.

Appointed Brs. J. M. Austin, D. Skinner and T. L. Clark, a Committee to nominate a Brother, to preach the next Occasional Sermon, who reported the name of Br. O. A. Skinner, of New York city, with power to appoint a substitute. Report accepted and subsequently adopted.

Appointed Brs. H. C. Mason, E. Whitefield and C. Townsend, Committee to nominate delegates to the United States Convention, who reported the following names; Brs. S. R. Smith, Buffalo; T. B. Thayer, Brooklyn; T. J. Sawyer, Clinton; A. A. Davis, Glen's Falls, Clerical. P. Price, New York; J. D. Ford, Newark; D. M. Moore, Schenectady; Paul Marshall, Plattsburgh; A. R. Ransom, Buffalo; Calvin Cole, Oxford, Lay. Report accepted and subsequently adopted.

Appointed Brs. G. W. Montgomery, T. J. Sawyer and S. Goff, Committee on Fellowship. Brs. D. Skinner, S. R. Smith and Job Potter, Committee on Correspondence.

The second Annual Report of the Board of Trustees of the N. Y. Universalist Relief Fund was submitted, read and adopted, and ordered to be placed on file, and to be published with the minutes of the body.

Appointed Brs. J. Chase, D. Skinner and O. Ackley, a Committee to take into consideration the several recommendations and suggestions contained in the Report of the Trustees of their Relief Fund, who reported the following:

Resolved, That One Hundred Dollars, be appropriated from the proceeds of the Relief Fund to the aid of the Widow and Orphans of the late Rev. Oliver Wilcox, one half of the sum payable immediately, and the other half on the 1st of November, 1846, to the order of Rev. Pitt Morse. Also, that Fifty Dollars be appropriated from the same source, for the benefit of the surviving child of the late Rev. Joseph Eaton—(Julius Savillion Eaton)—payable to the order of Joseph Mumford. Resolution subsequently adopted.

On motion of Br. J. M. Austin, the Moderator was desired to invite some Brother to give an Address on Education before this body; whereupon Br. T. J. Sawyer was called upon by the Moderator, and consented to give such Address.

The Committee on adjournment were instructed to take the subject of changing the time of meeting of this Convention into consideration, who subsequently reported the following Resolution:

Resolved, That the Constitution of this Convention be amended so as to change the time of the Annual Meeting from the last Wednesday in May, to the third Wednesday in August, in each year. Adopted, to lie over to the next session according to Constitutional provision.

Appointed Brs. J. M. Austin, D. Skinner and G. W. Montgomery, a Committee to take into consideration the condition, and direction of the Theological Seminary at Clinton, who submitted the following Report:

The Committee to whom the subject of the Theological School at Clinton was referred, Report as follows:

Whereas a Class has been formed in Clinton, for the better preparation of young men for the ministry—Whereas, this Class has already proved itself to be of great importance, not only to the sixteen individuals who have received instruction from its judicious teacher, Br. T. J. Sawyer, but also to the denomination who will receive these pupils thus better prepared for their duty, into its ministry—Whereas it is of vast consequence, that the Universalist denomination should encourage and strengthen every effort for the thorough education of candidates for the ministry—and Whereas, this School at Clinton needs not only the sanction, but also the aid of all those who wish the promulgators of the Restitution to be well fitted for the work of spreading the Truth; it is therefore by this Convention

Resolved, That a Committee of fourteen persons, (seven laymen and seven preachers) shall be chosen, who, in connection with Br. T. J. Sawyer, or his successors, shall constitute a Board of Trustees, whose business it shall be, to devise such means and plans as shall sustain and gradually perfect the effort now being made in Clinton for providing instruction for ministerial candidates; to solicit donations of money and books, either personally or by agents, for the support and use of the School; to take all such measures as shall tend to give permanency to the School. This Board shall meet as soon as convenient, and shall report its doings to the Order through our State Papers. Three members shall constitute a quorum to do business.

Resolved, That as the proposed subscriptions for sustaining this School for five years, are not yet sufficient for that object, this Convention earnestly calls upon the friends of the cause, to subscribe to its funds, that at least, if for no other object, the utility of such a School may be tested by the present experiment.

Resolved, That as the School is suffering from the want of a sufficient number of library and class books, this Convention earnestly solicits the friends of the cause to make donations of standard theological works. [It was expected Br. Sawyer would make out a list—he commenced one, and I designed the completion of it, but parted with him before it was attended to. Will he do it now?—P. P.]

The Report accepted, and after discussion, adopted.

Brs. T. J. Sawyer, Stephen Van Schaack and Job Potter were appointed a Committee to nominate Trustees of the Theological Seminary at Clinton, in accordance with the first of the foregoing resolutions, who subsequently reported the following names: S. R. Smith, Buffalo; John Moore, Troy; D. Skinner, Utica; J. M. Austin, Auburn; G. W. Montgomery, Rochester; J. T. Goodrich, Oxford; O. A. Skinner, New York, clerical; James Hall, New York city; Stephen Van Schaack, Albany; Jacob Harsen, New York city; David Moore, Schenectady; E. Cory, Cooperstown; Ira Cunniss, Auburn; E. S. Barnum, Utica. Report accepted, and the names adopted as the Board of Trustees. Adjourned to half past 7 o'clock, A. M., Thursday.

Thursday morning. Met pursuant to adjournment. United in prayer with Br. O. Ackley.

The following Preamble and Resolutions were submitted by the Clerk:

Whereas, The Sunday school cause is rapidly assuming that importance in the public mind which it is so eminently entitled to; and whereas we regard it as among the most important, if not the most important, means of advancing the cause of impartial grace and salvation, therefore

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Council equal prominence should be given to the services of the State Sabbath School Association, as to those of the Convention; and that a specific time should be set apart for listening to the Annual Address of that body, as is now the rule for the Occasional Sermon before this body; and in accordance therewith we recommend, that hereafter, Wednesday forenoon (as is now the rule) be appropriated for the Occasional Discourse before this body; and that Thursday forenoon be in like manner appropriated to the Annual Address before the Sabbath School Association.

Resolved, That the success which has thus far attended our efforts in the Sunday school cause, imperfect as has been our organization, is the best evidence we can have of the utility of the Institution, and the great benefits that must of necessity follow a thorough concert of action in its behalf; and we would therefore renewedly urge upon the denomination in this State increased zeal in this cause; by fostering and encouraging schools already established, and the establishment of others wherever practicable; and by all other appropriate means that are available. Adopted.

Appointed Brs. Sawyer, Montgomery and Potter a Committee to take into consideration the subject of Fellowship with this body, who made a partial report in the following resolutions:

Resolved, That any disabled clergymen, or family of a deceased clergyman making application for assistance from the Relief Fund, must accompany that application with a certificate from the Committee of Fellowship and Ordination, or Standing Clerk of their respective Associations, certifying whether the clergyman, in whose behalf, or in whose name, the application is made, is or was, in full fellowship with the Association in which he resides, or did reside previous to his death.

Resolved, That this Rule remain in force until the next session of the Convention.

Resolutions adopted, and leave granted to the Committee to sit again, with instructions to report through the Periodicals at their earliest convenience, some permanent Rules of Fellowship, to be acted upon at the next session of this body.

Voted, That the Clerk of this body prepare the Minutes for publication in the various denominational papers, accompanied with such remarks as he may deem appropriate.

Br. J. M. Austin submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention be presented to the members of the Universalist Society in Newark, for the kindness and generous hospitality extended to us during our sojourn in their midst.

Adjourned to meet in the Church immediately after the morning services.

Met according to adjournment, at the close of the morning services.

Br. D. Skinner moved the thanks of the Council to Br. T. J. Sawyer, for his Address on Education, which had just been listened to by the Council and audience; with a request for a copy for publication. Passed.

After uniting in prayer with the Moderator, the Council adjourned, as per previous vote, to meet in Scipio, Cayuga county, on the last Wednesday and following Thursday in May, 1847.

ON THE DEATH OF Mrs. NANCY SMITH,

OF SAUQUOIT, ONEIDA COUNTY, WRITTEN BY REQUEST OF HER DAUGHTER.

Dear Mother, hast thou left us here,

Without thy care, without thine aid?

Shall we thy counsels no more hear,

Nor mark examples for us laid?

Our infant days thou watch'd with care,

And didst in peace direct our way;

And thy kind spirit, free as air,

Guided our path from day to day.

But thou art gone to realms of joy,

Where all is peace and endless love;

To realms of bliss without alloy,

To chant the praise of God above.

Farewell, dear Mother, sainted friend,

Thy mem'ry lives within our hearts;

Thy cares and pains are at an end,

And we with thee are doom'd to part.

But far beyond these trying scenes,

Where sorrow racks the heart with pain;

In God's own time, by his own means,

He'll give thee to our arms again.

Peace then to thee, thou sainted one,

May thy example in us live;

Till God shall call our spirits home,

And we to Him all glory give. D. PICKERING.

Buffalo, May 18, 1846.

EPITAPH.

Oh! rest in peace, thou precious babe,

Thy spirit is with God;

Although thy form is here now laid,

Heaven is thy blest abode. D. PICKERING.

TRUTH.

Stern and grand amid the desperate war of elements, stood the wise man's house, which was founded on a rock. But no more grand a spectacle was the rock-founded tower of the wise man than is the man whose character of integrity is founded on eternal truth. 'Heaven and earth shall pass away,' but the words of Truth shall never.

As there is no character in the world so mean and despicable as the man who feasts on falsehoods, so there is no character more noble and commanding than the man who hath obeyed the injunction of wisdom, by binding truth around his neck, and having it wrote upon the table of his heart. We will not go into a definition of what truth is—it needs none, for it is a principle as well known to the savage as the civilized—was as well known at the beginning of the world as it is at present. It is no doubt true, that there can be no knowledge apart from truth; but the principle of truth in itself; moral truth in the heart of man, may shine as conspicuous in the simple peasant as in the learned prince. The principle of truth in itself, as a good moral virtue, is the principle which more immediately concerns our fraternity—is that principle which enables us to judge of right and wrong between man and man, and between ourselves and the world.

That many good and eminent men have been led away from truth into error, is a fact which history alas, furnishes too many sad and mournful illustrations, but we believe that a man open to conviction, and sincerely desirous of arriving at right conclusions, will, although led astray for a while, be ultimately led to direct his steps in the right path. The man who is deeply impressed with a sense of almighty truth, will always be found defending the rights of man, and opposing the wrongs which the ambitious and designing would impose upon the defenceless and innocent. It is this principle which has exalted with god-like courage, the martyr in the hour of danger, and enabled him to brave the fiery waves of persecution with unshrinking devotion. It is this principle which has led the patriot to lay down his life for freedom and his country, rather than live in grandeur, but to be a slave in mind. What sublime scenes of moral grandeur rises before our vision as we think of Paul in the pulpit, Tell on the field, and Sidney on the scaffold; but the field is too wide for our brief sketch, and too lofty the flight, it may be, for our humble powers, and beside we have considered that to trace the effects of truth in the more obscure paths of life, would be of more benefit, because there truth is generally passed by unnoticed. In duty to our fellow man—in the quiet transactions and relations between ourselves and our neighbors, it is perhaps more important to be guided by simple truth and honor, than in our public actions. What confidence could we place in that man whose public life is a scene of frothy patriotism and whose private life is characterized for meanness and deceit?—Surely none. But is it not a solemn fact that this simple rule of judging of true character is too much overlooked, and public confidence is often reposed in men who are known to be totally unworthy of the least private esteem. And is it not a fact that actions are committed in private without the least hesitation—actions from which we would shrink appalled, if held up to the public gaze; exhibiting a sinful forgetfulness of the solemn truth—'THE ALL-SEEING EYE IS UPON US.' To be adorned 'with truth in the inward parts,' that is, to be guided in our most humble and quiet transactions by simple truth, is more important, in my opinion, than in any other relations of life; for the private transactions of life is the heart of our public ones, and if the fountain is pure, the waters that flow from such a source must be sweet. I am acquainted with one whose private character I will briefly describe to illustrate the beauties of being guided by truth at all seasons and in all places—one whose nobility of soul may be overlooked from his humble position in the world, by the rich and the proud, but one of whom I am confident that when the Great Refiner shall assay in the crucible of truth the noble and base metals, he shall come forth as gold seven times purified, with songs and everlasting joy upon his head.

About nine years ago, Mr. Wilson* was employed in an extensive Lithographic establishment, and had by his integrity and attention to his business, won the esteem of his employer, Mr. Johnston, a man of keen business abilities, but who in his transactions, was guided not by the fine traits of truthful uprightness, but would even tell a small untruth as being sometimes, as he said, indispensable in the conducting of his business with some of his customers. It happened that he had a considerable number of orders on hand which he promised to accomplish on a certain day, a thing which he knew he was unable to do, but nevertheless he promised, reasoning that when he had the jobs on hand and not have them finished, he would be able to make some plausible excuse for the delay. On the morning of the 23d of April, 1837, Mr. Johnston came to William and said, there are six thousand cards to be ready for Mr. Brown, and three thousand for Mr. Kettle. You will not be able to commence Mr. Kettle's until tomorrow; but go on and finish Mr. Brown's, as he is always on the mark, and very irritable, and I will try and put Mr. Kettle off if he calls, as he is more easy to deal with. But it so happened that Mr. Kettle depended on his cards that very day, as he had arranged to send them away about three hundred miles; so exactly at eleven o'clock he called, and Mr. Johnston endeavored to make some excuse for the cards not being finished. 'Mr. Kettle flew into a passion, and spoke in very severe terms about his disappointment: indeed he gave vent to his feelings in such a manner that Mr. Johnston became very agitated, and to make a 'scape door for himself,' he called for William into his presence, and asked him if he had not got any of Mr. Kettle's cards finished yet? William answered that he had not. And did I not tell you, sir, said Mr. Johnston, to have them ready this morning? William answered mildly that he had received no such instructions. And do you tell me that I did not tell you to have Mr. Kettle's cards ready this morning? I can not for conscience sake, Mr. Johnston, give you any other answer than what I have given. Then sir, I say you got instructions from me to have them ready this morning, and, and— Here Mr. Kettle looked in Mr. Johnston's face, and coolly said, you may keep your cards, Mr. Johnston, and then walked down stairs.

Mr. Johnston, although a very good man, so called, was one who knew not what it was to be guided in all the fine lines of life by simple truth, and therefore at this time could not appreciate the fine character of the humble artisan who stood before him. He stamped and raved at poor William for making him a liar, as he said, before Mr. Kettle, little caring if William would have falsified himself before One who was greater than them all. Off, off, he said, never let me see you here again. To think I have lost one of my best customers by your want of respect to your superior. Begone, sir, begone.

William answered not a word, but with grief put on his coat and left Mr. Johnston's establishment. His purse was indeed light, and there were other two who depended upon his exertions for their daily bread—his young wife and infant child. William was of a delicate constitution, and he knew that there was no other establishment at which he could at that time get employment. The few shillings that he had were soon spent, and to crown his misfortunes, he was seized with a severe fever. What little his poor relatives could do for him, was done. His young wife was indeed like an angel of light by his bedside, and the consolations of a simple trust in the Author of all Truth wonderfully sweetened the cup of their afflictions, although they suffered and suffered severely. Relief at last providentially came. An exceedingly charitable lady had heard of their distress, and came to visit them. She was one who sought out personally many charities, the only true characteristic of true benevolence. She inquired into their situation, was touched with their tale of distress. She relieved their daily wants, and soon became deeply interested in the character of William, who was now fast recovering from proper remedies and the banishment of want from his family. She soon learned how he was turned away from the employment of Mr. Johnston, and admiration for the noble mind of William soon took the place of pity for his situation. She resolved to do an act which the reader will find to be evidence of both a liberal and sensible mind. She introduced herself to Mr. Johnston, and stated the case of poor William. She pointed out the value of such a man to any employer, and what trust might be reposed in him. Mr. Johnston needed not to be convinced of this, for experience had already been his stern teacher. The man whom he employed in William's place had run away and cheated him of no small amount. He had felt also, that he had done William wrong, and his simple words, I can not for conscience sake, Mr. Johnston, give you another answer, had vibrated on his heart ever since he had put William away. The God of Truth had been at work in his heart. He took up his cane and accompanied the good Mrs. Jamison to the house of William, and when he saw him wasted and bleached by his severe fever, the tears gushed from his eyes, and his voice was choked with grief, as he grasped his hand, and faintly said—Oh, William, I am the author of all this. All that were in the house were melted into tears—tears, it may be said, of sorrowful joy, and they bent the knee and offered up their prayers to the Giver of all good, at Mr. Johnston's desire, praying that God would enable him to walk in the footsteps of Christ, in spirit and in truth. William soon recovered, and was manager of Mr. Johnston's business for six years afterwards. His gratitude was ever fresh to Mrs. Jamison. He watched at the bed-side of Mr. Johnston in his last moments, who gave abundant proof of a lively hope in a glorious immortality, being happy that ever he heard William Wilson say, I can not for conscience sake tell an untruth.

To illustrate our subject, we have told a true and simple tale. It will, we have no doubt, be better appreciated than if we had written a thousand pompous paragraphs. My Brothers, let simple truth guide our footsteps in every walk of life; in private as well as public; may our every word be a lesson of truth. Let us never forget the rock of our promise, for Truth is the foundation of all honor, honesty, friendship and love. We know that a great deal more might be said upon this subject, but it was our object to inculcate an adherence to truth in every walk of life; in the most humble and the most minute actions. And as truth is the rock on which our Order is built, let us never forget that,

Truth is our golden banner bright,
'Tis waving in our Order's van,
Inspiring to the glorious fight,
Humanity, good will to man.

[Gavel.]

We give here, from Sharpe's London Magazine, an intensely interesting account of a perilous situation from which a human being was rescued. Such accounts are highly useful in a religious point of view, as they open to us what an interest is excited in behalf of the humblest person, when a sense of his danger is realized.—[Ladies Repository.]

DUFAVEL'S ADVENTURE IN THE WELL.

One morning, early in September, 1836, as Dufavel, one of the laborers employed in sinking a well at a place near Lyons, in France, was about to descend, in order to begin his work, one of his companions called out to him not to go down, as the ground was giving way, and threatened to fall in. Dufavel, however, did not profit by the warning, but, exclaiming, 'I shall have plenty of time to go down for my basket first,' he entered the well, which was sixty-two feet in depth. When about half way down, he heard some large stones falling; but he nevertheless continued his descent, and reached the bottom in safety. After placing two pieces of plank in his basket, he was preparing to re-ascend, when he suddenly heard a crashing sound above his head, and, looking up, he saw five of the side supports of the well breaking at once.—Greatly alarmed, he shouted for assistance as loudly as he was able; but the next moment a large mass of the sandy soil fell upon him, precluding the possibility of his escape. By a singular good fortune, the broken supports fell together in such a manner, that they formed a species of arch over his head, and prevented the sand from pouring down, which must have smothered him at once. To all appearance, however, he was separated from the rest of the world, and doomed to perish by suffocation or famine. He had a wife and child, who now came into his mind, and the thought of them made him feel still more bitterly his imprudent obstinacy in descending into the well, after being warned of the danger to which he was exposing himself.

But although Dufavel regretted the past and feared for the future, he did not give way to despair. Calm and self-possessed he raised his heart in prayer to God, and adopted every precaution in his power to prolong his life. His basket was fastened to the cord by which he had descended; and when his comrades above began to pull the rope, in the hope of drawing him up to the surface, he observed that, in their vain efforts, they were causing his basket to strike against the broken planks above him in such a manner, as to bring down stones and other things. He therefore cut the rope with his knife, which he had no sooner done, than it was drawn up by those at the top of the well; and, when his friends saw the rope so cut, they knew that he must be alive, and determined to make every exertion to save him.

The hole made by the passage of this rope through the sand that had fallen in, was of the greatest use to Dufavel; through it he received a supply of fresh air, and, after a while, his friends contrived to convey food to him, and even to speak to him. Of course he was in utter darkness; but he was enabled, in a curious manner, to keep a reckoning of time. A large fly was shut up with him, and kept him company all the time he remained there. When he heard it buzzing about, he knew that it was day, and when the fly was silent, he knew that it was night. The fly boarded as well as lodged with him; he was as careful as he could not to interrupt it while taking its share of his meal; when he touched it, it would fly away, buzzing as if offended, but soon returned again. He often said afterwards, that the company of this fly had been a great consolation to him.

More skilful persons than the poor laborers of the village of Champvert were soon engaged in the attempt to liberate Dufavel. The municipal authorities of Lyons procured the assistance of a band of military miners, who, under the direction of experienced officers, began to form a subterranean passage for the purpose of relieving him. Prayers for his safety were daily offered up in the churches of Lyons, and the most intense interest prevailed; it was found necessary to erect a barricade, and station a guard of soldiers round the scene of the accident, to keep off the flocking crowd from the neighborhood, all eager to obtain news, and see what was being done.

The cavity at the bottom of the well, over which the wooden rafters had so providentially formed a sort of roof, was at first about seven feet in height; but owing to the sand constantly running through, and pressing down the roof from above, by the third day, the space became so small, that the poor man could no longer stand, or even sit upright, but was crushed upon the ground in a peculiarly painful manner, his legs doubled under him, and his head pressed on one side against his left shoulder. His arms, however, were free, and he used his knife to cut away such parts of the wood work as particularly incommoded him, and to widen the hole the passage of the rope had made. Through this hole, by means of a small bottle, soup and wine were let down to him, and, after a few days, what was quite as important, a narrow bag to receive and bring to the surface the constantly accumulating sand, which must soon have smothered him, if this means of removing it had not been devised, and he had not had strength and energy for such a painful labor as the constantly filling and refilling the bag soon became. Of course, any pressure from above would have forced in the temporary roof, so that nothing could be attempted in the way of removing the mass of sand, &c., that had fallen in. They dared not to touch the surface above; but they contrived, by means of a tube, to speak to him. A cousin of his, himself a well-digger, was let down for this purpose. This man spoke to Dufavel, and assured him that the miners were making progress, and would soon reach him; he inquired after his wife and child, and charged his cousin to tell her from him, to be of good cheer, and not lose heart; at this time he had been a week in the well.

Day succeeded day, and still the expectations of the miners were deceived. They worked night and day, but such was the treacherous nature of the soil, that neither pickaxe nor shovel could be used; the foremost miner worked upon his knees, inserting cautiously a flat piece of wood into the ground, and afterwards gathering up with his hands, and passing to those behind him, the sand which he thus disturbed. On the twelfth day of his imprisonment, they calculated they were only twelve inches from him, and yet it took them two days longer before they were able to reach him. Every minute the ground was giving way; and it sometimes took them many hours to repair the damage that a single moment had produced. Besides, they felt it necessary to proceed with the utmost caution, when they approached Dufavel; for there was great reason to fear, whenever an opening was made, the mass of sand above his head would fall down and suffocate him. At length, about two o'clock in the morning of Friday, 16th September, they made a small opening into the well, just above his shoulders.—The poor man shouted for joy, and was able with his knife to assist in extricating himself. He was carefully conveyed along the horizontal gallery, and wrapped in blankets before he was drawn into the open air. Several medical men were in attendance, and one of them had him conveyed to his house, and put to bed.

We will not attempt to describe Dufavel's happy meeting with his wife, nor the tears of joy which he shed over his infant boy, who did not at first recognize him, muffled up as he was obliged to be to protect him from the cold, and his chin covered with a beard of more than a fortnight's growth. In the evening he was so well, that Dr. Bienvu consented to his being conveyed to his own home; and he was accordingly transported thither in a litter, attended by a great concourse of happy and thankful spectators.

THE ALPINE HORN.—Among the lofty mountains and elevated mountain valleys of Switzerland, the Alpine horn has another use besides that of sounding the far-famed Ranz des Vaches, or Cow Song; and this is of a very solemn and impressive nature. When the sun has set in the valley, and only the snowy summits of the mountains gleam with golden light, the herdsman who dwells upon the highest habitable spot takes his horn and pronounces audibly through it, as through a speaking trumpet, 'Praise the Lord God!' As soon as this sound is heard by the neighboring huntsmen, they issue from their huts, take their Alpine horns, and repeat the same words. This frequently lasts a quarter of an hour, and the name of the Creator resounds from all the mountains and rocky cliffs around. Silence at length settles over the scene. All the huntsmen kneel and pray with uncovered heads. In the meanwhile, it has become quite dark. 'Good night!' again resounds from all the mountains, the horns of the huntsmen, and the rocky cliffs. The mountaineers then retire to their dwellings, and to rest.

We find in an exchange paper an anecdote of the late William Wirt, that is too good to be lost. Wirt's Life of Patrick Henry, as every reader of that biography knows, is excessive in its laudations of the great Virginia orator; in fact it may well be doubted whether the man ever lived to whom such a swelling and varied strain of panegyric could be justly applied as Wirt continually resorts to in depicting the character of Henry. In illustration of this trait, the following story, current in Eastern Virginia, and said to be true to the letter, is told:

Wirt was once engaged in the trial of a cause in which one of the most material witnesses on the other side was notorious for his gullibility. By way of showing up this trait in the witness, and thus impairing his testimony, Wirt asked him if he had ever read Riley's Narrative, and if so, whether he thought it was true. 'Oh, yes,' said the witness, 'I've read it, and I believe every word of it!' The counsel on the other side perceiving the advantage gained by his opponent, here interposed the question—'Did you ever read Wirt's life of Henry, and if so do you believe it is true?' 'I've read it,' replied the simple witness, 'but I can't say I believe it; no, no, that's more than I can swallow!' Wirt was 'essentially floored!'

CHANGE.

Change is a constant attendant of time; following on in its footsteps, and upon every thing leaving marks of ruin and decay. From the smallest spire of grass bending beneath our footsteps, to the rugged pine towering in grandeur above the forest; from the smallest worm crawling in the dust, to man, the noblest work of God; throughout the whole range of inanimate and animate nature, time works its changes. The flower that opens its petals to the morning sun, receives a breath from the passing breeze, and its beauty is no more. The noble monument of art, the object of human toil and human sacrifice for long, long years, crumbles to ruin as time passes on.—Even the ponderous mountain lifting 'its snow clad summit to the sky,' shall be changed in all its wonders. The spell shall pass over it and it will be levelled with the valley! Nor deem that man is an exception; for while we are admiring the beauty glowing upon the countenance of youth, time draws a line of care, anxiety and sorrow upon that fair and lofty brow, and ere the change is scarce perceived, death 'opens wide the gate' and locks him in the solitary sepulchre! Sojourner upon earth, look back upon the lengthened way which you have trod, and say now, where are the friends once surrounding you and whose sentiments were congenial with your own? Where are the fond parents that watched o'er your childhood, and gave you that virtuous instruction, shielding you from the many dangers beside your pathway? Say, where are they, and many more whose names were once familiar? A voice comes up from the shadowy tomb, declaring human life to be but as a vapor before a burning sun. And yet during the period of life, there are many hours joyous and happy; many moments hallowed and blissful; many periods over which the eye of memory looks with pleasure and gladness. There are ties of affection woven around the finest and most tender sensibilities of our hearts. We commune with those who are, as it were, our second selves. We build high hopes and fond anticipations upon the stability of friendship, and the enjoyment which it will bring in coming days. And yet, those kindred spirits will soon pass away; those ties of affection, be rudely severed; our seasons of communion with friends and loved ones, broken up. Time shall throw around them the mantle of darkness, and they will slumber in oblivion!

Reflections like these have a tendency to fill the mind with grief; to throw a deep shade of sorrow upon the soul, or to sink the heart in the depths of a melancholy gloom. And some may think their indulgence highly improper, but we have yet to learn that they are productive of evil. We believe them to be beneficial. The hour of solemn reflection upon the changes and vicissitudes of time, is an hour productive of its blessings. Though the tear of sorrow may bedim the eye, yet then we are more fully brought to a knowledge of the frailty of human nature; of our entire dependence upon the Supreme Being for all of our enjoyments, and looking forward to the hour of dissolution, we shall be prepared to meet in a spirit of humble submission.

Though sorrow may arise from reflection upon the changes incident to human life, yet there is one change, and one the most important wrought upon human beings, which may give one joy almost boundless, and gladness far more than sufficient to overbalance the sorrows and grief of earth. That change is the one spoken of by the bold and fearless Paul; from mortality to immortality, from corruption to incorruption; and when that change shall have taken place, then there will be no more sorrow, no more grief, no more pain; for then the former things shall have passed away and all things have become new.

The star of Bethlehem is far above the horizon, and its beaming rays fall upon a prospect far more beautiful and lovely than aught ever beheld upon earth. 'There is a house not made with hands; there is a home eternal in the heavens.' There we shall meet those kindred spirits that bid us adieu, 'long, long ago.' There, ties more dear than any which have bound us below, shall be around us; and there shall be joy forever unbroken by sorrow! On Calvary the Saviour died, and through the instrumentality of that death and the power reposed in the hands of the Son of man, the intelligent creation is to be clothed upon with immortality and brought home to the dwelling-place of God! Faith in this change forms a balm for the wounded spirit, and its healing powers will never fail! Here is joy for the mind sorrowing over the inconsistency of human nature, and by it a smile shall beam upon the countenance of the downcast and dejected mortal! Here is that consolation, which will free the hearts of mankind from all desponding reflections upon the trials and afflictions of human life! And those who have a faith in this change, should treasure it up as a prize whose value can scarce be comprehended; as one of God's glorious and unspeakable gifts to man. S. J. G.

Rev. M. HALE SMITH has recently closed a course of Lectures in the second Presbyterian Church in Washington, to the Young—one each to Young Women, to Young Men, to Young Married Persons, and to Young Parents. They are spoken of in high terms of commendation, and are soon to be published, with an introduction by the Hon. John Quincy Adams, who heard them to his great satisfaction.

The name of the author will probably be recognised as that of the author of the very popular book, 'Universalism Renounced and Exposed,' made still more popular by a cheap edition with the title, 'Universalism for 12 1-2 cts.' If his old associates could have been believed, Mr. Smith was destined, by constitutional predisposition, to be no honor to the ranks he has joined.—The incessant dogging of their papers has kept our eye upon him, and we find that he has run a truly creditable, and in some respects, brilliant career since he escaped out of the snare of the pestilent error he renounced. First in Nashua, N. H. and the past winter in Washington, has he magnified the office of the evangelical ministry.—Moreover, his weekly letters in the N. E. Puritan, have been models of that kind of correspondence.

We copy the foregoing from a Partialist paper at Syracuse, edited by Revs. G. H. Hulin and P. Terry. We would like to know what the above named Editors mean by the 'pestilent error' which Matthew renounced. He renounced Partialism twice, Unitarianism once, Universalism twice, and has now a third time returned to Partialism, 'like a dog to his vomit.' Which the 'pestilent error' is they do not specify.

These gentlemen say he (Smith) has 'run a truly creditable and in some respects brilliant career since escaping out of the snare,' &c. Did they then allude to the fact that Gov. Steele, of New Hampshire, published and proved Matthew a liar, and moreover compelled him to acknowledge himself one? Or did they allude to the fact that immorality of conduct instead of the 'incompatibility of the climate to his health,' was the cause of the Orthodox society (to whom Smith preached) in Nashua advising him to ask a dismission? Was that the way, gentlemen, that 'he magnified the office of the evangelical ministry'? You say you 'have kept your eye upon him.' Very well, you had better not take it off. You may yet find, to your sorrow, that he has been 'no honor to the ranks he has joined.' Universalists have found him such, and you are welcome to try him. W.

DISTRICT SCHOOL LIBRARIES.

We would call the serious attention of our readers to the article on this subject from the pen of Br. J. T. Goodrich and those which follow from the N. Y. Journal of Commerce and Universalist Union, copied into this week's paper. The subject is exciting, as it justly ought, the deep interest and earnest attention of the friends of education, and of both the foes and friends of equal rights and unsectarian education and School Libraries. Bigotry and superstition combined are making a desperate effort to carry all before them—to drive every liberal and free work from the libraries, and push into their places the narrow and wool-dyed sectarian publications of the American Tract Society and American Sunday School Union. We hope their onslaught will be met with firmness, by the friends of equal rights, who should, in one united and impervious phalanx, stand to their post, resist the wrong and support the right. Br. Goodrich intimates that he has more important matter on hand, upon the subject, that will be forthcoming by next week. Let our friends, one and all, keep their eyes and their ears open on this subject. D. S.

A COMPEND OF CHRISTIAN DIVINITY, BY SYLVANUS COBB. BOSTON, 1843.

We owe the respected author of this valuable treatise on Christian Divinity an apology for so long delaying to notice it. True, we gave notice of its publication and copied a list of its contents, or subjects treated on, several months ago, and had intended to give it a more special and extended notice long ere this. But Br. C. requested us not to do it till we found time to read it through. This we did not find for several weeks, and when we had nearly accomplished it, we were interrupted and our attention entirely engrossed with business of a very different nature until now. We shall therefore crave his pardon and fall back upon the old maxim, 'better late than never.'

'Well,' says the reader, 'what do you think of Br. Cobb's Compend?' What do we think! why, we think it is an imperfect work, performed by an imperfect man; and the reader will infer the reason, when we assure him that we are not a perfectionist ourself, (though we have a natural brother who professes to be,) and doubt whether any man here on earth is perfect or ever wrote a perfect system of Divinity. But Br. C.'s Compend is an approximation to a perfect system, is judiciously and ably performed, breathes a spirit of candor, liberality and devotion, presents the character of God in a most amiable and attractive light, and the system of truth revealed in the Gospel as worthy of its great and good author, and the confidence and obedience of man. In short, the subjects treated on are, for the most part, ably handled, and with great plainness and perspicuity. There is nothing of tinsel or show, no gew-gaw ornaments in his style; but a plain, straight forward writer, he thinks of something to say, and says it right out, in unambiguous style. He 'finds his inspiration in his theme,' and 'is, when unadorned, adorned the most.'

We should not probably agree with him in every iota of doctrine, in every shade of opinion, or in all his interpretation of Scripture; and we know of no man living with whom we are certain that we could. His views on most doctrinal subjects appear to harmonise very nearly with those of the venerable Hosea Ballou; and his style is not entirely dissimilar to his.

It could not be reasonably expected that any man could furnish a perfect Compend of Divinity in the space of 430 pages, like the book before us. But Br. C. has crowded a great deal of valuable and interesting matter into that space; and we cordially commend it to the careful personal and favorable consideration of an enlightened public. Though we have many valuable denominational works treating on particular subjects in an able manner, yet we have none that exactly fills or can supply the place of this. It is therefore a desideratum in our denomination; and if, perchance, it should be read by others than Universalists, we are confident it will do them no harm. D. S.

THE PROTEST.—We have received from Br. Asa Upson, of Hornellsville, a communication containing his reasons for not signing the 'Protest,' nor desiring his name to appear on 'that roll of names.' His reasons are very similar to those given by us and others, and he thinks he could not consistently promise 'heartily fellowship and co-operation in any labors to advance the cause of human freedom,' before he saw them, or knew satisfactorily what those labors were to be. But as we have dropped the subject from our columns, and declined the publication of several articles on both sides, he will excuse us for not wishing to revive the discussion, and therefore for not publishing his reasons in full.

Our readers of the last volume of this paper will recollect that in December last a short skirmish, or brush, took place between the Western Luminary and this paper, or rather between their respective conductors—also that at that time it was stated in an article from one of our correspondents, to which we appended a note, that Br. Hammond had published a statement in the Luminary that he was losing by the paper and publishing it at a sacrifice, while private letters from him stated that he was making money by the paper. Br. Hammond desires us to state to our readers in reference to those discrepancies or contradictory statements, that the article in question published in the Luminary, conflicting with his private letters was written by a correspondent, and not by himself, and published in his absence, and that he was not aware that any thing of the kind had appeared in the Luminary at the time our article was published. We cheerfully give this explanation at Br. H.'s request; and we take occasion to say to one and all concerned, that we have laid up nothing personally against Br. H., nor do we cherish any unkind feelings towards either him or his paper. Ed. Mag. and Adv.

We have received a communication from Br. I. B. Sharp, complaining of the injustice done him in the Card of Br. J. Stebbins which appeared in this paper of the 8th ult. He says what he formerly stated he did honestly and candidly state, believing it to be true; and while he allows that Br. Stebbins might have been honest in his views of the same subject, and thinks two may entertain different views of the same thing and both be equally honest; he complains at being represented as dishonest and dishonorable in the course he took in this affair. Now we think this subject should be dropt, and dropt forever. Mutual jealousies, charges, surmises, recriminations, &c., where the parties are so sensitive as to take every thing that is said for more than it means, can do nobody any good, and can not but engender bitterness and bad feelings on both sides. Enough and too much has been said. 'A word to the wise,' &c.

To save others and myself some trouble, I would say to those who are in the habit of sending me letters and papers, that my Post Office address is East Hamilton, Madison county, N. Y. S. J. G.

The GAVEL for June is on our table. Its contents are excellent. We select an article entitled 'Truth,' which is worth a careful perusal.

The MECHANICS' MIRROR is also received and filled with useful reading as usual.

The June (and last) number of Vol. XIV of the LADIES REPOSITORY is received. The next volume (XV) will commence with July next. It is to be printed on new type with the usual number of embellishments and attractions. Two dollars a year in advance. Address A. Tompkins, 38 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.

No. 8 of MAUNDER'S TREASURY OF HISTORY concludes the history of Ireland, and contains the histories of Scotland, France and Spain down to 1812. 25 cents per No.

Removals.

Br. C. H. Webster to South Dedham, Mass. Br. E. Dayton to Geneva, Kane county, Ills. Br. Thomas to Randolph, Mass. Br. A. Hitchborn to South Reading, Mass. Br. S. J. Gibson should be addressed at E. Hamilton, Madison county, N. Y.

BLACK RIVER ASSOCIATION.

The Black River Association will be attended at Fulton, Oswego county, on the third Wednesday and Thursday in June. At our last session it was voted that the clerks of societies and ministers be earnestly requested to furnish statistical accounts of their respective societies at each session of this body. It is very desirable that this request be duly regarded; and that each society send two certified delegates. Occasional sermon by Br. J. S. Kibbe. P. MORSE, Standing Clerk.

Luminary please copy.

ST. LAWRENCE ASSOCIATION.

This Association will hold its next annual session in the village of Malone, Franklin county, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday (24 and 25) of June next. Our several societies, (and there are sixteen in fellowship with this body,) are entitled to two delegates each. Shall we have a full delegation this year? And will the clerks of all the societies send in full statistical information—such as Br. Grosh desires for his next Register, (see Mag. and Adv. No. 19, current year,) and as will enable me to report to him immediately after the close of our meeting? Brethren, one and all, let us remember our next association meeting and faithfully discharge our respective duties appertaining thereto.

W. H. WAGGONER, S. Clerk.
Canton, May 27, '46.

* * Will the Union and Watchman please copy.

OTSEGO ASSOCIATION.

In accordance with adjournment, this Association will meet at Richfield Springs, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday (24th and 25th) of June. The Council will convene at 8 o'clock on Wednesday morning; public religious services at half past ten o'clock, when the occasional sermon will be delivered by Br. A. C. Barry. The society of Richfield hereby extend a cordial invitation to ministering brethren and friends to come up to this annual feast. A committee of arrangements may be found at the church. O. WHISTON, Stand. Clerk.

NOTICE.

The Christian Universalist Association for Canada West, will hold its annual session in the village of Bloomfield, Prince Edward District, on Friday, Saturday and Sunday the 12th, 13th and 14th of June next. A general attendance of friends is expected. Ministers and members of all denominations are respectfully invited, and ministering brethren from the States are urgently solicited to attend. Bloomfield is situated about 40 miles south west from Kingston and 4 miles from Pictou, between which place and Kingston a line of steamboats run daily.

Friends will be at the wharf on the arrival of the boats to convey our brethren from a distance to the place of the meeting of the Association. Per order, Bellville, May 15, 1846. DAVID LEAVITT, S. Clk. * * Trumpet, Messenger, and Luminary please copy.

NOTICE.

The Steuben Association will meet at Howard on the first Wednesday and following Thursday (1st and 2d) in July next.

I presume directions are unnecessary. Any person arriving within the bounds of the county may be directed strait to Howard. But I suppose, fashion will have it, that I should say, 'Ministering brethren and friends are earnestly invited to attend.' How is this? Can there be a Universalist preacher, or layman, or sister, who can make it convenient to attend our Association or conference meetings, that must receive a formal invitation before they will venture to meet with us? I believe not. We are always glad to meet our brethren and sisters and ministers, at all times, and especially on occasions like these. And we believe it is so understood, and received, generally. So, if I have made this notice longer than usual, I have expressed my mind.

A. UPSON, S. Clerk.

DEDICATION AND CONFERENCE.

The meeting house recently erected at Edmeston Centre, Otsego county, will be dedicated to the service of God on Wednesday 17th of June.

A Conference of this Association will meet for this occasion and continue during Wednesday and Thursday, 17th and 18th. O. WHISTON, Standing Clerk.

CONFERENCE.

A Conference of the Hudson River Association of Universalists will be held at Porter's Corners, in Greenfield, the third Wednesday and Thursday (17th and 18th) of June. An invitation is extended to all, either in or out of the Association, who can make it convenient to attend.

Porter's Corners is about eight miles from Saratoga Springs, and it is hoped that friends who intend to visit this celebrated watering place this season, as many of them as can, will find it convenient to do so at that time, and meet with us on that occasion. All such will be gratuitously and cheerfully transported from the Springs to the place of meeting and back. Our friends from Greenfield will be in waiting, on the afternoon of Tuesday, the day previous to the meeting; and visiting friends who desire to go, will please report themselves at Huling's Book Store, on Broadway, opposite the American Hotel. J. A. ASPINWALL, S. Clerk.

MOHAWK RIVER ASSOCIATION.

The Mohawk River Association of Universalists will hold its annual session at Newport village, Herkimer co., on the second Wednesday and following Thursday, 10th and 11th, of June next. Services to commence at 11 o'clock, A. M. of Wednesday. Delegates from the different societies are requested to be there so that the Council can convene and organize at 8 o'clock in the morning. Each society is urgently solicited to send two delegates to represent them in the Council. The Clerks of the different societies are also requested to furnish their respective delegates with statistics of the condition of their societies, the number of members, the amount of preaching they enjoy, and finally their present condition and future prospect.

Our friends at Newport will be in readiness to receive us; come then brethren, from the east, the west, the north and the south, preachers and laymen, and their associates; come all who conveniently can, and hear the occasional sermon by Br. D. Skinner. J. D. HICKS, S. Clerk.

Universalist Books.

Just received from Boston, and for sale at this Office. The new work just published at the Trumpet office, entitled 'Reasons for our Hope,' by J. Victor Wilson, price 75 cents. Paiges Commentary on the Four Gospels, Vols. 1 and 2, $1.00 each. Ballou's select sermons, 63 cents—do. Lecture sermons, 63—do. on Atonement, 50 cents—do. Notes on the Parables, 50 cents—Family Prayer Book, 50 cents—Mrs. Scott's poems with a memoir, 63 cents—Emmon's Bible Dictionary, 50 cts.—Duties of Young Men, by E. H. Chapin, in miniature form, gilt, 38 cts.—Flower Vase, by Miss Edgarton, 38 cts.—Language of the Gems, 38 cts.—Manuals and Class Books for Sunday Schools.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. JOHN D. CARELL will preach at Bridgewater on the first Sunday in July.

Br. ABBOTT will preach in Mottville on the third Sunday in June.

Br. J. T. GOODRICH will preach in Harpersville, on Sunday, June 7th, at 10 o'clock A. M., in New Ohio at 2 o'clock P. M. and at Page Brook at 5 P. M. Also, on the second Sunday at Phettyplace school house in Norwich.

MARRIAGES.

On the 28th ult., by Rev. O. Ackley of Geneva, Mr. WM. BURNETT to Miss JULIA SCRIBNER, both of Phelps.

In Salisbury, March 25th, by Rev. J. Douglass, Mr. JAMES C. LAMBERSON to Miss MARTHA J. DIBBLE, all of Salisbury.

In Stratford, March 26th, by the same, Mr. KERLEY WARD to Miss ROSEY J. PHILLIPS, all of Stratford.

DEATHS.

At Black River, Jefferson co., May 22d, JANE, daughter of Francis and Polly Butterfield, aged 10 years, 1 month. The deceased was drowned by accident, in the river, near her father's dwelling. The body was found and interred on the eighth day afterwards.

The subject of this notice was one of the most engaging, interesting and promising personages of her age—the idol of her parents, and the favorite of all who knew her. Her loss was deeply felt by the entire circle of her acquaintance.

Her funeral was attended at Black River on the 30th, by a large and attentive audience, to whom the consolations of the Gospel were administered by the writer.

As when the crystal dew-drop, trembling on
The fragrant flower, feels the glad influence of The coming sun and flies to meet his warm Embrace, so her pure soul, relieved from earth's Dull cares, called by the gladning smile of God's Eternal love, has winged its flight to Heaven.

U. M. F.

At Little Falls, May 9th, Miss HULDAH LOOMIS, aged 56 years.

In the departure of sister Loomis from among us, all who knew her have reason of sorrow. Her active benevolence, her unconquerable attachments, her ever-enduring fidelity, her characteristic humility, and her warm and flowing affections, rendered her beloved while she lived; and her firm and unwavering faith in the Lord Jesus, and in the final triumph of the Gospel in reconciling a world to the Father of all spirits, rendered her happy and at peace in death.

Her life was such as to make her live in the affections and memory of the community, now she has gone from the world to sing the song of the redeemed, and with angels to worship our God forever.

Her funeral was attended on the Sabbath following the day of her death, at Salisbury Corners, where a sermon was delivered to a deeply feeling circle of mourning relatives and sympathising friends, by the writer.

TO MISS R.

BY REV. J. B. SAX.

My heart rejoices much to know,
Sweet lady, ever dear!
That God our heavenly Father, crowns
With blessings every year.
That he's a God of love and truth—
Mercy without alloy
—And that he does desire to fill
All human hearts with joy.
The blessed faith that he will save
By loves' all-powerful might,
All sinners in his own good time,
Gives infinite delight.
But you can not so read his word;
You can not see it so;
Well, why should this our love disturb—
Why stop its genial flow?
"O, let us still each other love,—
Pure friendship, constant love;
Rejoicing in each other's joys,
Till we shall meet above!
Until we meet our Father, God,
And Jesus Christ our Lord,
And all his holy angels bright,
In heaven, where sin's abhorred.
Let not our difference in faith,
Unfasten that bright chain,
Which now so sweetly binds our hearts,
Upon life's heaving main.
But O! what if in future time,
The judgment of our God,
Should break for aye this golden chain,
By his almighty nod!
Could you be happy then in heaven,
And I in fire of hell?
Ah, no! the sorrow you would feel——Pardon,—I will not tell!

'THE BLANKET IS BY FAR TOO NARROW.'

About a year ago there was quite an excitement in the adjoining town of Westfield, occasioned by the renunciation of the doctrine of endless misery, by the Rev. John Filmore of the Free-Will Baptist order, (formerly of Broome county, N. Y.) and embracing Universalism in its stead. As a natural consequence, as soon as it was known that so important a prop had ceased to give its support to the cheering doctrine, the cry 'to arms!' was echoed from every quarter, and it was declared that Filmore must be 'brought back,' or 'put down.'

A breach being made in their deemed invulnerable wall, it must needs be stopped, and the effort resulted in a challenge for Mr. Filmore to meet the votaries of Partialism, and discuss the question, 'is the doctrine of endless misery taught in the Bible?' or in other words, to show cause for abandoning the old and beaten track. Rev. Francis Strang, the Methodist champion of the far famed village of Priestville, appeared in support of the question, and said: 'Universalists can not support their doctrine but by sophistry, which they are continually using in explaining away the meaning of the Bible.' But he and his party used none! No, good souls! they always take it as it reads. Instance this in answer to Mr. F. on 1st Tim. 2d chap. 4th verse. He says it is true 'God wills that all should be saved; but it depends altogether on the man whether he is saved or not.' And again of Matt. 24, 3d verse, he makes three distinct questions with the answer applying only to the first; and immediately adds, that he thinks 'generation here means the life time of the Jews!' To cap the whole, Mark iii: 29, was shown up. Hell itself was uncapped, and we were carried a good stretch into eternity, and made to see the misery of him who had blasphemed against the Holy Ghost, and whom God in his 'holy wrath,' and 'with righteous justice,' was to keep to torment for ever and ever.

The whole was wound up and kept in balance by repeatedly cautioning us to beware of Universalism, lest we too should have our portion in that lake which ever burneth; forgetting that all sin should be forgiven men except the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, or else implying that the believing and trusting in the lovely attributes of Jehovah, constitutes this heinous sin! But now a mild voice is heard in reply to this masterly effort. His fabled hell and phantom demons soon vanished, and the lovely truths set forth by Mr. Filmore shone the brighter for the severe rubbing they had just received. The debate resulted in convincing the believers in endless misery that debates are injurious to the spread of their principles. There are a number of substantial friends to the doctrine of impartial grace here, and the light then unveiled continues to shine with increased lustre. A society has been formed, which is now in a flourishing condition, under the charge of Rev. John Filmore. P. O. address, Westfield, Tioga county, Pa. EDWARD O. AUSTIN.

WHY DO I WORSHIP GOD?

MR. EDITOR—SIR:—It seems to me that every professed worshipper of God ought to ask himself the question which heads this article; and not only ask but apply it to himself, and if possible, (which I believe it is,) to find out the cause which prompts him to profess to be a worshipper of God. For my part I believe there are at least three principal causes.

First. The love of popularity. There are those who desire to be popular and live in a community whose religion is popular. A majority of the people, for instance, are Methodists: consequently, a love of popularity causes them to be Methodists. But let them remove to some other place, where religion is not popular; that is, where the wealth and affluence of the place do not profess religion; and you will soon find that their religion is not worth transportation. So that it is plain to be seen that their love of popularity will make them religious, or not, just as will best serve their purpose.

Second. Fear united with selfishness. There is, I am sorry to say, a much more numerous class, who, though sincere in their profession, yet, believe that their future and eternal destiny depends upon their actions in this life. Therefore they profess to worship God, not because they feel the duty which they, as creatures, owe to their Creator; not because they feel the duty that they, as children, owe to a kind and indulgent Father; not because they realize that God first loved them, and has always done them good; but because they believe in endless rewards and punishments for the frail acts of human nature committed in this brief space of their being. Therefore, they toil on in all the dread and terror that their creed promulgates, without any of the consoling power of love. Poor souls! how I pity them!

But there is another and third class which, blessed be God, is daily increasing. They can see in God a Father, and in Jesus Christ a Saviour. They feel that God is good. They believe that because Jesus lives, they shall live also. They feel that God first loved them; therefore they feel constrained to love him in return.—If they have any fear, it is a fear to offend or dishonor, because they love. They do not trust in their own works or merits for salvation. But they do trust in the all-sufficient grace of Almighty God. Therefore, they are worshippers of one only living and true God.

I believe an application unnecessary. But let the reader reflect and judge for himself.

One half of the physical and mental labor now performed by mankind, would be amply sufficient (if properly adjusted) to feed and clothe all sumptuously. The cause why it is not so—too much finery and luxuries.

A GOOD MAN

Is respected everywhere by those whose respect is worth having. Whether a member of one church or another, he will be pointed to as an example to those around him. None are so lost to a sense of virtue as not to pay him reverence—all speak to him in a subdued and gentle tone of voice—and each one seems to say, I would like your respect and friendship.

A good man will sooner or later be known as a good man. Water is not more certain to obtain its level than such an one is to ultimately obtain from those around him a true estimate of moral worth.—Deception may seem to prevail for a time—lying and hypocrisy may momentarily obtain an advantage; but the man of truth and solid worth will live and flourish long after those who are guilty of them are 'twice dead and plucked up by the roots.'—And his peace of soul—his joy in believing, and his tranquil and happy state of mind are worth more than silver or gold, for neither of these can purchase them.

O how sadly do those err who think to prosper through falsehood and dishonesty! Until the laws of nature and the human mind are reversed the expectation of all such must utterly perish. They are opposed by the warning of their own conscience, the declarations of the Bible, the eternal principles of right interwoven with the whole frame-work of divine Providence—and by everything good and desirable.

VERY RELIGIOUS.—A bitter sectarian deacon, in commending a young man, a member of his church, said he was a very religious young person. On being requested to state his reasons for that opinion, he said the young man had experienced religion, believed in the trinity and endless damnation, and hated the Universalists like a saint. What kind of religion had that young man experienced?—[Trumpet.]

Human happiness has no perfect security but freedom; freedom none but virtue; virtue none but knowledge; and neither freedom, virtue, nor knowledge, has any vigor or immortal hopes, except in the principles of the Christian faith, and in the sanctions of the Christian religion.

ANNUAL ADDRESS.

Delivered before the W. N. Y. S. S. Association, at Alexander, May 13, 1846.

BY REV. J. S. BROWN.

BRETHREN,—In consequence of the ill health of the brother whom you appointed to address us on the present occasion, we are reduced to the present substitute as an alternative. In the presence of many of my seniors and superiors, and in view of the magnitude of my subject and the importance of the occasion, I proceed to my task not without embarrassment, but with the resolve to perform it according to the ability God has given me, and the opportunity which the brief period since my appointment to this station, has afforded.

‘Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.’—(Solomon.)

‘Suffer little children to come unto me.’—(Jesus.)

The texts which I have selected may not find an exclusive application to the subject upon which I design to discourse on the present occasion. And yet, embracing as they do the combined wisdom of three great lights of the moral world, they will serve to draw our minds to the mighty enterprise involving the dearest interests of human nature; to wit—the moral and religious instruction contemplated by the institution of Sabbath Schools.

In presenting the claims of these institutions to your consideration and patronage, I undertake it with a profound sense of the greatness of my subject, and the discrimination required to present it substantially in its true light, that it may have its proper bearing upon the minds of this congregation.

Should we, after a proper and thorough investigation, become convinced of the utility of our enterprise, the bearing of our tri-fold text will then be discovered, and, I trust, will force itself upon our consciences and feelings until our hearts, and voices, and hands will be engaged in this work and service of religion and humanity. I do not believe that the human mind can engage in a nobler employment, and one more befitting the high powers with which kind Heaven has blessed us, than in promoting and perpetuating to posterity, and down through future ages, the mild, rational, and benevolent religion of Jesus of Nazareth.

When we look at the several nations of the earth, and observe them where Christianity has taken up its abode—even though it be in its corrupt forms, mingled with false philosophy and superstition—wherever it has even a name to live, it is not difficult to trace the improvement of society, in not only religious theories, but in morality and virtue, intelligence and purity, customs and habits, arts and sciences.

The work of Christianity among the nations, though nominally allied to much that is wrong and degrading—though Persecution has gorged her victims in Religion's name, and Tyranny has assumed her garb, and Superstition has spoken her language, and Ignorance and Bigotry have croaked her phrases, yet her work among the nations has been greatly blessed—her victories sublime and glorious. Go where we may beyond the sunlight of Christianity, to any portion of the globe upon which we live, and man is comparatively degraded. For, where do the sciences tend their lustre, but in the land of Christians? Where are the arts encouraged? Where does literature refine the populace? Where do intelligence, and active enterprise, and social dignity, and domestic happiness, find a home secure, but where Christ and his religion are named? Where is the art of printing, with its untold wonders, with its thousand blessings, enjoyed as in those lands where the doctrines and precepts of the once lowly Nazarene are taught and practiced? Where is the great spirit of reform and progress in knowledge, in human rights and moral dignity, but where the Gospel comes, with its high standard of moral purity, its bright and glorious hopes, its expansive charity, its olive branch of peace, and its everlasting hostility to ignorance, vice, and wrong? A glance at the map of nations will answer these queries; and that answer will be truly encouraging to all lovers of the Christian textbook. Then, am I not justified in saying, that the human mind can not be engaged in a nobler employment than in perpetuating and extending the blessings of the Christian religion? It is worthy the noblest efforts of the best—yes, of all minds.

Hence, it should be a subject of most serious thought and solemn deliberation to devise those means that will be most effectual in advancing Christianity and rendering it the all-powerful agent in reforming our race and advancing the future generations in wisdom, virtue, and religion. Mankind, as rational beings, should remember, that their race is progressive—that the march of mind is onward, and that it lies in the power of every generation to enlighten and moralize the succeeding one to a higher state than the past or present. And especially is this true in a land of Christian institutions and Christian doctrines.

And now the question arises; what means shall we adopt—what measures shall be put in operation, that we may best secure the progress of the Christian reform—that the leaven of the Christian doctrines may work broadest, deepest, and the most effectual in the minds of those who are to take our places, and are to act in the great field of human improvement. You all anticipate the answer! It is this: place in the hands and instill into the minds of the children and youth that wisdom and those means that will prepare them for life's duties and toils—for its trials and pleasures. If the revelation from the Father of Lights, through his beloved Son, embraces that wisdom which will redeem human nature from the thralldom of sin, ignorance, and error, produce peace and harmony in social life, and elevate man to his true dignity—is it not due to them, who are to take our places, to give them a knowledge of that revelation—throw around them its hallowing influences, and point them forward and upward to a state of ‘high wrought happiness’ which can only be enjoyed by a proper development of the intellectual, moral, and religious faculties with which humanity is blessed? Is it not due to them, that their minds should be instructed in that volume that searches out all the hidden springs of moral action—that enables them to become acquainted with themselves, their duties to their Creator and to the world? It is my candid opinion, that the parents who do not endeavor to provide means for the moral and religious cultivation of their offspring, are neglecting their highest interests, and fall far short of those great duties which devolve upon them from that most sacred and endearing of all relations in this mortal world—that of parent and child.

It is not enough that the musty volume lie untouched upon the dusty shelf; it is not enough that the conflicts of religious sects draw the minds of the young to controversial topics, and make them biblical theorists—not enough, that they all attend church, and hear long dissertations upon fragmentary portions of the Bible—to go away in idle thoughtlessness, or with no practical knowledge of the subject upon which the preacher has spoken.

I speak not disparagingly of these advantages, for they have been blessings to the world; but that ‘Gospel of the kingdom’ should all be woven into the young mind—every precept and commandment should be written on the young heart—all its heavenly hopes should be given to animate the youthful soul, and light even childhood's eye with almost a spirit radiance. Its unbounded and everlasting love should so steadily and affectionately illumine the fair field of mind, that all gentle affections—a universal philanthropy, and a cheerful faith and holy reverence, should spring up, like the sweet rose and the gentle lily answering to the warm effulgence of summer suns.

I believe that all this, and more than this, is due to the child whose birth and education are in a Gospel land. The parent that looks to the moral and religious improvement of his child—that not only sees his own form and features in a miniature there, but looks into the soul, and discovers the image of his own moral feelings and religious nature, and feels anything of the importance of their development and education, preparatory to the great duties for which they are designed, will not fail to unfold, or provide means for unfolding, the spiritual glories of Christ's revelation to his soul. He will make every reasonable sacrifice to bring its varied and far-searching truths to bear upon their moral powers, discipline and refine the feelings, and throw around all subordinate passions the wall of principle. These obligations of parents to their offspring are felt by mankind in all nations, whether barbarous or enlightened; and their manner of performing them is graduated by circumstances, and the degree of intelligence and morality to which they have advanced. The fulfilment of this obligation is as binding upon man as any law of his mental or moral constitution.

The natives of our own forest lands would repeat to their children the legends and traditions of their ancestors, call up their virtues and their valor, and transmit from age to age through many generations their woodland wisdom, and their memorable deeds. These were to make the youth virtuous, perpetuate what they regarded as sacred, and inspire their sons with the spirit of noble daring that moved the bosoms of their fathers.

This custom was true to human nature and paternal feeling. Let the Christian parent—let all who are desirous of the moral welfare of our kindred humanity, so listen to the generous promptings of nature. And in proportion as the Gospel of peace and love is valuable to mankind, as it bears with it the elements of truth and reform, the glad tidings of great joy which shall be to all people, a corresponding zeal should characterize them in whose hands the everlasting Gospel is placed. Its glowing revelations should be written in the hearts of posterity, they should be woven with all the soul's deepest affections, their applications should be pointed out in the thousand vocations of life, and their peaceful, joyful influences on the young and the old, upon the sons of prosperity and the children of adversity, in health and in sickness—through all life's changes. The mind should early learn how calm and serene the untroubled bosom, how happy the life, how peaceful, and glorious the death of him who lives and walks in the light of the Christian doctrine. It is to effect this object, and more than this, that Sabbath Schools are instituted. It is to instill into the youth the pure and purifying religion of Jesus Christ. They are designed to give the children of the land a moral and religious education. Children possess moral and religious natures, and like every faculty which the human mind and body are endowed with, they require cultivation and activity. In vain shall we expect to advance mankind in the scale of knowledge and happiness as long as the higher, nay, the best powers are left without education.

If those noble faculties are not wisely directed in youth, they are very liable to be perverted and abused. The truth is, parents and friends, those children that play around the hearth of home, that seem indifferent now to all the proceedings of the religious world, those children that smile when you smile, speak your phrases and repeat your actions, indifferent to, and insensible of the fact as we may be, have moral and religious feelings and faculties which require training and nourishing into life.—They have religious sensibilities, and which shall we prefer, to let them remain dormant until passion and the lower propensities shall overpower them, or leave them to be seized upon by pioneers of mania and excitement, carried down the whirlpool of fanaticism, or blindly led away and lost to usefulness and the world, by the machinations of a Joe Smith, or a Wm. Miller? Or will we be wiser? Shall not those intellects be inducted into the Christian doctrines, these feelings of reverence and love be drawn out by a knowledge of the Creator's goodness and the moral government of God? Shall not those passions be subdued by early subjection and habitual obedience to reason, and the moral sentiments? Shall not the young minds learn their duties to God—their relation to the world, the high objects of life, the nature and sanctity of moral principle—the goodness of charity and the beauty and great excellency of all the Christian virtues? When the soul is young, and the affections uncorrupted, ere the passions become boisterous and dictatorial, and the vices of the world are little known, and the temptations of wealth and vanity, and the allurements of depravity in its dreadful forms are unfelt and unnoticed, and the mind is humble and teachable, oh, how propitious the season for moral and religious instruction! How few the obstacles to overcome compared to those thrown up in after years by the force of habit! It is the proper season to store the memory with the rich treasures of that wisdom that came down from heaven to give life to the world. What though the verses committed and rehearsed in the Sabbath school, be not comprehended in all their bearings? they will be treasured up in memory, and all additional knowledge will but reveal this hidden meaning, and as reflection and reason are natural, the first fruits of these early lessons will be more and more enjoyed, while life shall last.

The growing faculties will discover new moral grandeur, the longer these early lessons are contemplated and applied to experimental and practical life. No one can fully realize the probable blessings accruing to the moral world from these causes. How the instructions thus enjoyed, may direct the mind and give it strength and vigor in after years, to battle with the monsters of error and vice! None can tell how many, will thus be saved from the dark ways of iniquity—from the horrors of a gloomy superstition—from the cold gloom of atheism, the blight of bigotry, the dark dungeons of a prison—or worse punishment than these—the curse of a degraded nature, and a guilty heart.

If our Sabbath schools can be supported and encouraged with that zeal that their probable blessings should reasonably call forth, they shall yet wield a far reaching and glorious moral power and influence over the world. They will to a vast extent supply that deficiency in the system of education which has been so long felt, and is so commonly deplored, an education that has done everything for the intellect and genius of man, but left his moral and religious powers to chance and hazard, or given them over to the dark reign of superstition, ignorance, and bigotry.

And I believe that Sabbath schools well organized, and conducted with zeal and devotion, will give lovelier features to the face of society—will to a vast extent elevate the morals of the world, while they strengthen the intellect and subdue the passions. Whenever the Bible is taught in these institutions, children must become acquainted with the Christian duties, their hearts must be made better, and their minds stored with knowledge whose usefulness will be discoverable in all the changes of life.

In this age of the world there is more to interest children, and lead their minds into the love and service of religion, than in times that are past. The Christianity of the past, as well as too much of the present, has worn a dark, gloomy, and forbidding aspect. Children have no hearts for such a religion as this. It is too repulsive for their tender affections to cling to. But, what child I ask, can not be interested in the religion of love? What child that is instructed in the character of God as good and loving, his government paternal, his laws benevolent, his punishments disciplinary, and a heaven of purity, and love, and knowledge, for all earth's children—what child I ask, can not be instructed in a religion like this? And with this religion, how a sense of duty to God and man, how a cheerful obedience is wrought in the soul! I thank God that the religion of love is working with more energy and effect, than at any other period since the days of primitive Christianity. While I admit the zeal which all other sects exhibit in training up their children in what they believe to be God's truth, I hail the day with heart felt pleasure, when children can be instructed in a theory and practice, that unite and act in harmony to overcome evil with good—when God's impartiality is taught them, and a spirit of universal philanthropy is breathed into their souls in all the lessons and instructions of the Sabbath school. If, then, we would mould the minds of the children of our charge in a faith that works by love, if we would prepare them to battle with sin in a spirit of benevolence, and go forth in the work of reform with cheerful and charitable hearts, teach them while young to appreciate and love the benevolent religion of Jesus. A harsh theology belongs to the past, and it needs no philosopher's eye to learn that every successful reform—no matter what theory may live in the church book—every successful reform of modern times has owed its progress to a benevolent, punctual religion—and it requires no prophet's glance to discover in the signs of the times that the benevolent spirit of reform will outrun a cold and lifeless theology whose overwhelming terrors paralyze the fine sympathies of human nature, and must live more in outward form, than in the living, active energies of the soul. It is plain that the institutions, religious and moral—the literature, the principle of all reform societies, such as emancipation from slavery, intemperance, improvement of prison discipline, and associations innumerable, are all moved to a great extent, and are moving, in the spirit of a benevolent religion. And would you have your children carry on the great work that is now so gloriously commenced, plant deep in their young affections the germs of the mild and charitable religion of Christ. Teach them, while young, that the whole human family have all one Father, who loves them all, and what advances in knowledge and virtue, in all the Christian graces that can adorn the human heart, will, in due time, be seen, and your labors blessed.

To the friends of Christianity, for I speak to Universalists, and if I had advice to give to others, I would say, give your children a moral and religious education, instruct them in what you believe to be truth, and make them wise and good; but to the friends of liberal Christianity, there are but three alternatives—1st, To allow your children to saunter or idle away the Sabbath at home, and leave them to chance, or 2d, Send them to Sabbath schools, where doctrines are taught them, which you regard as derogatory to the character of God, and repulsive to the nobler sentiments of the heart—where the Bible is explained in harmony with the doctrine of retaliation—in short, where partialism and the religion of fear must enslave their nobler powers; or 3d, Educate them to look to God as their unchangeable Father, to man as their brother, and to a state of immortality, where virtue, and love, and truth will reign over the intelligent creation.

How many evils and dangers lurk in the first mentioned alternative can not easily be seen. As you value the moral and religious welfare of your children, do not neglect them. It is on the idle Sabbath days that the seeds of vice germinate. No never neglect them! Consider how many parents have seen their loved offspring disgraced by crime, become a prey to vicious habits, or the inmates of prisons, through neglect, and their gray hairs are brought down in sorrow to the grave. Moral instruction—a watchful discipline of the mind and heart—are the safeguards from these evils, and the seal of promise that a life of usefulness and happiness, of honor and dignity, is before them.

The second alternative is to teach them in dogmas that will cramp their nobler feelings instead of expanding them. Yet I am happy to say that much that is good and useful is impressed upon the minds of children in all schools, where the Gospel is made the text book. It can not be otherwise in this land of light and intelligence. 'Tis true with good precepts and a training for the path of holiness, great and good safeguards are thrown around the young spirit. But a gloomy faith will cast its clouds of darkness over those souls, and their dismal shadows may linger there through every period of later years.

I approach with pleasure the third alternative—the blessings of a hopeful and benevolent religion. The impressions first made, when the heart is freest to receive them, should be those that would serve to develop the highest and tenderest affections and sentiments, and effect a cheerful and willing obedience to the law of the Lord, whose perfections convert the soul. O, glorious are the results of such a religion!

When upon the days of excursion, these Sabbath school children individually, or collectively, give freedom to their active spirits, and go out into nature's fields, and breathe the pure air, and gather the gay flowers, and read lessons of hope and love in all the works of God, happy are they if their affections are chastened by a refined and purifying religion,—if their Sabbath lessons cast new lustre over the fair fields around them, and nature and revelation encourage reverent and loving hearts, a strong and cheering faith, animating and glorious hopes, and

'Minds with God and man at peace,
Like waters gliding calm at even,
And blending in their quiet face
The softer tints of earth and heaven.'

Then all things, nature, and poetry, and music can be brought into the service of religion, and religion in its turn will lend enchantment to the heavens in their grandeur, to the earth in its beauty, to man in his being and destiny.

In the establishment of Sabbath schools there are three classes of persons particularly interested and upon whom great responsibilities rest. The success of our enterprise will be determined by the action of two of these classes.

All men, as citizens and as Christians, are called upon by every sacred consideration to give their energies and influence for the improvement and welfare of the rising generation.

They but poorly fulfill the mission of men and women who take no interest in the moral welfare of the young. They are strangers to the dearest interests of human nature, and the sweetest sympathies this world knows.

But I shall confine my remarks at present, to two classes of persons very intimately related to the duties of the Sabbath school.

First, Parents and Guardians.

Of all persons beneath the sun we should suppose these first would become the friends and patrons of the Sabbath school.

Man may care but little about the moral welfare of his race, beyond his own family and friends.—He may speak lightly of those means which are devised for the intellectual and social elevation of a community. He may be absorbed in worldly pursuits, and overlook the social and religious interests of his fellows, as unworthy of his attention or time.

There is a barbarism I know in this indifference. There is a culpable sordidness and selfishness unworthy of an intellectual being in this carelessness of human welfare! But a parent can never, it seems to me, feel that indifference toward the moral and religious wants of his child. There are ties and sympathies that spring up from the very center of his being, that are fastened to the heart of the smiling image at his feet, and they plead for the moral and spiritual elevation of those trusting creatures, that grow up beneath a mother's smile, and feel the mighty inspiration of a father's love—a father's tears! Oh the strong pleadings of nature demand unremitting attention and care in the development of the moral powers of the child!

The first duty of the parent is generally understood to be the feeding and clothing of his offspring. And the man that will not do that is called a brute, and unworthy the name of parent. Yet, the father or mother so unnatural as to neglect the physical welfare of their children, does them no greater injustice, and practices no greater cruelty, than in allowing their moral and religious powers to remain uncultivated, to be overgrown with passion, lust, and all the brutish feelings. A glance at the consequences of such neglect will convince us at once of the truth of this remark.

A life of crime is certainly as much to be deplored, as suffering or death in infancy. The doom of a prison is more dreadful than coarse fare in childhood, or shivering in cold or storm. The sottishness of the drunkard, or the grovelling of the thief and robber, are worse to be endured than any evils that poverty or want can inflict upon human nature. Now if these be the result of early neglect in the training of the child, if parents have been regardless of the moral well-being of those who are intrusted to them, let them reflect upon the results of that indifference, and may their souls feel the remorse and shame which their negligence and folly should call down upon them. Parents toil from morn till eve, year after year, to provide means for the support of those who are dependent upon them—to feed and clothe the bodies of their children. Well this is natural impulse, and it is well. But remember that moral nature requires an aliment upon which to subsist, or like the body of the neglected child it will famish and die. How many interesting children I have seen in prattling infancy, the pride of their father, the delight of their mother. Nature had been lavishing the bestowment of her gifts. Every feature seems lighted up with a young intelligence. The perceptive powers catch impressions from the varied forms of nature, but through neglect of the mental and moral faculties, in consequence of paternal indifference, the infancy of the child passes away, and with it goes all its beauty, its intelligent features, its artful smiles, and brilliant wits, all gone. The body has grown, but the mind has stood still. The passions grow with the physical powers, but the mental and moral qualities become as it were an uninteresting vacuity—a blank; and the green, awkward youth appears the most uninteresting, insipid, and stupid creature in return!—How many such have we not seen! Families thus allowed to depend on chance, or natural tendencies, or social influences, are thrown upon a hazardous ocean. They may avoid the rocks and shoals that beset them on every hand, and they may be dashed into a whirlpool ere half the journey of life is gained. At least they will make a poorer voyage than they would under more auspicious direction, and beneath brighter skies. In appealing to parents for their encouragement of Sabbath schools, I would only call nature into action. I would only ask them to reflect upon their relation to the young beings of their charge. Education, whether intellectual or moral, ought to be closely guarded by a parent's love. A word, a look, a smile, a tear from that source, will stir far profounder depths in the heart of the child than sermons from any other being. There are some duties that peculiarly devolve upon parents, as connected with a Sabbath school, and should be attended to as a matter of necessity. Though they will be discovered at a glance, and it seems a work of supererogation to mention them, yet I believe, with all their obviousness, they are sometimes liable to be neglected: Regularity in attending church, and in conveying children to their place of worship, and to their school. If there be any reason in what has been said—if there be any virtue or benefit derived from the Sunday school, regularity in attending comes as a matter of course. Here is a parental responsibility. I know the inconvenience that sometimes attends those who reside at a distance from the church; but muddy roads or a shower will only test your earnestness in this matter; and to remain at home once or twice from these causes, is but to tell your children that you deem the Sabbath school of but trifling consequence.—You can convince them of it in no better way; and once convince them of this, and all you can do for the school will be labor lost, so far as your family are concerned. Let parents attach an importance to this matter. Let them be willing to make some sacrifice of ease or comfort to secure the prosperity of the cause in which they are engaged—let their personal presence give countenance to the undertaking, and let their own minds be deeply interested in the instruction and moral improvement of the pupils in charge. Here would arise a mutual benefit. The old will derive encouragement from the prospects and improvements of the young.—They will catch purity and new affections from the innocence, life, and virtue of the youth—and nothing will so soften the heart, and refine the feelings, and exalt the motives of man, as an interest in the moral cultivation and spiritual improvement of children and youth.

Our Sabbath services will possess new interest from associations like these, and religion will clothe herself in her loveliest attire, and speak in more enticing and enrapturing tones. These hints to parents I deem sufficient. I would only unseal the fountain of their feelings in behalf of the well being of their offspring, and their wisdom will be set to work to throw around the young mind and heart such influences as will lead to mount Zion, to tread the courts of the new Jerusalem, which came down from heaven, a fit residence of the human heart.

And by the term teachers, I mean all who have charge of the school, including preacher, superintendent, and those who have classes under their instruction. I would say much upon this branch of my subject. For the success of a Sabbath school must greatly depend upon the mental and moral qualification of those under whose wisdom it is controlled. It is necessary they should feel the responsibility resting upon them. Not to regard the station they occupy as one of minor consideration; but as fraught with interest as dear as the human heart, as valuable as virtue, as glorious as religion.

It is the duty of the teacher to cherish a strong love of the Gospel and religion of the Saviour.—How poorly are we qualified to teach without an earnestness and interest that will awake the same feeling in the breast of the child!

2d, It is the duty as it must be the pleasure of the teacher, like our beloved Master, to look with tenderness and affections upon little children, and especially those who look up to them for guidance, for example, for instruction.

Oh, what a field opens before him or her who would lead the mind of children to the contemplation of religion, to the love of virtue, to a knowledge of life's obligations. What affections can they awaken, what sympathies can they arouse! They may leave impressions that will linger around the heart of the child—that will brighten as years roll on—and speak in the character and conduct of their lives, through all the varied scenes of after years.

These children have memories. The words of truth, of love sincere, the rich voice of the Saviour that shall speak from your hearts—shall awaken sensibilities—shall inspire with glowing affections the hearts of these little ones, that will bless them in prosperity or adversity that may be the lot, and cheer and gladden their souls to the latest days of their lives!

Oh, in the humble task of the Sabbath school teacher, there are rich laurels to be won. How grateful would it be to the heart of a man or woman, if when a few seasons shall come and go, and these little ones, inspired by the deep lessons of childhood, shall rise to a virtuous—a lofty eminence of intellectual and moral greatness—and in the glory of their most useful days, they could point to the humble teacher whose love-lit eye and voice of wisdom first breathed the inspiration of religion into their souls. Oh, young man, or young woman! a tear of gratitude from such a source would be worth the richest pearl of ocean, the brightest gem of earth! Amen.—[Luminary.

DEATHS.

At Oriskany Falls, May 22d, of consumption, OCTAVIA, LOUISA, wife of Elisha Fowler, Esq., and daughter of Levi Carpenter of Bridgewater.

Although Mrs. F. had been afflicted with ill health for a long time, yet until within a few weeks of her death hopes were entertained of her being spared to her family and friends for many years. But alas! the insidious destroyer seems only to have masked his ravages, to inflict a more poignant wound. Endowed with every virtue that can make a wife amiable, a mother beloved, or a neighbor respected; her death has inflicted a wound that will not easily be healed. But the affliction is somewhat alleviated by the reflection, that to her death had no terrors. She bore her sickness with the most perfect patience, frequently expressing gratitude for attentions paid to her, and talked of the prospect of death with the calmness of a true Christian.

COM.

In Marshall, June 5th, OLIVER SABIN, aged 73 years.—A short time has elapsed since the deceased buried the wife of his youth—the partner of his age. He has now gone to be reunited with her in stronger and holier ties in that celestial paradise where age brings no infirmities and time causes no separation; where sorrows and sighing and pain shall flee away and God's own hand shall wipe away every tear. Through life he was a faithful follower of the Saviour, a lover of his Gospel, a believer of its doctrines of free grace and universal salvation, and a liberal contributor to its spread among mankind. Through life the Gospel was his beacon light to a better and happier clime, and in the hour of dissolving nature his support and consolation.

The funeral was attended by a large concourse of relatives and sympathizing friends, and a sermon preached by the writer. Br. C. A. Skinner took part in the services.

J. W. McMASTER.

In Lee, May 15th, of consumption, DANIEL NEADIT, aged 47 years. Mr. N. had suffered long and severely, and longed for the time to come that would liberate him from his sufferings. The time came and found him ready and willing. In conversation with a neighbor a few days before his decease, he spoke calmly and confidently. The future had no terrors for him—he felt assured that he should be there as here in the hands of a just God—a Father—a Saviour. The consolations of the Gospel were ministered to a numerous circle of relatives and friends, as he a few days before his death requested, by the writer. S. J.

In Cedarville, May 28th, Mrs. ORPHA, consort of Solomon Morgan, aged 30 years.

In early life Mrs. Morgan was a firm believer in Methodism—but as she grew in knowledge and grace, her views of God and his government became more elevated—till at length by the eye of faith, she saw God as the Father—Friend—and Saviour of the world. In all the departments of life she was a true woman—and she died, a true Christian.

Funeral on the first day of June, and a discourse from Rev. E. M. Woolley was delivered to an immense concourse of friends and mourners. May God lead them all as gently, and confidently to the grave, as he did our departed and lamented Orpha.—Com.

At Palermo, Oswego county, on the 30th ult., Mr. MARVIN PEARSONS, aged 45 years.

Also at the same place, on the 31st, Mr. JESSE HOLBROOK, aged 82 years.

The funeral of both was held in the Baptist church, June 2d, and to a large circle of mourners and a crowded audience, the consolations of the unlimited Gospel were presented by the writer, assisted by Elder Gardner.

M. B. SMITH.

In Gainesville, June 4th, LAURA B., infant daughter of John and Harriet I. Tousley, aged 8 months. The funeral was attended on the following day, and a sermon delivered by the writer, assisted in the services by Rev. H. S. Fish of the Christian connexion. May God bless the mourners

THE MOURNERS.

BY REV. THOMAS L. HARRIS.

I.

Where'er we wend our way we view the mournful ones of earth;
 They tread with bounding feet no more the glittering halls of mirth;
 Around their trembling forms are drawn the weary weeds of woe;
 Their sighs, like cold November rains, in mournful cadence flow,
 From the dead hopes and faded joys of bright departed years,
 They twine a garland for the brow impearled with many tears,
 Upon the grave of buried loves they sit awhile and sigh.
 Then mid the ruin-mantled waste of Time lie down to die.

II.

They close their tear-dimmed eyes upon God's calm and holy light,
 And dwell within their misery as in a starless night.
 The glory of the crimson morn, the music of the spheres,
 Falls vainly on their lonely way and on their tuneless ears.
 They nurse their hopeless sorrow till of life it grows a part,
 And like a cold and mighty snake twines round the bleeding heart,
 And then its hissing tones descend in drops of fiery rain,
 And scathe, as lightning flashes blast, the weak and wandering brain.

III.

The mourners chant with voices low, a wild and dirge-like strain,
 That moans, as on a rocky shore, the solemn sounding main,
 It breathes in April's violet breath and Summer's angel hymn,
 It mingles with the blush of dawn and evening twilight dim,
 Thus swells upon the wailing wind their melancholy lay:
 The night of woe hath veiled the smile and splendor of the day;
 The joys of life, its blissful dreams and radiant smiles are o'er,
 The rose of human love may bloom for us no more, no more!

IV.

Arise, be strong, O Mournful Ones, the Future is your own,
 There love may weave her rosy nest, there joy erect a throne,
 What though the first frail buds of Spring in dust lie cold and low,
 Still weave the incense-breathing blooms of life's rich Summer glow,
 The blissful ones, the glorified, build up their own bright state,
 Then on the path of light and love press joyous and elate;
 Rise fearlessly on eagle plumes—see through the parting gloom
 Elysian climes, and loving hearts, and groves of song and bloom.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the New York State Convention of Universalists for 1846.—Concluded.

REMARKS.—The first thing which seems to demand attention, and may I be allowed to say, also, to require a word of reproof, is the limited representation in the Council. There are now sixteen Associations in the State, each entitled to four delegates—2 clerical and 2 lay—in all 64. By a reference to the Minutes, it will be seen that only 19 clerical, and 12 lay delegates were present—less than half the number entitled to seats! Brethren, 'these things ought not to be.' It is needless to look for that full measure of prosperity to our cause, which we profess so ardently to desire, without we can make some little personal sacrifices, to promote its interests—at least, so far as to discharge our duties in these convocations of its ecclesiastical bodies. These annual social gatherings are of great benefit. They reciprocally warm and invigorate each and every heart. Let one quarter, one third, or one half of the members absent themselves, and it throws a chill over the zeal and ardor of the remainder. This result is inevitable—it follows in the very nature of things. But let our Councils be full—let them be animated in their deliberations by the attendance of 'great numbers of the people,' and every heart is strong.

In the matter of Statistics, also, there is great remissness. But a solitary report on this subject was submitted at the present session, from all this Empire State. That Report was from the Standing Clerk of the St. Lawrence Association—Br. Waggoner. It represents the cause in that Association as in good condition—the principles of our faith are continually gaining ground, and prospects becoming more cheering. 'The Association numbers 17 societies—three more than at last year's report. Three new houses are going up to be finished before the close of the year. Preachers are active, friends steadfast, the Death Penalty, few remaining advocates, and Temperance—'no license'—a large majority.'

It is greatly to be regretted that so little attention is paid to this subject. The Standing Clerk of this Convention will find himself but poorly prepared for a proper discharge of his duties, towards the General Convention. Will not societies, and Associations, be persuaded to give greater heed to it? It is important in many respects—particularly for our own encouragement in our struggles with the many difficulties with which we have to contend as a denomination, and to enable us to give an official refutation of some of the slanderous representations of a bitter opposition.

By the Minutes it will be perceived that some action was taken in reference to the Theological Class under the charge of Br. Sawyer, at Clinton. This being an important movement, I can not suffer the occasion to pass without a brief word, in allusion to it. In the Council it elicited considerable remark, all decidedly testifying to its importance, and the necessity of some efficient action in elevating the standard of ministerial qualifications. It was argued that the growing importance of our cause, the spirit of the age—every thing, in short—demanded it. The experiment of a School had been commenced—(by individual effort)—and had been prospered beyond expectation thus far. It was now the duty of the denomination to lend a helping hand, by some concert of action in its behalf. It was proposed that a Board of Trustees be appointed, to look after its interests, to obtain funds, &c., &c. Before the question was put, however, Br. Sawyer addressed the Council at some length, embodying some plain, common sense remarks, which it is hoped will be remembered by every one who listened to them. He urged upon the Convention mature deliberation upon the step they proposed to take, showing conclusively that it was useless—yea, worse than useless—for them to move at all in the matter, unless they had fully counted the cost, and had deliberately resolved to go through with what they should undertake. It was a work in which no man should engage thoughtlessly—the hand once to the plough, the watchword must be onward, until the work was accomplished. Better—far better—leave the Class in its present unpretending situation, than give it any degree of notoriety, merely to pine away under denominational neglect. He hoped every one voting would realize all these things. The question on appointment of Trustees was put and carried with but one dissenting voice; and that brother immediately explained—that the importance of the action, and a fear that it might not be efficiently sustained, was all that withheld his vote; but that now it had passed, the measure should have his whole heart and soul in its support.

It is believed the affairs of the School are entrusted to efficient hands. And now it only remains to be seen whether the Universalists in the State of New York will actively co-operate in this measure, and give of their substance and influence to bear it on to a triumphant termination. There is ample ability—only secure concert of action, and that promptly. In six months, or a year at farthest, the Theological School may be placed in an enviable condition—may be made an ornament to our cause in this State, and a source of inestimable benefit to the denomination at large. Brethren of the Empire State, will you suffer a word of exhortation in this matter, and promptly respond to it.

Intimately connected with the preceding subject, is the interest of the general Literary and Scientific Institute, at Clinton. It will be remembered that last year some steps were taken to bring this institution under the more immediate patronage of the denomination. These incipient measures have been attended with all the success that could reasonably be expected—perhaps more than could have been justly anticipated at the time. Within the year the valuable labors of Br. Sawyer have been secured as President of the Institution, a visible change has taken place in its prospects, confidence is increasing, and the school enlarging. With a property, worth at least, ten thousand dollars above all claims, admirably located for the accommodation of the whole State, and a denomination boasting its two hundred and fifty societies, one hundred and fifty meeting houses, and one hundred and thirty nine preachers, within the bound of that State, what can hinder the school in its onward course to all desirable prosperity? Nothing—but our own supineness!

The able Address on Education, by Br. Sawyer, on Tuesday morning, presented some wholesome and important truths for our consideration, as a denomination. When published, we hope they will meet the eye of every Universalist in the State, and be an instrument in bringing forth fruits worthy of the great theme of the Address. The average of One Dollar each, from every Universalist in the State, and those who would prefer supporting such an institution to most others in the State, would endow it in a manner, that it might demand its collegiate privileges, and place it upon a footing with any College in the State. Can any one doubt the favorable influence—the immense advantage to us—of such a state of things? Let every preacher take up the subject seriously in the field of his labor—let every active friend of our cause consider himself a committee to press this subject among his friends, and the work is accomplished ere the most sanguine of us could hardly look for it. I pray heaven that the denomination in this State may enter into this work, heart and soul, and thereby erect a monument to their zeal and munificence worthy of the blessed faith they profess to love above all things else, and which they would thereby most signally honor in practice.

The action touching Fellowship with the Convention, will be seen to be important so far as it has a bearing on the Relief Fund, or a participation in its benefits. Some Specific Rule should be adopted, and it should be uniform through the State—that is, the same in all Associations. Then, no question could arise on the score of Fellowship, or of claims to the benefits of the Fund. The Rule may be very simple and easy of application.

Finally, the present Convention has been a very pleasant one. Never, I may safely say, have I listened to more energetic and faithful preaching, than on this occasion. Every thing was conducted in harmony—the public services were all largely attended, and every countenance bore evidence of inward joy and rejoicing in the rapid progress of the cause of impartial and efficient grace.

The brethren in Newark, I should say in closing, opened their hearts and homes liberally to our accommodation, for which they will be gratefully remembered by those sharing their hospitalities. P. PRICE.

SECOND ANNUAL REPORT

Of the Trustees of the New York Universalist Relief Fund, for the Conventional year 1846.

To the Council of the New York State Convention of Universalists, to be convened at Newark, Wayne county, N. Y., Wednesday, May 27th, 1846.

The Trustees of 'The New York Universalist Relief Fund,' beg leave respectfully to

REPORT:

That since their last Annual Report to the Convention, the Principal of the Relief Fund has been paid over to this Board, by the Executor of the last Will and Testament of the late Cornelius Harsen, and has been invested according to the terms of the Bequest, on Bond and Mortgage, as per certificate of the Treasurer, in his Annual account current; six per cent, being the best terms that could be obtained under the conditions. This, the Convention will perceive, lessens the yearly income of the Fund, from what it had been yielding, the sum of Sixty Dollars—7 per cent being the rate allowed by the Executor. But the terms of the Will are imperative—the object of the Donor evidently being to make the Fund secure, rather than to obtain the highest possible rate of interest.

In the Treasurer's account, transmitted herewith, the Convention will observe that the Fund is credited with items of interest at 5 per cent. A word of explanation in reference thereto may be necessary. At the close of the former Conventional year, on some consultation as to the proper disposition of the surplus funds in the Treasury, the Treasurer of the Board proposed to allow five per cent upon all balances that might be in his hands, he being in a situation to use it in small or temporary investments, at little hazard—a hazard which he was willing to take entirely to himself. The Board gratefully accepted the proposition. By the Treasurer's account, it will be seen that the sum of $23.11, has been added to the Fund, during the past year from this source alone. The whole amount now in hand, as will be seen by said account, is Six Hundred and Thirty-Three Dollars and Twenty-eight cents.

In relation to the recommendation of appropriating to the Widows of the late Revs. W. I. Reese and Isaac Whitnall, contained in their last annual Report. The Board beg leave respectfully to state, that the business upon which they had then but just entered, was new to them. On the applications before them they instituted such inquiries as the circumstances seemed to require, and which proved so far satisfactory as to induce the recommendation which followed. But it is obligatory upon them, here to state, that the question of Fellowship did not occur to them as a distinct inquiry—the necessities of the applicants was the leading idea in the mind. When, therefore, the subject was referred back to them for reconsideration, they immediately instituted such investigations as the cases seemed to demand. These investigations were entrusted to Rev. T. J. Sawyer, who subsequently reported to this Board, adverse to the applications, which report, after mature deliberation, was adopted unanimously, and ordered to be published for the benefit of all concerned, a copy of which is transmitted herewith.

The Board recently received a new, or a re-application from Mrs. Reese, backed by the most flattering testimony from highly respectable individuals, as to her worthiness, necessities, &c. They have again taken the case into consideration, but though fully satisfied of the necessity of the case, and the worthiness of the applicant, they are not satisfied that it comes within their jurisdiction, or the purposes of this Fund; the terms of the bequest, in their apprehension, being very explicit. So they are constrained, again, to reject the application.

In addition to the foregoing considerations, the members of the Board are extremely averse to establishing, in the outset of their labors, any doubtful precedent—any rule that may hereafter involve difficulty, or jeopardize, in the least, the interests of this Fund to the denomination. And they feel confident, that when their motives are understood and are properly appreciated, they will receive the hearty co-operation of the Convention, and individual members of the denomination in this State, in every effort to guard this Fund as a most sacred treasure, confided to the Convention, for the purposes named in the bequest.

Feeling, however, that the case under consideration is a peculiar one—that a similar one can never probably again occur—and with a view of contributing to the immediate relief of the applicant, the Board would respectfully suggest to the Convention, the propriety of a private subscription to her aid during the session, or, perhaps, a collection at the close of some of the public services. In this way she might realise nearly, or perhaps quite as much, as was proposed to be appropriated, and at the same time avoid all doubtful action in respect to the Fund.*

The Board beg leave further to state, that they have three applications in addition to the one above named—the first from Mrs. Clarinda Wilcox, widow of the late Rev. Oliver Wilcox, of Ellisburgh, N. Y.—the second, in behalf of Mrs. Mary Eaton, widow of the late Rev. Joseph Eaton, of Portland, Chautauque county, N. Y.; and supplementary thereto (as Mrs. Eaton has since deceased) in behalf of Julius Savillion Eaton, only surviving child of the said Joseph and Mary Eaton—and third, from Mrs. Jerusha Smith, widow of the late Rev. Elijah Smith, of West Bloomfield, N. Y.

In respect to the first named case, the Board would recommend to the Convention, the appropriation of One Hundred Dollars, from the proceeds of the Relief Fund, for the benefit of Mrs. Clarinda Wilcox, payable to her order, or as the Convention may authorise—Fifty Dollars of it immediately after the action of the Convention, and the remaining Fifty Dollars, on the first of November, 1846—suggesting, at the same time, if the Convention deems it advisable, discretionary powers to the Board—as to any farther appropriations in this case, (within some specific amount,) prior to the next annual session of the Convention in 1847.

In respect to the second case, the Board being entirely uninformed as to the situation of the friends and relatives of this orphan child, and being also in some doubt as to the extent of claim on this gratuity, where immediate connections are able to assist; and anticipating some further information in the case, which may be brought before the Convention during this session, they can only feel warranted in making a conditional recommendation—or rather suggesting to the Convention, the appropriation of Twenty-five Dollars from the proceeds of the Fund for the benefit of Julius Savillion Eaton, if the facts and circumstances which may come before it, shall, in its estimation, warrant it—the amount, if granted, to be payable to the order of the guardian of the child, or such person as the Convention may authorise to receive it. In this case, also, being a peculiar one, the Board would suggest discretionary powers from the Convention; though they feel constrained in this public manner to record their conviction that the Rule of Discretionary Powers to the Board should be used with great caution—should not be resorted to except in the most extreme cases. And they are only induced to make these suggestions now, through a desire of avoiding, as far as possible, delay in the administration of the benefits of this Fund in the cases under consideration. And thus feeling, they would respectfully recommend, if any action is now taken, that it be upon the understanding that it is the last. The necessity, if any shall be thought to exist, for its exercise now, results more from the necessarily imperfect operations of a new organization than from any other cause. The Board confidently trusts, that with the appeals that have already been made; with the 'Circular of Directions' which it has issued, and the entreaty which it hopes the Convention will at this session send out on the subject; in all future applications, every necessary particular will accompany them, and thus enable the Board to act promptly and decisively, without any further discretionary instructions from the Convention.

In respect to the third case, the Board does not feel warranted in any specific recommendation. It is in possession of no information on the subject, save the first application, although a letter was addressed the applicant soon after the receipt of the application, and subsequently the Circular; as also the Circular to another individual named. Whether they have all failed of reaching their destination, or the occasion for the aid has passed by, the Board is entirely unable to determine. To provide against the former contingency, the Board can only suggest to the Convention, if any definite information comes before it, an appropriation, according to the circumstances, not exceeding the sum of Fifty Dollars.

*A private subscription was proposed in Council, by Br. T. J. Sawyer, and some $38 to $40 obtained—we did not learn the precise amount, before leaving. The design was to make it $50, if possible.—P.

It should, perhaps, be stated, that one other application was received last summer, for aid to a sick clergyman, but as the Board was not authorized to make any appropriations, it was suggested that friends should aid in the case, in advance of the action of the Convention, submitting the required vouchers to the Board, and they would recommend at this session. But the Board has received no further information in the premises, and so is not prepared to act.

In conclusion, the Board would respectfully suggest to the Convention some action, fixing a rule of Fellowship with its body; or of recommending to the several Associations under its jurisdiction, a uniform rule, by which the question of Fellowship shall be definitely understood in all future applications for aid from the Relief Fund.

All which is respectfully submitted,

JACOB HARSEN, President.

PHILO PRICE, Secretary.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JUNE 19, 1846.

WEALTH.

There are three different questions propounded by three different classes of people when a stranger makes his appearance in any community—Is he rich? Is he popular? Is he honest, industrious, and intelligent?

The first of these questions is asked by misers; by those who make gold their meat and drink, and god, and whose thoughts are confined to a small space upon this sphere where, the Deity has given them an existence.—They judge one by the length and width of his purse, regardless of all principles of integrity or any other virtue which should find a home in the bosom of man. And though it is a thought any thing but pleasant, yet this class of persons is rapidly increasing, and we fear that the day is not far distant when by them a death-blow will be given to the civil and religious liberty of the land. Time will determine. But how far below the dignity of man and how far from every principle of sense and judgment to select one of the lower propensities of the mind, and make its action the criterion by which to judge the man. To place the stamp of scorn and contempt upon that individual who can not look into his purse and find there an almost exhaustless mine of gold! To treat with cold neglect the child who may be so unfortunate as to have parents who are compelled to stem the strong tide of poverty! To bar the door and shut out all intercourse with those whose sun-burned brows tell of labor and toil, of bread earned by the sweat of the brow! To witness all this, we say, and not unfrequently to observe it in the disposition of the disciple of Him who, when upon earth, had not where to lay his head, is sickening to the soul and nearly or quite sufficient to make one ashamed of the name of humanity. And how ruinous in its nature and tendency; what a wonderful power it exerts upon the rising generation. The more prevalent the disposition to regard gold as the only principle of true wealth, and to make it a rule by which to measure the man, the more does the youth lend his powers to acquire it that he may make a respectable appearance in the world, and free himself from the scorn and contempt of those who are looked upon as the aristocracy of the land. This being his aim he neglects the improvement of his intellectual and moral powers, and the result is that he lives in profound ignorance all of his days, or ends them within the walls of a gloomy prison, and all the result of the wrong example set before him in the morning of life by those of miserly disposition. But there is a God in heaven above whose ways are not as the ways of man; 'justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne.' So go on ye gold-loving, gold-serving, and gold-worshipping vassals. The time shall come when the sun of your existence will near the horizon with but little promise for the morrow. The shadows of that lonely vale will gather around you, and while the worms are preying upon your persons, your gold will be scattered to the four winds by some graceless young scape-gallowses who would even dance upon your graves with no compunctions of conscience.

Is he popular? The class propounding this question respecting the newly appeared stranger, is composed of these fawning sycophants who sacrifice every thing noble that they may obtain the good opinion and will of those moving in what are called the higher circles. This is the method taken by them to get along in the world at a more rapid rate than they might were they to adhere strictly to truth, and depending upon their own powers, to follow their own convictions of right and duty. What are the principles upon which the stranger acts? Are they those of strict and sound integrity? What the character which he has maintained before the world?—A character graced by the beauties of morality, virtue, and religion? or one shaded by the darkness of vice and iniquity? Nothing of the kind is ever thought of.—They care nothing for character, or talent, or principle, or anything else; if so be that the stranger is popular it is amply sufficient; and they are ready to run, hat in hand, to bow before, and do him homage. Popularity with them is the pure gold of Ophir. With popularity wealth is poverty, for they are rich only when they can number the many in their train. Well; all kinds of people are necessary to constitute and complete a world, and we have them in this, and these fawning sycophants seem to occupy no little space upon the stage, and perhaps before the close of the act, we may know the part which they were designed to play.

Is he honest, industrious, and intelligent? This is the noblest question, and propounded too, by the most noble of earthly beings; not by him who is a slave to a mineral dreg from the earth or to an opinion formed in the breast of some who care but little for the laws of Heaven or earth; but by one of Nature's freemen, an honest and upright man. The criterion by which he judges another is not the abundance of 'filthy lucre' or the mad cry of the excited throng; but his opinion is built upon the discovery of that principle upon which one may rest secure amid the trials and afflictions, strifes and contentions, which anon rend society in twain and scatter mildew and blight and death in their pathway. Whenever he discovers this principle of integrity accompanied by industry and intelligence there he bestows his grateful acknowledgments and looks upon the possessor as one highly worthy of the name and nature of man.

Here is the only true wealth within the boundary of the universe of God. It is a fountain whose waters never fail. A source from whence may be drawn the richest blessings ever thrown upon the head of man. All the diamonds from Golconda are worse than poverty, are but a plague and a curse to him who is destitute of honesty, industry, and intelligence. These are truths which no man can deny; facts as plain as the noon-day sun, and yet in full view of them, too many parents will and do instruct their offspring in a way directly opposite; that wealth consists in the abundance of gold and that nothing but this can carry one safely and smoothly through the world. Gold is good in its place but it never was designed for a God, and he who makes its accumulation the end and aim of human life and those who teach their offspring and fellow creatures in such a manner, may be fully assured that the direction pursued is far from ending in happiness and peace, and they will find to their sorrow more thorns than flowers by the way side. So mote it be.

S. J. G.

AN ORTHODOX DOCTRINE—ITS INFLUENCE.

It were needless to attempt to sustain the position either by arguments or citations from their writings, that it is a cardinal doctrine of modern orthodoxy, that the wicked are more blessed of heaven in this world than the righteous. It is a constant theme in the ministration of all their public advocates from him who wears the tiara on his brow, through all the grades of the ministry down to the humble exhorter of less note, but no less zeal. It is, however, on the influence of this doctrine I wish to offer a remark rather than on the doctrine itself.

Universalists have always contended that the doctrine presented an unjust view of the government of God, and is detrimental to the interests of virtue. Its tendency is, say they, especially as all are in pursuit of happiness, to produce a spirit of irreligion which will grow deeper and broader, till it ends in blank atheism itself. To this charge the advocates of the sentiment can take no exception, if it can be sustained from the admissions, sometimes more than that, labored attempts to prove it, of distinguished men in their own ranks. Of the testimony of their own witnesses they have no right to complain.

Dr. Lewis, in his 'Platonic Theology,' pp. 244—5, furnishes the examples we want in this place. 'The sentiment,' says he, (that the wicked are more prosperous than the righteous,) 'may be frequently met with in classic antiquity. It has formed the constant complaint of the virtuous when desponding, and the standing objection of the skeptic.' 'Some minds, otherwise serious and thoughtful, have been almost driven to atheism by it.'—'But, while it has disturbed the pious in the desponding moods, it has formed the standing jest of the scoffer.'—These extracts speak for themselves. No remarks can make them plainer.

I will not at this time avail myself of the materials Dr. Lewis has furnished, to show the identity of this doctrine with heathenism. Of the fact, the reader has got a hint in the first extract. His quotations from clerical writers fully sustain it. I only add that himself has furnished the proof of our oft repeated declaration, that the distinctive doctrines of Limitarianism, (endless misery and its kindred,) originated in, and were borrowed from heathenism. Well may it disappear before the light of truth!

The attempt to show that the doctrine is embodied in Scripture, is vain. In their ignorance, some of the scripture writers thought so; but when they saw the truth, they acknowledged their error. The so oft quoted language of Asaph, xliii Psalm, is full to the point. He thought the wicked more prosperous than the righteous—more blessed of heaven, but when he went into the sanctuary, then understood he their end. He saw that their feet were placed on slippery places, that they were cast down into destruction as in a moment—they were utterly consumed with terrors. The opinion that this doctrine of the unequal ways of Providence leads to atheism, is confirmed by this chapter. Asaph says that his 'feet were almost gone'—his 'steps had well nigh slipped.'—By this I understand that he had well nigh come to reject the moral government of God over mankind—to reject him also. Such a government as he thought he exercised, he felt was unworthy a Supreme Being, and with distrust came disbelief. Such was its effect then—such it is now—and such it always will be.

The following letter to the Editor of the Luminary we copy by request, and we cordially commend it to the serious consideration of all Partialists, and especially all Methodists. May its perusal do them good. Ed.

ANOTHER CONVERT TO THE TRUTH.

Br. HAMMOND,—My religious views have undergone a change. Once I was a Methodist. I embraced the doctrines of the M. E. church about fifteen years ago; and for about twelve years I adhered to it faithfully, during which time I was ever found an ardent supporter and a devout advocate of the doctrines and discipline of that church, as my numerous friends and relatives will testify. For about two years, I labored under strong convictions and fearful misgivings, about the propriety of adhering longer to the sentiment I had embraced. The consequence was, serious reflection and investigation of the Scriptures, which convinced me that the doctrine of endless misery was not from Heaven, but is the offspring of superstition and ignorance, more worthy the name of a relic of heathenish darkness than of enlightened Christianity. I, therefore, a little more than a year ago, threw overboard the dogma of ceaseless woe, and embraced the doctrine of the Restitution. Some of the reasons that have induced me to abandon my former views, I will proceed briefly to state.

When I first became acquainted with the Methodist people, they were a humble, devoted class of religionists, and so very plain in their dress that a congregation of them could be readily distinguished almost as far as they could be seen. But what a contrast do they exhibit now? Will any candid person pretend to say they have not sadly fallen off in this respect, from the teachings of the venerated Wesley? Let plain common sense answer these questions.

The second article in the Methodist discipline, contradicts the express letter of the Scriptures, thus: 'Christ truly suffered, was crucified, dead and buried, to reconcile his Father to us.' 2 Cor. v: 18, 19, 'God hath reconciled US to himself by Jesus Christ.' 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself.' If any of my Methodist friends can put the above two items together, and make them harmonise, they can do something that I can not.

There are some features in the government of the M. E. church that savor strongly of aristocracy. Will any deny this? Let the question be asked, have the people any freedom in the choice of their ministers? Where can the Methodist brother be found that can answer this question in the affirmative. Others might be mentioned, but let this suffice.

The natural tendency and legitimate effect of a belief in endless misery is to contract, limit, or compress all the finer feelings of the heart, all the benevolent feelings of the soul within the narrow compass of their sect or party. Who can deny this?

The first article of the Methodist faith teaches the doctrine of a trinity of three persons in one God; which I reject as being unscriptural, irrational and absurd. The Scriptures teach that 'to us there is but one God the Father. There is one God, and one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time.'

In common with all orthodox people, the Methodists teach the doctrine of the unceasing wretchedness of a part of our race, without any mixture of mercy; and that, too, without reforming the punished, without benefiting God himself, and without improving the condition of any created being, which I reject as wholly unbefitting the character of him who came 'to save men's lives and not destroy them;' and who, it is said, chastens us only 'for our profit that we might be partakers of his holiness.'—And here I would most seriously inquire of my Methodist brethren and friends, if they are not serving God all their life-time subject to bondage through fear? Ask yourselves this important question. Am I not moved by the fear of hell to serve my Maker? And can my heart be made perfect in love while governed by such a motive?

Once I served God for the same reason, and on the same principle that I would an earthly monarch, that is, fond of the exercise of tyrannical and despotic power; but now I serve him with a far different purpose. Once I supposed that the fear of an endless hell sometimes drove men to repentance; but now I believe 'the goodness of God leads men to repentance.' Once I supposed that the righteous would scarcely be saved from an endless hell; but now I believe 'the Lord will not cast off forever; but will have compassion according to his mercies.' Once I believed in, and professed a religion that was manifested in loving my friends; but now I believe in a religion that requires me to love my enemies. I am conscious that for this step I shall be met on the part of my former friends and brethren, with coldness and indifference; and perhaps, in some cases, with rebuke. I am sensible too, that by some my motives will be impugned, and that I shall be accused of selfish and mercenary purposes in abandoning my former belief and embracing my present one. I am well aware also that the cry will be raised that I have backslidden, &c. Now all this I expect. For this I am prepared. I have counted the cost and weighed well the consequences. I owe them no ill will, nor entertain any other feelings toward them but that of kindness. I sincerely desire their welfare in every respect. It is an object of my most anxious solicitude, that I may be enabled through the strong consolation afforded me by the Gospel of Christ, to endure all the reproaches heaped upon me with a good degree of patience and forbearance, as well as fortitude and resignation. For 'with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of man's judgment.'

One more objection and I have done. Endless misery is seriously defective, and utterly incapable of affording consolation to the afflicted, of sustaining and comforting the bereaved soul, that is borne down with grief and sorrow. To him that has been called to part with those that bound him to earth, this doctrine is wholly insufficient to afford the necessary relief. I speak from experience when I declare that with me it has been 'weighed in the balance and found wanting.' Not so with a belief in God's impartial and efficient grace. 'I view it,' (to use the language of a forcible and elegant writer) 'as the only light that can dawn upon the darkness of the grave, and the only sure foundation of substantial and unchanging bliss in life. I feel and I know that it can bear the joyful cup of consolation to the prisoner in the dark dungeon of despair, and cause the song of deliverance to the captive to come up from the pit, sweet as the music of angels in the paradise of God. It has been the joy of millions in all the varied circumstances of human life. It has been the stay and staff of the aged, the comfort of the afflicted, and the support of the poor and destitute. It has been with the sick and dying, and made the dying bed feel soft as downy pillows are. Yea, and it has lingered around the house of affliction, where bereaved affection mourns its sundered ties, and mothers weep for their children, that are not. The lone's widow's tears have ceased to flow, as she has caught its inspiring spirit, and the orphan's feeble moan has been hushed by its soothing voice. In the strength of its faith, the aged pilgrim with ripened locks, has leaned upon his staff over the grave of his darling child, and joyed in the reflection that soon, very soon, he should meet the lost one in heaven. Nor is this all; it has shorn death of his terrors, and stripped the grave of its darkness, and put the song of victory upon the quivering lips of millions in the last agonies of the dying moment. Oh! then whatever else you may deny me, give me the privilege of enjoying this most precious faith, and it shall be enough for me.'

ORRIMAL B. SCOTT.

Removals.

Br. A. R. Bartlett, we are sorry to say, has determined to decline the unanimous invitation of the Bath Society to continue its Pastor, and will remove his family to Utica, N. Y., at which place he should be addressed.—

Br. B. is impelled to this course on account of his health. The sea atmosphere is unfriendly to his complaints, and he must go into the interior. We regret this very much. Br. B. is one of our best men, and we had hoped the cause in Maine might have enjoyed much advantage from his permanent connexion with it. May the good Lord go with him, and bless him with a speedy restoration to health, and with great success as a minister of the New and Better Covenant.—[Banner.]

Br. E. W. Locke, late of Maine, but later of Hudson, N. Y., has accepted an invitation to preach the Gospel to the Universalist Society, and such as attend worship with it, in Rockport, Cape Ann, Mass.

Br. E. Guild having removed from Prompton, Pa., to South Bainbridge, Chenango co. N. Y., wishes to be addressed at the latter place.

ANOTHER CONVERSION TO THE TRUTH.—Our readers will be interested in the perusal of the following communication from Br. Worden.

RENUNCIATION.

Nicholville, June 8th, 1846.

Br. SKINNER—Permit me, through the medium of the Magazine and Advocate, to inform our brethren of another renunciation of the cruel system of Partialism. A worthy brother, by the name of Lyman Perry, residing at the Natural Bridge, in Jefferson county; formerly one of the most substantial pillars in the Christian denomination, has (as I am credibly informed) renounced the horrid dogma of endless damnation, and become a believer in the Bible; or in 'the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.' Br. Perry has already commenced proclaiming the glad tidings of a world's salvation, and he is to preach in the village of Lockport, Jefferson county, on the 21st of June inst. We do not desire that all Partialists should fall into our ranks; neither can they, until they become more enlightened, and more moral. But Br. Perry is just such a man as we want: and we hope that others as soon as they shall become worthy of the name Universalist, will exchange their creeds for Bibles; enlist under the great captain of a world's salvation, and fight manfully the 'Battles of the Lord' A. H. WORDEN.

Harpers Publications.

The POEMS of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, complete in one volume. Price 50 cents. We claim not to be a judge of poetry, and therefore shall not pronounce upon the merits of the work here named. The Author is extensively known and read, and the patrons of light literature of the best Monthlies in this country, will appreciate such a work from the pen of a favorite author. These poems and ballads are put up in a neat 8vo form, paper cover, and occupy 117 pages.

Part XV of a Dictionary of PRACTICAL MEDICINE, containing a digest of eight different diseases, occupying 143 closely printed octavo pages. 50 cents.

A YEAR WITH THE FRANKLIN, or 'Suffer and be strong,' by E. Jane Cato. This is a neat 12mo volume of 276 pages, and appears to contain much excellent reading and moral instruction in the shape of an interesting tale.

No. 81—82 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE, concludes 'Antony and Cleopatra' with notes. 25 cents.

No. 80 of the Library of Select Novels is the 'FEMALE MINISTER,' or 'A Son's Revenge.' One shilling.

No. 84 is the 'CONFESSION OF A PRETTY WOMAN,' containing some 200 pages octavo for 25 cents. All of the above to be had at G. N. Beesley's.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Br. Goodrich, we have not received the further communication you promised on the subject of a Country Pastor and District School Libraries.

Rev. Mr. Armitage and Elder D. Holmes are both received and shall have a place soon, probably next week.

Br. Tompkins—Send thirteenth (13th) volume, and also next (15th) volume Repository to Miss Elizabeth Brown, this city, credit her $2.75 and charge A. W.

Br. S. Jenkins has closed his engagement with the society in Lee. Until further notice, his P. O. address will remain as heretofore, Lee, (Stokes P. O.) Oneida county, N. Y.

NOTICE.

The Steuben Association will meet at Howard on the first Wednesday and following Thursday (1st and 2d) in July next.

I presume directions are unnecessary. Any person arriving within the bounds of the county may be directed strait to Howard. But I suppose, fashion will have it, that I should say, 'Ministering brethren and friends are earnestly invited to attend.' How is this? Can there be a Universalist preacher, or layman, or sister, who can make it convenient to attend our Association or conference meetings, that must receive a formal invitation before they will venture to meet with us? I believe not. We are always glad to meet our brethren and sisters and ministers, at all times, and especially on occasions like these. And we believe it is so understood, and received, generally. So, if I have made this notice longer than usual, I have expressed my mind.

A. UFSO, S. Clerk.

ST. LAWRENCE ASSOCIATION.

This Association will hold its next annual session in the village of Malone, Franklin county, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday (24th and 25th) of June next. Our several societies, (and there are sixteen in fellowship with this body,) are entitled to two delegates each. Shall we have a full delegation this year? And will the clerks of all the societies send in full statistical information—such as Br. Grosh desires for his next Register, (see Mag. and Adv. No. 19, current year,) and as will enable me to report to him immediately after the close of our meeting? Brethren, one and all, let us remember our next associational meeting and faithfully discharge our respective duties appertaining thereto.

W. H. WAGGONER, S. Clerk.

Canton, May 27, '46.

 Will the Union and Watchman please copy.

OTSEGO ASSOCIATION.

In accordance with adjournment, this Association will meet at Richfield Springs, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday (24th and 25th) of June. The Council will convene at 8 o'clock on Wednesday morning; public religious services at half past ten o'clock, when the occasional sermon will be delivered by Br. A. C. Barry.—The society of Richfield hereby extend a cordial invitation to ministering brethren and friends to come up to this annual feast. A committee of arrangements may be found at the church. O. WHISTON, Stand. Clerk.

MARRIAGES.

In Brookfield, on the morning of the 8th inst., Mr. SAMUEL DEWOLF, Merchant of Bridgewater, to Miss ELIZABETH SCOTT, of the former place.

In Trenton, May 24th, by Rev. Mr. Buckingham, Mr. JAMES REED, to Miss LOUISA PAYS, both of Russia, Herkimer co.

In Auburn, by Rev. J. M. Austin, Mr. CHARLES SAMPSON, to Mrs. RHODA ANN BARBER. Mr. HENRY M. STONE, to Miss LYDIA B. PARRISH.

In Scipio, by the same, Mr. HORACE CLOSE, to Miss MARY W. WHITFIELD.

In Mentz, by the same, Mr. OTIS S. TRUSANT, of Aurelius, to Miss HARRIET E. SANDERS, of the former place.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. J. M. AUSTIN will preach in Watertown next Sunday 21st inst.

The EDITOR will preach at Canajoharie next Sunday, and at Oran the Sunday after next.

Br. JOHN D. CARGILL will preach at Bridgewater on the first Sunday in July.

SONNET.

'They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord.'— ISAIAH.

Oh, when shall dawn the happy day of promise,
The time foretold when tears shall be no more;
When dark Calamity shall vanish from us,
And human woe and suffering be o'er?
Hasten, O Lord, the time by thee appointed,
When Zion's blest deliverance shall come,
And th' peaceful kingdom of thine own Anointed
Cause the wide earth a paradise to bloom.
Then shall ascend from every grove and fountain
Sweet choral songs, Messiah to adore;
Then shall abound with peace each vale and mountain
And joy reverberate from shore to shore;
And fallen man, subject to pain and sighs,
Regain his native sphere, his long-lost Paradise.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the Central Association of Universalists of New York, for 1846.

The Council met at Lebanon Centre, Madison county, on the 3d inst.; and organized by choosing Br. HORACE USHER, Chairman, and Br. J. J. AUSTIN, Clerk.

United in prayer with Br. S. Jenkins.

Received credentials of delegates; when it was found that the societies of Lee, Stockbridge, Hamilton, Lebanon, Madison, and Marshall were represented.

Delegates present.—Lee, L. D. Baker; Stockbridge, C. M. Foster, John Quackenbush; Hamilton, Horace Usher, H. Smith; Lebanon, C. Buel, Josiah Lasell; Madison, O. Peckham, B. Bridge; Marshall, M. Hubbard, O. B. Gridley.

Clerical members of the Council.—S. Jenkins, S. J. Gibson, J. J. Austin.

The minutes of the last session were read and approved.

The committee on fellowship and ordination reported no application; report adopted.

Voted, That the chair appoint a committee of three to nominate officers for the ensuing year; in accordance with which,

Brs. C. Buel, S. Jenkins and J. J. Austin were appointed said committee.

Voted, That Br. L. D. Baker be the committee on adjournment.

The following resolution was here introduced by Br. J. J. Austin, and accepted for discussion.

Resolved, That the preamble and resolution touching the plan of reorganization presented to the United States Convention, which were passed by this body at its last annual session, be hereby repealed.

The above resolution was finally lost by a majority of one.

Thursday morning.—United in prayer with the Clerk.

The committee for nominating officers for the ensuing year, offered the following report; which was accepted and adopted.

Committee on fellowship and ordination.—Brs. S. J. Gibson of Hamilton, Jesse Baker 2d of Lebanon, B. Everett of Litchfield.

Committee on discipline.—Brs. Job Potter of Waterville, P. Fake of Clinton, O. W. Story of Lee.

Delegates to Convention.—Brs. T. J. Sawyer, S. J. Gibson, clergymen; L. D. Baker, S. A. Grosvenor, laymen, with power to appoint substitutes.

Preacher of occasional sermon.—Br. T. J. Sawyer, with power to appoint a substitute.

Voted, That visiting brethren in the ministry be invited to take part in our deliberations.

Committee on discipline reported no complaint; which was adopted.

Voted, That Brs. Usher, Woolley and Sawyer be a committee, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the fund belonging to this Association may, or may not, be united with the 'The New York Universalist Relief Fund'; and this committee report at the next annual session of this body.

The committee on adjournment reported an application from the Stockbridge society.

Voted, That the Clerk prepare the minutes for publication, with such remarks as he may deem proper.

The business being thus disposed of, it was Voted, That this Council adjourn to meet at Stockbridge, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1847. Per order,

J. J. AUSTIN, Clerk.

REMARKS.—This was in many respects a pleasant and profitable session of the Central Association. The principal obstacles were, the want of full delegations from all our societies, the absence of the Standing Clerk, and of some clerical members of the Association. Brethren, these things ought not to be! Brs. Stewart and Shipman were with us from sister Associations; and discourses were delivered to attentive congregations, by Brs. Gibson, Stewart, Jenkins and Shipman. Our prayer is for Zion. J. J. A.

ANECDOTE.

At the close of a recent discussion in Westfield, Pa.,* a large, dogmatic, self-important doctor of physic, standing in a conspicuous place, being somewhat discomfited at the result of the debate, remarked, that he 'should like to be used up in that way,' and that 'if any one doubted his qualification he could have the privilege of trying it, but he had better not come unless he was well loaded.' Mr. B—m standing by, a small, and not very prepossessing person in features, though having a good heart, says, 'I suppose he may if he has plenty of ammunition,' holding up a Testament. 'He had better be loaded,' says L—. 'May be he can load as fast as he fires,' says a bystander. 'Mr. L—, will you tell me what sin is?' says B—m. 'Transgression of the divine law.' 'What is the penalty?' 'Eternal death,' says L—, frowning. 'Who has transgressed the divine law?' 'All have.' 'Then all the difference in your views and mine Mr. L—, is, you believe in universal damnation, and I in universal salvation.' 'Very well done,' says one bystander, 'for an empty gun'— 'shoot again, B—m,' says another;— 'he shoots close for so short a piece,' says a third;— 'and to load too,' echoed from a corner;— 'how he hurt him,' said several voices;— till shocked and ashamed of his egotism, Mr. L— was glad to escape. THE TWO BROTHERS.

The site occupied by the temple of Solomon was formerly a cultivated field, possessed in common by two brothers. One of them was married and had several children; the other was unmarried. They lived together, however, cultivating, in the greatest harmony possible, the property they had inherited from their father.

The harvest season had arrived. The two brothers bound up their sheaves, made two equal stacks of them, and left them on the field. During the night the unmarried brother was struck with an excellent thought. My brother, said he to himself, has a wife and children to support; it is not just that my share of the harvest should be as large as his. Upon this he arose, and took from his stack several sheaves, which he added to those of his brother; and this he did with as much secrecy as if he had been committing an evil action, in order that his brotherly offering might not be refused. On the same night the other brother awoke and said to his wife, 'My brother lives alone, without a companion; he has no one to assist him in his labor, nor to reward him for his toils—while God has bestowed on me a wife and children; it is not right that we should take from our common fields as many sheaves as he, since we have already more than he has—domestic happiness. If you consent, we shall, by adding secretly a certain number of our sheaves to his stack, by way of compensation, and without his knowledge, see his portion of the harvest increased.' This project was improved and immediately put into execution.

In the morning, each of the brothers went to the field, and was much surprised at seeing the stacks still equal. During several successive nights the same contrivance was repeated on each side; for as each kept adding to his brother's store, the stacks always remained the same. But one night, both having stood sentinel to dive into the cause of this miracle, they met, each bearing the sheaves, mutually destined for the other. It was thus all elucidated, and they rushed into each other's arms, each grateful to heaven for having so good a brother.

Now, says the legend, the place where so good an idea had simultaneously occurred to the two brothers, and with so much pertinacity, must have been acceptable to the God. Men blessed it, and Israel chose it, there to erect the house of the Lord! —Lamartine.

The Star in the West, published in Cincinnati, Ohio, speaking of Br. Rogers' health, says:

Br. Rogers arrived in the city last Monday. Although I had known of his very severe sickness through letters and papers from the East, I was not prepared to see him so reduced in flesh and strength. He is yet in a very feeble condition.

Will those few persons who are still indebted to him for books send him immediately the amount due, as they may well suppose that his protracted illness makes it important that he should receive all that belongs to him. He has probably done more for Universalism in the West and South, than any other man, taking into view his extensive preaching tours and the general circulation of his books but he has hardly realized money enough meanwhile to meet his expenses, and we hope that our friends will remember him in a substantial way now that he is lingering with a severe sickness, unable to preach as formerly. We have written this without consulting any one—but trust it will not be passed carelessly over by the 'household of faith.'

Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn, keeps a general assortment of Universalist Books for sale. He is also agent for the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist publications generally.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street, Buffalo.

Br. T. J. Sawyer authorizes us to receive subscriptions or donations to the Theological Institute. Any one who may wish can therefore remit direct to this office, and the receipt of the money will be acknowledged in the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SAVIOUR.

BY REV. J. B. SAX.

Jesus Christ, who calls himself, generally, the Son of Man, is called a Saviour many times in the Bible. The great object of his mission upon earth, is represented to be to save. In fact, the leading idea connected with his character and office, is that of saving; and he is more frequently designated now by the term Saviour, than by any other title. All who profess to be his followers, delight in speaking of him by that name; and congratulate themselves on being the disciples and imitators of one, who came not to waste, destroy, and desolate, but to save. All who profess to preach his Gospel, proclaim him as a Saviour; and are accounted his ministers—instruments in his hands, for the accomplishment of the great purposes for which he lived and died on earth. In his character of Saviour, he is to us the fountain of righteousness and truth—the source from whence we derive true knowledge and holiness—the well of living waters from which we quench our burning thirst—the bread of life which came down from heaven, to feed our fainting spirits—the glorious sun of righteousness, which enlightens, with its refulgent beauty, the dark labyrinths of our benighted minds—the quickening spirit that stirs and awakens the dormant life within our souls, and brings us up from the dismal shades of moral death, to the pure light of that life eternal which we have in the Son of God.

As it is in this character that he gives rest to the weary, and those that are heavy laden—comfort to the afflicted—consolation to the mourner;—that he raises up the bowed down—binds up the broken hearted—proclaims liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound;—gives unto them that mourn in Zion, beauty for ashes; the oil of joy for mourning; the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that his disciples might be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he might be glorified. It is in him as a Saviour only, that we can rejoice with such joy unspeakable and full of glory. It is because he is a Saviour that faith in him gives his disciples so great an advantage over the children of the world. It is because of this that our faith will comfort us in the hour of adversity when misfortunes come thick and fast upon us and all the elements of this world seem to be directed against our welfare and happiness; that it will support us at the death-bed of a beloved friend, when his pulse grows feeble, and the hectic flush is on his cheek, and will sustain us as the hour approaches, when we must bid adieu to all things we have loved and cherished here below, through a long life, and set out on our journey to that undiscovered country, from whose bourne no traveller ever returns; that it will enliven our passage to the narrow house, and strew our pathway with roses as we journey through the dark valley and the shadow of death.

Aye, there is a higher strain. Salvation! the saving power of Christ! is to constitute the burthen of that rapturous song which is to be sung around the burning throne, by that great multitude which no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues,—clothed in white robes and palms in their hands, crying with a loud voice and saying, salvation to our God who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and forever. The rapt seraph which adores and burns, the radiant cherubim together with angels and archangels and the spirits of all men made perfect, will never cease to chant the praises of Christ as the Saviour, and to sing the glories of redeeming love. These bright spirits will each day string anew their golden harps, tune their heavenly voices, and strike up louder and louder anthems of praise and glory to the Saviour of the world. As they continually roam on the flowery banks of the spiritual Jordan, sweeping the melodious chords of their celestial lyres, and with hymns of everlasting joy upon their tongues, the chorus of their rapturous hosannahs will be,—Christ the universal Saviour.

The saving power and grace of Jesus, is what so pre-eminently distinguishes him from all other men who ever lived on earth; he came to save, and with power to save, and he came to save only, which can be said of no other human being or angel. Very justly then may we call him the Saviour; and most devoutly ought we to love that glorious being, who gave his life for the purpose of saving a world from sin, and death, and the grave. May we ever obey his law.

Of the Proceedings of the Mohawk River Association.

Met pursuant to adjournment, at Newport, June 10, 1846. The Council was called to order by Br. J. Douglass, Clerk of the last session. United in prayer with Br. J. H. Tuttle. Appointed Brs. D. Skinner, Moderator and J. Douglass, Clerk.

Received credentials from delegates, when the following Brs. came forward and took their seats as members of the Council. From Russia, George T. Graves and William G. Taylor. Eatonville, Leonard Eaton and Daniel Brayton. Newport, E. P. Voorhees and Ely Fortune. Salisbury, John Wiggins and Freeman Bliss. Frankfort and German Flats, J. B. Digert and A. Keeler. Leyden, Sanford Coe and Ira Thayer. Heard reports from standing committees—on discipline, reported that no complaint had come before them during the past year—on fellowship and ordination, no application. Br. J. Douglass, in absence of the Standing Clerk, reported that two Conferences had been held during the past year—one at Paine's Hollow, a glorious meeting, and one at Salisbury, a good meeting. The following Committees were then appointed—on fellowship and ordination, Brs. P. Hathaway, J. Douglass, and J. B. Digert. On discipline, D. Skinner, P. Philleo, and J. D. Hicks. To nominate delegates to the next State Convention, and to designate a Br. to preach the next occasional sermon, D. Brayton, G. T. Graves and P. Hathaway. Voted that the Standing Clerk be authorized to receive requests and appoint Conferences for the ensuing year. Adjourned to Thursday morning at 8 o'clock. Thursday morning. Called to order by the Moderator. United in prayer with Br. P. Philleo. The Committee appointed for that purpose, reported the following Brs. delegates to the State Convention to be held at Scipio, Cayuga county. Clerical, Brs. J. D. Hicks and P. Philleo. Lay, Sanford Coe and J. B. Digert.—Report accepted. The Committee to nominate a Br. to preach the next Occasional Sermon, reported Br. J. Douglass, of Salisbury, and recommended that it be preached on the second day of the meeting. Report accepted. Resolved, That the different preachers in this Association, be requested to take up a collection in their respective societies, on the first Sunday in January, on which they hold meeting, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the delegates to the State Convention. Voted that a committee be appointed to take into consideration the subject of a MISSIONARY SOCIETY, and report to this body during its present session. Brs. P. Philleo, D. Brayton, and D. Skinner, were that committee. Br. J. Douglass introduced the following resolution, which was adopted. Resolved, that every preacher in this Association, be instructed to bring the subject of SABBATH SCHOOLS before his society, in at least one sermon delivered upon the subject, and urge their importance and usefulness upon the serious consideration of his congregation. Voted that Br. J. Douglass be appointed to prepare the minutes for publication in the Magazine and Advocate. Adjourned to meet at intermission at the church. Intermission—the Committee on Missionary cause reported through Br. D. Skinner in somewhat extended and very appropriate remarks, favorably to the enterprise, and asked leave to sit again; whereupon it was voted that the committee have leave to sit again, and that they be empowered to more fully mature a plan for the organization of a Missionary Society; to appoint Trustees in the different neighborhoods throughout the Association; and if the means shall warrant, employ a Missionary, and set him carrying 'glad tidings of good things' to every nook and corner of the Association. Adjourned to meet at Talcottville, in the town of Leyden.

D. SKINNER, Moderator.

J. DOUGLASS, Clerk.

STATISTICS.—Accompanying the credentials, were the following statistics. I give a compend.

Russia.—This Society was organized Jan. 25, 1845. No. of members, 32—enjoys preaching one quarter of the time by Br. J. D. Hicks—meetings increasing in attendants—has a new brick church nearly finished, 42 by 32; cost, $1,700.

Eatonville.—This society was organized about 1814, or 1815, and has generally enjoyed preaching since that time. Our friends here have a church organization, to which fifteen members belong; a newly erected and commodious house, of which they own three quarters. Br. P. Hathaway is their present Pastor, and their congregations are generally good.

Newport.—This Society has fifty three members, preaching one half the time by Br. P. Hathaway; their present condition is prosperous, and prospects for the future bright and promising. They own with the Unitarians, a very nice and commodious church.

Salisbury.—No. of members, 40—preaching half the time by Br. J. Douglass. No Sabbath School at present. There are two villages in the town of Salisbury, and a Union church at each place. In our village we own one half of the church, and in the other one third by agreement, and probably about two thirds by subscription. Our society is not as strong as formerly, owing to deaths and removals, but is in a good condition, and hopes and prays for a refreshing from the Lord. Congregations generally good.

Frankfort and German Flats.—This Society owns a beautiful church, possesses considerable spirit and strength, has large congregations, though are destitute of preaching at present, but are about engaging. Statistics not full.

Leyden.—This Society has for some time been slumbering, but Br. Hathaway has lately paid them a resurrection visit, and I have no doubt the people will hear his voice and come forth. He is to preach to them a part of the time. They own a church or a part of one, I am unable to say which is the truth—statistics not full. Will the Clerks be more particular another year. For the benefit of Br. Grosh, I will add a little information upon my own responsibility.

At Deveraux, 6 miles east of Salisbury, I preach one quarter of the time. We have a very spirited congregation, a Bible Class on each Sabbath on which they do not have preaching, have appointed a time when they will organize a church and society, and hope toward God that they will continue to grow in 'grace and in the knowledge of the truth;' to grow in spiritual strength and numbers, be blessed and prosperous, and prove an honor to the cause of truth and righteousness. Last Sabbath I conferred the ordinance of baptism upon Br. and sister Hyatt, and hope when our church shall be organized, to welcome others. At Paine's Hollow I preach one sermon once in four weeks, and our prospects at this place are cheering. We have once given out notice here of a meeting to form a society, but owing to storm, we were unable to accomplish our object.

We mean to try again. There are circumstances connected with our past preaching history at this place, that I think would not be uninteresting to the friends of our cause, but perhaps they belong in a different place than statistics, therefore I will not now venture to give them. I also preach in two other places, out of the Association, which I would be glad to speak of, but inasmuch as they are out of our Association, I will omit them.

The present session of our Association was favored with beautiful weather, beautiful roads, and with large and attentive congregations.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Skinner, McMaster, Douglass, Jenkins, Thing, and Tuttle.

The singing was sweet and well executed, and raised our feelings high in adoration of the Parent of all good and Father of us all.

Flute, organ, voices, were all tuned to arouse in us unison of feeling to ascend to the Heaven of heavens and Holy of holies, to rest in the loving God. The preaching was good, (unless I except, as did Br. Skinner, in speaking of the State Convention, one discourse,) and I believe we all went home better and happier for having waited before the Lord.

Our business in council was transacted with unanimity and candor, and our brethren, we trust, strengthened by coming together.

I would call special attention to our move in relation to the Missionary cause, and hope our friends, throughout the Association will be ready and anxious to second the enterprise, with heart, hand, and purse. I hope all of our preachers will comply with the request expressed in the Resolution in regard to Sabbath Schools. The young must be taught or the old will remain ignorant—youth must receive correct religious sentiments, based upon reason and the nature of God, on the traces of error and prejudice will stick to them in after life, like that witchery and superstitious feeling which the old who formerly inhabited New England, tell us they can not remove by all the powers of their reason, the impressions made upon their minds when young, being immovably strong. May the Lord nourish and protect the young, and the old will bless themselves and the world.

J. DOUGLASS.

NIAGARA ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS.

Met at Clarendon, Wednesday morning, June 3d, 1846. Br. T. J. Smith appointed Moderator, and G. W. Gage, Clerk, pro tem. Delegates present handed their certificates, and took their seats.

Adjourned to afternoon.

In a call for the report of committees, the committee on discipline report no definite cause of complaint.

Missionary committee, consisting of Brs. J. Chase, T. J. Smith and U. Clark, report that they have visited most of the destitute sections within their respective vicinities, and find that in almost every place there is a deep interest manifested to hear the gospel, and it is believed that the field is fully ripening for a glorious harvest.

Brs. T. J. Smith, L. Spaulding and Dea. E. Lewis, (two lay,) reappointed committee on discipline.

Brs. T. J. Smith, S. W. Remington, C. Lee and S. B. Murdock, (two lay,) delegates to the next State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes.

Br. J. Chase appointed to deliver the next Occasional Discourse.

Committee on adjournment report in favor of Lockport, and report adopted.

Adjourned to Thursday morning. Prayer by Br. Hiscock.

On motion of Br. Chase,

Resolved, That article 14th of the Constitution of this Association, be expunged, and that in place thereof we substitute the following:

Art. 14. Resolved, That this Association reserve to itself the right to alter or amend this Constitution at any regular meeting, by a vote of two thirds of the members present, said alteration or amendment to take effect immediately upon its passage.

Committee on amending the Constitution of this Association report progress, and ask for another year to deliberate. Report adopted.

Committee on letters of fellowship, report in favor of granting a letter of fellowship to Br. E. Case, of Lockport.

Unanimously voted.

On motion of Br. Chase,

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend that every society in this Association, who have not done so already, immediately proceed to organize Sunday Schools, and to give every practicable encouragement to these nurseries of truth and good morals.

On motion of Br. U. Clark,

Resolved, That we commend the subject of denominational education to the attention of the friends within this Association, and that we urge the claims of the Clinton School Institute, and the Theological Seminary nearly connected therewith.

Brs. J. Chase, T. J. Smith and U. Clark appointed a committee on fellowship and ordination.

On motion of Br. G. W. Gage,

Resolved, That this Council recommend to the different societies the necessity of aiding in the formation and support of choirs in their own precincts.

Minutes read and approved.

Moved that the Standing Clerk prepare these minutes for publication in the Magazine and in the other denominational papers.

All the active societies within the limits of this Association were represented except Chili. Delegates from Lockport, J. Gray and S. B. Ballou; Middleport, Wm. S. Fenn and G. W. Gage; Ridgeway, L. Barrett, Wm. Murdock; Gaines, J. Proctor, J. Murdock; Barre, Wm. Wright, T. Clark; Clarendon, S. Wetherby, B. G. Petingill; Churchville, A. Goodrich, J. Emerson.

Highly favorable reports were given in regard to the general prosperity of our cause.

Ministers present: J. Whitney, J. Chase, T. J. Smith, S. W. Remington, W. B. Cook, T. L. Clark, J. R. Johnson, A. B. Copeland, L. L. Spaulding, A. G. Abbott, J. W. Hiscock, E. Case, U. Clark.

Sermons were preached by Brs. T. J. Smith, U. Clark, A. G. Abbott, L. L. Spaulding, T. L. Clark, J. R. Johnson and J. Chase.

The weather was fine; the meetings pleasant and profitable; and the business of the council done with unanimity of feeling.

Adjourned to meet at Lockport in June, 1846.—[Luminary.

U. CLARK, Standing Clerk.

BUFFALO ASSOCIATION.

The Annual meeting was held in Aurora, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 10th and 11th of June, 1846. The Council was organized on the morning of the 10th, by choosing Br. THOMAS THURSTON, of Aurora, Moderator, and Br. WM. ANDRE, of Boston, Clerk. The following members appeared and constituted the Council—Rev. S. R. Smith, Buffalo; Rev. D. Pickering, do.; Rev. L. S. Everett, do.; Rev. S. A. Skeele, Cowlesville; Rev. G. S. Gowdy, Boston; Rev. S. Goff, Aurora; Rev. E. W. Reynolds, Java Village.

Rev. W. B. Cook, of Alexander, and Rev. G. S. Abbott, of Jefferson county, were present, and took part in the proceedings.

Delegates from Societies. Peres Cobb and William Andre from Boston; Job Leicester and Benjamin North from Cowlesville; G. A. Moore from Buffalo; P. Sampson from Concord; Humphrey Barker and Philetus W. Warner from Java Village.

After organizing, and appointing a committee to arrange public services, the Council took a recess until after the close of the public services of the morning.

Soon after re-assembling, and when about to proceed to business, news came, that a carriage, containing the daughters of Brs. S. R. Smith and Thurston, and others, had been overturned, the horse attached to it having been frightened, and fears were entertained that they had been seriously injured. Proceedings were immediately suspended, until the result was ascertained. Fortunately no lives were lost, and but one, a daughter of Mr. T. was materially injured. Thankful that it was no worse, the Council proceeded with its business. A request from the First Universalist Society in Java for the fellowship of the Association was received, and granted.

Brs. Everett, Goff, and Gowdy were appointed a committee to report on a proposed amendment of the Constitution. The committee subsequently submitted an amendment of the 2nd Article, so as to render it necessary for those who may be desirous of becoming members, to ask for admission in due form, and continue amenable to its rules until regularly discharged. The proposition was accepted, and lies over to be finally acted upon next year.

The Committee on fellowship and ordination reported that there had been no application—and the Committee on discipline stated that there had been no complaint, and that they knew of no cause of complaint.

A committee of three, consisting of Brs. Andre, Moore, and Clark, was appointed, to nominate the officers of the Association for the ensuing year; and Brs. Gowdy, Goff, and Clark, were appointed a committee on adjournment, and to take into consideration the expediency of holding Conference meetings within the limits of the Association.

The subject of Conferences was discussed in the evening, and the following Resolutions were submitted to a large congregation assembled and unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That the religion of the Gospel is pre-eminently a social religion, and is calculated to strengthen and give a right direction to the human affections.

Resolved, That Conference meetings in which all can enjoy equal freedom to speak of the things that concern our peace, are well calculated to aid the regular administration of the word of life, to improve the spiritual and moral condition of the people, and to secure to those who take part in them the blessings of the Gospel of peace.

Resolved, That this congregation approves of the plan of holding stated meetings of the kind, as often as circumstances will allow, within the limits of this Association, and that we will earnestly seek for higher qualifications for a devoted Christian life, by the use of such means as God in his providence may afford.

The following officers of the Association for the ensuing year were nominated by the committee appointed for that purpose, and duly elected.

Committee of Discipline. Rev. G. S. Gowdy, Thomas Thurston and Benjamin Caryl, Esquires.

Committee on Fellowship and Ordination. Rev. L. S. Everett, Rev. S. R. Smith, and Peres Cobb, Esq.

Rev. G. S. Gowdy was appointed to deliver the Occasional Sermon at the next annual meeting, and Rev. S. Goff, to deliver discourse on the subject of the Eucharist.

Delegates to the State Convention. Rev. L. S. Everett, Rev. S. Goff, Thomas Thurston and Benjamin Caryl, Esquires, with power to appoint substitutes.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED.

Resolved, That the Universalist society of the town of Alden be requested to report, through its Clerk, to the Standing Clerk of this Association, whether it has kept up its organization, and if so, why it does not represent itself in this body.

Resolved, That the Standing Clerk be authorized to give the certificate in all cases, to the applicants who are entitled to the benefits of the Relief Fund, except in case of his absence or death, when the Committee of Discipline shall give such certificate.

Resolved, That, if practicable, the Trustees of the Relief Fund should invest the surplus income from time to time, with a view to the augmentation of the capital of said fund.

Resolved, That in regard to Sabbath Schools we deem it more important to strive to enforce those resolutions already passed, than to adopt new ones.

After the business of the Association had been brought to a close, the Council adjourned, to meet at Cowlesville the second Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1847. Rev. L. S. Everett was requested to prepare a record of the proceedings for publication in the 'Western Evangelist,' and the denominational papers are desired to copy.

Per order, THOMAS THURSTON, Moderator.
WILLIAM ANDRE, Secretary.

ORDER OF PUBLIC SERVICES.—Wednesday morning.—The Introductory Prayer was offered by Rev. G. S. Gowdy: the Discourse was delivered by Rev. G. S. Abbott, of Jefferson county, from Rom. xii: 10. Afternoon.—Introductory Prayer by Rev. L. S. Everett: The Discourse by Rev. D. Pickering, from 1 Cor. ii: 12. In the evening the congregation assembled at 6 o'clock, to participate in the exercises and enjoyments of a Conference meeting, and short addresses were listened to with a good degree of devout and prayerful interest. Although a discourse was expected in the evening, some were disposed to continue the social exercises and forego the pleasure of listening to a sermon; but fortunately that inclination did not prevail, for we were entertained with an excellent exposition of 1 Cor. xiii: 13, by Rev. W. B. Cook, of Alexander; and when the evening was far spent, the congregation separated, feeling that it had been good for us to be there. Thus ended the first day of the meeting.

On Thursday morning a discourse on Luke xii: 29-31 was delivered by the writer; the prayer by Rev. S. Goff. In the afternoon Rev. S. R. Smith, according to appointment, pronounced an able discourse on the nature, object, and use of the Eucharist, from Acts i. Prayer by Rev. D. Pickering. At the close of these services the Lord's Supper was administered, several of the ministers assisting in the appropriate duties of the occasion.

The following table contains all the statistical information that can be collected from the communications received by the Association:

The Society in Buffalo was originally organized in Feb. 1823, and contains 300 members. The church was organized in 1835, and contains 50 members. Sunday School organized in 1835. It has now 183 scholars and 30 teachers. The library contains 450 volumes.

The Society in Aurora has 29 members. The church has 13 members. A Sunday School has been recently organized, containing about 40 scholars. Rev. S. Goff preaches constantly to the society, and the cause is prosperous.

The Society in Boston owns its meeting-house, is free from debt, enjoys the labors of Rev. G. S. Gowdy, was organized in 1835; and is composed of 51 members. There is a Sunday School with 65 scholars. There is no church organized in connection with the society. The cause in this place is represented as being in a prosperous condition.

The Society in Java was organized in January, 1846, with 8 members, and has increased to 17.—Rev. E. W. Reynolds preaches for the society one quarter of the time. A Sunday School was organized in May last, which now has 28 scholars, one superintendent, one assistant, and one librarian.—The library contains 25 volumes.

The Society in Cowlesville was duly represented in Council, but there appears to have been no statement of particulars in regard to its condition or affairs. By order of the Association.

MINUTES

Of the N. Y. Universalist S. S. Association for 1846.

1. Met, pursuant to adjournment, at Newark, Wayne county, Tuesday, May 26.

2. Br. T. J. Sawyer, President, called the meeting to order, G. L. Demarest, Corresponding Secretary, acting as Secretary, in the absence of that officer.

3. United in prayer with Br. John Moore.

4. Read and approved the Minutes of last session.

5. Statistical Reports from several schools were read, together with some observations on their prospects, wants, and difficulties, all which were ordered to be published with the minutes.

6. Brs. H. L. Hayward, J. M. Austin, and G. S. Clark, were appointed a Committee on the nomination of officers for the ensuing year; who subsequently reported the following names:

For President, Rev. T. J. Sawyer; Vice Presidents, Rev. S. R. Smith, Rev. T. L. Harris, Rev. L. M. Hawes, Rev. John Moore, Rev. J. T. Goodrich; Recording Secretary, Rev. H. L. Hayward; Corresponding Secretary, G. L. Demarest; Treasurer, F. Ransom; Directors, Rev. O. A. Skinner, G. S. Clark, Geo. Gilroy, Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Rev. D. H. Strickland. Report, on ballot, unanimously adopted.

7. Brs. G. S. Abbott, John Moore, and J. H. Harter, Committee to nominate a suitable person to deliver the next Occasional Address, reported the name of Rev. G. W. Montgomery for that purpose, and recommended Rev. J. M. Austin as his alternate. Report unanimously adopted.

8. Brs. G. L. Demarest, J. Moore, and O. A. Skinner were appointed a Committee to make the necessary arrangements for the general Sunday School meeting to be held at Troy in September next.

9. Brs. J. J. Austin, J. H. Campbell, and F. Ransom, Committee on Resolutions, reported the following, which were unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That the Sabbath School Cause lies very near the heart of the Christian religion, and may be made to give forth life, and health, and strength to every fibre of its outward body.

Resolved, That the Ministers of our connection in this State be advised to bring the subject of Sabbath Schools before their respective congregations, with the view of enlisting their whole energies in the cause.

Resolved, That Parents be especially invited to engage in the Sabbath School cause, as the most efficient mode of building up in children a cheerful piety, an inward spiritual life.

Resolved, That Children be addressed as rational, religious and accountable beings, and that they be persuaded rather than coerced to become members of Sabbath Schools.

Resolved, That our people be recommended to diligence in the circulation of printed matter, bearing upon Sabbath Schools, among the parents and children of the indifferent, and of our own and other denominations.

10. Listened to the Occasional Address, by Br. H. L. Hayward.

11. The Corresponding Secretary was directed to prepare the minutes for the denominational papers.

12. Voted the thanks of this body to Br. Hayward for his Address, and solicited a copy thereof for publication.

13. Bis. S. R. Smith, U. Clark, J. M. Austin, J. Moore, and G. L. Demarest were appointed a Committee to consider the propriety of re-organizing the Association, and to suggest such plan for that purpose as may seem of most advantage to the Sunday Schools—to report at the next meeting of this body.

14. Adjourned to meet at Scipio, Cayuga county, on Tuesday, May 25, 1846.

G. L. DEMAREST, Sec'y pro tem.

Members of Council present: Rev. J. M. Austin, Ira Curtis, Auburn; Geo. Allen, Elias W. Ford, Newark; Rev. H. L. Hayward, G. R. Van Liew, S. Cornwell, Scipio; H. C. Mason, Mottville; Rev. J. J. Austin, T. S. Ballard, Lebanon; Rev. T.

Roberts, Rochester; Rev. J. B. Sax, Rushford; Rev. N. Brown, Howlet Hill; Rev. U. Clark, Lockport. Br. Clark and Rev. J. R. Johnson, were also Delegates from the Western New York S. S. Association.—Messenger.

On Saturday the 4th of July, 1846, will commence the Fifth Semi-Annual Volume of

THE GOLDEN RULE,

AND

ODD FELLOWS FAMILY COMPANION.

Mail Subscribers Two Dollars a Year, payable in advance.

We commence a new volume of the GOLDEN RULE under the most favorable auspices. Every where, throughout the Union, it has been received by the Brotherhood with a cordial welcome, as is evinced by an accession of over Seven Thousand additional subscribers during the past twelve months. Encouraged in our labors by this unmistakable testimony of the approval of the Order, we shall continue our exertions to render the GOLDEN RULE equal to any other periodical in the country. It is the oldest weekly in the United States devoted to the interests of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and will continue, as heretofore, to give the earliest and most complete intelligence of the progress of the Order; to illustrate and defend its principles against the assaults of the ignorant and prejudiced; and occasionally to give, in an Extra, a full Directory of Lodges and Encampments throughout the jurisdiction of the G. L. U. S. and in all other respects present to the brotherhood whatever is of interest in the wide field of Odd Fellowship—thus rendering the GOLDEN RULE indispensable to every member of our wide-spread and rapidly increasing fraternity. As an entertaining Literary Family Journal, the GOLDEN RULE shall not be exceeded by any other. In its Literary Department no labor will be spared which can add to its attraction or value. Original and selected tales and poetry by some of the ablest and most popular writers, will form a distinctive feature—which, while adding to the entertainment of the reader, shall, as far as possible, have for their object the inculcation of an elevated morality and virtuous and correct principles. Nor shall we neglect the Useful and Intellectual, but give articles illustrating the Progress of the Age in Arts, Science, and Philosophy—Incidents of Travel—Extracts from New Works of Merit; Popular Reading for the Family Circle; a Department for the Ladies; Amusement, etc., etc.

The GOLDEN RULE is published every Saturday at 30 Ann street, on a double medium sheet of sixteen large octavo pages, making two handsome library volumes a year, of 416 pages each, with title page and index.

It is important that every brother who wishes to obtain the GOLDEN RULE from the beginning of the new volume, should subscribe without delay, so as to obtain the back numbers.

TERMS.—Mail subscribers $2 a year in advance. Any brother obtaining five subscribers and remitting $10, shall receive a copy for his services.

E. WINCHESTER, of Stirling Lodge, No. 190. Publication office 30 Ann street, N. Y.

Rev. A. C. L. ARNOLD, Editor.

To each new subscriber will be sent a beautiful engraved Title-page. Address,

AN EVENING IN SUMMER.

How calm and still it is! The winds have died Away, and e'en the tremulous poplar
Leaf hangs motionless. That river yonder,
Now, is one vast mirror. The trees upon
Its banks, see at full length their forms display'd
Below; while down upon its brink, mournful
And sad the weeping willow stands, and laves
Its velvet leaves within the tide. Thrown in Graceful attitudes, upon its tranquil Bosom floats the careless flower, hush'd by
The gentle motion of its waves to rest.
Thus silently it floats forever on—
Noiseless its tread as time: save now, that far Below, the murmur of a gentle fall
Is heard, (it is some miles,) distinctly borne
Upon the quiet evening air thus far,
As in the noisy day, is heard one rood.
Now and then a playful trout darts from its Bosom, and returns so quick you scarce can See his form;—See the waves! Circle after Circle slowly leaves the spot, while ev'ry
Part preserves with nicest care an equal Distance from the centre: and as they near
The shore, see how the lengthen'd shadow of
The trees below, assume a serpent form;
With leaves all quivering, and disjointed boughs!
How fanciful their shape and attitudes!
Then see the little wild-flowers on the bank,
That, bending o'er the surface, kiss each wave,
And see below a faithful picture of Themselves inverted—the ones beneath, bow
And dance upon each wave, and rapidly
Assume a thousand forms; then gradu'ly
Regain their quiet as the ruffled tide
Sinks down into a calm, and all is still Again.

The hum of busy insects in the air—
The lowing of the distant ox—the sound
Of noisy wheels—the far-off bell—the shrill
Whistle of the swain on yonder hill-side,
Returning from a summer day's long toil—
Every sound is borne with triple loudness
On the evening air. Yonder farm house down
The road, so far, its ample size is shrunk
To but a span; and yet its gate, when swung,
Is heard distinctly here. All nature seems Delighted with the lovely scene—and he
Who wanders forth at twilight's soothing hour,
And, unattended, seeks the distant grove,
Will find all boisterous thought, or passion's stife,
Gradually give way, and, imitating
Nature, sink to rest.

MERRILL.

Willow Glen, June, 1846.

REMINISCENCE.

BY REV. JOHN MOORE.

Some ten years since, I attended the funeral services of a child, which were performed by a Methodist minister. The child was an only son, beautiful and promising, at least so in the estimation of its parents and their two remaining daughters, who were about entering their teens, all of whom were delighted with the name and company of a son and brother. But alas! in an hour when they least expected it, sickness and death came, and the angel of God removed the spirit to its divine Author, and all that was left them was the beautiful and lovely form,—rendered more beautiful by the work of the destroyer, and the fact that they could gaze with melancholy pleasure on it but a few hours more.

The parents were Methodists, and of course were not, by their creed, denied the full and blessed consolation or regarding their lovely boy as in the arms of the blessed Saviour of the world, whose words of love to children now came home to the hearts of those grief-stricken parents with a meaning, and a beauty, and a glory which they had never realized before, and of which the minister made a good use in his discourse. It was with no little satisfaction that I perceived that mourning group hanging upon the words of comfort as they fell from the lips of their spiritual teacher, while he led them to the fountain of 'everlasting consolation and good hope through grace,' in regard to the condition of the dear, dear departed one. For according to their faith, and the doctrine then declared by the preacher, who, so far as the condition of the departed child was concerned, was indeed a 'minister of peace,' no doubts were by them entertained of the happy destiny of the loved one, as it had died before it had passed 'the line of accountability,' and would, therefore, be saved by the grace of God; or, in the language of the preacher, 'by the atoning merit of the blood of Christ.'

But while listening to those remarks which were so consoling to the bereaved spirit, in reference to the departed one, my mind would dwell on the creed of that minister and those parents, in regard to their living children. Would that same Father in heaven who had given them life, and that Saviour who had blessed children, continue to be merciful and gracious to those who are permitted to 'pass the line of accountability?' Or does the grace of God abandon to their own ways such, while it secures the happy destiny of all who die this side of that line? There were two daughters, both of whom were accountable, neither of whom had 'experienced a saving change of heart,'—both exposed to death; and if they should die as they were, would their destiny be a happy or a miserable one? These were questions which forced themselves upon my mind, and which in the light of the creed of those parents, must have startled them. But happily for them there, they did not remember the danger in which their creed placed their living children; they were happy in contemplating the safety and happiness of the departed. I had no desire to divert their minds from that holy trust they seemed to repose in God, under the melancholy providence which they were called to experience. And yet I was desirous of having those, and all parents, brought to enjoy the same hope and trust in God in regard to the destiny of all their children, as in respect to those who die in infancy.

The present view of the subject of the destiny of children is a vast improvement on the past, when it was held and taught that many who died, even in infancy, would be doomed to endless suffering. There may be a few who still hold on to that most horrid dogma; and a larger class, probably, who regard baptized infants only as safe from endless misery; but nearly all Christendom hope for the 'salvation of all infants,'—while many fear in regard to the future welfare of those who, having 'passed the line of accountability,' die out of the pale of the visible church.

According to this view, where is the parent that can desire that children should survive that period? And is it so, that God has suspended the eternal weal or woe of his children on 'life's feeble strings?' Does he take some to himself before that period, lest if allowed to live longer, they might be lost? And does he spare others, that they may run the infinite risk? Does he know, when he spares the life of a child beyond that point of time, that it will be lost? If so, is it a mercy to the child to be thus spared? These are a few of the many queries and thoughts which present themselves to the mind as it dwells on the destiny of our race. And those parents whose religious creed tells them that all who die in infancy are sure of a happy endless life, and that all who survive that period are in imminent danger of endless suffering, can hardly be expected to thank God for sparing the lives of their offspring till they grow to maturity. Do such parents ever realize at what a tremendous risk human life is prolonged? Do they enjoy the society of their children, when reflecting upon that endless hell, which their faith tells them those children are every moment in danger of being doomed to endure? No, they can not. And all that keeps such believers from constant anguish of spirit in view of such danger, is the fact that they do not believe that themselves, or any of their dear friends, will be thus doomed. This hope for their dear friends, saves them from despair. It is happy for the world that it is so,—that all have enough of hope in the mercy of God for themselves and their friends, to save them from the legitimate influence of full faith in any of the creeds of Partialism. But that miserable selfishness and Phariseism, which are evinced by many professors of the benevolent religion of Christ, and which deny to others, the grace of God on which they must depend, are a disgrace to the Christian name and profession, and should be rebuked by all who can speak a word or wield a pen in favor of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Let parents all learn that God is indeed the FATHER, the UNIVERSAL FATHER, and they will trust and obey him with their whole hearts,—which sentiment, thus taught, will favorably affect their whole household.—[Miscellany.]

SECTARIANISM VERSUS TEMPERANCE.

The Rev. Dr. Lansing, of Auburn, N. Y., lectured before the 'Sons of Temperance,' on Wednesday evening, the 6th inst., at the Tremont Temple. The object of the lecture, on the part of the 'Order,' was to diffuse the principles, the objects, and to add to the numbers of the 'Sons.'

No person went by the invitation of that order, neither was it the intention of the members, that they should go, to discuss theological points with the speaker. Far from it. However that may be, there was an opportunity.—We think it short-sightedness on the part of any man, particularly in a lecture of that character, to introduce the private views of his party or sect, or in any way attach the least dead weight to the skirts of the holy cause of Temperance.

The Dr. spoke, in his introductory remarks, of the potency of 'Love,' and urged upon his hearers, the great beauty of one secret of the Order of the Sons of Temperance, and the duty of adopting it, as a governing principle for ourselves, viz., when a brother falls from his pledge, it is kept a secret in the Division to which he belongs; he is labored with; they do not publish his faults in the public highways, neither upon the house tops. And, said the Dr., they find the command whereby they are thus governed, in the word of God. If thy brother offend, forgive him. Go to him, and tell him what thou knowest, and not to his neighbor, &c., &c. This doctrine is very good, and we were much pleased with this part of the Rev. gentleman's discourse. But how different was the closing up of the address. It is not my intention, at this time, to give the exact language of the lecturer, but some of the leading ideas he intended to convey. He addressed himself to the rumrunner, but said he, 'this is no place to find the rumrunner, they'll not come here.' The Dr. was mistaken in this particular, there were two rumrunners present, to my knowledge, one of whom it will be difficult to get to another temperance meeting. He then poured forth his phial of wrath on their heads, sparing none, (pity he said he had for them, but a microscope would not have observed it,) until finally he drew a simile. He said 'the rumrunner was worse than the assassin. The assassin kills outright—the rumrunner tortures by degrees.' And finally in this connexion, the little head of the Rev. Dr. was eased from all pain, by his bold thrust at Universalism (as he thought, and wished to be understood,) but he didn't hit Universalism that time; some other ism had to bear up against the labored and pen'd shock of the Dr. 'I know there is a portion of my brethren,' said the Dr., 'that believe there is no hell; (some new sect, we take it) but if I should be allowed to offer an argument, to rebut that doctrine, I should present before them, the rumrunner.' Here was kindness, sure, to those two brothers who had come to hear him. Admitting for a moment that there must be a hell for the rumrunner, and that the Universalists did not believe in any, (for it was undoubtedly the Universalists he intended to attack) what an inconsistent man the Dr. must be. He said in the commencement of his discourse, that there never existed that man so hard-hearted, that the power of kindness would not reach. If the Dr. does not keep the only secret of the Order, (for he said it was the only secret) the devaluing of a brother's faults—better than he practices that which he recommends to be good for others, methinks he makes a poor Son of Temperance. If thy brother offend, go tell him of it, and not publish it to the world. This was the Rev. gentleman's doctrine in the first part of his address; but in the last part he was publishing what he meant as the faults of his brethren, (two of whom sat before him) to three thousand people, and finally complimented them by avowing that there must be one of his kind of hells, (an endless one) if for no other, on purpose for them. Oh! Dr., where was that LOVE you so eloquently described in your foregoing remarks? Echo answers, where?

In closing, let me request my brother Lansing to visit Dorchester, and I think he will find there work for him to do in opening the eyes of his brother Codman, who but a short time since, let one of those 'breathing holes of hell,' as he called them; then return to the city and visit his brother Blagden, who said not long since, in an address before the Boston Young Men's T. A. Society, that intoxicating drink was 'one of the good creatures of God.' Then call on his Br. Frothingham, who takes a 'little for the stomach's sake' now and then, as well as the Rev. Dr. Godman, of Dorchester, and warn him of the awful danger that awaits him, in recommending the students of Cambridge College to patronize these 'breathing holes,' by taking a little of the harmless beverage for the stomach's sake, in imitation (?) of St. Paul. Go then, to the Hollis street church, and from thence to Brattle street church, and learn the purposes for which the cellars of each are let, and seek out those who get the rent for the same, and point them to that awful hell that awaits them beyond the grave. More might be said, Mr. Editor, but I close, leaving you to handle the theological part at your leisure. Yours for the Right, JUSTICE.

REMARKS.—The foregoing communication is from a youthful 'Son of Temperance' who heard Dr. Lansing on the occasion referred to. It exposes a piece of borishness which is often met with in a class of declaimers, whose sectarian girt is stronger than their love for the temperance cause, or their desire for the improvement of society. They know that all which has been done for the temperance cause, has been accomplished by the influence of light on the effects of alcohol upon the human system, physically, intellectually and morally. Remove the consideration of the real and visible evils, individual and social, which result from the use of the inebriating cup, and the Doctors of Divinity might declaim 'till their voice is gone,' on the fabulous flames of Tartarus, but they would see ministers and people all familiar with their cups.

Now it is for the purpose of removing and preventing these real evils, that general temperance associations are formed. The design is to reach the community at large, of all sects and parties, with the benefits of temperance,—and to do this by the use of a set of motives which no party prejudice shall resist. Each minister has the opportunity, on every Sabbath, and every conference meeting, of his own sect, to urge upon his people motives as sectarian as he pleases. But when the community at large are invited to come together for the discussion of temperance in particular, it is expected that those ample and efficient facts and arguments will be presented, which shall reach all candid minds, and strengthen the mutual fellowship of the mass in the great and good cause, and renew their zeal and their efforts for its advancement.—And on such an occasion, for a man to lug in his sectarian dogmas, which he knows are odious to a portion of his most pure and conscientious brethren for temperance, and a mere by-word to others, he betrays a deplorable want of sense.

They who indulge in this sort of trifling, know that they can do no good by it. They do not expect, by these 'cut and run' thrusts, to make converts to their religious dogmas. They know that the only effect upon those who differ from them on those points will be disgust for their out-of-place attacks, and that their own partisans who may be present hear enough of it elsewhere. Indeed they can hear enough of that from the drunkards and drunkard makers. If we want to hear discourses of moving eloquence on the dogma which the sectarians we refer to are so fond of bandying about, we will take a seat for awhile in the grog-shop. There their throat is an open sepulchre; out of which flows a most eloquent strain of 'hell and damnation.' But when we go to a temperance meeting, we want to hear those truthful and cogent arguments, and those manly appeals for temperance and virtue, which shall move the hearts of all the people to respond, Amen.—[Freeman.]

SLIGHT CIRCUMSTANCES.

Sir Walter Scott, walking one day along the bank of the Yarrow, where Mungo Park was born, saw the traveller throwing stones into the water, and anxiously watching the bubbles that succeeded. Scott inquired the object of his occupation. 'I was thinking,' answered Park, 'how oft I had thus attempted to sound the rivers in Africa by calculating how long a time had elapsed before the bubbles rose to the surface.' It was a slight circumstance, but the traveller's safety frequently depended upon it. In a watch, the mainspring forms a small portion of the works, but it impels and governs the whole. So it is in the machinery of human life, a slight circumstance is permitted by the Divine Ruler to derange or alter it; a giant falls by a pebble; a girl at the door of an inn changes the fortune of an empire. If the nose of Cleopatra had been shorter, said Pascal, in his epigramic and brilliant manner, the condition of the world would have been different. The Mahomedans have a tradition, that when their prophet concealed himself in Mount Shur, his pursuers were deceived by a spider's web which covered the mouth of the cave. Luther might have been a lawyer, had his friend and companion escaped the thunder storm at Erfurt; Scotland had wanted her stern reformer if the appeal of the preacher had not started him in the chapel of St. Andrew's Castle; and if Mr. Greenville had not carried, in 1764, his memorable resolution as to the expediency of charging 'certain stamp duties' on the plantations in America, the western world might still have bowed to the British sceptre. Cowley might never have been a poet, if he had not found the Faerie Queen in his mother's parlor; Opie might have perished in mute obscurity, if he had not looked over the shoulder of his young companion, Mark Otes, while he was drawing a butterfly; Giotto, one of the early Florentine painters, might have continued a rude shepherd boy, if the sheep drawn by him upon a stone had not attracted the notice of Camabue as he went that way.—[Asiatic Journal.]

REV. MR. ARMITAGE AND HIS CHARGES.

We have just received from Rev. T. Armitage, the following letter in reply to our remarks about him and the charges he preferred against Universalists in this paper of the 15th ult., which he requests us to publish. We readily comply with his request and give his letter verbatim et literatim; and our answer to him will be found in the notes appended to his letter by the way.

Rev. Mr. SKINNER—

DEAR SIR—In your paper of 25th [15th] ult. I find a note from N. Snell, and 'remarks' appended by yourself occupying in all about two columns, having special reference to myself. Absence from home and numerous ministerial duties, have prevented me from paying attention to the matter until the present. And indeed, I have been at a loss to know whether it would not be a condescension on my part to notice your article at all. (a)

It would appear that no man professing to be a minister of Jesus Christ, and a brother to all men, could so far forget the dignity of the ministerial office, (and indeed, I may say the dignity of the Christian profession) as you manifestly do in the above named 'remarks.' If the impartial faith only teaches its votaries to deal out to strangers and those whom they profess to regard as fellow-heirs of the same kingdom, such denunciatory and scurrilous language as that embodied in your editorial, I can but say, from such a faith 'Good Lord deliver us.' But I hope for the honor of the sect whom you represent that they would not all disgrace the Christian name, by bandying round in their cool moments, such sublime effusions as the following which are found interspersed through your 'remarks.' 'Utterly false,' 'base calumny,' 'false and wicked slander,' 'malicious slander,' 'retailers of slander,' 'whiffets,' 'modern Judases,' 'traitors,' 'liars,' &c. (b)

Now my dear sir, the only thing that could possibly induce me to say a word in reply to such a motley mass from the vocabulary of low words, is a fear that undue advantage might be taken of my silence. (c) You appear to be at a loss to understand what I mean by the terms employed; and yet they are as plain, simple, and unsophisticated as can be. Suffice it to say, that when I said what I did to Mr. Snell, I meant just what I said; and just what any man, taking a common sense view of the words used, would understand them to mean. By the terms 'When it is necessary, Universalists deny' &c., I wish to be understood to say, that the sentiments of Universalists differ as it regards, time and place. And will you attempt to deny this? Do you not know sir, that Universalism is not now what it was when the 'father' of Universalism, Mr. Murray, first propagated it? (d) You can not be so ignorant of the different phases through which it has past, as not to know that it scarcely bears a resemblance to the original system. When Mr. Murray first declared his sentiments to the world, as the 'father' of the sect he held to all the fundamental doctrines of Christianity in common with Orthodox Christians, excepting that he denied the doctrine of eternal punishment. But do Universalists hold to those doctrines now as he held them? (e) Have they not found it 'necessary' to [b] Mr. A. must remember that he was the assailant and we the defendant—that he had deliberately, and in writing, charged us—not us only but our denomination generally—with base quibbling, dishonesty, hypocrisy and infidelity; that we indignantly repelled the charges, and used a part of those epithets and phrases which he quotes, as applicable to himself only on the supposition that he knew the charges to be false, (and if he knew them to be false, did he not merit them?) and the other epithets—those last named—in reference to those whom we had known and proved to be liars and traitors.

[c] So, we are to credit Mr. A.'s condescension entirely to his fear.

[d] No, sir, we do not know that 'Universalism is not now what it was' in the days of Murray. On the contrary, we know that Universalism was then, always had been, is now and always will be, the same, viz. the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. What else was Universalism in the days of Murray? What else was it in the days of the early Fathers, Clements Alexandrinus, Origen, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Pamphilus, Eusebius, &c.? What else is it now? Individuals might then have differed in opinion on other subjects and may now. But this was Universalism then, is now, and always will be.

[e] When Martin Luther first renounced and denounced the Papal doctrine of indulgences, and still adhered to all the other doctrines of the Catholic church, was he wrong in thus renouncing, or inconsistent with his subsequent renunciation of other errors, or avowal of other important truths? And because he and his adherents subsequently progressed in the rejection of error and the avowal of truth, was he, or were they, inconsistent with themselves and the principle of Protestantism? Has Protestantism—or its great and distinguishing feature, viz. the duty and right of every man to read the Bible for himself, and to exercise his reason and judgment in its interpretation, according to the dictates of conscience,—changed because Protestants differ in opinion on many subjects, or because the majority of them differ now from degenerate from Orthodoxy (f) little by little, until it is very difficult to put your finger upon one point in Christian theology, which they hold in common with professed Orthodox churches; excepting perhaps a belief in the existence of a God. Would not Murray himself were he on earth be ashamed of the system, and revolt at the degeneracy of the sect? But why this change? (g) Why indeed, but to secure Unitarian patronage by succumbing to Unitarian principles? Murray was no Unitarian, but modern Universalists are. I ask again, why have you so changed your sentiments if you have not found it 'necessary' to do so in order to perpetuate your existence by consolidation with other heterodox sects? (h)

It is in this sense sir, that I used the very objectionable words, 'When it is necessary,' &c.

You seem to be much disconcerted with my statement relative to your infidelity on the divinity of Christ, and you ask what I mean by the divinity of Christ. You know very well what as a Methodist preacher I mean by the divinity of Christ; and you manifest any thing but a good spirit toward me, when I affirm that you do not believe this doctrine. But sir, do you not yourself in the same article, denounce this doctrine as among the most monstrous absurdities? (i) It is true that you admit Christ to have been divinely endowed, divinely inspired and divinely empowered; you admit also that he taught divine doctrines &c. But pray sir, if this was all in which his divinity consisted, in what did it differ from the divinity of Jere-those who first asserted its leading principles? 'Fie! fie upon such nonsense. Mr. A.'s common sense should have taught him better than to suppose that because individuals of different periods and localities, holding a doctrine in common, happen to differ on minor points, therefore this common doctrine changes according to time and place!

[f] 'Degenerate'! Really, this is amusing. Because our denomination in the course of fifty or sixty years has made some progress, rejected some errors held then, and embraced some truth that had not then dawned upon Murray's mind, this is degeneracy! Then all the progress which Protestants have made since Luther first rejected popish indulgences is but degeneracy! And Luther's doctrine of Consubstantiation and Calvin's doctrine of Election and Reprobation, being rejected by Mr. Armitage, proves Mr. A.'s great degeneracy!

[g] And why this change among Methodists? Would not Wesley himself, the father of Methodism, were he on earth, be ashamed of his brethren and revolt at the degeneracy of the sect, when he should see the quarrels and contentions, the divisions between the North and the South, the readiness with which many of them espouse Millerism, Mormonism, Abolitionism, and almost every other ism in the land, the pride of their members, the vices of their clergy, &c., &c.?

[h] This charge of seeking 'to perpetuate our existence by consolidation with other heterodox sects,' and 'secure Unitarian patronage by succumbing to Unitarian principles,' is perfectly ridiculous. For however highly we respect and esteem our Unitarian brethren, it is a well known fact that Universalists had rejected the doctrine of the Trinity and maintained the Divine Unity long before the Unitarians existed as a denomination in America; and so of all the distinguishing sentiments now held by our denomination. We preach our own distinguishing doctrines, boldly, distinctly, undisguisedly, and seek no 'consolidation' with any other sect, orthodox or heterodox, except such as is voluntary on their part, by their adopting our views or harmonizing with us in feeling.

[i] We pronounced the idea monstrous and absurd that there was 'more than one Supreme Deity, or that Christ was his own Son or the Father of himself, or that he did not mean what he said when he declared, 'the Father is greater than I.' Now by saying that we denounce his 'doctrine as among the most monstrous absurdities,' he admits that he holds these anti-scriptural and monstrous notions.

miah, or Paul, or any other of the prophets or apostles? (j)

With regard to the doctrine of the Immortality of the soul, you accuse me of slander when I say, that as it is necessary you assert or deny it. And you then attempt to throw a cloud upon the truth in the case by classing some 'partialists' (as you are pleased to call orthodox Christians) with some Universalists as disbelieving the doctrine. But sir, what respectable Orthodox writer has approximated so near to downright skepticism (k) as Mr. Balfour in his letters to Hudson on this subject? On pp. 243, 339-342, 353, in that work he deals in the following and much more, very unchristian language on this subject. I travel through both the Old and New Testament in search of evidence for your immortal soul, but I can find none, that either such a soul was breathed into man, or breathed out of any one at death. And again, your doctrine of an immortal soul and its punishment after death is of heathen origin, is but heathen chaff which the wind of free inquiry and investigation into the Scriptures will ere long blow away. In the Trumpet and Mag. of Feb. 24, 1844, he says, 'I have turned the doctrine of the soul's immortality out of doors altogether as a heathen intruder.' Mr. Le Fever, editor of the Gospel Anchor says vol. ii, p. 244, 'We have given considerable attention to this subject, and we do not hesitate to say that in our humble opinion the testimony against the soul's immortality seems to preponderate.'

You may say that these men are not the oracles of the sect, and that the greater part of the body do not believe with them, as you say, you do not. But what does this avail? (l) What authorized creed have you, that discards such sentiments, and what discipline by which these errorists are brought to account for their errors? (m) In absence of these,

[j] We did not say 'this was all in which his divinity consisted.' We now say, in answer to his query, that the spirit was given to the prophets and apostles by measure, but to Christ 'without measure.' He was anointed above his fellows. Now, who were his fellows? (equals or companions?) If it be said they were the Father and Holy Ghost, then Christ was anointed above them; consequently the three persons in the Trinity are not equal—the Son is above the Father! But if prophets and apostles were his 'fellows,' then by being anointed above them, he was their superior and there is no absurdity in the expression of the Scriptures. Again, he is called the Beginning of the creation of God, the First born of every creature, the Christ, the Saviour of the world, the Resurrection and the Life; but none of these titles are given to prophets or apostles. Again, he is to reign till all enemies are subdued, till every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that he is Lord, and then he is to deliver up the reconciled kingdom to God the Father that God may be all in all. Is here no superiority over prophets and apostles?

[k] If the denial of the immortality of the soul is a near approximation to 'downright skepticism,' then was Martin Luther, the very head and leader of Protestantism and the Reformation, very near to skepticism. For he denied it; and William Tindall, his apologist, in 1530, owns Luther's views on this subject as the doctrines of the Protestants; as Mr. Armitage may see in Balfour's Letters to Hudson, from which he professes to quote in this very paragraph!

[l] It avails much—it proves that the greater part of the body, the denomination as such, is not obnoxious to the charge; hence that his charge is false. Because he has found one individual who denies the doctrine and another who thinks the testimony against it 'seems to preponderate,' while the great mass of the denomination sincerely believe it, can he in any way justify the charge? Impossible: and he knows it.

[m] We thank God that we have no creed nor discipline but the Bible, and such as individuals, churches and societies may adopt in the language, or according to their understanding of the Bible, and that freedom of thought and opinion are secured to all, by the very spirit of our the responsibility rests where it ought to rest; with the body. Why sir, this very fact, proves the truth of my statement, and is evidence that Universalism in New England is one thing, and in the valley of the Mohawk another. And it is 'necessary' that it should be so, in order that it may accommodate itself to the peculiar views of different communities. (n)

When I say that Universalists deny the divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures under given circumstances, you accuse me of 'unqualified and malicious slander.' And then you plunge into a dreadful fit of anger, and lavish your fury upon the devoted heads of poor 'Matthew Hale Smith, Robert Smith, and other co-laborers.' Moreover you solemnly aver, that their testimony can not be received, as you have 'disfellowshipped them for their vices and infidelity.' Now sir, this is all gratuitous. It is time enough to reject their testimony when it is offered. But as you are very much afraid to admit the testimony of others to any point, lest it should be 'garbled,' perhaps you will be willing to admit your own. (o) In a recent controversy with Mr. Holmes you argue (through your own columns) that inasmuch as it is the will of God that all should be saved all will therefore be saved. Mr. H. says in reply, that in order to know the will of God we must consult the word of God. He then refers you to Christ weeping over Jerusalem because, it resisted the will of God; and to the Apostle when he expresses a wish that men pray every where, but yet they do not so. You then made the following remarks, 'Mr. Holmes' great blunder is that he represents Christ and the apostles to be God himself, and their wills to be none other than his will.' And again, you ask, 'Is it honest for him to substitute the will of other beings and then call it the will of God?' Now sir, when you say that the words of Christ and his apostles as they are recorded in the Holy Scriptures, are not the words of God, do you not deny the divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures? I always understood that the apostles, as well as the prophets, 'wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost,' and consequently that the words thus written by them were the words of God to man. This is all the inspiration ever claimed for the Bible, and inasmuch as in the above 'remarks' you sweep all this away at a single stroke I am justified in saying, 'that when it is necessary Universalists deny the divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures.' (p) faith and of Protestantism. If we are Protestants, let us be such in fact, and not in name merely, while we are papists in practice with iron bedsteads to whose exact measure all must conform. But suppose we adopt the same course towards the Methodists that Mr. A. does towards us—suppose we charge the Methodists generally with holding all the wild vagaries that any individuals of their faith have ever put forth; then we should charge Methodists with giving countenance to and adopting the wild and phrenzied notions of the Millerites; for a considerable number of them have actually done so. We should also charge them with holding to the immortality and salvation of the brute creation: for even Wesley himself, the father of Methodism, held this doctrine, and believed he should meet his good old horse in heaven that had so long and faithfully carried him about to preach the Gospel! Was this an error? Who was accountable for it?

[n] We have before shown (see note d) that Universalism is the same in all ages and climes.

[o] Most certainly, if you will but quote it fairly. But like Elder Holmes, you garble and leave out the most essential, and all the explanatory parts of it.

[p] For rightly appreciating this paragraph, the reader should turn to Nos. 5 and 16 of the present volume of this paper, where our article in review of Mr. Holmes and our reply to a similar charge from him, were published. Mr. A., like Mr. H., purposely leaves out all the proof, the ample and positive Scripture proof we there gave of the correctness of our position, that God 'worketh all things after the counsel of his own will,' and 'doeth according

In view of the source from whence this matter originated, and the ungentlemanly treatment which I have received at the hands of one who is as great a stranger to me as I am to him, and having said this much, I dismiss the entire matter as unworthy of further attention. (g)

Your respectfully,
THOMAS ARMITAGE.

to his will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth? Neither of these Methodists undertakes to controvert or disprove the proposition, but both at once resort to the charge of infidelity, or the denial of the inspiration of Scripture! It is much easier preferring this charge than it is to meet our arguments and proof texts. Now does Mr. Armitage mean to affirm that every word and sentence recorded in the Bible is directly the word of God? So it would seem by his language. When Christ exclaimed, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' was this sentence directly the word of God? If so, the meaning of it must be—myself, myself, why have I forsaken myself!! What sublime conceptions must Mr. A. have! Again, when Paul said, ' Oftentimes I purposed to come unto you, but was let hitherto'—I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh'—I speak this by permission, and not by commandment; and 'that which I speak, I speak not after the Lord, but as it were foolishly in this confidence of boasting;' are all these expressions to be considered directly the words of God? True, they are recorded in the Bible, faithfully and truly recorded, but not as the words and sentiments and will of God, but as the words and sentiments and will of Paul. When we read in the Bible the sentence, 'Ye shall not surely die,' are we to regard this as God's language, or that of the serpent?—The ridiculous assumptions of Mr. A. will tend to make far more skeptics than the rational ground we take, that the Bible contains a faithful and true record of God's will and revelations to man, as also the record of many things not in accordance therewith—that the doctrines and precepts of the Bible are true and divinely inspired—and that itself records the fact that the apostles sometimes strayed from God both in their wishes and practices; and that Christ, though he learned obedience in all things, yet had sometimes desires and wishes of his own, distinct from those of God, as when he says, 'if it be possible let this cup pass from me;' yet he immediately and humbly submits and says, 'not my will but thine be done.'

[g] As Mr. A. now 'dismisses the entire matter as unworthy of further attention,' we would suggest, by way of advice, that before he again volunteers his services as 'the accuser of his brethren,' he should pay a little 'further attention' to the subject and inform himself a little better thereon, or in other words that he had better 'leave off contention before it be meddled with.' 'Give me neither poverty nor riches,' said Agur. It was well said. If poverty and riches were banished from the world, earth would be a heaven in comparison with what it is at present.

There are some small minds in this world. Some people spare no pains in efforts to veil their real characters. It is all in vain; for one may see through them, as easily as through the bottom of an old basket.

There are some men in the world. A few. But there are many who though they bear the form of men, are only things, and shocking disagreeable things too.

Hell. There is much said about this now-a-days.—Brimstone acts like a charm with many—especially under some circumstances.

The question which Pilate asked in reference to our Saviour, was—'What evil hath he done?' The question should be reversed relative to many of the Saviour's professed followers—What good have they done?

Removals.

Br. J. J. Austin of Lebanon, Madison county, has received and accepted an invitation to take the pastoral charge of the Universalist society in Newark, Wayne county, and is to commence his labors in the latter place on the first Sunday in July. He leaves a good home for what he believes to be a broader field of usefulness. The societies of Lebanon and Madison are left destitute by his removal: but we trust they will not remain so long. Together, they can make some active and faithful preacher a happy home. Our best wishes and highest hopes will go with Br. A. to his new home and the good people of Newark where we lately enjoyed so happy a meeting at the Convention.

Br. H. L. Hayward has resigned the pastoral care of the society in Scipio, and accepted an invitation to settle with the Universalist society in Fort Plain, N. Y., and will commence at the latter place the first Sunday in July. All letters and papers designed for him should be sent hereafter to Fort Plain.

Br. E. W. Lock late of Newark has removed to Rockport, Mass.

Br. James O. Emery from North Hermon to East Corinth, Me.

Br. C. H. Webster from East Lexington to So. Dedham, Mass.

Br. R. M. Byram from Strong, Me., to Oxford, Mass.

Br. B. B. Bunker from Hudson, N. Y., to Saco, Me.

Br. A. Hitchborn from So. Boston to So. Reading, Mass.

Br. J. L. Stevens from New Sharon, Me., to Beverly, Mass.

Br. Geo. Thomas from Buckfield, Me., to Randolph, Mass.

Br. D. J. Mandell to Farmingham, Mass. Lord! how these ministers do move about!

We learn from the Western Evangelist, that the Western Luminary is to be merged in that paper on the first of July. It will be recollected that Br. Hammond and ourself had some correspondence upon the subject of a similar arrangement with this paper some time since, but we were not able to make a suitable and acceptable offer to effect a union of the Magazine and Luminary. We suppose Br. Everett, being able, has made Br. H. such an offer. We doubt not that the union that is to take place will be beneficial to both papers, for to our mind it appeared morally certain that three papers in Central and Western New York, could not be sustained except at a great pecuniary sacrifice by the publishers of one or all of them. Although we doubted (and publicly and frankly stated our doubts) the propriety or necessity of another new paper in this State, while we questioned the right of no man to establish one, yet with the above arrangement we are perfectly satisfied, and cordially extend to the new paper (now two in one by lawful matrimony) the right hand of fellowship, and wish it all desirable success.

The June No. (12) of the FARMER'S LIBRARY is received. This number contains the usual quantity of valuable matter. This ends the first volume and contains the title pages, index, tables of contents, &c., at Beesley's.

We have received from the publisher, Caleb Bartlett, No. 225 Pearl street, New York, a copy of the HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. By Marcus Willson. It is calculated for the use of schools, having questions on the margin of each leaf, is illustrated with maps and scenes of some of the most remarkable events in our country's history calculated to interest and instruct the learner. It is neatly put up in boards, containing 346 pages 12mo. We are informed that it has been adopted and is in use by the Normal School at Albany, and that 10,000 copies have already been disposed of, which facts show pretty conclusive evidence of the value of the book. It may be had of G. Tracy and other booksellers in this city.

NEW BOOK.—We have just received another neat and new miniature volume, from the prolific pen of sister Sarah C. Edgerton, entitled the 'Floral fortune teller.'—It is in keeping with her former productions, the 'Flower Vase,' Tables of Flora, &c. Price 37 1-2 cents. We have also received a new supply of Streeter's Hymns, Law of Kindness, Williamson's Exposition, Flower Basket, Family Prayer Book, Mrs. Scott's Poems, &c.—'Reasons for our Hope,' Book of Reference, Roger's Memoranda, Orthodoxy as it is, Ballou's Sermons, Notes on the Parables, and indeed a general assortment of Universalist Books are on our shelves and for sale.

No. 9 of the TREASURY OF HISTORY contains the histories of Portugal, Germany, Hungary, Holland and Belgium, Sweden, Denmark and Norway, Russia, Poland, Switzerland, Italy and Venice. Three more numbers complete the series. 25 cents per number. Daniel Ade, 107 Fulton street, New York.

Mr. G. N. Beesley has received the English papers by the late Steamer, Punch, Wilmer and Smith's Times, etc.

Br. T. J. Sawyer authorises us to receive subscriptions or donations to the Theological Institute. Any one who may wish can therefore remit direct to this office, and the receipt of the money will be acknowledged in the Magazine and Advocate.

The articles from Br. J. T. Goodrich relating to 'A Country Pastor,' are received and will appear next week. Br. G. states that their delay was unavoidable.

A few copies of the Rose of Sharon for 1846 for sale at this office.

Br. SKINNER.—The following beautiful lines were addressed by your youthful author to an invalid cousin, whose heart cherishes their sentiment so warmly as to desire their publication; and they are now forwarded for that purpose, though without the knowledge of their writer. J. J. A.

THIS WORLD OF OURS.—TO O. E. J.

Oh, this is a beautiful world of ours!
With its scenery bright, its shades and flowers;
There is every thing fair, there is every thing good,
And in all is the mark of thy finger, God!
There's the storm's rough march,—and the day begun,
Balmy and bright,—and the setting sun,
As it sinks to its azure home far west,
The home of the perfect, the just and blest:
Now rustles the breeze through the coppice glade,
And the night-bird sings in the twilight shade,
As the vesture of night o'er the earth is cast,—
A symbol, Oh, Earth! of a night—thy last!
Now the stars come forth in the high concave:—
There's one that will shine on thy night, oh, Grave!
And the galaxy bright, a lurid zone,
Thy girdle, oh, Heaven,—and our pathway home!
We gaze, and we think we can almost see,
'Mong those far off worlds, our own destiny;
Where there's friendship and truth, and love and trust,
For the virtuous, good, and kind and just;
All these have the Author of good bestowed
On earth, for the children he made and loved.
Then list to the song of the passing hours,
'Oh, this is a beautiful world of ours!'
And think, though a beautiful world it be,
There still is a brighter in store for thee!

ELDER D. HOLMES IN REPLY TO A. O. WARREN.

Groton, June 9, 1846.

Mr. SKINNER.—Sir—Some weeks since I learned accidentally, that a Mr. Warren had addressed me by name through the columns of your paper, proposing to meet me in discussion upon the propositions made to Mr. Taintor. Supposing if this were the case, I should in some way receive a copy of the communication, I made no farther inquiry in regard to it, until the report went abroad amongst those who sympathize with Universalism, that I had been challenged but 'had backed out.' No doubt the wish was father to the thought. On learning this, I took the first opportunity to inquire for and obtain a copy of the 'Magazine' containing the letter. The following is my reply. You will oblige me by giving it an early insertion.

Mr. A. O. WARREN.—Sir, I should have given your letter an earlier notice but for the circumstances explained above in my note to Mr. Skinner.

You profess in your communication, to feel an interest in the cause of truth, and to be impelled by a sense of duty to assume a position 'which others have neglected or refused to take.' You profess to respond to my challenge to Mr. Taintor: and yet you close by changing the question, issuing a challenge yourself, and expressing a hope that you may 'hear from me as soon as may be convenient.'

To this I have only to say—if you intended to hold me to my proposals to Mr. T., you have been singularly unfortunate in stating your case.

The following extracts from my letters to Mr. T., will show the real nature of my challenge.—Under date of August 28, 1845, I wrote as follows: 'As you seem so very anxious to appear again as principal in this redoubtable affair, I will make the following proposition. If we can agree upon the preliminaries—and you will open your house in Virgil, I will meet you in open debate on the two main points in your sermon.'

Under date of September 11th, I wrote as follows: 'If, as you intimate, you are unwilling to engage in it, (the discussion,) though I am not so anxious for controversy as to hold myself open to meet any one that may be named, yet if Mr. Brown or Clark choose to take your place, I have no objection.' At the close of the same letter is the annexed paragraph.

My sermon will soon be before the public, when there will be no need of imperfect and garbled extracts. And when it is published, I am willing to meet, and hereby propose to meet, any Universalist preacher of respectable character in the wide world, in a written debate on the main propositions contained in it, provided we can obtain a vehicle through which our thoughts may be conveyed to the public. These extracts contain all the proposals I have made for a controversy of any kind, and I think you can not fail to see that your communication does not meet the case. I differ from you materially in regard to the nature of the question you propose for discussion. Though important to be sure, in the relation it sustains to fundamental truths—yet it is far from being the most important. I grant, that if the doctrine of 'future endless misery for any of the human family,' be taught in the Bible, Universalism must be false. But I do not grant that it must be true if this doctrine should be found not to be directly taught there. There would still be a score of methods by which the system might be found false; hence, if you should gain your question, you would not gain your cause.

But if you wish to discuss questions which at once cover the whole ground of controversy between Universalism and Orthodoxy—you can not do better than take those embraced in the two propositions of my discourse—since one of them relates to the nature of salvation, and the other to the conditionality and extent of it. You must not therefore expect me to change my ground—to give up the main point, to discuss one of subordinate consideration.

The following are my reasons for declining to meet you on the ground you have assumed.

1. I have not offered to debate orally with any one except the three gentlemen above named.
2. I have not proposed to discuss any questions except those already alluded to.
3. I have not offered to engage in any debate, oral or written, with any but a Universalist preacher of respectable character. You may be respectable enough for aught I know, but as yet you have given me no proof that you are a preacher at all.

When my proposals are fairly and fully met, it will be time enough to enter into other arrangements. Until then, I must decline any discussion of the question proposed by you.

Respectfully yours, D. HOLMES.

BR. SAWYER AND CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

Br. Price of the New York Christian Messenger, on his late excursion to the State Convention, visited Clinton and spent a few days with his former associate, Br. T. J. Sawyer. We copy the following extract from a letter addressed to his sons while in Clinton.

I almost envy the situation of my early co-adjutor—Br. Sawyer. True, he must forego the immediate society of early and long tried friends, but then, on the other hand, he is surrounded by the magnificent handy work of the great Creator, in all its beauty and profuseness. He can tread the green earth, breathe the pure air of heaven, snuff the odors of the fresh grass, and the opening flowers, and listen to the many-voiced music of forest and field.

You must know that he is becoming quite a Farmer. He has purchased a beautiful situation, and is now renovating the buildings and making some additions, which, when completed, will give him a delightful residence. His farm contains 42 acres; and when I tell you that it is as pretty land as you could wish to lay your eye upon, you will not be disposed to despise it. It was not a little amusing to me to sit and listen to the speculations upon corn, potatoes and pasturage, by one who has been all his life-time a complete book-worm!—gravely discussing the relative merits and demerits of different crops, with the neighboring farmers, who called in for a friendly chat! But never mind. Let 'those laugh who win,' I should much like the same opportunity, and would gladly risk the amusement it might afford to others!

Of his prospects touching the School over which he presides, I am not so well prepared to speak. That he occupies an important position—the most so that could be assigned him in our denomination will hardly be questioned. And that he is competent to his charge—perhaps the best qualified of any one in the denomination—those who know him best will be as little disposed to question. There is probably but one exception, if any. I can see but one difficulty in the way of all desirable success to himself, and advantage to our common cause—a barely possible failure of the denomination through the State to properly co-operate with him, and sustain him in his present efforts to establish among them an Institution of which they may all well be proud. I say possible failure, for I shall be slow to believe the Universalists of New York will allow the Institution to languish. It is now peculiarly their own—there is a good foundation laid to build upon, and it only needs concert of action, with a moderate effort on the part of each individual, to place it on a permanent and commanding footing. It has labored under many difficulties and embarrassments in the past—has struggled hard for an existence—but confidence is now rapidly extending, and the number of students increasing, and it would be worse than suicidal, to neglect it now. If I had a trumpet-voice, it would not be my fault if I did not reach the ear of every one professedly interested in our denominational advancement.

So, all things considered, I regard Br. Sawyer's location as a very desirable one—and his prospects for benefit to himself and usefulness to the cause, as greatly exceeding all they ever have been, or could be in the future, in the city. And that, to any one acquainted with the history of affairs there, for the past sixteen years, is saying a good deal.

On Sunday, 30th ult., Br. Sawyer exchanged services with Rev. Mr. Emmons, the Unitarian clergyman of Vernon, some six or seven miles west of Clinton. This afforded me the opportunity of listening to two discourses from Mr. E. And I take pleasure in thus publicly stating that they were excellent discourses, and embodied as good Universalism as I desire to listen to. If they may be taken as a fair sample of Mr. E.'s general preaching, he is far from being obnoxious to the charge of indefiniteness, so clearly resting against some of his denomination. I had also a very pleasant interview with him between the services, and could cordially unite with him in the general views advanced by him. You know that I have had occasion (or felt so at least,) sometimes, to complain of Unitarians, but am free to confess, that if all Unitarians were as I found Mr. E., I am sure there would be no difficulty between us. I could take them most cordially by the hand and bid them God-speed, in their labors of love.

Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn, keeps a general assortment of Universalist Books for sale. He is also agent for the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist publications generally.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected, assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street, Buffalo.

THE COUNTRY PASTOR.

Efforts of him and his friends to EXCLUDE UNIVERSALIST MEETINGS FROM A SCHOOL-HOUSE in Preston; and the 'VOICE TO YOUTH' and 'CONSTITUTION OF MAN' FROM THE LIBRARIES OF COMMON SCHOOLS; and to place therein the works of the 'AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY'; with the previous and attending circumstances and the result.

It is interesting to learn the names and read the biographies of those who stand prominent upon the scroll of fame. The sayings, doings and writings of the memorable author of 'More Snakes in the Grass,' have pre-eminently placed him in this conspicuous position; and justice to him and the world demand that he should not live and die in obscurity; that he should be known to the present and all future generations. I regret my inability to impart any information concerning his parentage, the wonderful place of his birth, or history of his youth. All I can do is to furnish some brief sketches and incidents that may be of service to the individual who shall assume the very responsible task of inditing a memoir of this illustrious personage. His cognomen is the REV. (?) MR. DYER. He is pastor of a little Presbyterian church in Preston; a moral and intelligent town. The fabled wolf covered by the skin of another animal, no more clearly exhibited his ears, than did this distinguished divine in the remarkable essay to which we have already referred. After reading it, I communicated my discovery to others, and found that those acquainted with his recent history saw his venerable face perfectly as in a mirror. Parental pride soon led him to assume and thus forever settle the paternity of the child.

Not satisfied with the immortality thereby acquired, he addressed a Memorial to the Secretary of State and Superintendent of Common Schools, for the laudable, three-fold purpose of inducing him to prevent the Universalists from occupying a school house for religious meetings, to exclude the 'snakes in the grass' from the libraries of district schools, and to place therein the works of the 'American Tract Society.' The circumstances under which it was written render the deed doubly infamous.—A school house had been erected in district number four, in Preston, long before there was a meeting-house in the town. At length three meeting-houses were reared; one for the Seventh Day Baptists about three miles south-west, one for the Presbyterians (Mr. Dyer's congregation) about two miles south-east of that district, and one therein for the Calvinistic Baptists. Universalists and others of liberal sentiments aided liberally in building the two houses last named, and without their subscriptions, certainly one could not, and probably neither of them could have been completed. The Presbyterians promised that theirs should be open to all denominations when not occupied by them, which they declared they expected would be but a portion of the time; and our friends furnished means, intending to use it once in four weeks. Soon after it was finished, and when it was unoccupied, they applied for it for a lecture from Br. Doolittle, then the nearest clergyman of our order, and it was peremptorily refused! One individual very justly concluded to sue the trustees for the fifty dollars he had paid them, and employed counsel. Knowing that he could conclusively prove that he signed in consequence of the above mentioned obligation, and that they should be beaten, his money was refunded. Others also, 'by the terrors of the law,' might have brought these pious swindlers to justice! They have threatened to do so, but as yet have suffered them to keep their ill-gotten gain. The 'Country Pastor,' too, for years very pleasantly listened to the excellent singing of Universalists in his choir, and has as cheerfully received support from them as from any in his parish.

The Calvinistic Baptists violated no contract in their dealings with the Universalists. But they refused all applications our friends made for their house, except for an Association and for funerals, though it was not in use. This was uncharitable and unjust. The fact that they would most strenuously importune and would receive essential aid in erecting it, and in sustaining their clergyman and choir, from a sect they would not commodore when they conveniently could, abundantly proves this declaration. During the whole of a protracted meeting, the table of one of our friends was spread every morning, noon and evening, and a fire was kept expressly for the accommodation of the attendants: and at his house they had every requisite comfort previously and subsequently to submitting to the solemn ordinance of baptism. And this excellent brother is far from being alone in manifesting to them in various ways a similar spirit. Equity requires us to add that but a portion of them are fully responsible for their unchristian course. A number of their best members have always been for granting all our requests. Whether they were the majority or minority, they yielded only to avoid a serious contention, which they dreaded more than the perpetration of a wrong.

The school-house in district number four, which, previous to or after the erection of the meeting-houses in Preston, was never refused to any sect when not in use for School purposes, whether Protestant or Catholic, Universalist, Partialist, Millerite, or Mormon, but which had been opened by common consent to all, 'waxed old' and went to ruin. It had become totally unfit for the purposes for which it was reared, and was destroyed. A new one was accordingly built. And now there was an excellent opportunity of depriving the Universalists of a house, stopping their meetings, and prostrating their sentiments. The inhabitants of the district were generally Presbyterians, Baptists, Universalists, and Nothingarians. In it the writer had delivered a lecture once in four weeks, for about five years. The influence of Partialism during that time had been decidedly upon the wane. Our friends, who had listened to its ministrations when they could not attend a meeting of their own, long ago ceased so to do. They could not brook the unprovoked abuse poured upon them by the 'Country Pastor' and his zealous co-laborer of the Baptist church in that town, the REV. (?) MR. BUSH, of Weedsport, Cayuga county, notoriety, who has been deposed from the ministry by his brethren, for the sin for which so many of the Partialist clergy are distinguished; and their undivided influence was exerted in favor of the cause of truth and righteousness. A spirit of reading and investigation was excited. Nothingarians were converted. Many of the young were strongly inclined to, or fully embraced our sentiments, and the scales began to fall from the eyes of the members of the different churches. Even the 'Country Pastor's,' the character of which can correctly be inferred by his productions, one which it would justly be supposed was almost beyond the reach of hope or mercy, and one which, like some in the days of our Saviour, is farther 'from the kingdom of heaven' than 'publicans and harlots,' even his church began to totter! To quote his own language, in his 'More Snakes in the Grass,' 'a lovely youth, the child of joyous parents, and for a member of the church of unusual promise....yielded to the syren voice of the charmer, and all hope of her recovery to the belief of the truth' (old fashioned Calvinism) 'and to the paths of righteousness' (self-righteousness) 'is gone!'—This is one, who he alleges, has rejected the Scriptures; that is, the belief 'that by the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death;' that 'their number is so certain and definite, that it can not be either increased or diminished;' that those of mankind predestinated unto life are chosen 'without any foresight of faith or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature as conditions, or causes moving him thereunto;' that 'others not elected,' whether infants or adults, 'can not be saved;' that God was pleased to pass them by and 'ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sins, to the praise of his glorious justice;' (Confession of Faith, chap. III, sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and chap. X, sections 3 and 4,) and embraced infidelity; that is, the sentiment that 'God WILL HAVE all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth!' (1 Tim. ii: 4.) Godly parents, 'despite the warnings and exhortations of their pastor,' recommended the perusal of works to their children, which placed them 'in the seat of the scorner,' and made them the loud advocates of infidelity! Females 'of high standing for intelligence and piety,' put 'Combe on the Constitution of Man' in a conspicuous position in their parlors! and 'mothers of interesting families were deaf to all warning and remonstrance against the dangerous tendency of so insidious a foe!!' And, O! most unpardonable sin of all! even that against the holy spirit!! religious friends laid 'Austin's Voice to Youth' 'side by side with Baxter's Call and Allein's Alarm, and other kindred works of the Evangelical Family Library, clothed in a dress more fascinating than either'!!!

Now just as certain as 'All mankind by the fall of Adam lost communion with God, are under his wrath and curse, and so made liable to all the miseries of this life, to death itself, and to the pains of hell forever;' just so certain as that fall caused thorns and thistles to infest the earth, and teeth to grow in the mouths of lions, tigers, and other animals, that they might worry and devour one another; 'and nature through all her works to give signs of wo that all was lost;' so certain is Universalism the cause of all these crimes! Now what must be done for their remedy? The new school house must not be opened for the promulgation of that horrid doctrine which produces them, and the work is accomplished; for they can procure no other place in which they can obtain a hearing; no more converts will be made; those who now favor or have embraced their views, one by one, will be led to discard them; and, as it is entirely through their influence that these infidel works are purchased and circulated, they soon will cease their fatal execution! Bright visions flitted before their imaginations. Accordingly, a practical follower of Calvin, commences the very creditable work, of obtaining the signatures of the voters of a district to a remonstrance against the Universalists holding meetings in the school-house. This was bigotry and intolerance so plainly and incontrovertibly, that even bigots themselves, beyond the pale of Presbyterianism, refused to lend their aid! Few were willing to stand out in bold relief immortalized on 'that roll of names,' but many would cheerfully assist in accomplishing by hypocrisy what they dare not by honesty attempt to perform.—Hence a protest was circulated against using the school-house for debating schools, singing schools, religious meetings, or for any other purpose than the day school. By the request of some of these very signers, the Rev. Mr. Richards, then of Norwich but now of Oxford, was the first who had ever lectured in it; several of them just after they had inscribed their names attended a debate in it; and the honest, conscientious man engaged in the righteous work of circulating the remonstrance and protest, officiated as the President! By every species of representation, and some affirm of misrepresentation, fifteen signatures were procured; several of them only because taxation to build a school-house which was of no direct benefit to them, as they had no children to school, offended them; actuated by the principle of Freeman, the negro in Cayuga county, in the murders he recently perpetrated, who, he alleges, was sent to State Prison for a crime he never committed; a determination to be revenged on some persons, not caring who they were.—The remainder, about three fifths of the district, refused to sanction this proscriptive course. A trustee, an opposer, presented this protest to another trustee, a friend, and forbid us holding a meeting in the house the next evening. The last mentioned trustee, after recounting to him facts herein presented, and considering that the absent trustee and a majority of the district would not sustain a policy so selfish and devilish, concluded to open it; and contrary to the expectations of some, we delivered our message to a very large congregation without interruption; despite 'the weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth' of 'the scribes, pharisees and hypocrites,' or 'the lamentations there or elsewhere.'

These violators of 'the Golden Rule,' these enemies of practical Christianity, these reckless trespassers of right, seeing themselves in a decided minority, and feeling that the popular current of indignation was rapidly setting against them, dare not call a meeting of the district to decide upon our occupancy of the house, as they had threatened to do, and for a time all was quiet; and we supposed that their favorite object was relinquished. Weeks passed. A Universalist trustee one day happened near the Post Office, and instantly having a presentiment that it would be to his interest to call, that there was something important for him, he went in, and learned that there was a letter for William Packer, jr., (the first signer of the memorial to the State Superintendent of Common Schools given below,) or other trustees of district number four, Preston. Mr. P. not being a trustee, and the writer apparently supposing that he was, and intending the letter for the trustees, or the district, or both, the Universalist trustee felt authorized to take it, the Post Master assenting upon his assuming the responsibility. He opened it, and perceived it was from the State Superintendent. The reader probably has a true copy of it, under my strictures upon the memorial which called it forth. I say probably, because I do not believe any one, if disposed, would dare to alter it, as detection would be morally certain; but the conduct of some engaged in suppressing it, and afterwards publishing what purports to be it, proves that they live up to the motto that 'the end justifies the means,' and even forgery could scarcely be more bare than some measures to which they have resorted. After reading it himself, and to others in the house who wished to hear it soon as its nature was revealed to them, before he left, Mr. Packer came and requested it. He had probably received a call from the 'Country Pastor,' who departed from the Post Office as the Universalist trustee entered, and doubtless desired him to look for a reply to the private and underhanded memorial he wrote for those who signed it. The Trustee, Br. Smith, gave it to him, upon his agreeing to return it for the benefit of the district to whom it belonged. A number of the disciples of Calvin assembled together that evening, and it is supposed, after groaning over their defeat, (for, as will be seen by the communication which follows, the decision in every respect was against them,) and, with the exception of one or two more bold and desperate than the rest, conceded in despair that we had triumphed, that further efforts to deprive us of the school-house would be unavailing; the letter addressed upon the interior 'to the inhabitants of the district,' and upon the exterior as already stated, was decided to be private, designed only for Mr. P. and those who had attached their names to the memorial to which it was a reply. At any rate, though repeatedly asked for, it was retained; thus proving that they never intended it to be known that they had written the State Superintendent, unless he decided as they desired, and were determined that no more, who were less contemptibly intolerant and practical partialists than 'their own dear selves,' should peruse his answer. The Post Master and (then) Town Superintendent of Schools, who resided in the district, by request, addressed the S. Superintendent, informing him that his decision was suppressed, and desiring a copy for the benefit of the district. In due time a reply was received from the Deputy S. Superintendent, stating that no copy of the answer of the S. Sup't, was preserved; but that he (the Deputy S. S.) remembered the decisions which the S. S. made, which he (the deputy) gave as nearly as possible.

Time rolled on, and it was determined that the S. Superintendent should be driven from his decision or his station. Hence his letter was published, which I now send you, with the tissue of lies that caused it, which, fortunately for the complete prostration of its author, I have procured. The S. Superintendent need not fear. Narrow and contracted sentiments have not entirely obliterated a sense of justice from the human heart. He is sustained by a decided majority of the inhabitants of Preston. In district number four, few, indeed, of any sect, justify these Presbyterians in the course they have pursued. The Baptist clergyman and a large proportion of that church have refused it sanction. Still less of the public uphold it beyond that immediate neighborhood. And such will be the result almost every where. Let an attempt be made, directly or indirectly, to remove a public officer; or let them continue in their periodicals or elsewhere, to harshly denounce him, for decisions so just and legal, forced upon him by both the statute and precedent, and an intelligent community, indignant at the outrage will drive them to their dens of everlasting infamy! Even the 'Country Pastor' himself, and his 'roll of names,' we have reason to believe, by no means covet the notoriety they have obtained. In spite of 'the total corruption of their natures,' and the malignant tendency of their doctrines, they feel most heartily ashamed. After erecting a portion of their own meeting-house by money swindled out of the adherents of a respectable Christian sect; after abusing them from time to time without the slightest, justifiable provocation; a determined, persevering powerful and lying effort is made, in opposition to the known wishes of a majority of the voters, to exclude them from the school-house of a district which had always willingly extended the privilege they asked to all, and according to the concessions of those engaged in it, which are less than the truth, one third of which was built by the funds of this very sect! Bigotry, with a head that can scarcely reason and a heart that can but feebly feel, blushes at the public exposure, if not at the blackness of such meanness, and seeks some skulking place to conceal her from public gaze. In the 19th century, in this boasted land of freedom, in an intelligent town in the Empire State, such an atrocious deed is an indelible stain upon her character! J. T. GOODRICH.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.—NEW PLAN OF RAISING FUNDS.

Br. SKINNER:—It has been some time since any communication has passed between you and me. Is the fault mine?—I am not so certain of that. But still, in this communication I will not undertake to vindicate myself, except what I might claim from old age. You are well aware that I am old man (some three score years and twelve,) and will frankly acknowledge that I dread to take pen in hand, unless I am persuaded that duty requires it to be done.—Such a case seems now to be presented to my mind, although to others it might appear presumption in me, rather than duty.*

I feel a deep interest (as I think all Universalists should,) in the success and prosperity of the Clinton Liberal Institute; and am fully persuaded that the straight forward progress of liberal Christianity depend, greatly on the prosperity of that Institution. I understand that it is now in debt some two thousand dollars—to relieve it from this debt, and to afford a fund in future for incidental expenses—a sum to be placed at interest, properly secured—I respectfully take leave to propose to my brethren (or a part of them at least) the following plan to raise the necessary funds, viz., let every society of Universalists in the States of New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, that numbers twenty five members, and less than fifty, agree to raise for this Institution, twenty-five dollars. Every society that numbers fifty members, and less than seventy five, raise fifty dollars. Every society that numbers seventy five members and less than one hundred, raise seventy-five dollars, and so on in this proportion to the extent of numbers in each society in our denomination, within the States above mentioned. If such a plan can be carried into effect, it would doubtless place the Clinton Liberal Institute, properly conducted, beyond the reach of want. It would afford a sum to pay the debt now hanging over the Institution; and a fund, by placing it at interest, for all incidental expenses, and for the support, in some degree, at least, for a Theological Professor in the Institute, if such a Professor is necessary—the propriety of which I must confess I have had some doubt. I am convinced, however, that if such a Professorship could always be properly conducted (and I have no doubt of this in its present incipient state) that it would be of great advantage in preparing young men for the ministry. But if the students in Theology are to be indoctrinated, by the plumb and line of the Professor—or strictly in his religious belief in all points appertaining to theology, the professorship, in my humble opinion, would prove a curse, instead of a blessing, to genuine piety, and true religion. Because we agree, necessarily so, on the great point—THE UNIVERSAL HOLINESS and HAPPINESS OF ALL MANKIND, it does not follow of course, that we agree on all minor points. This difference of opinion on that may, perhaps, be termed non-essentials, is necessary to be understood by candidates for the ministry, in all their ramifications, and their minds left free to judge for themselves. If some such course is not pursued, the beacon lights of history lead to believe that the project would end in man-creeds.†

But to return to the more important part of the subject—and say to my brethren of the Abrahamic faith—Is there one among us all, that will not say, emphatically—THE CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE MUST BE SUSTAINED?—And—How then is it to be done? If the plan I have proposed is not the best to effect the object, I entreat some one better qualified, to propose a better. I will cheerfully subscribe to a judicious plan that will effect the object. But in marking out any course to be pursued, it should be borne in mind—that it is impossible to equalize, exactly, the pecuniary part of the offering. Therefore, the plan that will come nearest to this point, is the one that should be adopted.

* No, Br. K. it is not presumption but duty, from which I rejoice you do not shrink even in old age. Our readers will unite in calling your old age a happy and vigorous one. My only apology Br. K. for neglecting to keep up personal correspondence is the multiplicity and onerous nature of other duties and cares. You are ever welcome—never stale, though old.

† We entirely concur with Br. K. in the design and spirit of this paragraph. It should be remarked, however, that there is not, and is not to be, a Theological Professor or Professorship in the Institute. The Institute itself is literary and has nothing to do directly with Theology. The Theological School and its teacher or teachers are to be distinct from the Institute, although located at Clinton and a Professor of Theology may also be a teacher in the Institute, and vice versa. But the two institutions are to be considered as entirely distinct from each other. D. S.

If it should be asked—why I have fixed the southern bounds of the plan on the 'Mason and Dixon line,' and the western, the western bounds of the State of New York? I answer—we are fully strong enough within these bounds, to raise the funds necessary to perfect the object; and that, too, without any embarrassment that would be felt a week. Also, because in time the South, and West, must have similar institutions. What then is lacking? It would mortify me extremely, to suppose we lacked the will to perform so obvious a duty. I have long been convinced that all that was wanting to effect the object in view, was a general and proper system, to act upon. And I say again—if the one I have proposed, is not the best one that could be devised—pray, let some one propose a better. For, neglecting our duty in so plain a case, we could have no good reason to complain, if we should be styled superficial Christians, instead of true believers in the Gospel. If am right in the premises—a profession of religion, accompanied by a true belief in the Gospel—honor, and a certain degree of pride, which is proper and necessary in the concerns of this life—all combine, to set us in energetic motion, to perform this duty, and that without delay. Let our ministering brethren read this plan, or any better one that may be proposed, as soon as obtained, to their societies after the services of the sanctuary are closed for the day—let the trustees of each society go to every member proper to be called upon—collect the quota each should advance—first calling on the wealthy, who, if liberal (as they ought to be, claiming to bear the name of genuine Gospel Christians, on all proper occasions, and much more so on an occasion so important to the well-being and prosperity of the denomination to which they belong,) will not stand upon trifles, nor an exact proportion with a poor man, whose will may be equally as good, but whose means, in a just proportion, are not always at his command. When the sum required is thus raised, let the result be published in our denominational periodicals, that all may see that none are lacking in 'good works.'

Our U. S. Universalist Convention will meet at Troy, in the State of New York, on the third Wednesday and Thursday, in September, next; at which time and place the collections can be forwarded (if this plan or any other is communicated) where doubtless the Treasurer, or some of the Trustees of the Institution, will be present to receive it. If the project can be made general, I will guaranty the proportion, according to the ratio proposed, for the society in which I am a member—it shall be paid every dollar of it, if I have to pay it all myself.

J. KINGSBURY.

Sheshequin, Pa., June, 1846.

NOTE.—It will readily be perceived, that if the plan proposed becomes general, that the sum for each to advance, would not amount to one dollar (and who among us could not pay, without grudging, a dollar in so good a cause?)—more especially if the wealthy in our societies prove to be liberal, as I am strongly inclined to believe they will.

J. K.

Will other denominational papers please publish the above article? We think the plan a good one, but for general adoption it must be generally known and understood. Brethren, 'strike while the iron is hot.'

of the Proceedings of the Pennsylvania State Convention of Universalists for 1846.

Met according to adjournment in Sheshequin, Bradford county, Pa., June 23, 1846. Organized the Council by choosing Br. G. F. Mason, Moderator, and Br. J. B. Gilman, Clerk. The delegates presented their credentials.

Appointed Brs. W. Andrews, H. E. Whitney and J. Kingsbury, a committee to arrange the public services.

Voted, That visiting brethren be invited to participate in the deliberations of this council.

Voted, That a committee of three be appointed by the Moderator to nominate delegates to the United States Convention, a preacher of the Occasional Sermon, a Standing Clerk, and report a place for adjournment. Brs. B. F. Hitchcock, V. A. Bullock and J. B. Gilman were appointed said committee. Adjourned to 8 o'clock Thursday, A. M.

Thursday morning. Met pursuant to adjournment and united in prayer with Br. E. Hoag.

Adopted the following, proposed at the last session, as Art. III of the Constitution of this Convention. 'This Convention shall meet annually on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June, at such place as may have been designated at a previous meeting.'

Voted that Br. G. F. Mason be a committee to obtain from Br. Gibon the books and papers in his possession belonging to this Convention and transmit the same to the Standing Clerk, on or before the next session of this body.

Accepted and adopted the report of the nominating committee. Delegates to the United States Convention:—Brs. A. Bond, Conneautville; E. Hoag, Gibson; A. B. Grosh, Reading; C. C. Burr, Philadelphia; clerical. C. G. Gridley, Orwell; Wm. Seeley, Cussewago; E. Case, Troy; L. Bruer, Reading; James L. Gibon, C. H. Rodgers, Philadelphia, lay; with power to appoint substitutes and fill vacancies. Br. Wm. Andrews to preach the next Occasional Sermon; with power to appoint a substitute. Br. A. B. Grosh, Reading, Standing Clerk.

Voted, That the Clerk prepare the Minutes for publication in the 'Magazine and Advocate,' and request the 'Western Luminary' and 'Universalist Union' to copy.

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention be presented to the Universalist society in this place, for the kind treatment we have received during our sojourn with them.

Resolved, That this Council adjourn to meet on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1847, at such place as the Standing Clerk may designate. Adjourned.

G. F. MASON, Moderator.

J. B. GILMAN, Clerk.

Sermons were preached by Brs. N. Sawyer, O. B. Clark, B. F. Hitchcock, W. M. Delong and J. Potter. Closing address Br. J. Potter.

DELEGATES PRESENT.—Lake Erie Association—B. F. Hitchcock, clerical. North Branch—W. Andrews, H. E. Whitney, clerical; H. L. Scott, V. A. Bullock, S. Bullock, lay. Susquehanna—E. Hoag, J. B. Gilman, clerical; W. Follett, G. W. Lewis, I. N. Bullard, lay.

PREACHERS PRESENT.—W. Andrews, Athens; H. E. Whitney, Columbia Flats; N. Sawyer, Kennedyville; O. B. Clark, Hornellsville; J. Potter, Waterville; W. M. Delong, Binghamton; E. Hoag, Gibson; B. F. Hitchcock, Conneautville; J. S. Palmer, Montrose; J. B. Gilman, Brooklyn.

REMARKS.—By referring to the minutes it will be seen that but three Associations were represented in Council. This, methinks, is not as it should be. Not until our Associations are more fully represented, not until our lay brethren feel willing, and our ministering brethren able to sacrifice! a little time and money to attend our annual meetings, shall we see the good cause in which we are engaged, move forward, as it certainly would if each and every one would put 'shoulder to the wheel' and labor with becoming zeal for the prosperity of that cause which has an advocate in God, in Christ, in every holy angel, and a friend in every Christian.

The business of the council (what little we had to do) was transacted in harmony. The congregation was large, the preaching good, the singing excellent, the weather pleasant and the meeting a happy one.

The society, and friends in Sheshequin did all in their power to make our sojourn with them truly pleasant; and succeeded. For which they have our thanks.

J. B. GILMAN, Clerk.

A few hundreds of the Register and Almanac for 1846 yet left, and for sale at this office.

NEW BOOK.—We have just received another neat and new miniature volume, from the prolific pen of sister Sarah C. Edgarton, entitled the 'Floral fortune teller.'—It is in keeping with her former productions, the 'Flower Vase,' 'Tables of Flora,' &c. Price 37 1-2 cents. On Saturday the 4th of July, 1846, will commence the Fifth Semi-Annual Volume of

THE GOLDEN RULE,

AND

ODD FELLOWS FAMILY COMPANION.

Mail Subscribers Two Dollars a Year, payable in advance.

We commence a new volume of the GOLDEN RULE under the most favorable auspices. Every where, throughout the Union, it has been received by the Brotherhood with a cordial welcome, as is evinced by an accession of over Seven Thousand additional subscribers during the past twelve months. Encouraged in our labors by this unmistakable testimony of the approval of the Order, we shall continue our exertions to render the GOLDEN RULE equal to any other periodical in the country. It is the oldest weekly in the United States devoted to the interests of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and will continue, as heretofore, to give the earliest and most complete intelligence of the progress of the Order; to illustrate and defend its principles against the assaults of the ignorant and prejudiced; and occasionally to give, in an Extra, a full Directory of Lodges and Encampments throughout the jurisdiction of the G. L. U. S. and in all other respects present to the brotherhood whatever is of interest in the wide field of Odd Fellowship—thus rendering the GOLDEN RULE indispensable to every member of our wide-spread and rapidly increasing fraternity. As an entertaining Literary Family Journal, the GOLDEN RULE shall not be exceeded by any other. In its Literary Department no labor will be spared which can add to its attraction or value. Original and selected tales and poetry by some of the ablest and most popular writers, will form a distinctive feature—which, while adding to the entertainment of the reader, shall, as far as possible, have for their object the inculcation of an elevated morality and virtuous and correct principles. Nor shall we neglect the Useful and Intellectual, but give articles illustrating the Progress of the Age in Arts, Science, and Philosophy—Incidents of Travel—Extracts from New Works of Merit; Popular Reading for the Family Circle; a Department for the Ladies; Amusement, etc., etc.

The GOLDEN RULE is published every Saturday, at 30 Ann street, on a double medium sheet of sixteen large octavo pages, making two handsome library volumes a year, of 416 pages each, with title page and index.

It is important that every brother who wishes to obtain the GOLDEN RULE from the beginning of the new volume, should subscribe without delay, so as to obtain the back numbers.

TERMS.—Mail subscribers $2 a year in advance. Any brother obtaining five subscribers and remitting $10, shall receive a copy for his services.

E. WINCHESTER, of Stirling Lodge, No. 190. Publication office 30 Ann street, N. Y.

Rev. A. C. L. ARNOLD, Editor.

To each new subscriber will be sent a beautiful engraved Title-page. Address, E. WINCHESTER, 30 Ann street.

THE LOUD CALL,
OR, THE DISINTERESTED PARSON.

There lived a Parson, as we're told,
But when or where we know not,
Who oft his snoring flock would scold,
Threat'ning that to Heaven they should go not—
But rather down to hell be hur'l'd,
If they would not abjure the world,
And count as dross, its filthy mammon—Gold.
It chanced at length, this goodly wight,
Who stoutly fought the Christian fight,
Elsewhere received a louder call;
What, though the stipend was a trifle more,
To one who plac'd in wealth so little store;
This had no weight, you know, at all!!!
'Twas not the cash,—oh! no!
But 'twas 'the Lord commanded'—
And though 'twas hard to go away,
Should he refuse 'the Lord' 't' obey,
And be a careless servant branded!
No, sure—so he must go.

The parting Sabbath now arriv'd,
And all his simple folks contriv'd
To hear their Priest's farewell;
He ply'd them long, in righteous strain,
Bade them from their darling sins refrain,
And in sweet concord dwell;
To hate the world, in holy ways be bold,
And shun the soul's seducer, glit'ring gold.

The service o'er
Before the door
The parish gentry gathered round—
Smiling, the good man went among them,
Seiz'd on their offered hands, and wrung them,
'A saint on earth,' the grannies cried,
And rolled their eyeballs up, and sighed,
And dropped their farewell courtesies to ground.

Behind the rest, to bid the priest good bye,
In Nature's sooty jacket dress'd
Old Cæsar came a wag, and mighty sly,
Bowling, the stick of ebony began
A confab with the gold despising man:
'Ah! how good massa parson do:
I hope me fine him berry well,'
'Well, Cæsar, well, how do you.'
'Ah! massa, Cæsar hardly tell;
Dis good long twenty year,
Wid you he worship here,
And now he sorry from you frock you go,'
'Ah! honest Cæsar, yes, it must be so—
I'm sorry, too,
That I am forced away—
But then, you know, 'twould never do,
The 'Lord's loud call' for me to disobey.'
'Who! massa, who you say?
De Lord call you away!
Massa, how many poun a year,
De people pays for preaching here?'
'Two hundred.'
'Toder place gib any more?'
'Why, Cæsar—yes—I think—they offer FOUR.'
'Ah! massa, may be 'tis de Lord who call,
But don't you tink more loud you let him bawl,
Aye, call and call, till all be blue,
Fore you come back from four to two?
De Lord, he hollow till he dum,
Fore massa parson ebbur cum.'

The following is copied from the Religious Recorder, Syracuse. Preachers we doubt not frequently get 'squeezed' in like manner in all denominations, and it seems to be a poor rule inasmuch as it does not work both ways.

SQUEEZING A PREACHER.

Dear Sir:—The substance of the following letter appeared in the Welsh Baptist Magazine, for February, 1845, and as the sin against which it is directed is by no means confined to the Welsh churches, but is sometimes found in English ones, perhaps its publication in our language may be of service. If you deem it likely to prove so, perhaps you will give it a corner in your journal. It was translated and put into my hands by a friend who understands the Welsh language; the word 'squeeze,' so frequently used, is a literal translation of the Welsh word, and I think is highly expressive. Praying that you may be strengthened and supported amidst your labors by the God of all grace. I am, my dear sir, yours in the Gospel of Christ,

HENRY B. POOLS.

'MR. EDITOR:—Lately, a church—or rather the lords thereof, made a resolution that their minister must be satisfied to live upon what they should collect at the month's end, let the amount be little or much, and that they would not from that time forward, bind themselves to make up any particular sum. This resolution they communicated to their pastor, with the solemn advice, 'Brother, you must squeeze, the times are bad.' He replied that he would think of the matter, and see how the plan was likely to answer. In a few days, he called upon the owner of his house, who was a member of his church, to pay his rent, and told him that he could not promise him any specific sum for the house from that time forth; 'that the times were bad, and he must squeeze, but he would pay for it as circumstances would permit. The landlord stared at him with astonishment, and replied, 'Man! who lets houses in that manner—to give as much as you please for it—did any one ever hear of such a thing? I thought to advance the rent a pound next year; you shall not have my house, I am sure, for one half-penny less.' He next went to the miller, and asked for a sack of flour. 'Certainly,' said the miller, 'but do you know that the price of flour has advanced since you purchased the last.' 'I was not aware of it,' replied the minister, 'and indeed it is of no great consequence as the order of things is changed, I am to give what I can for it—brother, you must squeeze, the times are bad.' 'Good or bad,' answered the miller, 'I must have according to 50s per sack for it; hearken man, who sells flour upon those terms?'

'He next proceeded to the farmer, (passing by the malster, who was a deacon, without calling,) and asked for a bushel of wheat. The farmer said he should have it, but it would cost him 8s and 6d. 'No, no, brother,' replied the minister, 'you must squeeze, for the times are bad; I will give you as much as I can, at the end of the month, after seeing how much the collection will be.' 'What has that to do with the price of wheat,' exclaimed the farmer, 'I have a great rent to pay next month, and I do not know how to bring things to bear between the wages, the tithes, and the payments.' This brother kept a large farm, and paid specific wages to all his laborers, except Jacko, the half-witted boy, who was at hand to fetch the cows for the women, to clean the out-houses, &c.

'He next called upon John, the shoemaker, who after hearing his terms for a pair of shoes, began to put the snuff into his wide extended nostrils, which were as black as two flues, and talk very sarcastically respecting such terms. 'He would not put a patch upon his shoe under three pence.' The butcher treated him in like manner, 'his meat was so much a pound,' and the tailor also insisted upon having a regular price for his commodities.

'On his way home, the minister went into the shop of his principal deacon, and asked him for some articles necessary for the use of his family, such as a pound of soap, a pound of sugar, a pound of candles, two ounces of tea, and a half penny worth of soda, (but no tobacco.) After packing the things neatly, the grocer began to count their cost. 'You need not waste your time in reckoning,' interrupted the minister, 'I am to pay you for them as my circumstances will permit. Brother, you must squeeze, as the times are very bad with me at present, but I will give conscientiously for them what lies in my power.' 'Squeeze,' said the shopkeeper, 'what do you mean? give what you please? how much will that be?' 'I can not say at present,' replied his pastor, 'but you shall know at the end of the next month, when I see how much the collection will be.' 'That will not do for me,' said the shopkeeper, 'I am obliged to pay a certain price for every article, and I have a large amount to make up next week.' 'So, indeed!' exclaimed the minister. 'Well, I see there is no one but myself to squeeze, and that I am out of the reach of bad times; if I was able to perform miracles like our Saviour with the loaves and fishes, your plan would answer. I have called upon all the members who sell anything for the use of man, to see how your plan was likely to prosper, but you must all have a particular price for your goods; the owner of my house, the miller, the farmer, the shoemaker, the butcher, the tailor, and yourself likewise. You will not let me have a pound of sugar, or an ounce of tea out of your shop, without I pay a stated price for it; how then can you expect me to pay my way without a stated salary, and that too proportionable to my family? Before I can agree to receive what you collect monthly for me, you and the others must be willing to receive that between you in proportion to what I may have had from each, and I will promise you to live quite moderately; or if you prefer it, I am willing to live on the money which is wasted weekly by the members in snuff and tobacco.' I do not know how the matter was settled.

'ELFFAANT.'

TRUSTING AN INDIAN CHIEF;
OR CONFIDENCE RETURNED.

One of the first settlers in Western New York, was Judge W——, who established himself at Whitestown—about four miles from Utica. He brought his family with him, among whom was a widowed daughter with an only child—a fine boy about four years old. You will recollect that the country round was an unbroken forest, and this was the domain of the savage tribes.

Judge W. saw the necessity of keeping on good terms with the Indians, for as he was nearly alone, he was completely at their mercy. Accordingly he took every opportunity to assure them of his kindly feeling and to secure their good will in return. Several of the Chiefs came to see him, and all appeared pacific. But there was one thing that troubled him; an aged chief of the Seneca tribe, and one of great influence, who resided at the distance of a dozen miles, had not yet been to see him, nor could he ascertain the views and feelings of the sachem in respect to his settlement in that region. At last he sent him a message, and the answer was the chief would visit him on the morrow.

True to his appointment, the sachem came; Judge W. received him with marks of respect, and introduced his wife, his daughter and little boy. The interview that followed was interesting. Upon its results, the Judge was convinced his security might depend, and he was therefore exceedingly anxious to make a favorable impression upon the distinguished chief. He expressed his desire to settle in the country, to live on terms of amity and good fellowship with the Indians, and to be useful to them by introducing among them the arts of civilization.

The chief heard him out, and then said, 'Brother, you ask much and you promise much. What pledge can you give of your faith?'

'The white man's word may be good to the white man, yet it is but wind when spoken to the Indian,' said the sachem.

'I have put my life in your hands,' said the Judge, 'is not that an evidence of my good intention? I have placed confidence in the Indian, and will not believe that he will abuse or betray the trust that is thus reposed.'

'So much is well,' replied the chief, 'the Indian will repay confidence with confidence, if you will trust, he will trust you.'

'Let this boy go with me to my wigwam, I will bring him back in three days with my answer!'

If an arrow had pierced the bosom of the mother, she could not have felt a deeper pang than went to her heart, as the Indian made this proposal. She sprang forward, and running to the boy, who stood at the side of the sachem looking into his face with pleased wonder and admiration, she encircled him in her arms and pressing him to her bosom, was about to fly from the room. A gloomy and ominous frown came over the sachem's brow but he did not speak.

But not so with Judge W. He knew that the success of their enterprise, the lives of his family, depended upon the decision of a moment.

'Stay, stay my daughter,' said he. 'Bring back the boy, I beseech you. He is not more to you than to me. I would not risk a hair of his head. But my child he must go with the chief. God will watch over him! He will be as safe in the sachem's wigwam, as beneath our own roof, and in your arms.'

The agonized mother hesitated for a moment; she then slowly returned, placing the boy upon the knee of the chief, and kneeling at his feet, burst into a flood of tears. The gloom passed from the sachem's brow but he said not a word. He arose, and departed.

I shall not attempt to describe the agony of the mother for the three ensuing days. She was agitated by contending hopes and fears. In the night she awoke from sleep; seeming to hear the screams of her child calling on its mother for help! But the time wore slowly away—and the third day came. How slowly did the hours pass! The morning waned away; noon arrived; yet the sachem came not. There was gloom over the whole household. The mother was pale and silent. Judge W. walked the floor to and fro, going every few minutes to the door and looking through the opening in the forest towards the sachem's abode.

At last as the rays of the setting sun were thrown upon the tops of the trees around, the eagle feathers of the chief were seen dancing above the bushes in the distance. He advanced rapidly, and the little boy was at his side. He was gaily attired as a young chief—his feet being dressed in moccasins; a fine beaver skin was on his shoulders, and eagle feathers were stuck in his hair. He was in excellent spirits, and so proud was he of his honors that he seemed two inches taller than he was before. He was soon in his mother's arms, and in that brief minute she seemed to pass from death to life. It was a happy meeting—too happy for me to describe. 'The white man has conquered!' said the sachem; 'hereafter let us be friends. You have trusted an Indian, he will repay you with confidence and friendship.'

He was as good as his word; and Judge W. lived for many years in peace with the Indian tribes, and succeeded in laying the foundation of a flourishing and prosperous community.—Merry's Museum.

A QUEER BUT SOLEMN OLD HUMORIST.

A queer old humorist lived in a little cottage in the outskirts of our village. He had travelled much in the East, and made money as a merchant in Smyrna. Being a native of our parish, and a bachelor, he came to close his mortal chapter where it began. I need scarcely say that like so many of his class, he was fidgety, testy, and troublesome; but a lover of fair play, withal, warm-hearted and benevolent. At bottom, too, he was a thoroughly religious man. He and I were getting on uncommonly well together, when, greatly to my sorrow, he took ill and died, only a few months after we had become acquainted. An odd incident befel him on his death-bed; and I must relate it as illustrative of his character:

A thief made his way into the cottage one midnight, and entered his dying chamber to steal—for he was accounted as rich as a nabob. There was a burning light in the room.

'What do you want, my friend?' was the testy demand of our disturbed old gentleman.

'Your money and your jewels,' replied the thief.

'Oh! you are there, are you?—very well. Just look at these old legs of mine. (Thrusting out his emaciated members from beneath the bed clothes.) Nay, lay hold of them—feel of them—so you may be perfectly convinced in your own mind, how that I can not go into the next apartment, where my money is. Come, then, take me on your back, and carry me there.' Saying this, the old chap, dying though he was, actually rose and got out of bed.

The thief drew back with a look of ghastly surprise.

'Hark ye! son of woman born,' continued the old gentleman emphatically, as he sat him down on the side of the bed, and raised his finger with warning solemnity, 'I am far on my way to eternity, and you are coming on behind me. You are here to steal certain trash of mine. Come, now, you must do better than that. Draw near. Here is this old bald head of mine. Stand forward.—Reach me now your thievish hand into this inveterate bosom of mine. Oh! do but steal, rob—plunder from it covetousness, lust, and every other lingering evil, and send me lighter on my way. Oh! do this, and you shake your head? You can not! Here, then, my friend—I am any thing but heavy—you must take me on your back.'

The thief could not stand this. He fell upon his knees, and begged the old man's forgiveness.

'Are you really in want?' asked the eccentric invalid.

'I am,' was the reply, 'but I deserve to be so, for I have been dissipate and idle; but God help me, I think I am a changed man.'

'Take this key, then,' said our dying friend; 'open my desk in the next room there (pointing to the door) you will find a purse of gold in it; bring it to me.'

The thief did so.

'Take that,' said the humorist, and he served out his gold very liberally. With tears in his eyes, the poor penitent again fell upon his knees, and craved a blessing on the dying man. He was about to retire. 'Nay, friend, you must help me into my bed for it,' said the old gentleman,—'it is any thing but reasonable that I be raised up at midnight in this sort of manner.' Accordingly the thief lifted the old man up in his arms, and put him into bed. 'Now, brother worm,' said the queer but wise old patient, 'I asked this last piece of service for your own good, as well as mine. You will be nothing worse for having felt the weight and worth of an armful of poor, sinful, dying clay. It will help to keep in mind your good resolutions. Christ be with you! In his own gracious words—'go and sin no more.'—[Old Bachelor in the Scottish Village.]

STRICTURES UPON MR. LANE'S 'STRICTURES.'

By Hon. JOHN GALBRAITH. Erie, Pa., 12mo., 48 pages, 1846.

This is the reply of Hon. J. Galbraith to Rev. B. I. Lane's pamphlet of 'Strictures' on his former letter to Rev. H. Tullidge, which we noticed at some length in the last volume. It is characterized by the strong and clear common sense of its author, and the dignity of the gentleman and the Christian. We should think, if Mr. Lane had any feelings or any conscience, he must writhe under the merited rebukes and just exposure of his own littleness, bigotry and dishonesty which the pamphlet before us gives. We have not room this week for very extended extracts from the pamphlet, but we present the following exposition of the falsity of Mr. Lane's charge that Mr. Galbraith's Letter was singularly 'irrelevant' to the subject he professed to discuss.

'Now, let us test the truth of what Mr. Lane frequently repeats as to the 'irrelevancy' of the letter to his book—its failure to 'invalidate it,' &c. What was 'the whole subject of the book,' (The Refuge of Lies, etc.)? Was it not the doctrine of endless misery, to be inflicted, as asserted by Mr. Lane upon a portion—a large portion of mankind, and insisted upon as a doctrine of the Bible? He will certainly not deny this. When I inquired then, 'when the inspired lawgiver was about to leave this transitory world forever, and was communicating to the chosen people of God, for the last time, all the commandments of the Most High, for their guidance and prosperity, and announcing to them in the most solemn and impressive manner, all the consequences of their disobedience, and the inflictions which should certainly follow, why he maintained throughout so total and profound a silence on the subject of endless misery after this life, or the place where it would be inflicted, if it be a 'damnable' heresy—'damning unbelief' to doubt it, etc.'? was so 'irrelevant' as to be entitled to no answer on that ground? When I inquired of Mr. Lane if he 'would enlighten us from the Bible whether this 'place of everlasting torments were from eternity, or whether it had been created in time? If the former, how it had been occupied; and if the latter, when it was created and who made it,' etc.; was this so 'irrelevant' as to be 'anything or everything but just the point in debate?' and was it entitled to no answer on the ground of its 'irrelevancy to the whole subject of the book in general?' If these, and such like enquiries were 'irrelevant,' I should like Mr. Lane would be good enough to indicate what would be relevant. Let us then test some of 'its positions in particular.' Was it not one of these introduced by Mr. Lane, that the Hebrew word sheol meant hell, or a place of unending torments for mankind? When I enquired in relation to this word, 'if there was any certainty, that the word sheol conveyed, or was ever employed to convey the idea of a place of endless torment'; was this 'irrelevant'? Had it 'nothing to do with the point in debate,' if he chooses so to consider it? And I might have further enquired whether the patriarch Jacob was to be understood in the 35th verse of the 37th chapter of Genesis, and one or two other places, where he uses the word sheol, as conveying the idea that his 'gray hairs' would be brought down with sorrow to hell—or that his 'gray hairs' would suffer everlasting punishment? Enquired further, 'if there was any word, or combination of words in the Hebrew language handed down to us which necessarily imports unending misery and torture to be inflicted in a future world for sins committed by finite beings in this?' were these 'irrelevant to any of its positions in particular?' Again, when Mr. Lane had asserted in his book, that 'those who die in their sins will continue to sin forever,' and quotes from another with his endorsement of positive knowledge of its truth, in speaking of the wicked, that 'their hatred will increase their torments, and their torments increase their hatred'; and I inquire, if this be true, 'what Paul meant when he says 'he that is dead is freed from sin,' and what is meant by the Revelation, 'death and hell were cast into the lake of fire'? Were these enquiries 'irrelevant'; and how is Mr. Lane excused from furnishing any answer whatever, save to give the name of the author?—And when I enquire 'by what system he and his author come to the conclusion that our heavenly Father has determined that the punishment inflicted upon his own creatures should have the effect of increasing their hatred towards Himself, and not their reformation or amendment'—if this were the true system of punishment, was it designed by the Holy One from all eternity, or to go into operation by his permission or knowledge afterwards; and in either case, how it was to be reconciled to his own word, 'God is love,'—'if it was to take place without his knowledge or permission, how it was to be reconciled with his omniscience and almighty power'? Were not these relevant 'to any of its positions in particular,' or were they 'anything and everything but just the point in debate?' What could have been more pertinent and relevant to some 'of its positions in particular,' than these and numerous other enquiries and collateral positions to which I might refer? And with what face Mr. Lane say to an intelligent community that they are 'irrelevant' or 'anything and everything but just the point in debate,' and justify himself by barely giving the name of the author and referring to one or two texts of Scripture which have no more to do with those enquiries than the repetition of the names of the four Gospels, Matthew, Mark, Luke and John? With what force and propriety then may I not retort upon Mr. Lane his own very true remark, 'nothing is more common than for an antagonist to decry a home thrust.' We always think that the 'force of a remark is felt when an opponent declares it foolish' (or irrelevant). 'If it is weak, its weakness can be demonstrated.' And why did not Mr. Lane exemplify his own precept and instruction, by at least making some attempt at 'showing' the 'weakness' of the unpretending letter, instead of barely asserting it to be 'irrelevant,' etc.? The mind of every candid and intelligent reader will frame the only answer for him, because he could not, or at least found it much easier to say it was 'irrelevant,' than to furnish anything like a satisfactory answer. This evasion then, will not avail the author of the 'Strictures.'

The following, from page 12 to 15, is a happy hit at the whining pretension of Mr. Lane that he 'felt very kindly towards all men when writing his Lectures,' while at the same time he used the most offensive and opprobrious terms towards Universalists.

'Mr. L. professes to be 'sorry, very sorry,' if he has used harsh, 'opprobrious or offensive epithets'; and says he 'did not mean to employ such'—that he 'certainly felt very kindly towards all men, when writing our Lectures, (he uses the plural, after the manner of Kings and courts) and meant to be courteous in all our remarks.'—Asks 'where in our book have we uttered an unkind word against those who differ from us in opinion?' 'We lament that we have not been fortunate enough to express ourselves in such a way as to shame every man out of an attempt to bring against us such a charge.' And frequently throughout his pamphlet does he deny the use of any unkind words towards Universalists. It is possible that he has been so long accustomed to the use of harsh and opprobrious language towards this body of Christians, that he is not aware himself of the use of it. Like some men I have known long accustomed to swearing and the use of profane language, who would often employ such without being aware of it, and immediately forget, and even deny that they had done so. To remove the charge, Mr. L. quotes the whole paragraph referred to on page 196 of his book, where he speaks of persons 'filled with all unrighteousness, covetous, malicious, etc.'—'full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity, etc.' Now, in using the language above he meant something; and it is fair to presume he intended to make some impression, and was then drawing the contrast between the Universalist system and its opposite; and I would like to know why it was he used it, if not to apply to the former, and where was its application at all if not by way of contrast? I am aware it is introduced rather by way of insinuation than by direct charge, and such is the character of many passages of imputation in his book. But they are not all such as may be thus evaded. By way of refreshing his recollection, I will refer him to page 211 of his 'Refuge of Lies,' etc., in which he uses the following entire sentence in direct language. 'The doctrine of universal salvation is most generally embraced by infidels, profane swearers, Sabbath-breakers, the intemperate, and those who are unfaithful in the conjugal relation.' Does he consider this a kind and courteous expression? If this be the language of kindness and courtesy learned in 'the different schools of theology'—the 'first principles' of the 'science' as taught there, it strikes me, Mr. Lane had better have done as his more unpretending neighbors, and drawn his 'first principles' 'from the Scriptures' which teach their students a charity which is 'kind—envieth not—vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up; doth not behave itself unseemly; is not easily provoked, and thinketh no evil.' Mr. Lane's assertion, that he 'meant to be courteous in all his remarks,' reminds me of a Frenchman I once heard of, who accosted one very politely, and at the same time charged him with a base crime; and addressed him somewhat thus: 'You be von grand scoundrel, Sare—I mean no offence, Sare—You stole my sugar, Sare—I ver much beg your pardon, Sare; but you be von grand liar, rogue, and vat you call villain—mean you no offence, Sare,' &c. We read in the Scriptures, of those, whose tender 'mercies are cruel?' How far Mr. Lane's professed 'kindness and courtesy,' resemble those 'tender mercies,' I leave the intelligent reader to judge for himself. A piece of ancient and sacred history is brought to my recollection here, to which I will call Mr. Lane's attention; and when I mention the names of Joab and Amasa, he will probably remember, that the former approached the latter with the hypocritical smile of friendship on his countenance—caught him by the beard by way of friendly salutation and said, 'art thou in health, my brother,' and at the same moment smote him under the fifth rib with his sword, which he had kept concealed, so that he instantly died. There may be still Joabs in the present day. Now, what is meant by the sentence quoted from page 211 as above, if it be not opprobrious and offensive? The term 'infidel' may be said not to be so. This, perhaps, depends upon circumstances. When spoken of a nation or people, who do not profess our religion, it might not be considered disrespectful; but when applied to professing Christians, it can not be understood in any other sense than as a reproach, and would always be taken as so intended,—and so of the other terms in the sentence except the last; and how does Mr. Lane understand the term 'unfaithful in the conjugal relation?' Although it might not impute a crime in this State, (New York, as I believe it does not,) cognizable in the criminal courts, yet it conveys the idea every where of an infamous immorality, and here, in Pennsylvania of a high crime. If I were to say of the class to which Mr. Lane belongs, which I certainly would not degrade myself by doing, but by way of exhibiting its coarseness more forcibly upon him, although I might perhaps do so with many more examples to justify it, than he could find for it among those to whom he applies it, that they are generally 'unfaithful in the conjugal relation,' I am quite inclined to think he would regard it as anything else than kind or courteous. He ought therefore to learn and practice the beautiful Gospel precept, 'whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.'

We shall probably make some further extracts from Mr. Galbraith's strictures hereafter as we find room. It is a valuable pamphlet; and we wish it a wide circulation.

EDUCATION.

'An Address delivered at the opening of the County Normal School in the Village of Fort Plain, April 13th, 1846. By ALFRED C. BARRAY.'

We received, some time since, the Montgomery Phoenix containing the above named Address. We have not found time to peruse it till now; and it is with no small pleasure and gratification we have read it. It is an able and happy argument for Education, for thorough education, not of the intellect merely, but of the whole nature of man, physical, intellectual, moral and religious, and sets forth in glowing colors the great responsibility of teachers. Our readers will recollect that we recently noticed the prospectus of a new work soon to be published, entitled the Common School Manual, to be prepared by the author of this Address. The sentiment and spirit of this address admirably harmonize with the design of the Manual. The just and sound views of the author on the subject will be gathered from the following extract, with which we think our readers can not but be highly gratified. We should be glad to make more liberal extracts did room permit. We may hereafter make some further extracts.

Ed. Mag. and Adv.

'We have said that the business of the Teacher is to educate, and we have explained what we mean by this. He is to look to, and to aid in, the training and development of the whole man. Not only are the Physical and Intellectual natures to be educated, but the moral nature is to be developed, and the whole being brought under sway of great religious truths. I reject the doctrine in toto that Religion ought not to be taught in our schools, and that our children there should not be brought under Bible and Christian influences. When I speak of Religion, I do not mean sectarianism—I do not mean the tenets or doctrines of any denomination or sect—but I mean Christianity as it came from the lips of its great Teacher, and spake from his labors of love in this sinful world. Would it harm the child to teach it this?—to tell it of God, the Father?—of Jesus Christ who once took little children in his arms and blessed them?—of a great moral government encircling all worlds and all beings?—of a punishment, for sin, and a blessed reward for obedience?—of a future immortal life and endless progress? These sublime truths, speaking to a deep consciousness of their verity in the soul even of a little child, are the main support of every virtue. No man perhaps is aware, says Collet, how much our moral and social sentiments are fed from this fountain—how powerful conscience would become without the belief of a God—how palsied would be human benevolence, were there not the sense of a higher benevolence to quicken and sustain it—how suddenly the whole social fabric would quake, and with a fearful crash, sink into hopeless ruin, were the idea of a Supreme Being, Accountability, and of a Future Life, to be utterly erased from every mind. Once let men thoroughly believe that they are the work and sport of chance—that all their improvements perish forever at death—that the weak have no guardian, and the poor no avenger—that an oath is unheard in Heaven—that secret crimes have no witness but the perpetrator—that human existence has no purpose, and human virtue no unfailing Friend—that this brief life is every thing to us, and death is total, everlasting extinction—once let men thoroughly abandon religion, and who can conceive or describe the extent of the desolation which would follow?

We hold it to be of the greatest importance that the moral sentiments should be developed along with the intellectual powers. Unless this be done, I question very much whether the whole duty of the Teacher has been discharged. Intellectual and religious instruction should be combined, that there be a harmonious development of the whole mind. It ought not to be overlooked, that, in general, the character received in childhood and youth, is retained in every succeeding period of life. How necessary, therefore, that the moral being be trained, and that religious instruction be imparted by the teacher to those consigned to his care.

There have been sad mistakes made with reference to this matter. The whole process of Education seems to have been carried forward on the ground that the child had no religious nature—that he had only an intellect to be cared for and developed. We have said that man has an intellectual nature—and we have meant something by it. And so we have marshaled instructors, and plied every means in our power, 'to lead up the youthful mind to the manhood of its understandings.' All this is very well—this we should have done, and not left the other undone. But we have neglected that which is more than the intellectual, and left the religious nature, untrained, uneducated. And hence it is, that we 'See lads and young men thickly springing up in the midst of us, who startle at the mispronunciation of a word, as though they were personally injured, but can hear volleys of profanity unmoved; who put on arrogant airs of superior breeding, and sneer with contempt, at a case of false spelling or grammar, but can witness spectacles of drunkenness in the streets with entire composure. Such elevation of the subordinate, such casting down of the supreme, is incompatible with all that is worthy to be called the prosperity of their manhood. The moral universe is constructed upon principles not admittance of welfare under such an administration of its laws. In such early habits there is a gravitation and proclivity to ultimate downfall and ruin. If persevered in, the consummation of a people's destiny may still be a question of time, but it ceases to be one of certainty.' (Horace Mann.)

In view of this state of things what should be done? Why educate—educate the long neglected moral or religious nature. Bring out the whole being, and instead of sending forth from the school room mere intelligent worldlings, let them be those who are prepared, by the training and instruction they have received, to walk, whole-souled, into the midst of the busy scenes of this world, and win crowns and true honors in Life's great conflict.

UNWORTHY MEANS.

It is a maxim with some, that the end justifies the means; and there are by far too many who are ready at all times to act upon such a principle, however much it may in many instances, fall short of the principles of justice and integrity. We were forcibly reminded of this truth a short time since, in taking up a paper advocating the doctrines of a limited salvation, in which was found a low thrust at Universalists and Universalism. The paper is not at hand and in quoting from memory the precise language may not be given, but the sentiment was as follows:—One of the ministerial brethren was upon one of his parochial visits, and in a family upon which he called, found an aged lady, and in paying proper respect to age he inquired of her, if she enjoyed religion. She answered, 'no sir, I am a Universalist.' From this, of course the reader was left to draw his own conclusions, respecting our principles of religious faith.

Whether this anecdote is founded upon truth, or merely the fancy of some visionary, newspaper paragraph writer, it matters not. But of one thing all may rest assured; that if the lady did not enjoy religion, it was not because she was a Universalist, but because she did not live up to the requirements of that faith; and hence her answer is no argument against the truth of Universalism. This faith requires of its believers, strict obedience to all the precepts and injunctions of the Gospel and if its professors do not obey these, Universalism is not responsible for it but the responsibility must rest upon the actors for not walking worthy of the faith for which they have declared.

Open and manly opposition we admire, and argument put forth in candor we are pleased to meet; but this low-lived witticism is contemptible. All are entitled to the free enjoyment of their own opinion, and if another's faith is unlike our own, it is no reason why we should treat him with disrespect or ridicule his opinions. But it is a source of regret that so many are found who lose sight of that manly spirit which should always characterize the course of man toward man, and abuse every one whose thoughts are different from their own. But they have their reward. Their course will eventually bring them to a knowledge of the fact, that their own bitterness serves only to retard, if not actually to destroy the credit of the doctrines of their own religious faith.

CAUSE FOR REJOICING.

We extract the following from the 'Universalist Watchman,' and heartily congratulate Br. Ballou on his success. We are glad that one Universalist publisher has got out of debt. How we wish we could add one unit to that and make it two. Br. Ballou is out of debt and has $2000 in old accounts due him. But Br. B. we can beat you all hollow on the last count. We have from five to seven thousand dollars due us, and as you have said, 'the Lord only knows how much of it we shall get!' But alack and alas! You have the advantage of us in being free from that vile pestilence, debt. We owe only about four thousand dollars for the Magazine and Advocate establishment besides sacrificing what little we had saved by toil and economy before entering the publishing business, and some four years of time and labor since.—Wouldn't mind being set back those four years—guess some other name than ours would shine as publisher of the Mag. and Adv. How very convenient the amount that is due us would be. Wish somebody would contrive to give those who owe us a galvanic, or (better perhaps,) a philanthropic shock of honesty—any thing reasonable to induce them to fork over. We used to dun and appeal until we got heartily sick of it and gave it up as a bad job, and since adopting the advance pay system, we have had no occasion to beg of or threaten our patrons. That system completely does away with such nuisances. Those old accounts accrued from 1840 to 1844 under the old credit system. But here is the extract.

'It is now over six years since we commenced editing and publishing the Watchman, and if we had all that is honestly our due, we should have some $2000, that we now have not. Having just made an inventory of our account books, we find, we have about that sum due us. But the Lord only knows how much of it we shall get! We have by continual labor, by preaching and writing, and by such economy as we have, made out to pay our debts—to pay the original purchase money for the paper, beside $750 we paid down; and support our family—and that's all. We have not anything beforehand, except these $2000, in accounts! Now, will those who owe us pay us what they owe? Or will they leave us unpaid and destitute? We have labored hard for these $2000. Justice demands that we should have it. If we had it, we should be comparatively well off—but here we are; worth $2000 in small accounts and notes of from $1 to $10, and over—and the persons owing us are scattered far and wide. These are small sums, and it does seem to us, that it would not hurt those who owe us to pay these small sums, so much as it will injure us to do without them.—The great many 'littles' would make us a 'mickle.' Shall we have it? or shall we struggle along without it? We must have a settlement with every one who is in arrears and know what to depend on. We tender our thanks to those who have paid us promptly, and ask those who have not to remember us in mercy.'

Br. W. Bell of the 'Gospel Bountain', in noticing the Western Evangelist, alludes to this paper as follows: 'The Magazine and Advocate is, and always has been a good paper; but it should years ago, have increased in size in proportion to the increase of its patronage.' Now for Br. Bell's information we would say, that since 1836, when the list of patrons or subscribers was between 7000 and 8000, its patronage has been on the decrease, until the present year. The list in 1845 numbered only about seventeen hundred. 'It is a poor rule that wont work both ways,' it is said, so that according to Br. Bell's theory the Magazine should be decreased in size in proportion to the decrease of its patronage. The paper had been enlarged previous to 1836 and has been continued at the same size since, notwithstanding the falling off of patronage. We are happy to say that our present list is more than double what it was last year, and when it shall have increased so as to enable us to wipe out some old scores, and place us in a situation to enlarge it, we shall be glad to do so, if in accordance with the wishes of our friends. We must be allowed to say however in conclusion, that as the paper is almost if not wholly devoted to matters of a moral and religious nature, and denominational affairs, and entirely free from advertisements and secular matters—is almost the only one exclusively devoted to the interests of the denomination,—while it contains nearly or quite as much matter of that character as any other paper, at about one-half the price. W.

NEW MEETING HOUSES.—The Universalist society in Burlington, Vt., are about erecting a new meeting house the present season. Another is going up in Williston, another season, and one has been commenced in Jerico, Vt. The society in Camden, Me., are making arrangements to build the present season.

Br. Otis A. Skinner was installed as pastor of the Orchard street Universalist Society in New York, on Sunday, 14th ult. Sermon by Br. T. J. Sawyer of Clinton.

Harpers Publications.

Mr. Beesley has just received the following works from the press of Harper & Brothers.

SHORES OF THE MEDITERRANEAN, with sketches of travels, by Francis Schroeder, secretary to the Commodore commanding the United States Squadron in that Sea.—1843-45. Two volumes. These volumes are handsomely put up in cloth numbering together some 570 pages 12mo., printed on large clear type and fine paper. A hasty glance at their pages convinces us that they possess much useful information and an exciting degree of interest. Descriptions of, and personal adventures in many of the most remarkable places along the shores of the Mediterranean sea, both in Italy and Northern Africa are given, and some of these places are represented with beautiful engravings. Gibraltar, Malta, Naples, Athens, Smyrna, Constantinople, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Egypt, Cairo, Alexandria, Palermo, Venice, Tripoli, Tunis and Carthage, are among the many places visited by the author, and of which he has given vivid descriptions. An interesting and valuable work.

Miss Beechers DOMESTIC RECEIPT BOOK designed as a supplement to her treatise on Domestic Economy. This is a neat volume of near 300 pages containing recipes for cooking up as many varieties of good things as would satisfy the most inveterate gourmand on earth. All sorts of pies, cakes, stews, fries, jellies, custards, puddings, pickles, etc., etc., etc.

No. 3 of the PICTORIAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND, contains the history of the civil and military transactions, religion, etc., during the reigns of King Harold, Edward the Confessor and others. Finely illustrated. 25 cents.

Part XVI of a Dictionary of PRACTICAL MEDICINE, treats upon 21 different subjects and diseases. 50 cents.

No. 85-86 ILLUSTRATED SHAKESPEARE contains the remainder of Troilus and Cressida. 25 cents.

No. 15 of the illustrated edition of the WANDERING JEW is published in the usual beautiful style. About 3 numbers more complete the work. 25 cents.

No. 85 of the Library of Select Novels, contains 'The Disponent,' 'The Wolves' and 'The Jewess,' by the author of 'Letters from the Baltic.' One shilling.

No. 10 of the TREASURY OF HISTORY is issued, and contains the histories of Rome, her church, Republic and Empire, Naples, Sicily, Genoa, Sardinia, Bavaria, Hanover, Greece, the Ottoman or Turkish Empire, India, Persia, Arabia, and commences the history of China. 25 cents. Br. G. S. Abbott has received and accepted an invitation to take the pastoral charge of the First Universalist society of Cowlesville, Wyoming county, N. Y., and wishes all communications intended for him directed to that place. He is to commence his labors in that place early in July.

Br. Walker—Having accepted an invitation from the Homer and Cortland societies to become their pastor, I desire that hereafter, all communications for me should be directed to Homer, Cortland county, N. Y.

D. H. STRICKLAND.

Br. Tompkins—Credit James Brown, this city, $2.00 for next (XV) vol. Repository. Also send same volume to Miss Clarissa Pease, Copenhagen, Lewis county, N. Y. credit her $2.00—charge A. W.

GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE, for July, is received at Beesley's, and contains an interesting variety matter of accompanied with the usual number of beautiful engravings. 25 cents.

The COLUMBIAN for July is also issued, and is for sale by Mr. Beesley. 'The Bridal Prayer,' and 'Gen. Warren taking leave of his wife and child on the eve of the battle of Bunker Hill,' are the principal embellishments in this number in the line of engravings. It is well filled with original papers from some of its best contributors. 25 cents.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The EDITOR will preach at Little Falls next Sunday. Br. S. JENKINS will preach at Mechanics' Hall, in this city, next Sunday, at the usual hours. Br. D. H. STRICKLAND will preach in Cortland on the second Sunday in July. Br. HICKS will preach in Graves' Hollow on the fourth Sunday in July.

MARRIAGES.

In Madison, on the 10th ult., by Rev. J. J. Austin, Mr. DANIEL FAIRCHILD of Augusta, to Miss MARTHA M. SERGENT, of the former place.

In Cowlesville, June 18th, by Rev. G. S. Abbott, Mr. EDWIN W. WESTON of Buffalo, to Miss JULIETH DURKEE of Cowlesville.

In Otego, June 3d, by Rev. D. T. Elliott, Capt. SMITH SUTHERLAND of Oswego, Ill., to Miss LUCY P., daughter of C. P. Fuller, Esq., of Otego, Otsego county, N. Y.

In Bridgewater, June 18th, by Rev. D. M. Smith, Mr. D. B. GITCHEL to Miss LOUISA T. BEMISS, both of Winfield, Herkimer county.

DEATHS.

In Brooklyn, Susquehanna county, Penn., on the 26th of May, Capt. STEPHEN WILLIAMS, aged 60 years, a native of Connecticut, but was thirty years a resident of the town where he died. He was an early pioneer, not only in preparing this mountainous and rugged country for the abode of civilized man, but was ever ready to aid by his word and means, the promulgation of God's impartial grace; to plant the seed of truth in the rough fallow ground of the human heart, and to water the tender plant with his works of love. The early companion of his youth, the partner of his joys and sorrows, left this world for a better, a few years before him. He sustained during his life a good character, such as is worthy of imitation; and lived as a good citizen, husband and father. Few men had a less number of enemies. He was esteemed by those who knew him.

ANOTHER REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIER GONE!—Died at his residence in Harford, Susquehanna county, Pa., on the 26th of May, Mr. RUFUS KINGSLEY, in the 84th year of his age.

Mr. Kingsley was born in Windham, Conn., Feb. 1, 1763, and entered into the service of his country, as a drummer, at about the age of 13. He was among the troops that commenced the struggle for liberty at Bunker Hill, and continued in the service, from time to time, until honorably discharged at the close of the war. Within a few years he has visited the mount of strife in the vicinity of Boston, and beat the early reveille while standing upon the monument of his country's glory. What were his reflections? The pen can not record them, and silence must answer.—He was likewise a soldier of the Cross. The same free spirit which urged him to throw off a foreign yoke, likewise led him forth into the field of free inquiry, and he spurned all creeds but the word of God. In short, he believed in the salvation of all men. This faith, we may truly say, endowed him with all the Christian virtues; patience, cheerfulness, faith, hope and love were his. For some time he had associated with the idea of his death, these words:—

'We trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe. These things command and teach.' He sealed these words with orders for them to be opened after his death, for the purpose of being used as a text on the occasion of his funeral, which was complied with. He likewise selected the 22d verse of the 15th chap. of 1st Cor. to be inscribed on his tomb-stone. Thus after setting his house in order, he has gone to his rest.

In addition to the above, it becomes our painful duty to add another item in our record of mortality, in the death of Mrs. LUCINDA KINGSLEY, wife of the former, who followed her husband, Friday, May 29th, aged 79. This worthy couple lived happily together for 60 years, and were frequently heard to say that they desired to leave this world about the same time; their wish was granted, for they died within three days of each other. The same faith that sustained her husband was the anchor of her soul: and of this faith she lived a worthy advocate. But of her amiable qualities and Christian virtues, what shall we say? It is said she never was angry, and it is but common praise to say that she was good and kind to all. She has left no enemies. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered on the three above occasions, to a very large concourse of mourning relatives and friends, by the writer of this article.

MINUTES

And Proceedings of the Ontario Association, for 1846.

The Ontario Association, agreeably to previous notice, convened in the Universalist church, in Fairport, on Wednesday morning, June 10, 1846, and organized the Council by choosing Br. L. L. Spalding, Moderator, and Br. C. Hammond, Clerk, pro tem.

2. The Council united in prayer with Br. Johnson.

3. Delegates from societies presented their credentials.

4. Appointed Brs. B. F. Gibbs, J. Armstrong, and W. A. Lockwood a committee to arrange the public services in the desk. Read and approved the minutes of last year.

5. Adjourned till after the services in the afternoon.

6. Met agreeably to adjournment, and united in prayer with Br. Montgomery.

7. Voted to receive the first Universalist society in Rochester into fellowship with this body.

8. The committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of conferring ordination on Br. B. F. Gibbs, at such time and place as he and his friends may think best. Adopted.

9. Appointed Brs. L. L. Spalding, O. Ackley, and C. Hammond, a committee on fellowship and ordination for the ensuing year.

10. Heard the report of the committee of discipline. No complaint. Adopted.

11. Appointed Brs. Almond Gage, Daniel Kenyon and John Loyd, a committee of discipline for the ensuing year.

12. Whereas Br. Henry Roberts in 1842 resigned his letter of fellowship to this body on account of ill health, and whereas in 1843 he, having recovered the same, and being desirous of continuing his services as a preacher of the Gospel, and having expressed such intention to this Association, it was unanimously voted that a letter of fellowship as an ordained minister of the Gospel be granted to him.

13. Appointed Brs. G. W. Montgomery and O. Ackley, clerical, and A. L. Van Dusen and G. H. Roberts, lay, delegates to the next State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes and fill vacancies.

14. Voted that the next annual meeting of this Association be held in Webster, on the second Wednesday and following Thursday in June next.

15. Voted that the thanks of this Council be tendered to Br. Hammond for his occasional sermon, delivered at this meeting, and that the same be published in the Luminary.

16. Appointed Br. O. Roberts to deliver the next occasional sermon.

17. Voted that there be four Conferences held in this Association the ensuing year.

18. Adjourned to Thursday morning.

19. Met and prayer was offered by Br. O. Ackley.

20. Adopted the proposed amendment to the Constitution, as passed at the last session of this body.

21. Appointed Brs. Montgomery, Hammond and A. Gage to revise the Constitution of this Association, and report at an adjourned meeting of this Council.

22. Voted that when this Council adjourn, in adjourn to meet in North Bloomfield, on the second Wednesday and following Thursday in October next.

23. Voted that the application of Br. Clark of Canandaigua for a letter of fellowship be referred to the committee on fellowship to report at the adjourned session of this Council, in October next.

24. Elected Br. C. Hammond Standing Clerk.

25. Voted that the Clerk prepare the minutes for publication in the Luminary and other denominational papers in the State.

Ministers present—L. L. Spalding, Webster; O. Roberts, Lakeville; D. Biddlecom, Phelps; J. R. Johnson, Oakfield; O. Ackley, Geneva; B. F. Gibbs, Perrinton; S. W. Remington, Churchville;

G. W. Montgomery, H. Roberts and C. Hammond, Rochester.

Lay delegates—B. Northrop, D. S. Rogers, Livonia; A. L. Van Dusen, D. Kenyon, Newark; H. Jerrells, E. T. Cogswell, Perrinton; J. Loyd, M. D. Brown, North Bloomfield; G. H. Roberts, A. Gage, Rochester; E. Cook, Webster; D. I. Lewis, Victor.

Remarks.—This was indeed a pleasant meeting. A truly Christian spirit pervaded the Council, and the business was transacted with despatch.

The application of Br. Clark for a letter of fellowship was laid over on constitutional grounds, not being made three months before the meeting.

The services of the desk were creditable to our ministry, and very satisfactory to our friends. Sermons were preached by C. Hammond, J. R. Johnson, O. Roberts, D. Biddlecom, and G. W. Montgomery.

We cordially thank the society in Fairport for their generous attention to the wants of their brethren and sisters on this occasion. Long may the society enjoy the prosperity which favors it under the administration of its able pastor.

C. HAMMOND, Clerk.

A CHANGE.

Eighteen years ago I was located in Newfane, Vt. where there was a small society of believers, which with much exertion, was able to give me a scanty support, ($120) for half of the time. One quarter was employed in Dover, an adjoining town; the other in Winchester, N. H. When there was a fifth Sunday in a month I went to Chesterfield. After a time I was able to find places where I could go out and lecture on a week-day evening, or after my regular Sunday service—in Brattleboro', Guilford, Wilmington, Somerset, Patney, and other places where the word had not been preached. By and by, when a brother preacher came along to spend a Sabbath and supply for me, I could occasionally preach where a small pittance could be given to help him on his journey.

Preachers were as scarce as Societies in those days. Brs. W. Skinner of Cavendish, S. C. Loveland of Reading, J. Moore, of Lebanon and O. A. Skinner of Washington N. H., each some fifty miles distant, were my nearest clerical neighbors. To meet them once or twice a year was cause of great rejoicing.

And houses of worship were more rare than either preachers or Societies. We met in Court-Houses, School-Houses, Groves, Barns, and occasionally in the town 'Meeting Houses,' which were claimed by other sects, generally by the 'Standing Order,' (Congregationalists) formerly so called in New England, but for many years past a falling order. These houses had been built by the towns for places of worship, and the doing of town business, holding elections, &c. The 'standing order' claimed the use of them on Sunday, but sometimes we could get in for a 5 o'clock lecture, or for a week-day, or a funeral service. No society ever dreamed of being able to erect a house for itself; but some had the presumption to hope we might, in a few years, join with Methodists, or Baptists, and build 'Union' Houses; and others even screwed up their courage to think we could one day claim a right, in common with other sects to the 'old meeting house.' This last measure began to be pretty loudly talked of before I left that region, for that class of men who came out to sustain our cause, in its infancy, were of good courage, and jealous of their rights. I remember some curious incidents touching this matter. I was once invited to Claremont, N. H., to preach a Sunday. A difficulty had arisen in the society, and a pretty liberal committee had been elected to supply the desk. As they had no 'settled minister' they consented to let me preach in the house. When about to enter the door, I was met by a gruff looking man, whose face was flushed with rage, and whose voice trembled as he asked, 'Are you going to preach here to-day?' I replied I had come for that purpose.

'By what authority?' he boisterously inquired. My first thought was the reply of Eathan Allen at the surrendering of fort Ticonderoga; but being a little frightened, I modestly answered, 'By the desire of the people, and the consent of the Committee.'

He angrily remarked, 'There's no such thing—the Committee have never given their consent.'

A brother at my side, who had invited me there, said 'I will answer that matter,' and beckoned me to pass in. I did so, and pretty soon the old deacon came raving in and motioned all about the house for the people to leave. A few did so, and the service went on.

At another time I was invited to Greenwich, Mass., under similar circumstances. The Committee had assumed the office of Peter, whether by 'direct succession' or not, I can not say; but they had put a lock on the door of the pulpit, it was one of those pulpits into which the preacher enters by a side door and so 'climbs up some other way,' and 'opened and no man shut, and shut and no man opened.' At church time, Lawyer M——, not a Universalist, but one of the liberal party, conducted me to the pulpit, took the key from his pocket, opened the pulpit door and 'passed me in,' then turned the key upon me, put it into his pocket, and took his seat. After a little time I heard a rattling at the door, and looking over the side of the pulpit, saw a man trying to get in. Failing of his purpose, he turned to the congregation and said, 'I demand this pulpit.' Lawyer M—— arose and said rather sternly, 'Sir, you can not have it.' The poor man was fairly shut out of the kingdom that time. I pitied him. But thinks I, he is of the 'Standing Order,' and can stand it. After a little commotion, a few leaving the house—the services began. At the conclusion my 'legal adviser' liberated me, and fastened up the kingdom till I came in the afternoon.

Mark the change. Now there are societies in nearly every town in that region, with neat and comfortable churches of their own, or the free use of the 'Meeting-houses,' and settled pastors, each of whom receives double the salary I did, which is raised with half the exertion formerly required to sustain a single preacher. In Brattleboro' there are two houses and two preachers. In the circuit above named there are more than twenty preachers constantly employed in proclaiming God's most holy truth, persuading the people to repent and believe the Gospel, who are generally respected as much as the clergymen of any other order.

Verily, God is doing great things, whereof we are glad. Brethren, let us be of good courage, and let our hearts be strong in the Lord, to go forward in the work he has entrusted to our hands; for in due time we shall reap if we faint not.

Brother Limitarian, seest thou no sign in these things? If not, the Lord have mercy on thy blindness.—[Messenger. W. S. B.]

THE MOURNER'S PRAYER.

O Father, call my spirit home,
To thy blissful courts of love and peace;
Ope wide death's gate thou Holy One,
And my poor soul from earth release.
I'm weary of this world of care,
It hath no charms, no bliss for me;
O God! wilt thou but hear my prayer?
I long, I long, to dwell with thee.

Father, I know my heart is young,
And scarce to middle age has grown;
I know this life it's just begun—
But, oh! 'tis weary, sad and lone.
Oft to my lips has sorrow pressed
The cup of bitterness and wo,
Till with the life-tide in my breast,
Its dull and poisonous waters flow.

I wipe the grief drops from my eyes,
And think I'll mourn and weep no more,
Yet come again deep heaving sighs
And tears, more freely than before.
But thou, O God, canst wipe away
The last sad tear—and grief destroy;
O, take my spirit from its clay
To dwell with thee in endless joy.

Yet, Father, if it is thy will,
That in this world I longer stay,
I'll bid my murmuring heart be still,
And learn thy mandate to obey.
All, all, my soul shall meekly bear,
Till thou shalt make it ever free;
Like him, who once, the thorns did wear,
I would resign myself to thee.

MEMORIAL OF THE 'COUNTRY PASTOR,' REVIEW OF IT; THE SUPERINTENDENT'S REPLY.

1.—THE MEMORIAL.

To the Hon. N. S. Benton, Superintendent of Common Schools for the State of New York:

The undersigned would respectfully submit to the consideration of the Superintendent, the following facts of which we complain as grievances; and regard to which we desire your opinion, or rather decision, (so far as it may come within your province to decide, at as early a date as may be practicable.

1. During the autumn of 1845, a tax was levied and collected of the inhabitants of school district No. 4 in the town of Preston and county of Chenango, amounting to between four and five hundred dollars, ostensibly for the purpose of obtaining a site and erecting a school house for the benefit of said district; which house has been constructed much larger than necessary for the accommodation of the school, with the evident intention of occupying it for the purpose of holding religious meetings, so called, the tendency of which is, in our estimation, to corrupt rather than improve the moral and religious sentiments of community. Since its completion, it has been repeatedly so occupied, against the wishes and notwithstanding the strong remonstrance of almost one-half of the legal voters in said district, on whom about two-thirds of all the expenses of its erection had been assessed, leaving the house to be controlled and by them used for other purposes than that of the benefit of the district school, by those on whom has devolved but about one-third of the expense of its erection.

2. 'Watts on the Mind,' a text or class book in many of our Academies, together with certain publications of the American Tract Society, such as 'Abbott's Young Christian,' are said to have been expelled from the Library of said school district, on the ground of their sectarian character, while 'Austin's Voice to Youth,' a work published avowedly with the design of propagating the peculiar sentiments of the Universalist denomination, and 'Combe on Man,' which Infidels themselves recommend as the work of all others best calculated to subserve their purposes, are retained, to be commended and urged upon the perusal of our children and youth.

Your memorialists would inquire in regard to the first of the above named grievances, whether the trustees of a school district are empowered to appropriate its house to any other use than that for which it was professedly erected—whether a majority of its voters have the power of doing it—and if so, whether individuals residing in the district but paying nothing towards the erection of the house, are entitled to vote in such case?

In relation to the second named grievance, we wish to be informed whether works, in the publication of which all evangelical denominations of professing Christians harmoniously co-operate, like those of the American Tract Society, are to be accounted sectarian; and if they are to be excluded from the school library on this ground, whether those of the character complained of, are still to be allowed a place there?

The Town Superintendent having taken an active and officious part in relation to the above causes of grievance, leaves no other alternative than that of an appeal to the Superintendent of the State, from whom we hope to receive an early decision.

2.—THE REVIEW.

It is a most painful duty to expose the plots and exhibit the deeds of a 'Country Pastor' and his co-laborers in the cause of bigotry and superstition. But justice to the sentiment of universal grace and love, to unsectarian education, to ourselves, to society, and above all to our God, demands it at our hands.

HE WAS THE AUTHOR OF THE ABOVE MEMORIAL. An individual of undoubted veracity, who saw it in the office of the State Superintendent of Common Schools, knows that it was his hand writing, and HE HAS ACKNOWLEDGED IT.

He intimates that it was only 'ostensibly,' 'professedly,' or apparently for the purchase of a site and the erection of a school house that 'a tax was levied and collected of the inhabitants of school district No. 4 in the town of Preston; that it was in reality to purchase a site and rear a meeting-house. Nothing can be more false than this. The sect alluded to desired and expected to use the new house, only as they had the old one, or as school houses generally are used, in common with all who wished it, and without interfering with any; and meanly as they had been treated, they thought too well of their neighbors at that time, to imagine that they would oppose them in so doing. They erred; but it was on the safer side—that of charity.

* We omit five of the names attached to the above memorial, as we do not wish needlessly to wound their feelings or injure their reputations, though they richly deserve to be published to the world. If, by their future conduct, they manifest a desire for greater notoriety in the cause in which they are engaged, it would become absolutely necessary that we should confer it upon them. We insert the first signature, as the 'Country Pastor' has given the reply of the State Superintendent addressed to him, in the New York Observer, thereby showing his connection with the production answered.

He alleges that the house was constructed much larger than was 'necessary for the accommodation of the school, with the evident intention of occupying it for the purpose of holding religious meetings.' The district is very extensive, about two miles square; and long before another will be built, the number of scholars will probably be much increased; and yet the teacher of the last winter's school and the late worthy County Superintendent, have both declared that its dimensions were none too ample for present convenience; nor do we think an intelligent, disinterested friend of education can be found who will otherwise decide. Some, if not all the tools of the 'Country Pastor,' who signed this declaration, knew it to be utterly false. Its erection was considered at the regular annual meeting, and THE PLAN WAS PRESENTED BY ONE WHOSE NAME WAS ATTACHED TO THE ABOVE STATEMENT, AND WAS ALMOST UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED. In some respects it was afterwards changed to suit several of the other memorialists; but THE SIZE WAS NEVER ALTERED, NOR THE EXPENSE INCREASED. Nor could there have been more than one or two, if there was any of them, who expressed a desire that its dimensions should be less. Little or no opposition was manifested until sometime subsequent.

He insinuates that the meetings which the house was reared to commodate are not really religious, but only 'so called'; and declares that their tendency is 'to corrupt rather than improve the moral and religious sentiments of community.' How meek and modest! Who that reads the facts above and herein presented does not feel the crimson glow of shame upon his cheeks, that men so callous to a sense of justice, so destitute of charity, kindness and benevolence, 'friendship, love and truth,' with 'consciences seared as with a hot iron,' should represent that the religion of another sect is merely nominal? Universalist meetings have corrupted the morals and religion of Preston! So says the author of 'More Snakes in the Grass,' this lying memorial, and perhaps the instigator of the infamous deeds recorded in the preceding communication. And he and his little band are the righteous men that save the town! Corrupt, indeed, if judged by them, must be his character, and still more so that of its Universalists, if they have perpetrated blacker acts than those recorded in this day's paper of him and his steadfast friends! Sodom itself would stand aghast, and fear and tremble! And yet I can mention other deeds that some of his supporters have performed which the worst member of the Universalist society in Preston would scorn to do.

Do not these very individuals whose morals and religion he virtually avers are so corrupt, discharge their duty to their fellow beings and perform their obligations to Almighty God as faithfully as others? The Rev. J. S. Swan, a Baptist clergyman of Albany, but once of Preston, and perhaps as bitter an opponent of Universalism as lives, has been honest enough to frequently declare that the Universalists of that town are better neighbors and citizens than the Presbyterians. 'If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen.'—'He that loveth God loveth his brother also.' 1 John iv: 20, 21. No person can love God and not love man. If he is deficient in the latter he certainly is in the former. The fact that he loves the latter, is as good evidence as can be given that he loves the former. We leave the reader to decide who loves God and man, and who fails so to do; or whether the most essential proof that be adduced against our friends in these particulars, namely, that they neither support, attend upon the ministrations, or believe the antiquated and exploded doctrines of John Calvin and his 'Country Pastor,' conclusively shows that they have corrupted the morals and religion of Preston.

The intimation concerning the object for which the house was reared; the allegation that it was of unnecessary size; the insinuation that those who performed their devotions in it only possessed religion in name; that they were corrupt in morality and theoretical and practical Christianity, all, all are false. Nor had the Universalists occupied it more than twice when the State Superintendent was addressed, nor 'repeatedly,' nor but once after any had remonstrated; nor was it against the wishes of one-half, or of fifteen of about forty of the legal voters of the district; nor did they pay, although they were the most wealthy, near 'two-thirds of the expense of its erection.' If we concede that our friends are as ungodly as is contended, there still remains not less than five false statements in the first division of the memorial. Well done good and faithful 'Country Pastor'!

2. The 'Country Pastor' informs the State Superintendent, that 'Watts on the Mind' and 'certain publications of the American Tract Society, such as 'Abbott's Young Christian,' are said to have been expelled from the library of said school district, on the ground of their sectarian character.' This statement has not the slightest foundation in truth. Neither of the works named, nor any of the publications of the society specified, had been or were threatened to be expelled from the library referred to, although the sectarianism of one or more of them had been mentioned; and doubtless some of the productions of that society richly deserve and the law clearly requires their expulsion from district libraries. Did Mr. Dyer write, and his half dozen tools sign this statement, knowing its falsity, to unjustly excite the prejudices of the State Superintendent, and induce him to remove the books they afterwards mention? Who was their informant? Let them answer, or stand convicted in public estimation of intentional wrong. If they received such information, it was from one who designedly deceived them, or was himself the victim of deception. The author of this declaration must have been guilty of wilful falsehood. And whether it was so said or not, the subscribers to this accusation, who resided in the district, and and one of whom was a trustee, and the writer who was not remote, are not entirely blameless for indirectly falsely accusing the Town Superintendent, when they could so easily have tested its accuracy.

The 'Country Pastor' represents that 'Austin's Voice to Youth' was retained in the library. This is true; and almost if not the only truth important or unimportant, contained in his memorial. We know not that it was 'commended and urged upon the perusal of our (their) children and youth;' but, if so, was it improperly, or more earnestly than were the justly obnoxious works of the American Tract Society 'urged upon the perusal of ours.'—Or does any sane man believe that it was calculated to so deeply injure them that it was so serious a grievance, that the State Superintendent should be required to remove it? Or can any one conclude differently from him, as declared in his reply?

The 'Country Pastor' asserts that the 'Voice to Youth' was 'published avowedly with the design of propagating the peculiar sentiments of the Universalist denomination.' Will he inform us who ever published it avowing such a design? He can not. No such avowal was ever made. Though not avowed was such the design? Whether a few sentences in the book do or do not favor the views of the sect specified I shall not decide. Nor do I wish too harshly to censure the inditer or asserters of the declaration under consideration. And yet, I would ask, who but an idiot, or at least a dolt, a maniac, or a wilful liar can carefully and attentively peruse the work and so represent? That the 'Country Pastor' had read it is probable. If so, or not, the community will justly hold him morally responsible, even though those interested in its sale should not make him legally so; as no man has a right to falsely accuse because he does not know its falsity, or to assert without conclusive evidence of its correctness. That he has ability, his 'More Snakes in the Grass,' and the above half sheet, containing but one or two solitary truths, abundantly proves. And the world can readily decide upon the veracity of his character after enumerating the falsehoods of his memorial. That the subscribers to that wonderful production at that time had ever read the 'Voice to Youth,' I do not believe. That some of them had not I am morally certain; and I leave others to mete out to them the measure of reproach they richly deserve for such representations under such circumstances.

The 'Country Pastor' complains that 'Combe on Man' is retained in the library, 'to be commended and urged upon the perusal of our children and youth.' He is not a resident of and I know not that he has children in the district. But a man so free from selfishness and narrow-mindedness, so enlarged in intellect and unbounded in philanthropy, we can not consistently suspect of being 'a busy body in other men's matters,' and must concede that he feels intensely for the good of all. Hence his malignant opposition to Phrenology! Hence the discovery, he is said to have made, that it is dangerous to teach children in general many of the higher branches of science, as they lead them into infidelity, and what is still worse, Universalism! Hence his laudable efforts in the cause of unsectarian education, as evinced in his memorial and elsewhere! But unfortunately for him and his little body guard of signers, 'COMBE ON MAN' WAS NOT NOR NEVER HAD BEEN IN THE LIBRARY REFERRED TO, WHEN HIS MEMORIAL WAS WRITTEN. The State Superintendent having decided that it was very suitable for such a purpose, it has been placed and will remain there, the doleful lamentations of the Rev. Mr. Dyer and Co. to the contrary notwithstanding! But it is an infidel work, says this sapient writer! For every infidel he will produce who will recommend it 'as the work of all others best calculated to subvert his purpose,' I will exhibit ten who will vastly prefer the sermons, essays, memorials and other efforts of the 'Country Pastor.'

From the questions propounded to the State Superintendent there can be no doubt, that if he had decided that neither a majority of the trustees, nor the voters of the district, both of which were so disposed, could give us a legal right to occasionally occupy the school house for religious purposes, we should have been forthwith excluded. Or if by a disfranchisement of the poor, or any other means, they could possibly have obtained a majority, (which is doubtful,) no matter if it was of but one, or how much our friends were taxed for its erection. And by beings too, not only of human form, but loud in their professions of Christianity! 'Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph.' I have preached in school houses in districts that did not contain a Universalist, without hearing of a solitary murmur, or ever before of an effort to prevent. And, perhaps, there is not another in the county of Chenango, and few, indeed, in the State of New York, how ignorant and benighted soever, that had uniformly admitted others, and would attempt to exclude us, even if all the inhabitants entertained essentially different views.

It is evident from the queries of the memorial, that the 'Country Pastor' pretended not to believe that works could be 'accounted as sectarian,' in the publication of which all evangelical denominations of professing Christians harmoniously co-operate like those of the American Tract Society.'—What though New York has a hundred sects!—Have not three or four of them partially united and claimed for themselves and denied all others the title of 'evangelical'? And is not that enough to forever entitle them to a legal patent to that appellation, and make them unsectarian, no matter how many soever may oppose? What though it is the object of law to protect all in the enjoyment of freedom of conscience! Can conscience be free, if free from Presbyterianism? What though our institutions aim to confer on all equal rights and privileges! What rights have Universalists?—They are not evangelical; that is, they do not proclaim 'good news or glad tidings;' the endless happiness of the elect, increased by the endless misery of the reprobate! And what rights have Unitarians? They deny the evident truth that a Father can be as young as his son, or a son as old as his father, or that any thing can emanate from both and be as old as either! What rights have Catholics? They discard the right of private judgment in matters of religion! Or what right have Protestants to judge wrong in the exercise of that right? And who has judged right or determined it from wrong without the light of Presbyterianism? Are not a majority of the inhabitants of the State evangelical? And who ever heard of the rights of the minority? True, we are not the majority of the school district in which we reside; but what right have they to say that books that teach our peculiar sentiments shall be removed, while the 'Voice to Youth' and 'Constitution of Man,' which inculcate the great practical duties of life, independent of creed or sect, shall remain? Are we not justifiable in defaming their objects and contents to accomplish our ends? What unpardonable insolence! What pitiable stupidity or atrocious villany even granting that their works had been excluded!

The 'Country Pastor' informs the S. Superintendent that the Town Superintendent had 'taken an active and officious part in relation to the above causes of grievance.' When I say that this representation is in perfect keeping with the others contained in the memorial, I hardly need add that it is entirely destitute of truth. I know not whether he had informed any one how he should vote, if the question was referred to the district, in regard to the occupancy of the school house. That they rightly surmized is probable. Knowing that he might be called to decide, and not wishing to prejudge, he never had committed himself in favor of the retention or exclusion of any of the works named, from the library. How basely scandalous and characteristic of Preston Presbyterianism, to falsely represent a public officer, without ever consulting him or knowing his views! How conclusively it proves that they only expected a favorable decision, because the tribunal they chose was far away, and they could palm upon it their falsehoods unsuspected and unexposed!

Even granting the truth of the charge against the Town Superintendent, why does the 'Country Pastor' declare that there was 'no other alternative than that of an appeal to the Superintendent of the State?' Doubtless he knows that the County Superintendent was a proper individual to decide these questions. But he was afraid to trust him, notwithstanding he had been a member, was an attendant of, and is an avowed believer in the doctrines of a self-styled evangelical church, engaged in issuing the very works that the Pastor wishes introduced into the libraries of Common Schools. He could easily ascertain all the facts, as well as decide legally, and their reckless falsehoods would be of no avail.

For the present, I am nearly done with the 'Country Pastor.' I have laid before you many circumstances merely local, a portion of which abstractly viewed, will be uninteresting. But they will enable you to correctly learn the characters of the originators of the movement to exclude the 'Voice to Youth' and 'Constitution of Man' from common school libraries and place therein the works of the American Tract Society, and better qualify you to judge of the real intentions of those engaged. In a few weeks I purpose to present you more important matter than any I have yet adduced, which I trust will do something to settle throughout the State the general features of the question, concerning the publications that should remain or be expelled from district school libraries. I have reasons I consider substantial for preferring a short delay.

In addition to the five or more falsehoods pointed out in the first portion of the memorial, the statements concerning the exclusion of any and every work specified; the avowed and real design of publishing the 'Voice to Youth,' the infidelity of 'Combe on Man,' its being in the library of district No. 4 in Preston; the Town Superintendent's 'taking an active and officious part in relation to the books named or the occupancy of the school house; are all untrue. And these are the 'FACTS' complained of 'as grievances.'

Towards Mr. Dyer and his friends I entertain no ill-will. I am aware that I have used 'great plainness of speech' in this review of them, and in the preceding communication. I am a plain, blunt man, who speak the honest sentiments of my heart, and aim to accomplish my objects boldly, and fearlessly and conscientiously, not secretly and underhandedly. So were the sacred writers. So was my Lord and Master. Seven times in one chapter did he call those who professed the most religion and possessed the least, 'Pharisees and hypocrites,' and clearly intimated that it was impossible for them to 'escape the damnation of hell!' 'As many as he loved he rebuked and chastened;' that they might 'be zealous, therefore, and repent.' I expect that 'those who are by nature the children of wrath' will pour out great indignation upon me, and endeavor to create sympathy by representing that they are the persecuted! But let them disprove my statements, or it will be of no avail. I CHALLENGE A REPLY. I have designed, 'to nothing extenuate or set down aught in malice.' If I am in any respect in error, it is unintentional, and shall be publicly corrected. I leave the community to decide whether I have castigated them too severely, and whether, as men, they are honest or dishonest, as Christians sincere or 'so serve God as not to offend the devil!'

I conclude with the reply of the State Superintendent to the memorial. J. T. GOOPRICH.

STATE OF N. Y.—SECRETARY'S OFFICE.
Depar't of Com. Schools. Albany, Dec. 29, 1845.

Gentlemen—You will perceive by reference to the 'Digest of the Common School System,' which is undoubtedly in the library of your district, that the occupation of the school house, when not required for district purposes, is to be determined by a vote of the district. If a majority of the inhabitants and legal voters of the district are opposed to such occupation for religious or other meetings, the Trustees are legally bound to carry their will into effect. If they give no direction and take no order in the premises, the trustees are authorised to make such disposition of the matter as they may deem expedient.

I think you can not have read very attentively either of the works which you denounce as sectarian, infidel and irreligious, or you would entertain a somewhat different opinion respecting their character and tendency. Both 'Austin's Voice to Youth' and 'Combe's Constitution of Man,' are eminently adapted to the cultivation and improvement of the moral and intellectual faculties of youth. Nor can either of them, in my judgment, properly be regarded as sectarian, or in any respect immoral or injurious. The publications of the 'American Tract Society,' to which you refer are unobjectionable, except so far as they are sectarian in their character; recognising as they do, the religious tenets solely of those who are denominated 'Evangelical Christians,' and systematically opposing and endeavoring to refute the religious creeds of all other denominations. However valuable, therefore, they may be in the private or the church library, they are obviously inadmissible in the school district library—especially in districts where any of the inhabitants profess religious views in opposition to those held by the great body of Christians.

Yours respectfully,
N. S. BENTON, Sup't Com. Schools.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the Otsego Association of Universalists for 1846.

Met at Richfield Springs, June 24th, and organized the Council, by appointing Brs. W. Williams, Moderator, and Alexander Gardner, Clerk, and J. H. Tuttle, Assistant Clerk. United in prayer with Br. P. Philleo. Delegates present handed in their certificates and took their seats.

The society recently formed at Edmeston, Otsego county, presented a petition to be received into fellowship with this Association. The petition was granted and the society received.

Read the credentials of delegates and letters from societies, when it was found that the following were represented, by the delegates named.

Fly Creek, W. Williams, Francis Taylor; Burlington Flats, Truman Wood, William Park; Cooperstown, Levi Wood, Holden Cory; Cedarville, Nehemiah Rice, A. S. Devendorf; Louisville, Asa Tilson; Minden, Isaac Keller, N. Snell; Edmeston, Eri Deming, C. Hammond; Richfield Springs, E. Gardner, C. C. Chamberlin; Fort Plain, unrepresented.

The following committees were then appointed. Brs. W. Park, O. Whiston, J. H. Tuttle, on adjournment. Brs. H. Cory, Eri Deming, E. Gardner, to nominate delegates to the next State Convention. Brs. O. Whiston, Levi Wood, C. Hammond, to nominate a preacher to preach the next occasional sermon.

Appointed Br. J. H. Tuttle to prepare the Minutes for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, with such remarks as he may deem proper.

Voted to adjourn till Thursday morning.

Thursday morning, united in prayer with Br. Z. Cook.

The committee on discipline having reported that no case had been presented for their action during the past year. The following Brs. were appointed a committee for the ensuing year; A. R. Elwood, H. Colman, Truman Wood.

The committee on adjournment reported in favor of Edmeston. The report was adopted.

The committee appointed for that purpose, reported in favor Nehemiah Rice, Eri Deming, O. Whiston and Z. Cook, delegates to the next State Convention. Report adopted.

After considerable debate on the subject of organizing a Missionary Society within the bounds of this Association, finally

Resolved, That the subject of the organization of a Missionary Society be referred to the consideration of our friends within its bounds, and that the delegates to the next Council come prepared to act upon the same.

Further resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to draft a Constitution to be adopted at the next session of this meeting, if the Council deem it proper. Brs. O. Whiston, Z. Cook, J. H. Stewart, were appointed the above committee.

The committee on fellowship and ordination having just received a request from Br. N. Snell to be received into fellowship with this Association as a preacher of the Gospel, made a report, when the following resolution was offered and adopted.

Resolved, That Br. N. Snell be received and published in the minutes as a candidate to be admitted into fellowship at the next session of this body.

Brs. C. Hammond, Levi Wood and O. Whiston, were appointed a committee on fellowship and ordination for the ensuing year.

The committee which was appointed at our last session to determine the time and place of the organization of the first Universalist society in the State of New York, made a report which was adopted. Voted also, that the same be recorded in the Clerk Book of this Association.

The committee appointed to nominate a preacher to preach the next occasional sermon reported in favor of Br. H. L. Hayward, of Fort Plain. The report adopted.

Voted to adjourn at the conclusion of the public services to meet at Edmeston, the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1847.

WILLIAM WILLIAMS, Chairman.

E. GARDNER, Clerk.

J. H. TUTTLE, Assistant Clerk.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Z. Cook, T. J. Whitcomb, P. Philleo, C. L. Shipman, P. Hathaway, W. G. Anderson, J. W. McMaster and T. J. Sawyer.

Ministering brethren present.—J. Potter, O. Whiston, N. Snell, C. L. Shipman, J. W. McMaster, Z. Cook, J. D. Hicks, T. J. Sawyer, W. G. Anderson, J. H. Stewart, W. Perry, T. J. Whitcomb, P. Philleo, P. Hathaway, E. M. Woolley, J. N. Parker, J. Douglass. There were also several students from Clinton.

REMARKS.—This was one of the most interesting and happy meetings we have ever attended. The Universalist house being too small to contain the vast numbers that came in from every point of compass, our friends requested the Congregational society to grant them the use of theirs—the request was readily granted, (for which they have our sincere thanks and grateful acknowledgments,) and both houses were literally filled to overflowing. It was with some difficulty that our friends consented to be separated, but with much reluctance, they did so, believing that it is only in this world that we part, and that the mansion beyond the grave is of sufficient size to contain us all: As all were anxious to hear Br. Sawyer's sermon on Education, he, upon request, consented to deliver it in both churches; first in the Universalist and then in the Congregational. This made the task somewhat laborious for Br. Sawyer; yet it satisfied many a listening ear. The preaching was all good and spirited; such as sends joy and gladness to the human heart.

The council was an interesting one, and ruled in order and good feeling.

Finally this was a glorious meeting! I verily believe it was a prelude to the joys of heaven.—May God grant that we may all enjoy many more such annual convocations—that we may remember and practice in our lives and conversations the valuable impressions then made upon the heart.

J. H. TUTTLE.

THE TRUMPET AND UNIVERSALIST MAGAZINE has just entered upon its 19th volume, edited and published still by its original proprietor, Br. Thomas Whittemore. It is one of the oldest periodicals of our order, and still conducted with its usual spirit and ability. We wish it abundant success in propagating the great doctrine of a world's salvation. Its terms are, as heretofore, $2 per annum in advance, or $2.50 after six months.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street, Buffalo.

Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn, keeps a general assortment of Universalist Books for sale. He is also agent for the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist publications generally.

Br. T. J. Sawyer authorises us to receive subscriptions or donations to the Theological Institute. Any one who may wish can therefore remit direct to this office, and the receipt of the money will be acknowledged in the Magazine and Advocate.

A few copies of the Rose of Sharon for 1846 for sale at this office.

A few hundreds of the Register and Almanac for 1846 yet left, and for sale at this office.

SWALLOWS.

The following life-like article is from the pen of Mrs. Child:

There are different theories on the subject of instinct. Some consider it a special revelation to each creature; others believe it is handed down among animals, from generation to generation, and is therefore a matter of education. My own observation, two years ago, tends to confirm the latter theory. Two barn swallows came into our woodshed in the spring-time. Their busy, earnest twitterings, led me at once to suspect they were looking out a building spot; but as a carpenter's bench was under the window, and frequently hammering, sawing and planing were going on, I had little hope that they would choose a location under our roof. To my surprise, however, they soon began to build in a crotch of a beam over the open door way. I was delighted, and spent more time watching, than 'penny-wise' people would have approved. It was in fact, a beautiful little drama of domestic love. The mother bird was so busy, and so important; and her mate was so attentive!—Never did any newly married couple take more satisfaction with their first nicely arranged drawer of baby clothes, than they did in fashioning their little woven cradle.

The father bird scarcely ever left the side of the nest. There he was all day long, twittering in tones that were most obviously the outpourings of love. Sometimes he would bring in a straw, or hair, to be interwoven in the precious little fabric. One day my attention was arrested by a very unusual twittering, and I saw him circling round with a large downy feather in his bill. He bent over the unfinished nest and offered it to his mate with the most graceful and loving air imaginable; and when she put up her mouth to take it, he poured forth such a gust of glad-some sound! It seems as if pride and affection had swelled his heart till it was almost too big for his little bosom. The whole transaction was the prettiest piece of coquetry, on both sides, that it was ever my good luck to witness.

It was evident that the bird had formed correct opinions on 'the woman question,' for during the process of incubation he volunteered to perform his share of the household duty. Three or four times a day would he, with coaxing twitterings, persuade his patient to fly abroad for food; and the moment she left the eggs, he would take the maternal station, and give a loud alarm whenever a cat or dog came about the premises. He certainly performed the office with far less ease and grace than she did; it was something in the style of an old bachelor tending a babe; but nevertheless it showed that his heart was kind, and his principles correct, concerning division of labor. When the young ones came forth, he pursued the same equalizing policy, and brought at least half the food for his greedy little family.

But when they became old enough to fly, the veriest misanthrope would have laughed to watch their manoeuvres! Such a chipping and twittering! Such diving down from the nest and flying up again! Such wheeling round in circles, talking to the young ones all the while! Such clinging to the sides of the shed with their sharp claws, to show the timid little fledglings that there was no need of falling!

For three days all this was carried on with increasing activity. It was obviously an infant flying school.

But all their talking and fussing was of no avail. The little downy things looked down, then looked up, but alarmed at the infinity of space, sunk down into the nest again. At length the parents grew impatient, and summoned their neighbors. As I was picking up chips one day, I found my head encircled with a swarm of swallows. They flew up to the nest, and jabbered away to the young ones; they clung to the walls, looking back to tell how the thing was done; then dived, and wheeled, and balanced, and floated in a manner perfectly beautiful to behold.

The pupils were evidently much excited. They jumped on the edge of the nest, and twittered, and shook their feathers, and waved their wings, and then hopped back again, saying, 'Its pretty sport, but we can't do it.'

Three times the neighbors came and repeated their graceful lesson. The third time, two of the young birds, gave a sudden plunge downward, and then fluttered and hopped till they lighted on a small upright log. And oh, such praises as were warbled by the whole troop! The air was filled with their joy! Some were flying around, swift as a ray of light; others were perched on the hoe handle, and the teeth of the rake; multitudes clung to the wall, after the fashion of their pretty kind, and two were swinging, in a most graceful style, on a pendant hoop.—Never, while memory lasts, shall I forget the swallow party! I have frolicked with blessed Nature much and often; but this, above all her gambols, spoke into my inmost heart, like the glad voices of little children. The beautiful family continued to be our playmates until the falling leaves gave token of approaching winter. For some time, the little ones came home regularly to their nests at night. I was ever on the watch to welcome them, and count that none were missing. A sculptor might have taken a lesson in his art from those little creatures, perched so gracefully on the edge of their clay-built cradle, fast asleep, with heads hidden under their folded wings. Their familiarity was wonderful. If I hung a gown on a nail, I found a little swallow perched on the sleeve. If I took a nap in the afternoon, my waking eyes were greeted by a swallow on the bed post; in the summer twilight they flew about the sitting-room in search of flies, and sometimes alighted on chairs and tables. I almost thought they knew how much I loved them. But at last they flew away to more genial skies, with a whole troop of relations and neighbors. It was a deep pain to me, that I should never know them from other swallows, and that they would have no recollection of me.

THE OLD OAK TREE.

There stands its leafless trunk; its branches have fallen, and its surface is covered with ivy, that now hides, perhaps some of its deformities. We look upon the time when it first emerged from its acorn shell, and was nourished by moisture from the pebbly brook upon whose bank it first burst into life. We see it again a mere twig, susceptible of being bent in any shape by the tiny hand of childhood. If kept erect it grows in majesty and might, and becomes the most beautiful of its kind; if warped, or its upward course obstructed, it is doomed to a life of deformity, and to premature death. We look again, and it is the pride of the forest—its branches extend the broadest, and it can furnish a cooling shade, or protection from the storm to scores that walk the earth. Again, and its majesty is gone—it is the lifeless trunk that stands before us. Fit emblem of man! His existence at first is marked with helplessness, and but for maternal sustenance he perishes in an hour. In childhood he is susceptible of proper or improper culture. If trained aright, he becomes one of the honored and beloved of his race. And in proportion as wrong impressions are engrafted into the youthful mind, is his dishonor and degradation, and premature decay. In manhood we behold him, as the oak in maturity, shedding light and happiness upon all within his circle. But change its still written on his brow. We look again and behold him as the aged oak—his grandeur is gone; he stands but a feeble monument of his former existence; he sinks to the earth and the green sod covers his mortal remains, as the ivy covers the oak of the forest—but with this difference in the similitude: Man will live again. It is man that God has favored above other workmanship of his hands; to him has he promised a life beyond the grave—an eternal spring of life and joy, of immortality in mansions of purity and bliss.

A WONDERFUL INVENTION.

The Journal of Commerce makes known the following contrivance, which we hope may reduce the prices of straw bonnets—at present unreasonably high—not to say exorbitant:

Elisha Fitzgerald, a mechanic of this city, has invented a machine called the 'Tuscan Straw Braider.' It is so small and beautiful that it would be an ornament to a parlor, and so simple in its management that a child could attend a dozen or twenty of them with ease.

Having a quantity of the short straws which are imported from Tuscany put into a receptacle, it selects one at a time, and adds it to the braid, at the same time cutting off the refuse end of the one whose place it supplies, and forms the braid, with its iron fingers, much better than could ever be done by the most experienced braider in Tuscany, and with speed that one machine would do more work in a day than fifteen or twenty operatives. If a straw is too large, the machine rejects it, and if by any accident a straw is missed, it stops of itself.

This machine is a singularly compact instrument, requiring but about three square of room and built at a cost of about $300. The New York Tribune states that Mr. Elisha Fitzgerald the author of this trophy of American practical genius, is the youngest of six brothers, nearly all men of original and inventive mind. Daniel invented the Salamander Safe; Jesse the Portable Burr-Stone Mill; the three together the machine for braiding Manilla Grass, now extensively used for making Amazone and Neapolitan Bonnets. This was deemed a wondrous achievement, but it is thrown into the shade by the Tuscan Braiding Machine. This has hitherto encountered some difficulty in the practical working, which has been overcome, and the pattern Machine now picks up straw as quietly and aptly as though it had been doing that and nothing else since the days of Adam.

JAMES WATT'S BOYHOOD.

A friend of Mr. Watt one day came upon young James, stretched upon the ground, tracing with chalk all kinds of cross lines. 'Why do you suffer this child thus to trifle away his time?' exclaimed the visitor; 'send him to school.' 'You will do well to delay your judgment,' said the father, 'before condemning him, be good enough to find his occupation.' The harsh judgment was speedily reversed. The child of six years was solving a sum in geometry. 'James,' said Mrs. Muirhead, one day to her nephew, 'I never saw any boy more given to trifling than you are; can't you take a book and employ yourself usefully? There you have been sitting a whole hour without speaking a single word. Do you know what you have been about all this time? You have done nothing but shut and open and shut, the lid of the teakettle; and first, you have put the saucer in the steam from the spout, and then you have done nothing but pore over them, and bring together the drops formed by condensation on the surface of the china or the spoon. An't you ashamed of spending your time in that way?'—M. Arago.

[The boy was watching the action of steam, and he afterwards made the improvements to the steam engine which have led to the extensive use of that power in the present day.]

AN UPRIGHT JUDGE.—In the time of Judge Holt there was a riot in London, occasioned by the practice of sending young persons to the plantations, who were confined in a house in Holborn till they could be shipped off. Notice of the riot being sent to Whitehall, a party of the military was sent out; but before they marched an officer was sent to the chief justice to desire him to send some of his people with the soldiers. Holt asked the officer what he meant to do if the mob refused to disperse.

'My lord,' said he, 'we have orders to fire upon them.' 'Have you?' said Holt; 'then observe what I say. If one man is killed, I will take care that you and every soldier of your party shall be hanged. Sir, acquaint those that sent you that no officer of mine shall attend soldiers; and let them know, likewise, that the laws of this land are not to be executed by the sword. These things belong to the civil power, and you have nothing to do with them.'

So saying, he dismissed the officer, proceeded to the spot with his tipstaves, and prevailed upon the populace to disperse, on a promise that justice should be done and the abuse remedied.

Industry and economy will get rich, while sagacity and intrigue are laying their plans.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JULY 10, 1846.

THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL AT CLINTON.

Dr. Whittemore, of the Trumpet, thus notices the proceedings of our State Convention in reference to this Institution.

'At a late session of the New York Universalist Convention, resolutions were passed in regard to the Theological School at Clinton, N. Y., under the charge of Rev. T. J. Sawyer. Among other things it was resolved, that a Board of Trustees, consisting of fourteen persons, be appointed to have the charge of the School.'

After giving the names of the Trustees appointed, Br. W. says,

'These are all good men so far as we are acquainted with them; but we were not aware, until we saw the names, that it was designed to make the School exclusively a New York School. All the Trustees, both clergymen and laymen, it will be seen, belong to that State. This may be for the best; we trust it will. It would be vastly more difficult to get a Board together who were scattered over a wide extent of territory. We wish the School great success, and recommend it to all young men preparing for the ministry in the Universalist denomination.'

REMARKS.—In reference to the Theological School at Clinton being made 'exclusively a New York School,' we remark, that it was not, and is not, designed nor desired to make it such. Its friends desire it to be a school founded on the most liberal principles and for the benefit of the whole denomination throughout the Union. The subject was talked over in Council, and that desire universally expressed. But a few of the members feared that New England, which is certainly able to do much, would be disposed to do but little for any institution out of her own borders. They thought they had a right to infer this from the fact that so little was done at the great glorification meeting, in Boston, last fall, where much was said, but comparatively little pecuniary aid pledged for the object. True, these few members might have been mistaken in their apprehensions. We hope they were. For one, we can hardly believe that our brethren in New England, when they come to understand the matter in its true light, and see their own interests, as well as those of the denomination at large, will withhold their aid, or refuse to contribute their just proportion of the needed pecuniary aid. Clinton is about the centre of the great and central State of New York, and very near the centre of the great body of Universalists in America; and on account of the Liberal Institute located there, and many other advantages possessed by it, such as ease of access, cheapness of living, &c., &c., we think has claims which no other place we can now think of possesses. We desire therefore that it may be made the seat of a Theological School for our whole denomination, and that no local jealousies or unfriendly feelings may be cherished towards it in any quarter. We moreover desire that Dr. Ballou, of New England, whom the general voice of the denomination designates as a suitable person for the place, should become either principal, or associate Professor of Theology, and that he and Br. Sawyer, two of the best men for the place in our denomination, should conduct the School, not for a section merely, but for the whole of our order.

The committee appointed by the Convention to nominate Trustees for the Theological School, saw fit to nominate them all within the bounds of this State, for the reason, as we understood, that it would be next to, if not quite, impossible to induce those out of the State, if chosen, to attend the meeting of the Board; and the importance of a general attendance at such meetings must be obvious to all. And the Convention fell in with the nomination and appointed them accordingly. Who has not seen and known the difficulty of getting together any considerable number of men to act on such, or any similar business, especially when living far separated from each other and remote from the place of meeting? Even in the appointment of committees of no more than three or five, to act during the recess of the Convention, both of the States and of the Union, when they live remote from each other, the appointment is often rendered almost useless or nugatory. And would it not be so, almost certainly, with a board of fifteen or more trustees of a Theological school, scattered all over the Union? Action, decisive and concerted action, is what we want. And this the Convention sought to secure, by the appointment of the entire Board within the State where the School is located.

We have thought, however, since reading Br. Whittemore's article on the subject, that the general attendance of the Board of Trustees might be secured once a year, even if they resided in different States, provided the meeting were appointed at the time and place of the annual sessions of the General Convention. This is the only plan we can think of to secure a general attendance.—Should this plan be adopted, and to it we can see no objection, there might be an Executive Committee appointed, residing near the School, to manage its affairs and have the principal charge during the recess of the Board, and who should report their doings annually at such meetings.

Should it be thought advisable to adopt this plan, we should most cheerfully resign our post in favor of any good brother in New England, or in any part of the Union; and we doubt not every member of the Board would willingly do the same. Come, brethren of the press, what say you to this plan? Speak out freely: and don't be at all mealy-mouthed.

One thing more in relation to Trustees, if that office is coveted; we propose that each State in the Union shall raise as large an amount of funds as practicable, and have as many Trustees assigned to it in proportion to the whole number chosen, as the proportion of funds it raises bears to the whole amount of funds raised. This will certainly be fair for all. Now then, let us see which State shall, according to this rule, be entitled to the greatest number of Trustees. We hope no New England State will be behind New York. D. S.

REV. JOSEPH HARTWELL'S SECOND HANDBILL.

Our readers will recollect that some months since a letter was published in our columns addressed by Br. D. S. Morey to Rev. Joseph Hartwell of Stockbridge upon his rude and uncivil conduct at a funeral at Morrisville, in refusing to comply with the wishes of the mourners. This letter called out a reply from Mr. H. in handbill form, which was noticed at the time of its publication in this paper. Subsequently, by request of our friends in that neighborhood, Br. M. replied to his handbill in a similar form. After a long delay, Mr. H. has come out with a second handbill, of similar length to his first, addressed to 'D. S. Morey, Preacher of Universalism,' which, although characterized by the usual cant phrases, vulgar slang and vituperation against Universalism and its advocates, for which his sect has become so distinguished of late, exhibits some peculiar marks of wisdom on his part and of great condescension and compassion towards Universalism and its defenders!

He begins thus: 'Sir, I now see that your first letter needed no reply, as it reacted upon yourself, and the only injury it produced was upon your own cause.' Why then reply, Mr. H., if it needed no reply? And if the only injury it produced was to the cause of Universalism, why attempt to screen the doctrine from that injury? Did you love the cause of Universalism so well you could not bear to see it perish by the hand of its own advocate, and so came to its rescue yourself? What magnanimity! what condescension to a fallen enemy! How great must be the obligations of Br. Morey and the Universalist public, to be thus saved from utter ruin by the interposition of the generous and magnanimous Rev. Joseph Hartwell! Mirabile dictu! But this is not all: he proceeds—'And as your second (letter) is less plausible than the first, and its false statements more obvious, I could not, until now, see the least reason why it should be refuted.' Well, this is more marvelous still: the first letter, being nothing, except an injury to Universalism, and yet to prevent the total ruin of the cause by its own friends, Mr. H. condescends to come to the rescue, and the second being less than the first—i. e. less than nothing—Mr. H. in the astonishing depth of his condescension, has stooped as far below zero as Mr. M.'s second letter was below his first! Was there ever the like before? Can his equal be found in all the universe beside?

We do not design to review this most cogent and wonderful production of Mr. H., but simply to let the world know its obligations to the great man who is its author. We can not, however, forbear to notice one or two instances of the peculiarly keen discernment of our author. One instance is seen in his first column in the fact that he discovered in the kindness and courtesy of Mr. L. (the father of the deceased whose funeral he attended) evidence that Mr. L. approved of his one-sided and illiberal course on that occasion. Another instance is found in his quoting, (column 3d,) and attributing to Br. Morey as his language, the language of a correspondent of this paper of March 27th, in which he says, 'Sin is a part of the divine economy. It seems to be a necessary result of the present state of things, without which God could never have made himself known to man.' This correspondent was writing at the time on the doctrine of necessity, in opposition to one of our preachers who had in a previous number argued against that doctrine. It must be the remarkable keenness of his discernment that enabled Mr. H. to discover Br. Morey's language in that of a very different person residing some hundreds of miles distant! It can not be that he intended to misrepresent Br. M., for this would not be indicative of a 'first rate good man,' as he makes the widow of the deceased say he is, if we recollect rightly, in his first handbill!

As another evidence of the acuteness of his discernment, Mr. H. admits that State's prison convicts generally reject the doctrine of Universalism and favor that of endless misery. This he considers highly complimentary to the latter and derogatory to the former doctrine! Thus he has discernment enough to be proud of his associate believers in endless misery, who have been so unfortunate as to be incarcerated within the walls of a Penitentiary! His condescension, his great love and kindness towards Universalism and Universalists are only equalled by his good fellowship and hearty communion with the views of State-prison convicts. Really, Mr. H.'s handbill ought to, and we presume will, have an extensive circulation, that the whole world, and especially all Universalists may know their obligations to so distinguished a benefactor.

Br. Morey has been absent on a visit to Michigan for some two months past. Whether he will see this marvelous production in the far west, or whether, if he were here, he would deem it necessary to answer or pay any attention to it or not, we can not say. We presume, however he will be perfectly contented to let the matter rest as it is, inasmuch as Mr. H. has had the wonderful condescension, in his absence, to come to the rescue of Universalism and undertaken to save it from being utterly ruined by Br. M.'s first letter and worse than ruined by his second. D. S.

EASTON, PA.

Some of our friends in the place above named having always supported the Rev. J. P. Hecht, of the Lutheran church, on account of his liberality of sentiment, preaching, and practice, have united with 'the Independent Church of Christ,' newly organized there, for the purpose of inducing Mr. H. to resume his ministerial labors under more favorable auspices than existed at the time of their suspension. For circumstances now removed and not necessary to be named here, had given Mr. Hecht's enemies an opportunity to punish him for his noble and liberal conduct to our preachers who first visited Easton, and they were not slow in availing themselves of it. But as soon as these circumstances were removed, (as they have been for some months past,) the above named church was organized, and a neat frame building, handsomely finished within and without for an Armory, was rented from the Corps owning and occupying it. A pulpit was then placed in it, seats fixed, aisles covered with matting, and Mr. Hecht was invited to preach to them on terms mutually agreed on, his views and feelings in regard to the teachings of divine revelation and human duty. People and preacher being thus left perfectly free and untrammelled in judgment, conscience and speech, he complied with their invitation, and the relation thus established yet continues.

Having been informed that an exchange could be had, and was even desirable to our friends, arrangements were made, accordingly, for one on the 21st inst.—each of the preachers and the congregations to be, of course, untrammelled thereby in speech, or faith, or ecclesiastical relations. Of the journey to effect this exchange, and the events accompanying it, I would now inform you and your readers, believing the information interesting to you and them.

The road is a good one from here to Easton—distance, 54 miles; fare, one dollar; country, very fertile, highly cultivated, and delightful; settled by a German population, of course. Having some relatives to visit at Bethlehem, and an engagement to address the five Lodges of Odd Fellows in Easton and South Easton, on the 19th, I took time by the forelock, and left home on Tuesday morning preceding. My home during my visit was with an acquaintance of 'auld lang syne' whom I had not seen in the flesh for 16 years, although we had communed occasionally by letter. Any ministering brother passing through Easton, will confer a favor on the friends there, by giving notice before hand, that they may have a chance to make an appointment for him; and will also find a home during his stay at the same place, by calling on Charles H. Williams, Esq., the Collector at that place for the Delaware Division of the Pa. Canals. A Universalist preacher will find a few, but good brethren in Easton, and some friends beside, whose hospitality will make his stay among them very pleasant.

Rev. J. P. Hecht, late pastor of the German Lutheran church in Easton, is a gentleman of superior natural abilities, and of most amiable character and manners. His education and acquirements are of a superior order, and he preaches equally well in the English and German languages. For many years he has preached the same sentiments as at present, as many of his hearers testify—that is, he has avoided countenancing the dogma of endless hell torments, and every idea connected with it, and dwelt wholly on those views of God's character and government, which are calculated to exalt his goodness and loveliness in the minds of his children. I do not suppose that he now does, or ever did, preach the doctrine of universal salvation, positively and strongly—but rather, (if at all,) in the manner set forth by many believers of Universalism among the German divines, and English Unitarians. But his views and practices of toleration are decided and liberal. On the first appearance of our preachers in Easton, he stood out boldly as the defender of their right to be heard and to be well-treated by the public, and to be recognised as fellow Christians by other denominations. Since then he has passed through many and severe trials, but he still occupies the same liberal ground as at first.

The United States Armory, which his congregation occupy stately for public worship, is well located, about 70 feet long by 30 wide, well lighted, and ventilated, and furnished, and will seat about 470 to 500 persons. Should they purchase it, and obtain a long lease of the ground, (as they desire to do,) they will fit it up with a vestibule, and a singing gallery.

'The Independent Church of Christ,' as they term their present organization, is constituted mainly with reference to the support of Mr. Hecht as a public speaker—to furnish him with a full, free utterance of what he believes to be divine truth. The most active members are open and avowed Universalists, and probably a majority of the contributors are more favorable to Universalism than to any other distinctive sentiment. They earnestly desire, or the sake of Mr. Hecht, as well as for their own personal gratification, and the advancement of what they deem to be truth, to procure as many exchanges as possible, between him and our nearest preachers—especially those in New York and Philadelphia. And with a view to aid them, I have been more full in my statements than I otherwise should have been; and now proceed to add several items of information by way of additional inducements.

The sublime scenery of the Delaware Water Gap, of which tourists have written so warmly, is but 20 miles above Easton, and well worth a visit, especially for preachers who for months together are shut up in dusty streets, by heated walls. The distance of Easton from New York is about 60 or 70 miles—rail-road from New York to Somerville, N. J., and stage from thence to Easton, 30 miles—fare for the whole distance, $2.50. From Philadelphia to Easton is about 50 miles—fare, $2.50.—From Easton to Reading is 54 miles—fare, only $1.00, (and to see me will be worth that sum to any old friend of mine!) and from here to Philadelphia, by rail-road, is $2.25—distance, 54 miles. By coming or going from Philadelphia or Easton via Reading, a very slight additional cost will be incurred, and a very great additional amount of pleasure added to the journey. Besides, we Readingers are always ready to hear a stranger preach! While at Easton, it will be very easy to visit South Easton, with its manufactories; and Nazareth, that singularly quiet and beautiful Moravian village is only two hours distant. Bethlehem, another beautiful Moravian village, and Allentown, (where there is a free Hall and many skeptics,) and Kutztown, are on the stage-route to this place. And let me add, in conclusion, there are few handsomer and more interesting places to visitors than Reading, with its machine shops, foundries, rolling mills, anthracite furnaces, and rail-road with monster coal trains. I hope, therefore, that our ministering brethren who can make it convenient to visit Easton, (on exchange with the Rev. Mr. Hecht, or otherwise,) will do so, and call to see

Reading, Pa., June 26th, 1846.

GENERAL REFORM ASSOCIATION.

The Universalist Convention of Massachusetts, at its late session, appointed a Committee to call a meeting for the purpose of forming a General Reform Association, to consider and report upon the various subjects of reform which are now so much agitated in the Northern, Middle and Western States. We presume this was intended as a prudential measure, and designed as the only effectual means of keeping out of our ecclesiastical bodies the agitation of such subjects as are foreign from the objects of such bodies, such for instance as those embraced by the late Circular and Protest, and others kindred to it. If such was the design of the measure, we commend the wisdom of the movers thereof.

THE COUNTRY PASTOR AND HIS MACHINATIONS.

We would earnestly call the attention of our readers and of the public generally to the exposition, furnished by Br. J. T. Goodrich and published in the last and this week's Magazine and Advocate, of the schemes and machinations of a 'Country Pastor' (the title he assumed in the New York Observer) and his coadjutors in Preston, to exclude Universalists from the school-house in that town, and Austin's 'Voice to Youth' and Combe on the 'Constitution of Man' from the Libraries of Common Schools. The real 'Snakes in the Grass,' are now sufficiently manifest to put our friends and the public on their guard against their snakeships and their wiles. Had the plottings and schemings of Mr. Dyer and his co-laborers succeeded, not only would they have triumphed in Preston, but throughout the State; and the entering wedge thus admitted, would have been driven up till all unsectarian works, both moral and scientific, would have been driven from our Common School Libraries, and the blue light publications of the American Tract Society substituted for them. And moreover, the builders and owners of school houses could not have been allowed the contrivof their own property, or the occupancy thereof for the peaceable worship of God according to their own consciences.

We thank God, and the laws under which we live, and our faithful and straight forward State Superintendent of Common Schools, for defeating this wicked, narrow minded, selfish and bigotted plot. May it be a warning to all other similar plotters against justice and right. We thank Br. Goodrich also for his just and seasonable exposure of this Preston plot. He deserves and will receive the thanks of the community at large; and we believe the posterity of these very schemers will have reason to thank him. Let the 'Snakes in the Grass' look out for their heads: for 'the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head.'

Our readers will recollect that Br. Goodrich has more matter in reserve for the future bearing on this subject.

M. H. SMITH.

Br. Whittemore copies what he calls the 'Latest Ecclesiastical Intelligence,' from the 'Congregational Journal,' which is the following:

'Rev. M. Hale Smith. We learn that Mr. S. has closed his labors in the city of Washington.'

Truly, this is a brief sojourn for a settled minister in the Capital! But then, it should be recollected that Mr. S. is uncommonly smart, and generally does up his business in short order. Moreover, his universal benevolence is so great, he probably could not in conscience bear to confine it exclusively, or for any great length of time to one city, though that were the Capital of the nation, while 'the boundless macrocosm's' his.

DEDICATIONS, INSTALLATIONS, &c.—On the 18th ult., the new and beautiful Universalist meeting house recently erected at Beverly, Mass., was dedicated to the worship of the One true God and Father. Sermon by Br. S. Cobb, of Boston.

In the afternoon of the same day, Br. J. L. Stevens was installed as pastor of the society worshipping in the house. Sermon by Br. Ballou, 2d. A large number of ministering brethren were present on the occasion and took parts in the interesting services.

Br. Quincy Whittemore was ordained to the pastoral care of the Universalist society in Sterling, Mass., on the 18th ult. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou of Boston.

Br. Asa Spaulding, of Stoddard was ordained as an evangelist at the late session of the Universalist Convention of New Hampshire in Manchester, of that State.

The church recently purchased of the Episcopalians, by the Universalist society in Amesbury, Mass., has been recently enlarged and fitted up anew, and was dedicated to the universal Father on the 27th of May, ult. Sermon by Br. S. Cobb.

Dedication at Erie.—We learn from the Western Evangelist that the new and beautiful meeting house lately erected by the Universalist society at Erie, Pa., was solemnly dedicated to the purposes of Divine worship, on Saturday the 27th ult. The Introductory Prayer was offered by Br. A. Bond; Reading of Scriptures by Br. E. S. Everett; Sermon by Br. S. R. Smith; Dedicatory prayer by Br. N. Stacy. Brs. Whitney and Alvord were also present. Several of the brethren staid over the Sabbath, and a happy and glorious meeting was enjoyed.—The society in Erie is in a flourishing condition. Though now destitute of a pastor, they desire to, and will doubtless soon secure the labors of some faithful and efficient minister of the reconciliation to break to them the bread of life. Erie is an important location, and we hope it may be occupied by the right man.

Br. G. W. Montgomery's sermon preached at the funeral of Br. Ames Underwood, is thankfully received and shall have an early insertion. We have also a good sermon from Br. J. Stebbins which we will soon give a place. Br. J. J. Austin's Valedictory at Lebanon also just received and shall have place.

PAINFUL NEWS OF BR. G. ROGERS.

It is painful to learn, as by the following article copied from the Star-in the West, that Br. George Rogers is so feeble and so far reduced that little hopes are entertained of his recovery. We fervently hope, not for his sake alone, but for that of his family and the cause of truth, that the fears expressed may be without just foundation. But whether so or not, the appeal to the liberality of our brethren is proper, and we hope will be answered by a corresponding liberality.

BR. GEORGE ROGERS. During a connection of about seventeen years with the Universalist ministry this Brother has preached, more or less extensively, in all the States of the Union, excepting Vermont and the Carolinas—also in the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, and in Canada. Mainly however, his labors have been in the West and South.

He has recently returned to Cincinnati utterly broken down in health, and with no prospect of even hope of recovery. We can not of course know what the issue will be; but we have little doubt that ere many months we shall lay his body in the bosom of mother Earth.

If we can render him comfortable, and do a little for his wife and three children in the event of his departure, we shall verify the observation of an ancient worthy, that we have 'not seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread.'

Br. R. is poor. He has made people rich in the things of the heavenly kingdom; and shall we err if we ask for aid, in his behalf at our own suggestion, from generous brethren who reside in the range of his extensive travels? We seek not the widow's mite, and will not be importunate with even the wealthy. We appeal to the generosity of the brotherhood for a testimonial of love, which in all probability will come too late if it be long deferred. Nevertheless, even if it be delayed for a season it will be of service to those of his family whom he shall leave behind.

Brother Editors will please copy this Memorandum—and the correspondents of Br. Rogers will understand why his communications have ceased.

JOHN A. GURLEY,
ABEL C. THOMAS.

The 'Universalist Assistant,' by Br. D. Forbes, price 50 cents. 'Adventures of Elder Tub,' comprising important and startling disclosures concerning hell; its magnitude, morals, employments, climate, &c. To which is added, 'The old man of the hill side.' This book is by Br. George Rogers, price 50 cents. 'Floral Fortune Teller,' by Miss S. C. Edgerton, 38 cents. Also volumes I and II of Paige's Commentary. Balch's Manual for Sunday schools, &c.

FRAGMENTS.

Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.—BIBLE.

Precept and example. United they possess an irresistible power; divided, the former is useless, and the latter crippled.

Pity, is often bestowed upon the poor and unfortunate. There are none but what are ever ready to pity those who are in adversity. Reader; why is there such an abundance of pity bestowed by man upon his brother man? Because it costs nothing. Were it worth a penny a pound, some would not be so abundantly supplied as at present!

CONSCIENCE.—The name of a venerable old gentleman who has long been wandering o'er the world. Why does he wander? Because he has but few friends, and no continued abiding place!

A man may act properly so far as he knows. Beyond this, his value is unspeakable.

'Faith without works is dead.' So saith the Scripture. Alas! that there should be so much death in the world; and so many who are ever ready to make a virtue of necessity and endeavor to get to heaven by such a death.

'Live and let live.' Would that it were always so; but there are too many who are determined to live, any how!

A man of sense will command the respect and esteem of his fellow men—a simpleton with gold will get along tolerably well—but a fool without money is in a bad fix.

The deed and the motive are two things. The former attracts the most attention; but the latter shows the brute or the man.

To-morrow, never should have entered the catalogue of words. It has been the fruitful source of disappointment, regret, and misery. 'There is no to-morrow,' said Uncle Toby, spiritedly. 'Then I will do it to-day,' said Trim. It was done! S. J. G.

On Saturday the 4th of July, 1846, will commence the Fifth Semi-Annual Volume of

THE GOLDEN RULE, AND ODD FELLOWS FAMILY COMPANION.

Mail Subscribers Two Dollars a Year, payable in advance.

We commence a new volume of the GOLDEN RULE under the most favorable auspices. Every where, throughout the Union, it has been received by the Brotherhood with a cordial welcome, as is evinced by an accession of over Seven Thousand additional subscribers during the past twelve months. Encouraged in our labors by this unmistakable testimony of the approval of the Order, we shall continue our exertions to render the GOLDEN RULE equal to any other periodical in the country. It is the oldest weekly in the United States devoted to the interests of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and will continue, as heretofore, to give the earliest and most complete intelligence of the progress of the Order; to illustrate and defend its principles against the assaults of the ignorant and prejudiced; and occasionally to give, in an Extra, a full Directory of Lodges and Encampments throughout the jurisdiction of the G. L. U. S. and in all other respects present to the brotherhood whatever is of interest in the wide field of Odd Fellowship—thus rendering the GOLDEN RULE indispensable to every member of our wide-spread and rapidly increasing fraternity. As an entertaining Literary Family Journal, the GOLDEN RULE shall not be exceeded by any other. In its Literary Department no labor will be spared which can add to its attraction or value. Original and selected tales and poetry by some of the ablest and most popular writers, will form a distinctive feature—which, while adding to the entertainment of the reader, shall, as far as possible, have for their object the inculcation of an elevated morality and virtuous and correct principles. Nor shall we neglect the Useful and Intellectual, but give articles illustrating the Progress of the Age in Arts, Science, and Philosophy—Incidents of Travel—Extracts from New Works of Merit; Popular Reading for the Family Circle; a Department for the Ladies; Amusement, etc., etc.

THE GOLDEN RULE is published every Saturday at 30 Ann street, on a double medium sheet of sixteen large octavo pages, making two handsome library volumes a year, of 416 pages each, with title page and index.

It is important that every brother who wishes to obtain the GOLDEN RULE from the beginning of the new volume, should subscribe without delay, so as to obtain the back numbers.

TERMS.—Mail subscribers $2 a year in advance. Any brother obtaining five subscribers and remitting $10, shall receive a copy for his services.

E. WINCHESTER, of Stirling Lodge, No. 190. Publication office 30 Ann street, N. Y.

Br. HICKS will preach in Graves' Hollow on the fourth Sunday in July.

DEATHS.

In Auburn, on the 23d ult., AMOS UNDERWOOD, Esq., aged — years. The deceased had long been a resident in this place. For many years he had taken an active part in the public affairs of the community—had received numerous offices of trust and responsibility—was very extensively known and respected as an honorable man and a useful citizen. His loss is deeply felt. Probably no individual could have been taken from our midst, who would be so sensibly missed as the deceased. As a business man his abilities were of the highest order, and he possessed the entire confidence of the public. Strictly honest himself in all his dealings—prompt in the fulfilment of all his engagements—faithful to all trusts reposed in him—he naturally and rightfully required the exercise of the same qualities and principles in those with whom he had dealings, and was rigid in his actions of those who were disposed to violate them. By enlightened enterprise, untiring industry, and strict economy, he succeeded in acquiring a large fortune, sufficient to make his numerous family comfortable for life. He was a kind husband and affectionate parent. His attachment to his family was great; and it was his constant exertion to educate his children, and assist them to become valued and useful members of society. And the respectability with which they have entered upon active life, attests the success of his efforts. His family mourn his death, with a regret that can not be expressed. To them it is a loss which nothing in this life can replace. The deceased was brought up in the belief of the prevailing Orthodox sentiments in religion. But about twelve years since, he embraced the Gospel of the world's salvation, with an ardor characteristic of him in all his proceedings. His love for that doctrine, since he received it as the truth of God, has apparently been the predominant feeling in his mind. He has ever frankly and openly proclaimed his belief in its sublime and heavenly teachings—exerted himself to diffuse its light to others—and yielded it a steady and most generous support. As an indication of his attachment to his religion, and of the generosity of his heart, it should be mentioned that a few weeks before his death, he subscribed the sum of one thousand dollars towards the new Universalist church now erecting in Auburn. And in his will provision was made for a generous yearly annuity from his estate for the benefit of the Universalist society in Auburn. A most noble and worthy example for the imitation of the wealthy! It is a source of great satisfaction to know that the religion which he so highly prized and liberally supported in life, imparted to him its sweet and soothing consolations in death. He departed with its bright hopes, and soul-sustaining promises, strong and vigorous in his soul. May the richest consolations of the Gospel descend on those who mourn his loss. His funeral was attended by a large concourse of sympathising friends and neighbors; and an appropriate and able discourse was delivered (in the absence of the writer of this notice) by Br. G. W. Montgomery of Rochester. J. M. A.

In the village of Adams, Jefferson co., June 8th, GEORGE ANDRUS, Esq., aged 46 years. Possessed of a discriminating mind and strong social affections, he was well calculated for usefulness and enjoyment. As a companion, father, citizen and civil officer, he will long be remembered and lamented. His remarkable decision of character enabled him to correct what every man should correct, that is, his own errors; and after living many years with the respect and esteem of his acquaintances, he died with an unblemished moral character. He reared a family of twelve children, ten of whom are supposed to be living; who, as their mother has also gone to the land of spirits, are now orphans indeed. His faith in 'the living God, who is the Saviour of all men' was unshaken through the changes of life and in the perils of death: giving him the consolation which 'the world can neither give nor take away.'

In compliance with his request, the writer of this notice performed his funeral services on the 9th inst., in the presence of numerous relatives, acquaintances and friends.—May the afflicted ever remember that 'God smites to bless, and wounds to heal.' P. M.

Henderson, June 24, 1846.

At Little Falls, on the 29th ult., Mrs. ANN MARIA, wife Charles Petrie, and daughter of Shadrach Dunning of Hamilton county, N. Y., aged 21 years, leaving an only child of ten days old. She departed this life rejoicing in the faith and hope of meeting her kindred and friends in a world of bliss beyond the grave. M. M. R.

BE KIND TO EACH OTHER.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

Be kind to each other!
 The night's coming on,
 When friend and when brother
 Perchance may be gone!
 Then 'midst our dejection,
 How sweet to have earned
 The blest recollection
 Of kindness—returned!
 When the day hath departed,
 And memory keeps
 Her watch, broken-hearted,
 Where all she loved sleeps!

Let falsehood assail not,
 Nor envy disprove—
 Let trifles prevail not Against those ye love!
 Nor change with to-morrow,
 Should fortune take wing,
 But the deeper the sorrow,
 The closer still cling!
 Oh, be kind to each other!
 The night's coming on,
 When friend and when brother
 Perchance may be gone!

MINUTES

Of the Black River Association of Universalists for 1846.

The Council of the Black River Association met according to previous adjournment at the village of Fulton, Oswego county, June 17. Prayer by Br. Boughton. Chose Br. P. Morse, Moderator, and Br. H. Boughton, Clerk. Read, and approved the proceedings of last year. Received credentials of delegates, and read letters from various societies. Voted that Brs. Hawes, Wood and Case, be a committee to arrange public services. Ministering brethren from other Associations were requested to participate in our deliberations. The committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of conferring ordination of Br. L. M. Hawes; and granting letters of fellowship to Brs. Bradford and Mendall. Report adopted. Brs. Morse, Boughton and Rice appointed a committee on fellowship and ordination for the ensuing year. Brs. Boughton and Hawes, (clerical,) and Brs. Thayer and R. D. Murray (lay) delegates to the State Convention in May, 1847, with power to appoint substitutes and fill vacancies. Committee on discipline reported that charges had been preferred against Br. Wm. Sias by the society in Mexico—that said Br. had acknowledged some impropriety in conduct, promising to make suitable amends, and to give no cause for complaint in future. Council voted against adopting said report. And referred the case embraced therein to a committee of three for a final decision. Voted that the standing committee of discipline be said committee. Voted that this body, when it adjourns, adjourn to meet in Henderson, Jefferson county, on the third Wednesday in June, 1847. Voted that the thanks of this council be presented to the Trustees of the Wesleyan church for the use of their house on the present occasion.—Voted that the Standing Clerk be empowered to appoint Conferences for the ensuing year, according to request. Voted that Br. Rice preach the next Occasional Sermon. Voted that the Clerk of this council prepare the minutes of the proceedings for publication.

Resolved, That a meeting, or Conference, be held in Mexico, Oswego county, the first Wednesday in September next, for the purpose of taking into consideration the subject of Missionary operations within our limits.

Resolved, That Br. P. Morse be a committee to prepare a plan for the above enterprise.

STATISTICS.—Watertown Society, one hundred members.—Sabbath School—scholars, 80—teachers 24—S. S. Library, 200 volumes. Preaching every Sabbath. Fulton.—This Society numbers about 40—and in connection therewith is a Sabbath School, numbering about 30 scholars. Preaching each Sabbath. Mexico.—This Society numbers 45.—No stated preaching since the first of April last.

Ministers present.—P. Morse, W. Sias, Henderson—M. B. Smith, Albion—N. Brown, Howlet Hill—L. Rice, Ellisburgh—J. Mendell, Dexter—J. S. Kibbe, at large—J. B. Sax, Cuba—W. D. Bradford, Volney—L. M. Hawes, Fulton—H. Boughton, Watertown.

Lay Delegates.—H. Bates, D. Stanley, Henderson—J. Case, G. Wood, Fulton—B. Thayer, C. D. Burlingame, Mexico—Isaac Mendell, E. Palmer, Ellisburgh.

REMARKS.—Our meeting this year was pleasant, and, to all appearance, profitable. The business of the Council was conducted with harmony and brotherly feeling. The preaching was listened to with marked attention, and by a goodly number, from various parts of our Association. On the second day, in the afternoon, Br. L. M. Hawes was solemnly ordained to the work of an Evangelist.—The order of exercises was as follows:—Sermon by Br. P. Morse. Prayer by Br. H. Boughton. Charge and delivery of Scriptures by Br. M. B. Smith. Right hand of fellowship by Br. J. B. Sax.

The society in Fulton are entitled to our heartfelt gratitude for the true Christian kindness with which they received and entertained us. May God reward them for the same—and may He continue to bless them and their beloved pastor with spiritual prosperity and enjoyment. H. BOUGHTON.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the Christian Universalist Association of Canada West.

Met in the village of Bloomfield, Prince Edward District, on Friday the 12th of June, 1846. Organized the Council by choosing Br. ALEXANDER McDONALD, Moderator, and Br. A. G. LAURIE, Clerk.

Received the credentials of delegates from the Universalist Society in the Victoria District, from those of London and Sparta, in the London District, and of Smithville, Niagara District.

Voted, That Br. Basil R. Church and Alexander McCrae, from the Johnstown District Congregations, be invited to participate in the deliberations of the Council.—Voted, That Brs. Joseph Baker, William Sias, J. P. Averill, and Jones Mendell, Ministering Brethren from the State of New York, be invited to participate in the deliberations of this body.—Voted, That this Association appoint a delegation to attend the North American Convention, (General Convention) to be held in Troy, N. Y. in Sept. next, to request a religious Union and Fellowship with that Convention, while (for local and peculiar reasons,) respectfully declining any disciplinary Union with or subordination to that body.—Voted, That our brethren of like precious faith in Canada East, who have formed themselves into Societies, be solicited to organize an Association, and send a delegation to the next annual meeting of this Association, in order to form a Provincial Convention.—Voted, That this body recommend to the several Societies in its Fellowship, to raise funds annually, sufficient to defray the expenses of their respective delegations to and from the meeting of this Convention.—Voted, That Br. David Leavitt, Clerical, and Brs. Benjamin Fralick, Alvah Stuart and D. I. Woodward, lay, compose the delegation to attend the N. Am. Convention, with power to appoint Substitutes.—Voted, That Revs. D. Leavitt, Benjamin Fralick and Ezra Mallory, be a Committee to consider what mode of discipline shall be adopted in cases of persons assuming our name and preaching within the limits of our Association while unconnected with this body.—Voted, That Br. B. R. Church, of Merrickville, Johnstown District; Br. B. Fralick, of Bellville, Victoria Dist., and Br. Joseph Forsyth, of London, London District, be a Committee to name time and place for the next annual meeting, and that said Committee are required to notify the Standing Clerk as to the result of their decision on or before the first day of May next, that so he may publish the notice betimes, in the most convenient Periodical.

The Standing Committee reported in favor of granting letters of Fellowship to Revd. David Leavitt, and request that before the close of this Session, he be solemnly ordained a Minister of the Blessed Gospel.—They moreover state that no cause of complaint has come under their notice during the past year. Report accepted, and request gladly granted.

Voted, That the thanks of this Association be rendered to the Revd. Brethren, Baker, Sias, Averill and Mendell, for their assistance in the deliberation of the Council.

Voted, That the thanks of this body be presented to Br. Alexander McDonald, for conduct in the chair; and adjourned to meet in 1847 at such time and place as the Committee shall select.

A true copy, (Signed,) D. LEAVITT, Standing Clerk.

Our Session was very pleasant Br. Price, and we trust profitable. About a thousand attentive listeners hung upon the ministration of the word, apparently with deep interest and joy. On the closing Sabbath, we assembled in one of God's temples, a very lovely grove; and after the Ordination Sermon by Br. Baker, (an excellent one it was too,) we proceeded solemnly to consecrate to the work of the Lord our very worthy and beloved Br. Leavitt. Ordaining Prayer by Br. Laurie; Charge, and presentation of Bible, by Br. Sias: Right Hand of Fellowship, Br. Laurie.

The Tabernacles of Zion are enlarging and multiplying in our beloved land. Verily, the harvest is great, but—Ministering brethren in the States do you hear us?—the laborers woefully few. Two preachers only in this immense stretch of country! Who will come and help us, who? Come and cast your bread upon the waters—a return will be given, and we trust a rich one—even though, after many days. There are, it is true, discouraging circumstances in the way, but will they ever be removed from the way without effort? Can no Association in the State of New York send a Missionary to the Johnstown District? There are Carlton Place, Merrickville, Dalhousie, (a congregation of Scotch Universalists) and Ramsay, a promising field, of labor. Merrickville, the residence of Dr. and Mrs. Church, is 25 miles in the rear of the beautiful village of Brockville.—[Messenger. A. G. L.]

FUNERAL DISCOURSE,

Preached in Auburn, June 25, 1846, on the death of Mr. Amos Underwood.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

[Published by request.]

'But man dieth and wasteth away: yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?' Job xiv: 10.

The occasion which has called us together, is full of solemnity and interest. The mourning are weeping—the friendly are sad—while the minds of all should be impressed with the lesson of our mortality, which speaks from the voice of wailing, and in the scenes of earthly change. A sermon from the stars that have disappeared from among the lights of the firmament—a lecture from the crumbling mountains—an eloquence from the sere leaf of autumn—a question from the crowded dominions of death—are all asking, 'for, what is your life?' And an answer comes from the countless generations who have glided into the darkness of the past, 'it is even a vapor that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away.' Is it not so? Take one life—compare it with the age of the world; and is it more than a gush of mist flying by on the wings of the storm? Or if we look at the whole mass of life, its constant recession from existence, it is like vapor that 'vanisheth away.' All life is passing—it comes; it is; it passes forever.

It is astonishing what amount of life has disappeared. For six thousand years it has been pouring a constant stream into the vast ocean of death. The city that is now deserted, was once peopled by a busy multitude, eager for gain, for applause, for the honors and luxuries of this life. The hall that is crumbling to ruins, the abode of owls and bats, overrun with twining ivy, its courts deserted, its columns and statues overthrown, and its walks choked with weeds, was once tenanted with a gay crowd, echoed with the laugh of pleasure, and sheltered those who were busy with thoughts of this world, its cares, its sorrows, its joys. The plains which once bore large cities, were trodden down by the proud war-horse and his armed rider, and the legions of well appointed warriors, over which passed the caravans of a busy people, are now silent—the cities have fallen; the war-horse and his rider both sleep in the dust; the armies have melted away; and the merchant and his camel are overthrown by all-rapacious death. The hall of mirth no more knows its inhabitants—the wild-bird, the worm, the moth, have taken their places.

Death is busy. He knows no feebleness. He roams in all climes. Into every dwelling he finds an entrance—to all beings he sends his summons; and his summons is never disobeyed. Under his power, generation after generation has gone down to the tomb, like immense shadows gliding by on a wall, to return here no more forever. Like the Aurora Borealis, they flashed into life, and then, with a few faint gleams, passed into the regions of darkness.

How almost innumerable are the modes by which human life is ended. Subjection to a bad fashion—damp air playing in the lungs—organic disease—pale consumption—a slight cold—a single rush of blood to the head—swift and blighting contagion—burning fever gliding in every artery and vein—a blast of electric fluid—the terrific earthquake—the storm—all unfold death for man; and then, his earthly house returns to its original dust. Where, oh where, in what corner of the earth, does not death lurk in search for its victims? The spiny lands of a tropical sun, know him—the more temperate regions of light and wisdom, are visited by him—and well is he known amid the ices of the poles. The palace and the hovel; the mansion and the dungeon; the king and the beggar; the aged and the young; the middle aged and the infant—are all visited by king Death.

It would be useless to disguise the fact, that death, while performing his work, creates great affliction. Death alone, brings no joy—his arrows are always dipped in pain—and though those whose society has not been visited by the pale king, dream not of the grief which distills in his pathway; yet when some fondly loved one, a husband, wife, father, mother, brother, sister, or a child enwrapped with the beautiful outgoings of a parent's love, are called to garnish the halls of the tomb, the soul is filled with anguish. Yet, in the midst of this distress, God has not left us without consolation. For when affliction shrivels up the tenderest affections by the dissolution of the object around whom they were fondly woven—when frequent and repeated death-scenes bring to our ears the unerring truth, that sooner or later we must no longer look upon the attracting forms of nature's glory, but fall down in the banquetting house of the worm, to return to the quiet embrace of mother earth—then Hope, which God has so mercifully given us, goes boldly into the tomb, and emerging from its shadows, pictures forth a life of pure felicity, of ennobling scenes, of endless being; where all that makes human nature dignified and worthy of its Creator, shall expand with purer powers, until mind shall swell into a seraph of immortality. This enchanting work Hope brings forth in the soul of man while he looks upon death, and realizes that stern fate is hurrying him to that dark ocean, from whose waters no being has a return-voyage to the shores and changes of transitory and mortal life.

But are these tales of hope TRUE? Can it be that the desires of man for unfading life, are given us by Him who intends to fulfil them, or are they mere dreams, the outbreaks of disturbed fancy, which live and perish with those who cherish them? Who shall answer these questions? What voice speaks in thrilling tones of immortality? Will the assurance come from the physical heavens? There are vast and complicated wonders there, displaying infinite wisdom and skill—wonders which no human eye can fathom, no human thought reach.—The bodies of light we behold, are suns and planetary worlds, overwhelming in size, grand in all their relations, which with the gigantic systems that are continually springing into active being, send forth a glorious song from the organ of their movements to the praise of Him who is sublimer than all His works. But with all their grandeur, they send no voice down to earth, that for mind there is an immortality more enduring than their existence.

Will the assurance come from earth? The earth is mighty—and in all the sciences which display knowledge of it to us, there is a grandeur and sublimity that speak of the power, wisdom and goodness of its gracious Architect. But it gives to the soul no vivid and thrilling truth, that beyond the brief day of human existence, the soul shall endure without change. The earth speaks a different language.—The gradual but sure crumbling of mountains—the fall and decay of vast forests—the sere leaf of autumn—the continual change of organic forms into the separate elements which compose them—all utter but one tone; man is born, grows, decays, perishes, like the plant which rears its head like a gleam upon life, and then vanishes.

Will the assurance come from the man of knowledge? The man whose mind is trained in science—who can stand amid the glories of nature—and display before us her choicest secrets; unfold to our wondering vision the manifold facts which the mind has been enabled to select from the book of the universe—is dignified and noble in all the powers of intellectual science. But station that dignified and noble philosopher beside the grave, and inquire of him, if the mind which once animated the form that moulders there, will live forever; and he is no more capable of answering the inquiry, than the wandering savage. Both have hopes—both have speculations, cultivated and refined in the philosopher, and crude and wild in the savage—but scenes beyond the grave, are to them both, equally sealed—the power of their knowledge sheds no true light on the tomb—they may dream; but their dreams perish with them, when they lie down in the sleep of death.

If hope then whispers to man of future life—if the native love of life strengthens that hope—if the mysterious influence of nature's works excites desires in the mind, which seem too spiritual and heaven-born, to belong to earth—who shall answer the question, will mind become immortal? Can it receive an answer?—or must we shrink into our perishing natures, and go down to the grave in unawaking slumber; to cease to be; to have our being end in a profound gloom that shall never be broken by coming life and illustrious immortality? Is this our fate? Do our longing inquiries meet with nought but unbroken silence amid the thousand voices that are continually telling of God's love and goodness to the children of men?

Hark!—What disturbance is in the halls of the dead?—Why flees death in dismay?—What light is pouring into the tomb, flooding it with noontide glory, and by its aid, directing the trembling bird of hope to stand on the rock of faith, which is upheld by the promise of life to come founded on God's direct revelation? What divine form has broken the gloom of the tomb, and is waking up mind to another and better life? Christian! It is thy Lord! Mourner! It is thy Redeemer! Unbeliever! It is the 'Resurrection.'! God sent him among men on a mission of love and mercy, to reveal truth which no mere human effort could attain. He came; and like an angel, shed the benignant smiles of his God-like nature upon the world—pure as truth, sinless as a smiling infant, kind as the dews of heaven, immovable as a rock in the discharge of his duty, tender with subduing affection, dignified with the noblest forms of virtue, loving men with a love which their bitter hostility could not destroy, in the midst of persecution, sorrow, and dreadful death on the cross, he went down to the grave, dared all, all its fearful horrors, and on the third day, armed by the power of God, he burst the cerements of the grave, came forth the 'first born from the dead,' thus demonstrating that He who gave life can save from death; while, by his ascension to the spiritual presence of God, in view of his disciples, he established the truth of the 'life and immortality' which he brought to light. The 'morning star' of the resurrection, he has robbed death of its greatest terrors, and in effect, has taught this sublime communication to men; though death is the unalterable doom of all human beings, yet that death is not an end, but only the path to a brighter and better life; to freer and ever-extending knowledge; to nobler and more hallowed affection; to the presence of God and the Lamb; to communion with angels, in whose company we shall be permitted to enjoy the delight unfolding from the volume of the universe, and to go on expanding in an endless round of being.

to die, that He might reanimate his lifeless body, and bring him forth to the physical eyes of competent and honest witnesses, who beheld, and handled him after his resurrection; and whose record of these events is found in the Scriptures which have come down to us, and will be cherished as a precious boon so long as one pulse shall beat or one heart shall throb with sympathy. It was with the confident assurance of these facts, that the apostle proclaimed the sublime truth, that 'this mortal must put on immortality.' In the splendor of this sublime revelation, well may we declare:—'For we know that if the earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.' Transporting thought! Mortality is but the flush of life, to expand into the celestial infinitude of an existence, which, through revolving ages, shall increase in majesty. Death is but a sign of goodness to lead us to immortality—a shadow which God casts over us, to prevent the splendors of his own presence from falling at once upon and crushing the mind, as it feebly emerges from its perishing body, to gradually approach the grandeur of God.

The simple truth in regard to another life, deduced from the Scriptures, is this—at death, man throws off his mortal body, which returns to its native dust; for earth-born it is, and earth-ward will it tend—but the mind, the soul, that part which allies man with Deity, will be made immortal, and placed in a spiritual body as well fitted for heavenly scenes as our mortal bodies are fitted for earthly scenes. This is one of the great facts which God has communicated to us in His word—a fact, which breathes the noble thought, that the children of the resurrection shall become equal to the angels of God, and therefore can not die any more. * * *

Immortality will be full of felicity and knowledge. The assurance of the Saviour that the 'children of the resurrection' shall become 'equal to the angels of God'—and of the apostle that 'this corruptible must put on incorruption;' and that Christ 'shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself;' Phil. iii: 21—these assurances prove that all who partake of immortality, will also partake of unmingled felicity.

Even punishment tends to this end, for we believe that the sinner will be punished according to his deeds—that punishment will ultimately wean him from sin—that God's truth will reconcile him; will raise up his degraded mind; will invigorate the ruined intellect; will repair the abused faculties; will restore order in the long abused soul; will reclaim the wanderer from sin; and fit and prepare him for the enjoyment of that immortal felicity, which is purely a gift from God to all his children. This is the faith which the Scriptures teach us—one which displays the mercy and benevolence of God—one which accords with the mission of Christ—one which speaks of universal reconciliation—one which gives a sublime answer to the question contained in the text.

Glorious plan! Divine theme! All-hallowed news!—worthy the songs of angels, the praise of men, the labors of the Saviour, and the love of God. How sublimely it unfolds that unchanging and benignant paternity, which, watching over the countless throngs of the human race with untiring and unspending care, through all their wanderings, and notwithstanding all the evils to which they are subject, brings them all at last to the desirable period, when the joy and reconciliation, so long foreshadowed by prophets and preached by apostles, as resulting from the reign of the Saviour, shall be consummated and established world without end.—How it illustrates that vast and thrilling truth, which in all the universe, is ever proclaiming in tones of benevolence, 'God is Love.'

At that period, 'SIN SHALL BE FINISHED.' No longer shall the heel of oppression crush man in the bitterness of slavery, both of body and soul. No more shall parents mourn for prodigal children wandering in the darkness of vice and folly. No longer shall army clash with army; no more shall the gory stream flow in one crimson tide, mingled with the tears of orphans and ruffled by the widow's cry; no more shall rapine, destruction and ruin stalk abroad in all the fury of unhallowed passions. No longer shall iniquity reign among men; enfeebling their minds, prostrating their bodies with disease and premature death; separating them from communion with God and the holy influences of virtue. No longer shall the rebellious soul resist the calls of mercy, take no heed of the eloquence of kindness, turn a deaf ear to the voice of truth. Sin will be finished. The flesh with all its craving desires and appetites, will be thrown off. The soul will be drawn from all motives to disobedience.—In the light of universal knowledge, and in the reconciling powers of truth, it will rise on eagle wing, and soar far above all impurity, until, in the smiles of peace, holiness and immortality, it will become wedded to righteousness; and in it, God shall be all in all, absorbing all its powers, filling all its faculties, and governing all its desires. And what will be true of one soul, will be true of all souls. Oh! how sublime will be that scene; how triumphant that joy; how glorious that song of praise; when Christ shall have saved his people from sin.

ERROR SHALL CEASE. Those blinded imaginations which envelope the minds of men with a thick veil of darkness, shall vanish away. Those creeds and traditions which cause men to look upon their heavenly Father as a being of mingled love and hate, thus clothing him with human passions, shall drop into oblivion. Those monstrous dogmas which throw their gloom over the soul, destroy its peace, make it shed the bitter tears of hopeless despair, and even chain it in dreadful insanity, shall vanish away. Truth, God's holy truth, the truth consecrated by the love of the Saviour, shall fill every understanding, expand every mind, and induct every individual into the glorious liberty of the children of God; conferring upon them the full freedom of knowledge, of virtue, of heaven, of affection, of joy in the Saviour.

THERE SHALL NOT 'BE ANY MORE PAIN.' All sickness shall cease. The cheek shall no more be sicklied by the pale cast of consumption. No more shall the evening breeze be loaded with pestilential vapors, to wither the human frame. No more shall the wrenching pain make every nerve quiver with agony. With the mingling of the elements of the body with mother earth, all disease shall lose its power; nor shall insanity introduce horrible confusion into the mind. Endless health shall reign. And of all people, 'God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.'

'THERE SHALL BE NO MORE DEATH, NEITHER SORROW, NOR CRYING.' 'Death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed.' For 'death shall be swallowed up in victory.' Jesus will abolish death in life and immortality. There shall be no more parting.—Rachel shall no longer weep because her children are not. Parents shall no more be separated from their beloved ones. Friends shall no longer weep over the grave of buried affections. Death shall no more divide families nor destroy the blessings of friendship. And in the triumphs of the cross—in the saving power of Christ—in the immortality of heaven—in the smiles of the love of God—the redeemed universe shall utter the mighty challenge, 'O Death! where is thy sting? O Grave! where is thy victory?'—and the glorious jubilee shall swell every soul, as the Saviour answers, 'DEATH IS SWALLOWED UP IN VICTORY.'

Here then is the consolation we bring on the present occasion. We offer it to the wife, children, and other relatives of the deceased. Your loss is indeed afflicting. A kind husband and tender father has been taken from you. But weep not as those who have no hope. Be resigned to the will of Providence, and take comfort from the fact, that death is not the ultimate end, that there is another life, and that you will surely meet again in joy and peace. Console one another. Do it with that affection which the departed ever exhibited towards you, and especially which he ever exhibited towards his aged mother. Let the truth be so ardently believed, be the strength of this consolation.

The Society of which he was an efficient member, has met with a severe bereavement. Brethren, you feel this loss. You feel that one who loved the cause; one who showed that love by his generosity and zeal, will be with you no more. He was indeed a friend to the truth. And though he long had the impression that he should not live to see the new house which you are engaged in building, finished, yet he as liberally assisted in the enterprise, as though he had expected to enjoy it.—When you shall meet in that new temple, remember that one who loved you all, can not meet with you; that he has gone to a more glorious temple. Show your affection for him, by imitating his zeal for the faith.

Citizens of Auburn, you have met a great affliction. Living here for thirty years; a man whose activity and business talents were calculated to make him heard and felt; he became identified with your village. You will miss him from your councils and streets—the poor will miss his generous liberality—widows and orphans will miss his protection—and those suffering under oppressions or from false charges, will miss his untiring efforts to give them freedom. Many here can say, that his friendship was tried and ever found true. But he has gone with the multitudes of others who have been taken from your midst. Let all say, peace be to him.

Finally, let us all learn wisdom from this painful scene—let us realize the certainty of our own mortality—that by faith and virtue, we may be ready to die in peace and joy. Amen.

LETTER FROM BR. STEBBINS.

Port Huron, Mich., June 12th, 1846.

Br. SKINNER.—When I last wrote you, I expected ere this to have seen you face to face. I had made arrangements to attend the Convention at Newark and to make sure of being there I engaged passage with two brethren; but like many others in similar circumstances, between them both I fell to the ground; and was left to turn my disappointment to the best account possible. This I did by starting at once for the West. Having resolved to go somewhere, and having a desire to see for myself the land 'flowing with milk and honey,' accordingly I made my way to Buffalo. There shipped on board the elegant steamer St. Louis; and after a delightful voyage of about 30 hours, I found myself at Detroit. Here I was cordially received Br. J. H. Sanford, who is attempting to revive an interest in the cause of Universalism, among the good people of this ancient city.

It may be a cause of wonder, to those unacquainted with the difficulties that, in cities, often beset the way of the 'sect everywhere sp ken against,' that no society of Universalists is established here. But to you and others who have long labored to build up the cause of truth in Utica; and have seen it prostrated in the dust of error and popularity, it can be no matter of surprise to know that other cities have chosen to worship the God of this world, and set at naught the most precious truths of revelation. May we not hope the day is approaching, when the veil shall be removed from the minds of the people and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed to them?

From Detroit I travelled westward, spending the last Sunday in May, at Dearbonville, and preaching to respectable and attentive congregations.—The following Wednesday and Thursday I had the happiness of meeting with eleven ministerial brethren and a large number of believers in the restitution, at Ann Arbor; it being the annual convocation of the Central Association in Michigan. And a glorious meeting we had! A soul refreshing season! Long shall I remember the happiness enjoyed there, and the social cheer and generous hospitality of the kind friends who opened their doors and their hearts to their visiting friends. May they long enjoy the peace and prosperity that now attend them under the acceptable labors of father Miles. Long may this aged brother continue to break the bread of life unto them.

From Ann Arbor, I returned to Detroit, where I attempted to preach the word to the little band, who have here gathered around Br. Sanford, in his undertaking of which I have spoken above. Never I think have I so much felt my weakness; nor had so deep a sense of the great responsibility resting upon a minister of Christ. Here were assembled a handful of believers in the midst of thousands, who speak against them and their faith. Fearful and trembling lest they be not able to withstand the powers arrayed against them, how much did they need to have illustrated most forcibly the words of Jesus, 'Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom!' but oh! how feeble the encouragement I could give them! I trust, however, the lesson may stimulate me to labor more earnestly, that I may become a faithful minister.

From Detroit I came to this place in company with Br. Sanford. Four happy evenings of this week have been spent with this devoted brother in religious meetings. Two at this place and two in St. Clair. In both of these places our meetings have been well attended, and marked attention given to the preached word. I remain a few weeks, when I expect to return to New York.

Detroit, June 25th.—When I commenced this letter, I was upon the beautiful banks of St. Clair River. I spent there two weeks—and became acquainted with many believers in the restitution.—Here is a pleasant, and would, I think, be a profitable field of labor for a preacher: and the friends here are resolved to have one. They are raising a handsome subscription, and have given conditional calls to two ministers, so that (if they do not fall between them,) they will soon be blest with the ministrations of the word. My intentions of returning soon to N. York, at present seem to be frustrated. Since I was last in this city, Br. Sanford has made arrangements to leave his charge, and I have been informally invited to tarry with the friends here, to which invitation I have reluctantly acceded; there appearing to be no other alternative but to suffer the effort commenced by Br. S. to be abandoned. So that for the present I am booked at Detroit, Mich., and wish Editors and others to be apprised of the fact. How long I shall remain is uncertain—perhaps till some more competent person can be obtained. Your brother, J. STEBBINS.

MR. WARREN'S SECOND LETTER TO ELDER D. HOLMES.

Smithville Flats, July 3, 1846.

Dear Sir,—Your letter under date of June 9th, came to hand last Saturday, and I hasten to give it a brief notice. I however entertain but faint hopes of meeting you in debate, and thereby having the privilege of seeing the truth prevail over error, to the glory of God, and the peace of man. You have put down your foot, it seems, and will not move, come what will. I shall not dispute your right to do so. But you say I have been 'singularly unfortunate in stating my case;' but wherein I am unable to see, unless it is in my failing to obtain a discussion with you; for the question I proposed, embraced the same doctrine as the second one you proposed to Br. Taintor; only I have changed the affirmative. (See Mag. and Adv., present vol., No. 4.)

I shall not bandy words with you about issuing a challenge; for it is of no moment at all. I am ready to give, or receive a challenge for the laudable purpose of learning the truth, and its power; and it matters not who gives it, if respectable and respectful.

Dear Sir, I am at a loss to understand the meaning of your letter. I do not know whether you mean to refuse an oral discussion, or not; for you seem to be both sides of the fence. In one sentence you throw out encouragement that you would discuss under certain circumstances; then, as if frightened by the appearance, you refuse to meet any, but the three first named and then on your own ground. You say to me, 'If I wish to discuss questions which at once cover the whole ground of controversy between Universalism and Orthodoxy —you can not do better than take those embraced in the two propositions of my discourse; since one of them relates to the nature of salvation and the other to the conditionality and extent of it.' Suppose I do take them: will you then stand up to their support? We will see. To suit your hint I offer the three following,

1. Is scriptural salvation a salvation from sin, or from deserved punishment?
2. Is man's future immortal salvation conditional or unconditional?
3. Do the Scriptures teach the doctrine of endless punishment for any of the human family? or do they teach universal salvation?

These if I have read your 'House on the Sand' and other writings correctly, cover the ground you wish to examine. The last of these, however, is the only one of importance with the mass, and in the final issue between us.

As to a written discussion, I would say, I do not think, as a general thing, they are as profitable as oral; from the fact that too frequently only one side is read by each party. Hence, truth does not find its free course to the heart that it will in an oral debate. But sir, if we fail on this, I will not object to a few letters on these questions. As to my respectability, I did not know as it was my business to prove my standing. But I will say I am a preacher of the Universalist order, in connection with the Chenango Association, and for aught I know, am in good standing. I will not enlarge on this point; for you well know that 'F' is a significant character. Yours in love, A. O. WARREN.

LETTER FROM SISTER LAURA EGGLESTON.

BIS. SKINNER AND WALKER,—Excuse the freedom of an invalid sister, who is somewhat better in health and spirits than of late. I have spent the last six months in the arms of severe illness, and have but partially recovered my former state of health. To be brief, I am now at my mother's in German again, and wish you to be patient with me in my peregrinations, and still have the kindness to continue sending me the paper as usual. I want it directed to German P. O. The post office is kept by a better man now. The young bigot, who I believe must have played an iniquitous part respecting my papers last winter, is out of the office, and will trouble my paper no more at present.

Br. Skinner will accept my thanks for his charity* and sympathetic manifestation, for one who is truly a daughter of affliction, and is still solaced by the blessed hope of a better life than this, when I shall cease to be an inhabitant of this lower world, and rise to bloom with seraphs in the paradise of God. In my recent trials, this hope has been my support, my all. I have found some warm hearted friends, who have smoothed my sick pillow, and rendered me some assistance. I am able to sew a little, and shall, I think, be enabled to struggle on as heretofore. My lungs are very tender yet, but the hemorrhage has ceased. If the followinganzas are deemed worthy, please give them a place in your columns. This is the first I have written in six long, long months. Sincerely yours, LAURA EGGLESTON.

* This allusion is to the fact of my having received a donation of $2 from Br. Eli Peck for the writer, to which I made a small addition and forwarded it to her. And, by the by, if there are any whose money troubles them, or whose consciences may trouble them if they do not 'go and do likewise,' we would say to them, send sister Laura a little of your surplus; it will be well applied, will do her good, and she will bless the 'liberal soul' that does it all her days. D. S.

WE MUST NOT EXPECT TOO MUCH AT ONCE.—I often think of a saying of Archbishop Bramhall. When, upon the cessation of the great rebellion he was appointed to the primacy of the Irish Church, he found the province of Armagh teeming with disorder, and filled with opposers both of his own person, and of the discipline and doctrine of the church. And how did he eventually succeed in stemming the torrent of evil? Not by making sudden and violent changes; but by patient, quiet firmness, and by steadily continuing his own uncompromising course of argument, persuasion, and long-suffering, through good report and bad report. For 'men,' said he, 'must needs have some time allowed them to return to their senses, who had so long been out of them.'

TRIMMING TREES.—June is a good month for trimming fruit trees. Planting is over and we have more leisure in June than in May. We prefer May and June to March and April because the wounds heal sooner. No new wood is made till the leaf puts out to elaborate the sap; the wounds are therefore exposed for a less term when the trimming is done in full leaf.

It is not prudent to trim excessively in one season. Trees will sometimes bear much abuse, but we have known them to die in consequence of losing too much top. Most trees need a little pruning each year, and when this is done, there is no need of cutting much at a time, nor of cutting large limbs.

Some orchardists dislike to trim so late as June, because they find young apples on the limbs. So young gardeners are loth to thin out their plants till it is too late in the season and they are ruined.

No farmer should allow his hired man or himself to stand on the trees with heavy boots or shoes on his feet. Limbs are much injured by such treatment as the wounds are longer in healing than those made by the trimming saw.

This book is by Br. George Rogers, price 50 cents. 'Floral Fortune Teller,' by Miss S. C. Edgerton, 38 cents. Also volumes I and II of Paige's Commentary. Balch's Manual for Sunday schools, &c.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street, Buffalo.

Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn, keeps a general assortment of Universalist Books for sale. He is also agent for the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist publications generally.

Br. T. J. Sawyer authorises us to receive subscriptions or donations to the Theological Institute. Any one who may wish can therefore remit direct to this office, and the receipt of the money will be acknowledged in the Magazine and Advocate.

A few copies of the Rose of Sharon for 1846 for sale at this office.

A few hundreds of the Register and Almanac for 1846 yet left, and for sale at this office.

MARRIAGES.

In Greene, June 17th, by Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Mr. SAMUEL WHEELER to Miss MARGARET RACE, both of that town.

In Oxford, July 3d, by the same, Mr. SMITH SLOCUM to Miss ALMINA B. NORTH, both of Norwich.

In Oxford, July 5th, by the same, Mr. SETH G. PELLET to Miss MARY WESTCOTT, both of Norwich.

At Little Falls, by Rev. W. G. Anderson, Mr. ALFRED SCHUYLER to Miss SARAH MCCHESNEY.

At Trenton Falls, July 4th, by Rev. P. Hathaway, Mr. TRUMAN C. HASKELL of Newport, to Miss ELIZA A. HOWARD of Trenton Falls.

SUMMER IS COMING.

Summer is coming—and with a glad shout
 All nature is hanging her drapery out;
 The forest and valley, the mountain and hill,
 Are singing in concert with river and rill,
 The bird in the tree top, its mate in the glen,
 And the winter-bound spirits of wearied men
 Alike are rejoicing its coming to see,
 As it throws its rich mantle o'er valley and lea.

Summer is coming—and like a rich vest,
 The earth in an emerald robe will be dressed;
 All gem'd with bright flowers of various light,
 From the deep scarlet dyè, to the pure pearly white;
 And the sky with its pale and cold mantle of blue,
 Will deepen its tint of cerelean hue,
 And its light floating cloudlets of silvery white,
 Will seem to shed o'er us a smile of delight.

Summer is coming—and winter is o'er,
 And the voices of nature awakened once more
 In a murmuring strain of sweet harmony blend,
 And upwards from earth a rich orison send—
 The murmur of breezes, the songsters' wild notes,
 The hum of the insects, which on the air floats,
 And the voices of rivulets heard everywhere,
 Make vocal with music the earth and the air.

SHAKER AND THE DEACON.

Enter Landlord. Friend, there is a traveller who has put up with me who does not wish to mingle with the multitude in the bar or sitting-room, and as my house is now full, I can not accommodate him unless that you will obligingly permit him to sit in your room until he retires.

Shaker. Yea, if he is a sober man, I have no objection.

Land. I thank you; I will introduce him. Exit.
 [Enter Landlord and Deacon.]

Land. This is the gentleman, Sir, for whose introduction you gave consent. [Retires.]

Shaker. Be seated, friend, before the fire. [The deacon sits down.]

D. It's a cold night.

S. Yea.

D. I abominate a tavern.

[No answer.]

D. I sometimes think a tavern a meeting house for the ungodly.

[No answer.]

D. The church to which I belong and in which I hold the office of deacon condemns dancing as the worst of sins.

[No answer.]

D. You belong to the Shaking Quaker Society, I take it.

S. (After a pause.) Yea, I am a member of that people.

D. Do you hold any office among them?

S. Yea, that of a brother.

D. I suspected that you belonged to the C-n-y Society, and that you was the man they called Deacon Ed—ly.

S. I belong to that society.

D. Your people, I understand, dance on the Sabbath day.

S. We labor before the Lord on the first day of the week.

D. In either sense it is a prodigious abomination, and our missionaries ought to be sent to enlighten you.

S. Friend, dost thou confide in thy faith?

D. Yes.

S. So do I in mine.

D. But you are in a state of moral devastation, of sin, and of rebellion against God and his revelation.

S. Friend, I have not a gift to converse with thee at this time. I will not condemn thy faith—permit me and mine to remain at peace.

D. I feel it my solemn duty to warn you to beware of dancing as you would the wrath to come.

[No answer.]

D. You are in a state of sin and moral darkness, will you shut your eyes against the light of revelation?

S. Nay, friend.

D. Then how can you dance, or labor, as you call it, without Scripture authority, and against the light which our churches send forth?

S. Art thou a Deacon, and hast thou a Bible, friend?

D. Yes, I am a Deacon, duly 'set apart' according to the ordinance of the Church of God, and have a Bible which I understand from Genesis to Revelation.

S. Then I can not give any additional information to thee, who understandeth the whole of the law of God; and we will cease to speak further thereof.

D. If you will produce one text in the whole book to countenance dancing, I will cease to speak further.

S. Friend, thou art kinder than I expected; I will answer thy request threefold upon thine own condition; and first upon the dancing of a prophetess. 'And Miriam, the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and dances.' Exod. xv: 20. Dost thou think, friend, if dancing was not acceptable to Israel's God, that Moses and Aaron would have suffered the sisters to have danced before the Lord, the moment they had escaped the Egyptians and miraculously passed through the Red Sea?

D. I have no recollection of that text; I will take it down, and after reading it show it to our minister; but you will proceed with the rest.

S. 'And Jephthah came to Mizpah unto his house, and behold his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and with dances, and she was his only child, beside her he had neither son nor daughter.' Judges xi: 34. Jephthah was a Judge in Israel and favored of the Lord.—Canst thou believe that he allowed his only child to dance if it was wicked?—and would she forth to meet her father in a manner not truly acceptable to him?

D. I have noted it down with the other. I have heard that the Shakers had a Bible for themselves—proceed.

S. 'And it came to pass, as they came when David was returned from the slaughter of the Philistines, that women came out of all the cities of Israel singing and dancing, to meet king Saul with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of music.' 1 Samuel xviii: 6. Now, friend, Israel was a favored people of the Lord, and would the women 'have come out of all the cities of Israel singing and dancing' before Saul and David for the great victory, unless it was approved by their God? Nay, friend, they would not have sinned against God for the victory and deliverance which he had given.

D. Admit your texts are from our true Christian Bible, they do not prove that men and boys are allowed to dance; it was only the women, and they are allowed to do almost everything, and if I find those passages in my Bible, I shall think they have always been a prodigious abomination from old mother Eve down to the fag end of them.

S. Do'st thou believe, with thy Bible, that David was holy, and a man after God's own heart, friend?

D. Yes, to be sure, I do most solemnly.

S. Take care, friend, for verily thou wilt make thy God a dancer, if David was a man after his own heart, for 'David danced before the Lord with all his might, and David was girded with a linen ephod.' 2 Samuel v: 4. Now canst thou believe, friend, that holy David would have danced before the Lord, if the Lord was not fond of dancing?

D. This is an abomination of abominations, worse and worse; oh I can smell sulphur in this room.

S. Not unless thou hast it about thee, friend, for my people neither make it, or have occasion to use it.

D. Your Scriptures I now flatly deny. I can't recollect a word of it; if it be found any where, it must be in Ann Lee's revelation.

S. Nay, friend, be not offended that I repeat thy own Bible to thee, thou wilt find all therein. I fear thy memory does not quite reach from Genesis to Revelation.

D. Well, if such passages are to be found in the Bible, like the old dispensation, they are outlawed and now binding nor never will be again.

S. Verily I would fain ask thee one question: do'st thou believe that Israel will be gathered together?

D. Yes, for it is the promise of God.

S. Yea, verily, and hast thou faith that thou art one of the ransomed of Israel?

D. Yes, Sir, I have the evidence in the church.

S. Then, friend, if thy Bible deceive not, thou thyself wilt have a merry long time of dancing!

D. This is worst of all; you may make all the women of Israel dancers, and king David to boot, but mind you have now got a deacon of an orthodox church to deal with; you nor any other power can make me consent to dance; take that for an answer.

S. Then thou already deniest thy faith, in being one of the ransomed of Israel, for God hath said, 'Again I will build thee, and thou shalt be built. O Virgin of Israel! thou shalt again be adorned with thy tabrets, and thou shalt go forth in the dances of them that make merry.' Jer. xxvi: 4.

D. Well, I tell you again, I will not dance with them.

S. Verily, friend, I may say, 'according to thy faith be it unto thee.'

D. I now believe every word in Mary Dyer's book concerning you.

S. Yea, friend, it seemeth strange unto me, that thou shouldst follow the counsels of Mary concerning us, and denounce the examples of Miriam the prophetess of God.

D. I hold it my duty not to say one word more to you.

S. Thou hast my thanks, friend, if steadfastly thou keepest thy promise, thou wilt find thy silence more useful to thee than thy accusation, and more conformable to the character of a deacon, who should be at least decent in his deportment, and an honest seeker after the truth.

D. I'll leave this accursed room as soon as I can get my hat and coat.

S. Friend, thou hast spoken again and sworn too.

D. I don't thank the landlord for putting me in this room. [Runs out in a rage.]

S. Thou wilt dance soon, I fear, THOU DEACON OF THIS WORLD. [Exit Shaker into bed.]

REASONS FOR NOT GIVING TO THE FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

We are, by no means, opposed to Foreign and Home Missionary enterprise, rightly conducted,—but especially since hearing the lecture of Dr. Lafon, on the Sandwich Islands, and reading some articles that have appeared in the papers, our confidence in the operations of the 'American Board of Foreign Missions,' is much weakened. Dr. Lafon stated, that he did not impugn the motives of the Board; neither do we. Perhaps, they think they are doing the best they can under the circumstances. This gentleman has been one of the Missionaries in those Islands, and is consequently well acquainted with the state of things there. He says the common people there, are the merest slaves and serfs to the king and nobles. These nobles are oppressors—and yet the Missionaries do not preach against oppression—do not censure, but countenance it, and to use his own words, 'receive into the church every form of oppression,' and the American Board approve of their doings. We learn also, that the Missionaries and their wives and children, also join in this heartless oppression, which deprives the working classes of nearly all their rights. The wives and daughters of the Missionaries have them for servants, and use them for beasts of draught and burden. They are moved about the country, and even a few rods to meetings, in vehicles drawn by the natives. Thus they countenance and join in the system of wrong doing.

Dr. Lafon also remarked, that when Christ preached, 'the common people heard him gladly,' but said he, 'not so in the Sandwich Islands,—there, they are the nobles who give a willing ear to the Missionaries—while the common people care little or nothing about it.'

We infer from this, that the Missionaries do not preach the Gospel as Christ preached it. His preaching was a source of gladness to the common people in Judea—while to their oppressors—the nobles—the Scribes and Pharisees,—it gave great offence—and by the way, these were rigid Partialists. Christ's doctrine was favorable to the common people. It pleaded their rights against the great ones—the nobles of that age. It was a system of equality of rights. It was against the oppressor, as such, and in favor of the oppressed—the poor—the laboring classes. But, these Missionaries do not preach so as to favor and defend the oppressed—but rather their oppressors. The nobles, the aristocracy hear them gladly. What better proof do we need, that the system of Partialism and endless misery which they preach is not of God—not of Christ—not the Gospel in its purity? The Gospel is a system of peace and good will, and equal rights to all men. After knowing these facts, and some others which we shall soon publish, who can feel disposed to give money to sustain the present Missionary establishment in the Sandwich Islands?—[Watchman.

UNIVERSAL RESTORATION.

There is one argument for universal salvation, independent of those taken from the express declaration of the word of God, which, with the intelligent mind and benevolent spirit, is of immense weight; and it is that drawn from analogy. As it is seldom exhibited, we propose to dwell on it, a few moments; and by spreading it before the people, animate and encourage their hopes in regard to the glorious prospects which await us in another life. We mean an argument drawn from analogy between visible and invisible realities, between the advance of perfection in matter and in mind.

Thus, as regards the physical world, there is a slow and regular mounting up from the igneous to the watery; from a confused chaotic mass to more regular proportions and formations; from the formless and flowerless moss, to the lofty palm; from the rough pebble, to the precious diamond; from the sloth, to the half reasoning elephant; from the hyena to the noble New-foundland dog, from the worm, to the gorgeous butterfly; and from the lowest in the human race and species up to the most noble, dignified, intellectual and fascinating of the Circassian race.

Nature never retrogrades. The God in 'whose hand are the deep places of the earth,' is continually beautifying his fair and glorious creation. The same changes are taking place in imponderable and invisible substances. We have now a purer atmosphere, air and sky than existed before man was created. The light of heaven once lurid, heavy and murky, has become brilliant, silvery and exhilarating. New stars have in consequence been seen breaking forth on the azure dark mantle of night; and with a new order of things that are visible; the invisible immortal mind while it sees, feels, and knows only through the immateriality of things around it, has no doubt been roused to new energies, hopes, sympathies, and aspirations. Now, since this is the case, why should not the onward march of mind, soul, spirit, the glorious moral and intellectual world around us, invisible but eternal, ever progress in excellence and glory? Why should Deity change the rough pebble to the beautiful crystal, the worm to the gorgeous butterfly; upheave continents into a fairer sky, and wind up all visible creation into the perfection of beauty, and yet leave the invisible untouched by the finger and pencil of an infinite grace? It can not be. No we feel that it can not. All that the eye sees, the ear hears, or the heart feels, gives to us an upward rush, a spirit-stirring hope and expectancy as it regards the future. The figurative expressions of Scripture, which a dark and gloomy superstition have materialized, are destined to give way speedily to the plain teachings of truth and love. As science has advanced, and as civil and religious liberty have prevailed, there have series after series, been swept away; and, the time will come, when the plain teachings of truth will cause even children to love and seek the Lord with that perfect love which casteth out all fear. This is a true, an elevating and ennobling view of the subject. It throws a flood of glory over creation, and eternal existence. God is good—God is love—God is glorious. It is not necessary for us to know the way, the time, manner, and purpose. We take only the glorious truth and rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.—[Gospel Fountain.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

BAPTISM.

To the Editor of the Magazine and Advocate.

Rev. Sir—I can not resist the temptation which this opportunity presents of making bold to ask a few questions, in which I am greatly interested, and which I have no doubt you can easily answer. I have heretofore sought in the Magazine and Advocate in vain for some article upon the subject. The community around me are mostly Reformers, or Christians; and their preaching has undoubtedly excited these inquiries in my mind. The subject is Christian Baptism. I believe the Universalists have no form of baptism. Now was not water baptism practised by the apostles? Was not John baptising in Aenon because there was much water there? Did not both Philip and the Eunuch go down into the water, and he baptised him? To make a long matter short, what do you do with water baptism. Should you consider so humble an inquirer after truth as I am worthy of notice, you will confer a favor by answering the above queries.

Yours, &c.

E. D. P.

Midway, Ky., June, 1846.

ANSWER.

The inquiries of our friend E. D. P. we cheerfully give a place in our columns, and add the following by way of answer.

Universalists generally do not regard water baptism as indispensable, as a sine qua non, or as requisite to salvation. They consider it an outward form, or ordinance, that may or may not be adopted by the believer, according to his own conscience. They regard it, not as 'the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God.' (1 Peter iii: 21.) They allow perfect liberty of conscience on this subject among all their members. While some of the Friends, or Quakers, have embraced our faith and still retain their former opinions on the subject of Baptism and all other outward ordinances, rejecting them, as no longer binding or necessary, and adopting the idea of spiritual, or inward Baptism—the Baptism of the Holy Ghost and of fire, (see Matt. iii: 11. Mark i: 8. Luke iii: 16. John i: 26, 27,) others among us from those denominations who hold to the outward form of Baptism, still retain their former opinions and practice accordingly. St. Paul says, (1 Cor. i: 17,) 'Christ sent me not to baptise, but to preach the Gospel.' It appears by this and other passages in Paul's writings, that although he was allowed to baptise, and did so in several instances, (see 1 Cor. i: 13-16.) yet the administration of the ordinance was not specially enjoined upon him; and owing to the perversion and abuse of it among the Corinthians, he thanked God that he had baptised no more of that church than he had. But whether he baptised many in other churches of his planting does not appear. It seems that had he regarded the ordinance as any way necessary to salvation, instead of thanking God that he had baptised none of the Corinthians but the few individuals named, he would most certainly have baptised every one of them; and also that the administration of the ordinance would have been specially enjoined upon him as an Apostle of Christ.

It is not certain that our Saviour ever administered water baptism in person to any one, though his disciples did with his approbation; (John iv: 1, 2,) and it is also certain that Philip baptised the Eunuch, that Christ himself was baptised of John, and that water baptism was practiced, to a greater or less extent, during the apostolic and all subsequent ages of the church. But still it is evident from the New Testament that this ordinance was not made an indispensable ordinance, nor a necessary prerequisite to salvation. Was the thief upon the cross (who Christ said should be with him that day in Paradise) ever baptised with water? Were all little children, such as Christ said composed the kingdom of heaven, baptised? Do even the most zealous Baptists themselves deny that infants will be saved who are not baptised with water? Certainly not. Then they themselves being judges, water baptism is not indispensable to salvation.

It is obvious from Scripture that the baptism of John was purely a water baptism unto repentance; and equally so that Christ had a different baptism from that of John, with which his followers were to be baptised—viz. a spiritual baptism. This is the essential baptism, the other, a non-essential.

The outward form, or water baptism, we have always regarded as a solemn and beautiful ordinance when administered, and received by the true followers of Christ. It is a beautiful type of 'the washing of regeneration'—it is a solemn memorial of the burial and resurrection of Christ—it is a lively emblem of the burial and resurrection of the human family. (See and read the 6th chapter of Romans.)

About the time I commenced the ministry of reconciliation, my mind was considerably exercised on the subject of baptism. I felt desirous of fulfilling all righteousness, as far as possible. I then conceived it my duty to receive the ordinance of baptism. I accordingly applied to Rev. John E. Palmer, of Vermont, for the ordinance, and received the solemn rite at his hands. I have never regretted it, but in numerous instances, when applied to, have administered it to others since that time, and never decline so doing when requested. Yet my conscience is not to be the rule or guide to the practice of others. Each must examine and judge for himself. Others may as conscientiously differ from me as I from them. Let each examine himself and follow the dictates of his own conscience. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. Let each adopt the language of Pope—

'What conscience dictates to be done,
Or warns me not to do;
This teach me more than hell to shun,
That more than heaven pursue.'

D. S.

ELDER GILLET OF WEST CAMDEN AND HIS BUGBEARS.

Mr. Editor:—The place in which we reside, is one where Partialism has, for a long time, held undisputed sway. When we removed to this place, (something more than a year since,) and 'twas rumored abroad, that we believed in the 'dangerous doctrines' of the impartial goodness, and love of God to his offspring, you may be assured that no small commotion was excited among those who devoutly and zealously worshipped God, in the fear of endless wrath. The stir, made by the clergy and others, awakened the minds of some to inquire what that doctrine was, against which so much was said. The Magazine and Advocate, which, like a white winged messenger of peace, found its way here, bringing the glad tidings of a Saviour's love, corroborated by the voice of nature, and the teachings of Revelation, was thrown in their way, and though silent as the dews of evening, it had the effect to remove, in some measure, the veil, which had so long obstructed their mental vision, permitting the rays of light and truth to shine upon and irradiate their minds; showing the sandy foundation upon which stands the doctrine of endless misery, and its want of support, in reason or revelation. Although none have yet avowed a disbelief in its truth, yet many have been led to question its divine origin; and Universalism is regarded much more favorably, than it has been wont to be. Seeing this, a renewed and vigorous effort has been made, for a few months past, to check its growing influence, and to destroy, root and branch, this 'semi-infidelity,' by retailing slander, of every description, which ingenuity could invent, or the heart of wickedness conceive. We are blessed with a church here in our little village, who designate themselves as Unionists, professing a love and fellowship for Christians of every sect or denomination; administered to, alternately by Elders Gardner and Gillett. The latter is a man considerably advanced in years, formerly a resident of Herkimer county, and a preacher of the Methodist denomination. Leaving them, he joined the Free Will Baptists, and now goes exclusively with the Unionists, I believe. For several months past, Universalism has been the theme of their, almost every Sabbath's discourse, Mr. Gillett taking the lead in this affair. Did I say Universalism? not so: but the offspring of ignorance, conceived in the wild, and disordered imaginings of their own brains, and christened at the font of bigotry and superstition, by the name of Universalism.

Among the many things said by them, I will relate the following anecdote, given by Mr. Gillett, to show 'the utter inefficiency of Universalism to sustain a person in the dying hour; which has been so generally received and circulated that I should like some authority to say it was false, as I believe it to be. Benjamin Larnard, deceased, late of the town of Russia, about three miles from Newport, had been a Universalist all his life: his wife was a Baptist. Notwithstanding the many prayers of the wife, his children had grown up in sin. Not one had yet been brought to Christ. The father was taken sick. His physicians told him that he must die. His hopes in Universalism now fled. He laid hold of the promises of the Gospel, and was converted. Then sending for his minister, he gave him the following exhortation. 'Go,' said he, 'and tell your congregation, that though Universalism may do to live by, it will not do to die by.' This renunciation had the effect to almost level to the ground the citadel of Universalism in that quarter. But a few months passed, ere the children all experienced religion, and many a Universalist was led to enquire, what they might do to be saved.'

Such stories in many places would be taken for what they were worth; but here, where darkness has so long covered the minds of the people, they are swallowed with avidity. Writing to a friend at Newport, I took the opportunity, to inquire concerning the facts; but got no definite answer, save, that his widow would feel very much afflicted, to have anything said about his having been a Universalist. Now I would like to know if Mr. Larnard was ever a member of the society at Russia, or attended meetings there; and whether he ever made the request to a Universalist minister; and if that minister gave his congregation the warning. Yours,

West Camden, July 1st, 1846. WM. S. GOODELL.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We know nothing of this Mr. Larnard (Larned?) deceased, late of Russia, nor of the story of his renunciation of Universalism, but have every reason to presume that the above story is false in all its material features. The Universalist society in Russia was organised but a few months since, has just completed a new and commodious meeting-house, and is in a flourishing condition. The Universalist society in Newport, (within three miles of which this renouncing man was said to have lived and died,) was never in a more flourishing condition than at present, and the citadel of Universalism, as Elder Gillett calls our cause, was never stronger or better prepared to stand a long and close siege from its enemies, than it is this day in Russia and Newport, and the region round about.

But to say nothing of the prosperity or adversity of Universalism in this region, and granting even that the story told by Elder G. were true, so far as that Mr. L. renounced Universalism on his death bed, (though we believe the whole story false,) what would it prove? Would it prove Universalism false; or that it will not do to die by? Not at all. It would only prove that a fallible, fickle changeling said so on his death bed, not from knowledge, nor experience; because he had never died a Universalist, and never did die a Universalist: therefore he did not know that Universalism would not do to die by. But thousands and thousands have died triumphantly happy in this faith, which proves that it will do to die by. And what do the thousand and one stories told by Partialists about death bed renunciations of Universalism—about Universalists renouncing their faith in their last days, and dying in despair, and seeing the flames of an endless hell flashing and gaping to receive them—what, we ask, do they all prove? Why, not that Universalism occasions their despair and their fears, but the want of it. They gave it up when most they needed it, and died in despair for want of the very doctrine they denounce.—Did they firmly believe, and retain it to the last, they would die as happy as the ten thousand Universalists that have departed with a song of triumph in their mouths.—What do our opposers think? Do they think that on a death bed the firm faith, the full assurance, of the endless and immortal bliss of a redeemed world of intelligences will give despair, and cause them to depart in anguish? Must they have the lurid flames of an endless hell before their eyes, before they can close them in peace? How astonishing! How completely does prejudice and superstition blind their eyes to the truth!

But by Elder G.'s own showing, his subject had never been a Universalist: for he says that on his death bed 'he laid hold of the promises of the Gospel,' implying that he had never believed them before. Of course then, he had never been a Universalist. For all Universalists lay hold of the promises of the Gospel in the first place, and cling to them to the last. They can not be Universalists without this.

Will some of our friends in Russia or Newport ascertain and inform us of the facts of the case of this Mr. L. deceased, that the veracity of Elder G. may be thoroughly tested? D. S.

MERCY THE PREROGATIVE OF CHRIST.

'I long to measure out a full cup of happiness to every body, but Christ wisely keeps that prerogative in His own hands.'

The above precious scrap we cut from an Orthodox paper made up of 'The dying sayings of Dr. Payson.' It is worth more than its weight in gold. Dr. Payson had been a rigid and bigotted orthodox preacher in Portland, Me., although it is believed his bigotry was very much softened down before his death. In his last days he had time for calm and deliberate reflection; and then it was that the true man and the Christian gained the ascendancy over his narrow creed, as is usual in such cases, and he exclaims, 'I long to measure out a full cup of happiness to every body; but Christ wisely keeps that prerogative in his own hands.'

Universalism was in his heart and in his mouth—he possessed its spirit—his philanthropy was universal—he loved every body and longed to measure out to all a full cup of happiness! He would have done it if he could. And as God said to David concerning his building the temple, it was well that it was in his heart to do it. And this desire 'to measure out a full cup of happiness to every body,' we believe exists in every Christian, in every good being in the universe of God. It is well that this desire does so exist in all good beings—good orthodox ministers not excepted. 'But Christ wisely keeps that prerogative in his own hands.'

Could the dying Payson have believed that Christ was as benevolently disposed towards every body as he was himself, he would have died rejoicing in the full assurance that the longings of his soul would be satisfied, and ultimately Christ would 'measure out a full cup of happiness to every body.' But his partialist faith and partialist creed did not permit him thus to believe and thus to rejoice.—On the contrary, his faith taught him that Christ, who held this high prerogative, would deal out endless wrath and immortal woe to millions and millions of the human family to whom he, if he had the power, would give a full cup of happiness! This thought, it would seem, must have greatly embittered his dying hours, if he retained it to the last. We have no account whether he did so retain it or not. How happy would he have died could he have fully embraced, by faith, the great doctrine of universal happiness, for which, in his heart, he longed and prayed. And yet, strange to tell, there are those who stoutly contend that Universalism will not do to die by!—that none can die happy in that faith! In the name of all that is sacred and holy we would ask, if the faith that Christ shall 'deal out a full cup of happiness to every body' and fully satisfy the benevolent desires of all good beings, will not impart happiness in the hour of death, what will? what can? Nothing; we verily believe nothing can if this can not.

It is true, some die comparatively happy, who are members of Partialist churches, and have long been professed believers in endless misery. But why is it that they die thus? Is it because of their faith in endless woe? None will pretend it. Nay, it is because they are sometimes enabled to forget that awful doctrine—to banish the thoughts of it entirely from their minds, and to think and dwell on the love of God manifest in Christ; on grace and salvation—these are the themes and sources of happiness. And these, recollect, are the foundation and spirit of Universalism. They are thus enabled, having none in their own system, to borrow consolation and peace from Universalism, which they know not by that name. We thank God that he enables them to do so. For it does not injure us. It leaves none the less consolation and peace for us: for we have enough and to spare. And we want no better source than Universalism furnishes in the trying hour of death. And God grant we may never have less.

Reader, consider this subject, and if Christ possesses the prerogative of dealing out 'a full cup of happiness to every body,' ask thyself if he will be less liberal and gracious in exercising that prerogative than would the dying Dr. Payson. D. S.

PRIDE.

'Pride goeth before destruction,' said the wise man of olden time, and yet what an abundance of pride there is in the world. There is no man in existence who is free from this passion. It would be directly contrary to that constitution of mind which the Supreme Being has thought proper to bestow upon man; and that none are to be found with whom it does not exist, may at once be observed by looking upon the different classes of society and listening awhile to their observations.

'Pride will be his ruin'—said one, of a heavy dealer, as his eye run over the bombastical advertisement spread over a whole page of a large newspaper; of wares cheaper than the cheapest, better than the best, and now to be sold far less than cost—'pride will be his ruin; I am proud to think that I possess sufficient sense to prevent my running such hazards, and thus to escape the ruin into which he will one day be plunged.'

'Pride puts that upon his back which he will some day want in his mouth'—said another, of a spendthrift around town. 'I am proud that I am not ashamed of a coat a day or two behind the fashion; nor yet of a hat not exactly in trim with the newest style.'

'He is too proud to work'—said a third, of a lounging wight who was afflicted with that dreadful and incurable disease—laziness! 'I am proud of the thought that I am industrious.'

'He is too proud to join our church'—said a fourth,—'because it is not popular. I am proud to think that I am not ashamed to own my Master's name, and to worship God in the rude tabernacle dedicated to his service.'

Thus we might go on to the end of the catalogue, finding all to be proud one way or the other. The dandy is proud of his glossy hat and swinging skirt, and the Quaker is proud of his broadbrim and straight collar.—The young belle is proud of her 'gypsie' and silks and satins; and the matron is proud of her more modest and becoming attire. And last of all the old lady of three score and ten throws up her hands, and looking over her spectacles exclaims—'la, me! I am proud to think I have not any pride!'

Now every thing is right in its proper sphere, and hence we must inquire for the place to be occupied by pride.—Where that place is we know not unless it rest upon well-doing. That man who makes a proper use of all his powers, and a proper use of all that God has created for the enjoyment of mankind, may well be proud, providing it is not a pride tinged with so much selfishness as to lead him to look with scorn and contempt upon his wayward fellow creatures. When one has cultivated his powers in a proper manner; when he has made a prudent and proper use of those things around him for his pleasure and enjoyment; when his heart is imbued with the spirit of charity and affection, and when he loves God supremely and his fellow man as himself, then, if mortal ever may be proud, is the hour for him to have the feelings of pride; and yet that is the time when he will have the least.—Humility will appear in all of his words and ways, and proud feelings will be far from his bosom.

But there are those, and not a few either, who are proud of their piety and religion, and like him of old, thank God that they are not like other men. They may be observed in nearly or quite all of the tabernacles of the land, upon the Sabbath; and though they are there under the pretence of worshipping God, yet it is more for keeping up appearances, and deceiving those who are ever ready to be duped; to lead such to believe that they are the only righteous men, upon the earth, and favored recipients of blessings and benedictions from above. But verily they have their reward, for notwithstanding their many professions, it may be observed at a glance that the heart is ill at ease, and their situation should be a warning to all, to shun that selfish pride which leads one to hold his fellow mortals in contempt while he supposes himself to be the favored object of God's love. Such pride, and peace and happiness are never found in company, and the days of such a man shall be days of affliction and his nights, nights of sorrow and wo !

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

LETTERS ON THE MORAL AND RELIGIOUS DUTIES OF PARISHES. By a Clergyman. Third edition. Boston: Published by Abel Tompkins, 38 Cornhill, 1846.

Such is the title of a very neat and beautifully printed little volume, of 156 pages, just received from the publisher. We have perused it through from beginning to end with entire and unmingled satisfaction. It is one of the best books of the kind we have ever read. Its style is unostentatious, its language simple, plain and easy, its tone kind and benevolent, its precepts pure and unexceptionable, and would if universally regarded and acted upon by parents save many a child from ruin, and many a parent from a broken and bleeding heart, as well as from bitter self-reproach for their neglect or wrong management of children. In the long and respectable list of names recommending the work to public favor we find those of nearly all sects: and well may all denominations recommend it. It is not sectarian; not designed for one sect alone, but for the world, for all parents and guardians entrusted with the responsible task of rearing, guiding and training children to virtue, usefulness and happiness. The work should be in every family, and in every district school library. To all we would earnestly recommend to procure and study the work faithfully, and endeavor to carry out its principles in your families. It is neatly bound in muslin and lettered. Price 38 cents. For sale at this office.

THE FLORAL FORTUNE TELLER, A Game for the season of Flowers. By Miss S. C. Edgerton. Boston, published by A. Tompkins, 1846. pp. 160.

This is another of those beautiful miniature volumes from the prolific press of friend Tompkins; bound, lettered and gilt in the most elegant style, and what is more enticing still, filled with the sweetest of flowers gathered by the industrious yet delicate hand of sister Sarah. We are no friends to gaming, in the usual acceptation of the term; but really, this game of Floral Fortune Telling would look somewhat tempting, especially if we were a bachelor, and a score or so of years younger than we are; we would go straight into it. For however great the hazard, we would run the risk in this instance, having so sweet an oracle to decide our destiny. If the decision were favorable, it would be bliss indeed to receive it from such a source; and even if unfavorable, the gentle and sweet manner of the oracle would soften or take off the keen edge of disappointed ambition.

Sister Sarah, in selecting her flowers, and collating her oracles, has drawn from the purest wells of English Poetry. And she thinks as almost every thing has been turned into an oracle, there can be no harm in consulting these little 'floral apostles' respecting the mysteries of our earthly destiny. 'At all events,' she says, 'they are pure and beautiful playthings for the fancy; and if any diversion on earth be innocent, it must be one whose instruments are poetry and flowers.'

As the season of flowers is rapidly passing away we would recommend to all who wish to try this sweet game, or learn how it is played to call for the Floral Fortune Teller soon. Price only 38 cents.

CREDIT TO WHOM CREDIT IS DUE.—We are not very particular, nor very apt to find fault with our brethren of the press, for neglecting to give credit in all little affairs for the matter they publish from our columns, for the reason that some (to us) unknown publisher often copies articles from our paper, neglecting to give credit, and our brethren copy from them, not knowing the origin of the article. And we think it not improbable such may have been the case with the following.

The Trumpet of the 4th inst. copies that beautiful and touching piece of poetry written by Mrs. C. M. Sawyer, entitled 'Spurn not the Guilty,' which appeared originally in this paper of January 2d, 1846, and gives no credit whatever, either to the well known authoress or to the paper which first published it.

We often see articles both in prose and poetry going the rounds of dozens of papers without any credit which first appeared in this paper. And we sometimes publish articles from selections in other papers, whose origin we know not, and therefore can not give the proper credit. It would be well if all publishers would observe the rule of giving credit to whom credit is due.

Br. J. R. Johnson has recently removed to Victor, Ontario county, where he will preach on each alternate Sunday till his engagement closes in Alabama, and after that all of the time in Victor. May the union thus formed be a lasting and happy one for both pastor and people.

By the by, Br. Johnson, we should be glad to see, occasionally at least, the traces of your pen in our columns; and as the Luminary has been discontinued, or merged in the Western Evangelist, we should be equally pleased to hear from the other writers, corresponding editors, &c., of that paper—Brs. Whitney, Chase, Brown, &c., &c., with many others of our old and familiar friends and correspondents, from whom we have not for a long time heard.

Harpers Publications.

No. 4 of their beautiful illustrated edition of the HISTORY OF ENGLAND, is issued. National industry, literature, science and the fine arts, and the manners and customs of the early Saxons are the subjects of this number. 25 cents.

Nos. 89-90 and 91-92 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE contain 'Titus Andronicus' and 'Pericles Prince of Tyre.' Beautifully illustrated as usual. 25 cents per number.

No. 16 of the illustrated WANDERING JEW, is also published with its usual number of engravings. 25 cents.

For sale at Beesley's, who has also received the latest English papers by the last Steamer.

Daniel Adee, No. 107 Fulton street, N. Y. has issued No. 11 of the TREASURY OF HISTORY. It contains the history of China, the East India Islands, Egypt, Barbary States, Australia and Polynesia and their Islands, the history of North and South America, and the United States to the close of the Revolutionary War. One number more completes the series. 25 cents per number.

Prospectus of the third volume of THE GAVEL:

A Monthly Periodical devoted to Odd Fellowship and General Literature. Each number to contain 32 large octavo pages.

THOMAS L. HARRIS AND JOHN TANNER, EDITORS.

The first No. of the third volume of the Gavel will be issued previous to the first of August, and contain a magnificent mezzotint likeness of JOHN G. TREADWELL, Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of New York.

In presenting the prospectus of the third volume of the GAVEL to the Brotherhood, the publisher would return his thanks for the support thus far received at their hands, and he pledges himself to renewed exertions in carrying out the improvements which will be made on the forthcoming volume. He would also state that the subscription list for the second volume is more than double that of the first.

Among the list of contributors will be found the names of some of the most distinguished literary characters in the United States.

Miss H. J. Woodman, Miss S. C. Edgerton, Mrs. Sarah Broughton, Mrs. M. L. Gardiner, Mrs. S. A. Lewis, Mrs. C. T. Clark, T. B. Thayer, Alfred B. Street, Geo. Lippard, James Lumbard, C. D. Stewart, Wm. H. Herbert, J. Stanley Smith, Henry Channing, T. L. Harris, E. H. Chapin, W. K. Cole, E. H. Van Benschoten, B. C. True, Charles Holt, John G. Treadwell, Alfred A.

Phillips, J. B. Devoe, J. Batchelor, R. Macfarlane, W. H. Chaplain, Horatio Gates, B. F. Palmer, Tal. P. Shaffner, John Tanner.

Besides which we have local correspondents scattered all over the United States, who will report the organization of new Lodges and Encampments, and all matters of general interest to the order. And occasionally we shall publish a complete Odd Fellow's Directory, of all the Lodges and Encampments in the United States.

The GAVEL will be published monthly at the city of Albany—each No. to contain 32 large 8vo pages, printed on superior paper, with new and beautiful type, at $1 per annum, payable in advance, being undoubtedly the cheapest Magazine devoted to the Order, ever published in the United States—thus placing it within the reach of every brother who takes an interest in the principles we advocate.

Any person forwarding us the names of five subscribers, (enclosing $5) will be entitled to the 6th copy gratis. If such person will forward us the names of 10 subscribers, (enclosing $10,) will be entitled, and the Lodge of which he is a member, each to a copy gratis, and 20 per cent. on all monies over that amount.

All subscriptions must commence with the volume and none will be received for a less period than one year.

Address, JOHN TANNER, publisher of Gavel, Exchange Building, Albany, N. Y.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

DEATHS.

In Clinton, on the 23d of May, Mrs. PHILOMELA CATLIN, wife of Capt. N. Catlin, and daughter of the late David Edwards of Watertown, Conn., in the 36th year of his age. Mrs. C. had been suffering for several months. She bore her sickness with great patience, and as the closing scene approached she expressed entire resignation to the will of God, and resigned herself with Christian confidence and hope into the hands of that Saviour who gave himself a ransom for all. She left behind her to mourn her loss, a husband and two children, besides a large circle of friends. A sermon was delivered at her funeral by the writer from 2 Cor. v: 7.

T. J. S.

In Smithville, June 11th, Mr. DAVIDSON LANDERS, aged 42 years. A large concourse of citizens attended his funeral on the 13th, to whom a discourse was delivered by

J. T. G.

In Gaines, June 27th, Br. JEPHTHA WOOD, aged 50 years. He was only sick a week, and has left a widow and seven children to mourn his sudden departure.

Br. W. was one of the good of the earth—industrious, honest and charitable, and in the practice of the Christian virtues, he gained the respect and the good will of all acquaintances, and died universally lamented.

He was a consistent believer in the Abrahamic faith, and his deeply afflicted family only mourn over the intervening time that keeps them from his society.

His funeral was attended the Sunday following, at the Universalist church, by the writer.

T. J. S.

In Sheridan, Chautauque county, N. Y., June 30th ult., Mrs. ANNA USHER, aged 46 years and 6 months, wife of Newel Usher, Esq., and only daughter of Chauncey Isham of Hamilton, Madison county, N. Y.

Mrs. U. suffered much and long with that terrible destroyer—the consumption; but endured with exemplary and Christian patience, being sustained by the retrospect of a good life, and the hope of a blessed and glorious immortality for herself and all the human race.

S. R. S.

At the village of Sparta (near Sing Sing) on Friday, June 26, Mrs. ELIZABETH AGATE, wife of Mr. John Agate, aged 66 years. Her funeral was attended in the afternoon of the Sunday following by a numerous collection of relatives, friends and neighbors of the family—and probably some strangers—when, after a fervent prayer, offered by a ministering brother of the Methodist denomination, a funeral discourse was delivered (according to previous arrangement) by the undersigned, from that most interesting declaration of St. Paul, in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, xv: 26, 'The last enemy shall be destroyed—death.' May the consolations, so justly derivable from the above inspired testimony, and other like Gospel assurances, be richly enjoyed by the bereaved husband and children and other relatives of the deceased.

THE INFERENCE.

Spring, dying, left her rich bequest of flowers,
And fruit, and grain, and all the abundant stores
Prolific Nature yields, to be matured
And brought to full perfection, by the glad
And matron hand of Summer. But not Alike does ev'ry tender plant, or flower,
Or fruit, live to receive the warm embrace
Of blushing June; for frosts unkindly, nip
The op'ning bud, or sear the tender leaf,
And blast the fruit that promised well to yield Abundant harvests. But what if frosts do Wither the rich flower, or blast the fruit, or Sear the leaf? Their beauty's only gone, or Their immediate use, but not their substance;
That remains, and shall exist while matter
E'er endures—shall yet assume a thousand
Forms perhaps more beautiful or useful Still.

So in the moral world—that mind which Feels sin's blighting influence dies—to virtue Dies, and holiness, and bliss; and gropes its Way through life, shrouded in moral darkness,
More severely 'felt,' a thousand fold than Egypt's; but which Moses' magic wand could Neither call nor dissipate; but truth, in
In God's own time, by its all-powerful influence Shall dispel, leaving the soul with all the Parity and worth originally Owned;—as free from evil and the stain of Guilt, as when th' Almighty first declared his Finished works were 'good.' So works eternal Truth—the moral sun whose penetrating Beams eradicate the universe: and Where its power is felt, no vice is found, but Love, and peace, and joy. Its action is as Constant, its effects as sure upon the Mind, to purify to raise from moral Death and reinstate in holiness and Bliss, as is the influence of the nat'ral
Sun upon the worlds which bend reluctant
To his powerful sway, to animate, to Beauty and render tenable. Then
Let us hail that promise which declares 'all Men from error shall be saved, and gain a Knowledge of eternal truth.' MERRILL.

GLIMPSES OF TRUTH.

BR. SKINNER.—You are aware that Partialism has some eccentricity of character, and is wonderfully given to jumping about, making long strides, throwing backward and forward somersets, and the like feats of sprightliness and agility, disliking, very much, to get cornered. It generally has two hobbies on which it rides, as Br. Sawyer has remarked concerning the good Dr. Watts; and when it chooses to wipe from its eyes the mist and dust that prejudice and error have thrown in them, it can step out into the clear sunshine of truth and see as well as necessary.

I have been reading some of the sermons of the amiable Saurin, one of the most warm, vigorous and eloquent of the French divines, and though thoroughly orthodox in his views of salvation, hell, devils, total depravity, and all the gloomy paraphernalia of modern Partialism, yet I am astonished at times, at the sound Universalism the good man gets off as if unawares. Indeed, at such times he seems to speak with a dignity and fulness of feeling, as if his whole soul resolved not to be pent up longer, but was determined to go out and bask, if but for a few moments, in the eternal sunshine of the true doctrine of life and immortality. Here is an extract from his sermon on 'Obscure Faith,' which would do honor to the strongest Universalist in the land, but which had it been uttered by such, would certainly meet the censure and disapprobation of our 'unco righteous' neighbors, as Burns calls them.

'Is it possible that a God so gracious and compassionate could have created us to render us forever miserable? Is it possible that a God so great and so munificent should limit his bounty towards us, to the good things granted here below; to that air which we breathe, to the light which illuminates this world, to the aliments which sustain their bodies? Nay, is it possible he should permit us long to remain in this world, exposed to so many public and private calamities; to war, to famine, to mortality, to pestilence, to sickness, to death? Away with suspicious so injurious to the goodness of God! 'He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?' Let us indulge ourselves in feasting on the deliciousness of this hope; let us not destroy the relish of it by wallowing in the pleasures of sense; let us all habituate ourselves to pursue happiness in a conviction of the felicity prepared for us in another world.'—Saurin's 2d Sermon on Obscure Faith. MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the St. Lawrence Association of Universalists for 1846.

Met at Malone, Franklin county, June 24th.—The council was called to order by Br. Waggoner. United in prayer with Br. J. Baker—after which Br. Samuel Field of Malone, was chosen Moderator, and Br. A. M. Worden, Clerk. Read credentials of delegates. Voted that visiting clergy have the opportunity to participate in our deliberations. Chose Brs. Holbrook, Amsden, Parlin, Clark, Berry and Hosford, committee of arrangements.

Appointed Brs. J. Baker, E. A. Holbrook, and S. Walrath, committee on fellowship and ordination. Voted that Brs. C. A. Eldrige, L. W. Sanford and J. Ferris be a committee to nominate delegates to the next State Convention. Appointed Br. J. Baker to preach the next Occasional Sermon. Appointed Brs. D. Mack, M. L. Parlin and A. Goss, committee of discipline for the ensuing year.

The committee on fellowship and ordination made the following report which was approved.

Your committee being instructed to consider the request of T. G. Axtell for a letter of fellowship, and also to consider and hear his explanations, do now report,

That we have attended to the duty required of us, and find that Br. A. expresses nothing but kind feelings and confidence in the ministering brethren, and has explained all to our satisfaction; and we recommend that he receive a letter of fellowship, according to his request.

The following resolution was presented to the council and by it adopted.

Whereas, Br. J. Wallace, who is well known as a preacher in our order, but who is not in formal fellowship with us, having been invited, expresses a wish to act in fellowship and union with us as an ecclesiastical body of Christians. Therefore,

Resolved, That we extend to Br. Wallace, the hand of brotherly love and cordially receive him into our fellowship as a minister of the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The committee to nominate delegates to the next State Convention, reported the names of Brs. W. H. Waggoner and J. Baker, (clerical,) and Samuel Field and Gilbert Wait, (lay,) delegates, with power to appoint substitutes and fill vacancies.—Said report was accepted and approved.

Voted that Br. J. Baker be associated with Br. Waggoner, the Standing Clerk, to receive requests for Conferences and set the time for holding them.

Appointed Br. A. M. Worden to prepare the minutes for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, with a request that they be copied in the Universalist Union and Universalist Watchman.

Voted thanks to Br. Worden for his occasional sermon and requested him to send a copy to Br. Skinner for publication.

Adjourned to meet at Heuvelton, St. Lawrence county, on the fourth Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1847.

SAMUEL FIELD, Moderator.

A. M. WORDEN, Clerk.

Ministers present.—E. A. Holbrook, W. H. Waggoner, J. Baker, A. M. Worden, J. Wallace, T. G. Axtell—all of the St. Lawrence Association—and Brs. W. J. Goss, D. M. Knappen, H. P. Cutting from abroad.

Delegates present.—Canton, L. W. Sanford and C. A. Eldrige—Malone, Samuel Field and H. F. Brewster—Hopkinton, James Ferris and F. Brewster—Heuvelton, Solomon Walrath—Westville, Samuel Mann.

Order of religious exercises. Sermons were preached as follows—on Wednesday morning by Br. A. M. Worden (occasional)—in the afternoon by Br. J. Baker—at 5 o'clock by Brs. H. P. Cutting and W. H. Waggoner.

On Thursday morning, by Brs. D. M. Knappen and W. J. Goss—in the afternoon by Br. W. H. Waggoner, and addresses by Br. J. Baker.

REMARKS.—The services having been closed, it was with reluctance we parted with our brethren, sisters and friends, who had come up to Zion; to the feast of fat things, to partake of that bread which cometh down from heaven and giveth life to the world. It was a season which we shall long remember, and one of the deepest interest to all concerned on that occasion. It was indeed pleasing, to those embracing the Abrahamic faith, to see our partialist brethren manifest so great a share of that charity which characterises every follower of Christ.

There were many present, whose minds were yet chained in the gloomy cells of limitarian darkness, who nevertheless attentively listened to the words of life, truth and salvation, dispensed from the very desk which had heretofore proved a 'broken cistern,' holding none of the waters of salvation. They will doubtless long remember those cheering rays of Gospel light, which were perhaps the first that ever broke in upon their benighted minds. It also filled our minds with pleasure, as we gazed upon the stately form of the new church which our friends are building in Malone, and from the sacred desk of which, Br. Holbrook will doubtless soon be heard, proclaiming the glad tidings of a world's salvation.

We can safely say, that our cause in this vicinity, is rapidly advancing. As intelligence, and a knowledge of the truth increases, ignorance and partialism die away. The two principles (or lack of principles) last mentioned, have long travelled hand in hand; but they are now in the decline of life. At the rate our cause is advancing in this age of improvement, these twin brothers and survivors of the dark ages, will soon be slain by the 'sword of the spirit,' and their bodies will soon be consigned to the shades of oblivion. Then will God be adored as the Father of all, and man recognise in his fellow man, wherever found, a brother.

Then shall the wail of despair, be hushed in silence, and succeeded by songs of praise, and rejoicing; the tear of sorrow shall be wiped away, and 'The ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs of everlasting joy and crowns upon their heads.' May God hasten the happy day.
A. M. WORDEN.

VALEDICTORY SERMON.

Preached in the Universalist Church in Lebanon, Madison county, June 28th, 1846.*

BY REV. J. J. AUSTIN.

'The time of my departure is at hand.' 2 Tim. iv: 6.

In addressing this congregation for the last time—at least for the present—I have wrested a single sentence from the circumstances which anciently surrounded it, as expressive of a simple truth relative to myself. That sentence is a part of the fervid utterance of St. Paul, when about to cast off his vestment of clay, resign his ministry and his soul to the keeping of infinite Love, and soar away from earth to the heavenly habitation of the blessed. 'For I am now ready,' he said, 'to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.' It will at once be seen, that the circumstances which called forth the original utterance of the text, were very different from those which surround us on the present occasion. Then, the person speaking was the great apostle of the Gentiles, learned in all the customs of the fathers, having risen from the feet of Gamaliel to a chief seat in the Christian temple; now, it is the utterance of one of the weakest and humblest of Christ's disciples who would travel steadily on, though at a feeble pace, in the glorious path he trod. Then, a good fight had been fought, the course had been finished, the faith had been kept; now, nothing of the kind can with truth be pretended. Then, the speaker was about to be called to the enjoyment of 'a crown of righteousness,' the fadeless and heavenly inheritance of immortality; now, the call will place but a few miles between us, nor forbid me the pleasure, I trust, of again seeing your faces in the flesh. Still, the text now, as then, speaks the truth—'the time of my departure is at hand.'

As the labor of the day is done, in the calm twilight hour, we gain a true profit by reviewing the hours from the early dawn to the setting sun; so when the pastoral office is about to be left vacant, as under circumstances like the present, I deem it a source of real gain for both pastor and people, to cast their eye backward over the time of their union, and note an advance here, a defect there, and endeavor therefrom to reap instruction for the future. Let us go back, then, brethren, to the time of our union, wake up our memories to events gone by, and from the whole let us be guided more truly in the times to come.

For myself,—when I came among you, I had no experience of the pastoral relation—knew nothing of the duties which would devolve upon me—was young in years, young in the kingdom of God, and still younger in those important qualifications of mind and heart, without which, though Paul should plant, and Apollos water, no increase can be visible in holy living. The time of my connection with this society was unfortunate in one respect, aside from the numerous disadvantages already mentioned. The war of political factions soon spread its tide abroad, raging with intensest fury, and sapping the very foundation of morals and religion. Scarcely a society in all the land escaped its withering influence. Some were rent from centre to circumference—utterly torn asunder—and their vitals dropt bleeding into the arms of spiritual death.—Some were divided into parties, which continued the warfare with a weakened arm, after the storm had swept by. Some gathered to themselves the spirit of discord, though the outward fabric was skilfully kept together. And some were enabled, by the possession of a larger measure of the divine life, to turn their back upon the tempter, and forbid him to enter their inwardly sanctified walls. It was the lot of this society, as the brethren well know, to feel sensibly the warring of the elements of the kingdom of this world. It was not as sorely torn and dissevered as many others; but that fact does not furnish you the smallest apology.—Your society felt the shock: and no power, save that of Him who once quieted the raging storm, could have lulled the troubled waters to immediate repose. Had your pastor been superior to every other, his voice would have been powerless for a while. But when I reflect that he was lamentably deficient in experience, and every desirable qualification, it brings to my heart a sadness it will never forget. May I not ask of you, brethren, never to become involved in like manner again? Will you not consent to differ, yet differ in love? The welfare of your society in the future—and what is more, the extension of your most holy faith, depend in a measure upon the answer you give, and upon its practical fulfilment. There are many among you, who looked with fear and sorrow upon the political contention of a very few. They stood aloof and apart, and felt not the smitings of the storm. They are worthy of all praise; and I am happy to bear testimony, in this public manner, that nearly all of the members of this society, in that trying time, acted the honorable, the noble part.—Brethren, I hope to hear from you often in the future; and to learn of your increase in numbers, in Christian union, in the Christian virtues, will give me joy indeed.

Soon after our union, and something more than two years since, we organized imperfectly a small Sabbath school and Bible class. They were much cramped in their energies and influence, for the want of competent regulations, books, and the active industry of the friends. Since that time, some difficulties have been removed, and others are yet to be overcome. A small library has been procured, and the books seem to be read with pleasure and profit. The Bible class has been well sustained; and I doubt not, it has been and may continue to be productive of much good. The classes for smaller scholars have been under defective regulations, and have proved almost if not quite a failure; still, I have no doubt, experience will correct all past mistakes; and although the scholars live some distance apart, yet the class and the school may be raised to a highly flourishing condition. Brethren, this is a subject which can not engage your too earnest attention. There never was a better time than the present, to exert a good influence on the minds and hearts of the young. Intellectual training is progressing in the land, and its standard of knowledge is rising higher and higher. In almost every district, and hamlet, we behold improvement in those nurseries of freedom—the common schools. The benevolent heart beats lighter and happier for all this:—but are we paying as much attention to moral and religious culture as we ought? Do our children become good, in the same degree they rise in abstract, barren, intellectual knowledge? Do you need to be informed, that culture of the mind does not, necessarily, confer goodness of heart and life? For myself, I am confident, that true intellectual, moral and religious culture, must in time be joined,—that the flowers of the mind, and the graces of the heart, must be made to bud, and blossom, and bring forth fruit together. In the person of my successor, I do hope and pray that a longer experience, and a warmer zeal, and a stronger ability, may help you onward with the Bible class and Sabbath school, and that these interests, bearing upon the progress of truth, may be faithfully and successfully subversed.

The Ladies' Sewing Society is well worthy a passing notice. This society was organized some two years since; and I do verily believe, that your religious society is much better off with than without such an institution. Its peculiar mission is to light up smiles amid suffering and tears, to take the thorn from the bosom of the poor, and to pour therein the sweet balm of relief. The business affairs of this society have been, in the main, well regarded—though want of experience was, at the commencement, a prominent difficulty. In view of all the obstacles, the society has been blessed with a rational degree of prosperity. Its number of members is greater now than at any former period. Though a change has been made in its constitution, diminishing the amount constituting membership, yet I think its funds must have been increased; and if so, it has the capacity of doing still greater good. The object of this society is a most noble one.—'Goodness is the only pleasure;' and to do good furnishes a deeper joy, than to revel in the pomp of wealth, or experience the adulation of the multitude. The professed design of this society has been, and still is, 'to extend the knowledge and practice of Christianity, without any reference to denominational limits.' In fulfilment of this design, it has furnished correct moral and religious instruction for youth; in some instances, it has drawn people of all denominations together in social converse; it has matured acquaintance, and strengthened the bond of union between distant members of your religious society; and, greater and better than all, it has visited the couch of affliction with words of condolence and deeds of love. Oh, is there a single member, who can look with regret upon the doings of this society? Rather, does not the thought of its feeble effort to do good, wake to life a pure joy in the soul? Brethren, let not this society languish; but let it go onward, gathering new strength as the years pass by; and its trophies of good will be treasured up in the temple of Zion. Discouragements may arise as in every undertaking; but with willing hearts, and active hands, they may all be removed; and every soul fraught with benevolence, must ever hope and pray for its continued prosperity.

In reviewing our past connection, brethren, I can but bear testimony to the active interest you have ever manifested in the welfare of the choir. This choir is as numerous, and for a young choir as well disciplined, as any I meet with in my ramblings abroad. Its members, and the society generally, have exhibited, all the while I have known them, a high-minded regard for the cultivation of music as a church ordinance. The choir has met for discipline regularly, I believe, for the past two or three years; and for a good part of the time it has had the benefit of the services of a competent instructor. Nearly all its members have been punctual to their places on the Sabbath; so that we have seldom been without the cheering voice of sacred song in our assemblings for religious worship. All praise is due the choir and the friends, for the warmth of their zeal in this respect. Brethren, these things should continue. The service of the choir is almost indispensable, in the public worship of the Father. The voice of sacred melody and harmony is softening and elevating to the feelings and affections. Next to prayer, it is the outgushing of the soul in love. May the interest you have ever manifested never diminish, but rather increase, to the perfection of this branch of church service.—May the choir sing on, and ever, with the spirit and with the understanding also. And when time and earth shall have gone forever, we hope to meet you in the clime of undying bliss, and with hearts fully blest, and voices united, to sing the high praises of God, in strains of rapturous melody and love, forever and forevermore.

Permit me here to refer, briefly, to the business affairs of your society. It is not an uncommon thing, for societies to become neglectful of their temporal affairs; instances of the kind might easily be pointed out; but all such instances terminate in embarrassment or final ruin. Some think it an onerous task, to discharge the duties devolving upon society officers; and such positively refuse to accept such offices, and perform the duties pertaining to them. Some have so much business of their own, that they feel unable to attend to them. Some feel indifferent, and care not how society affairs are managed, provided they are not troubled with them. While others see the necessity, and are prompt and active in such matters—and not unfrequently at the expense of being charged with designing to rule. Difficulties like these must and will occur, where all do not feel a deep and abiding love for the blessings of the Christian faith. But where the members of a society feel a proper interest in the progress of truth, each will hold himself in constant readiness to do what he can, of the labor that must be performed that the society may live. If such be the feeling in every society, the business affairs of that society will be punctually performed; but if otherwise, that society can never prosper. These remarks are of a general nature, and applicable to all societies in some degree. But you will allow me here to say, that your society has done well in this respect since I have known it—no better than it should have done, perhaps not as well as it might have done—but still it has done well. I am happy in being able to say, that for the past two years, so far as I have known, this society has met its engagements promptly; and more than that, they have been liberal to the family of your pastor, and the poor around, beyond what he had any reason to expect. Brethren, continue the same prompt business habits, and active benevolence, in the future; and your pastor, whoever he may be, will have reason to bless you, as I do most sincerely; you will warm his heart, and nerve his arm, for the duties of his profession; and the good feeling toward you now pervading this community, will be elevated to Christian recognition and brotherly love. Be not weary in well doing.

I can not forbear mentioning, in this place, your general promptitude in the attendance upon religious worship. There are times, I am well aware, when it would be unreasonable to expect a full attendance in the visible courts of the Lord. Situated as your society is, in a farming community, and spreading several miles around, a sufficient apology is found for occasional non-attendance, in the fierce march of the storm, in drifted and blocked-up roads, in bad and dangerous travelling, or in the prevalence of disease in some part of the town. But making due allowance for all obstacles, our meetings for worship have been well attended. Our congregation, under favorable circumstances, has been as large as most of our congregations in the country. Strangers have frequently presented themselves with us before the Lord. The smiling faces and buoyant hearts of the young have been almost constantly with us. And I think I may safely say, that our congregation is larger now than formerly—or at least, that the society in this respect has well maintained its own. We have been called upon to part with some by removal; we have followed some with tears, yet with joy, to the grave; some may have lost their interest in the truth, or the speaker, and remained at home; yet has the congregation, by new accessions, been well sustained—and I think somewhat increased. Here allow me to say, that I take none of the credit to myself. I have, it is true, endeavored to serve the Father, and the brethren, the best I could; but I am sensible of my weakness and deep unworthiness in Heaven's sight. Your own zeal and fidelity, brethren, with the blessing of God, are the chief cause of the small advancement we have made.—Had you been cold and indifferent, and remained at home on the Sabbath; I should have taken it as sufficient proof that our connection was a burden to you, that I could not serve you successfully at all, and I must have left you long ago—if I had not indeed left the ministry, which I dearly love, forever. Brethren, to God and to you be the praise, for the little good which has been done since the time of our union. May you continue to attend the service of the Lord, within these walls, even more regularly in the future. May you gather the youth and the aged with you, around the altar of religious devotion and meditation. And may you praise God on earth, as you expect to praise Him in heaven.

There is one thing to which I wish now briefly to refer, and of which I have spoken to you in times gone by. It is, that you make an effort to sustain the ministry among you every Sabbath. I know that, in all societies, some who are the most willing are the least able, to contribute to the necessary wants of the minister's family. It probably is so in this society. But I do sincerely believe, that with constant, vigorous, judicious efforts, the end can be attained. A minister can be supported with a less salary among you, than in most other places. And if you are careful to get one of the right spirit, zeal and talent, he can do you three fold more good than though you sustain him but half the time. Is not the object worthy the effort? The Sabbath School and Bible Class would receive an impetus they can not otherwise have. The choir would doubtless be improved, by a more constant and uniform practice. The congregation would of course be enlarged, by the very effort which puts forth more strength. The youth would be drawn hither, who have been compelled to attend other places of worship, or not attend at all. And your pastor would be better sustained and invigorated; you would get a preacher of better talent and standing in the order; you would be enabled to retain him; and your society and congregation would be the first, and strongest, within several miles around. Are not the benefits worthy the labor? And I would not have you put your hand to the plow, and look back. You should be careful first to count the cost. Far better to remain as you are, than to rise higher only to sink the lower. But I think I know your perseverance too well, brethren, to apprehend danger in the result; and I believe if you resolve that you can effect this change, and will do so, the work is almost done. I need not press the subject; for I believe that, whether you meet for worship every Sabbath, or but half the Sabbaths in the years to come, your society and the cause in this region will be steadily, triumphantly onward. The Lord, we believe, is on our side; every tendency and influence of the age brings us strength; and it needs not a prophet's ken to foresee, that the end must be for good.

There is another point to which I wish to call your attention. There are some among you, who, I am confident, would be glad of the privilege of observing church relations. The rites of baptism and the Lord's supper are, it is true, nought but forms; but are the services of prayer and singing any thing else? We pray together in public, and we sing praises to God, not because these services are positive commands binding upon us, but because much of our true happiness is found therein; and I would have church rites observed for the same reason—because of their utility. They should not be regarded as tests of Christian character, nor of Christian fellowship; for Christ's test is love, and none other may with safety be adopted. But in this world, the spiritual and material are intimately connected; and we can reach the former only through the medium of the latter. Sight and sound are important avenues, between the soul and the outward world. And whatever tends to the elevation and expansion of the soul, may indeed be used with profit. Baptism and the Lord's supper, I believe, have a sanctifying influence on the mind and heart. If others think them unauthorised and useless, I would not urge their observance of them. But those who think them proper and useful, should be privileged to enjoy them. If we think differently here, as upon all other points, we should ever differ in love. There was a time, brethren, as I am informed, when you had the privilege of assembling around the table, representing the last supper of Christ with his apostles, and partaking of the symbols of the broken body and spilt blood of the Saviour, in remembrance of him—kindling the thoughts with truth, and warming the affections with love. That time is long since past—be it said with sorrow? You will doubtless remember, that, since I have been with you, your attention has often been called to the subject, and an effort was made to bring about the desired communion, but with partial success. Obstacles which need not be mentioned, were among us, introduced from the warring elements of the world, and our efforts were frustrated for that time. But can you not succeed in the future? You will need a close union in love, a near communion with the Saviour, an earnest, fervent walk with God, or you can not sit down at the feast of love together, nor rise to the enjoyment of unfading purity and bliss. But I will not press the subject. You will, I doubt not, labor in the future for the spiritual advancement of yourselves, your children, and for all around; and I can assure you, brethren, you will ever have my most ardent prayers for your success.

But I must hasten to a close. The time of my departure is at hand. The first connection I ever made, as a pastor of a people, is about to be broken. I leave you, brethren; but I leave you with such feelings as I never knew before. A new charge calls me to come; and my duty bids me go. The change, to me, will be striking; and I doubt not, full of instruction. I shall look over my new congregation, in vain, for a single familiar face.—Though new friends may rise up around me, yet shall I never forget the old. I leave behind many warm and loving hearts, toward whom I must ever feel strong and deep affection. But I go. We may never meet again on earth—though I hope and trust we shall. We may never again mingle in the social circle; we may never again sit at the same festive board; we may never again join in the solemnities of the marriage union; we may never again mingle our tears, and our hopes, over the dead; we may never again meet for worship within these walls; we may never again hold prayer communion with the Father; we may never again join in singing the praises of the Lord; we may never again ponder together the truths of the Sacred Volume; but I conjure you, brethren, ever to bear this truth in remembrance—Though we never meet on earth, we shall meet again in Heaven!

THE DIVINE CHARACTER.

It is altogether impossible for men to love God as his character is represented by our opposers. Some points of the divine character as represented by them are sufficiently inviting, as for instance the attribute of benevolence; but whenever the justice of God is presented by them, his character, as a whole, become odious and truly repulsive. It is seldom that we find a person holding the common views of God's character, who is willing to acknowledge their legitimate influence upon the human mind. I have never known but one instance, and that is the following admission by a Presbyterian divine in Ohio, as reported to me recently by Br. C. C. Wilcox, of Middlebury, Ohio.

The following illustration of the divine character was recently given by a distinguished Presbyterian preacher (Rev. Mr. Hanford) of Tallmage, Ohio, who has been in good standing with that denomination more than twenty five years. He said 'you may conceal a very loathsome object, and then by exhibiting some parts of it, it may seem desirable, but disclose fully its true character, and it becomes perfectly disgusting; and so it is with the character of the great Jehovah. You may speak of his mercy, love, goodness, etc., and sinners will almost be induced to love him; but bring fully to view his real character, and they will hate him with a perfect hatred.

This, dear reader, is the God whom men ignorantly worship as the true God! It is not the devil in sheep's clothing, for the very clothing itself is the devil in his ugliest form. And can it appear strange that sinners do not love such a God, when his professed ministers themselves confess that in his true character he appears so odious, so horrible, that they naturally 'hate him with a perfect hatred?' How true it is with regard to the Orthodox and the Universalists, that 'their God is not our God!' J. W.

THE POWER OF EARLY IMPRESSIONS.

If it be true that 'first impressions are the strongest,' then the greatest care should be had, that early impressions be good ones. There is no estimating the influence of an impression, made upon the mind of a child, in after life. I well recollect (for I can not efface it from my mind) the idea I formed of the first preacher of the restitution I was permitted to behold. I had been taught to think of Universalism as a bad doctrine; and Universalists as bad men, especially their ministers; and when, for the first time, I went to one of their meetings, and gazed upon a live Universalist preacher, I imagined that a monster stood before me, an image that always to this day presents itself, when the name of the venerable man, whom I then saw, is thought of.

Now I do not suppose that my parents, any more than others, were guilty of impressing my young mind unfavorably towards any one. But certain I am that I received a most unfavorable view of one, whom I now believe to be a good man; but of whom I can not think, without calling up the character of the drunkard, the swearer, and the disturber of domestic quiet; though more than twenty years have elapsed since that impression was made.

I note this incident for the purpose of calling attention to the manner in which wrong impressions are given out and how lasting they are. What incalculable injury is done to the child thus impressed! What injustice to the individual thus misrepresented! Yet how many are causing false impressions to be made upon their children, both in regard to individuals and sentiments! How many are receiving perverted, distorted views of truth—abhorrent ideas of Deity—that time will never wholly remove? Are there not, even among Universalists, those who are not careful to prevent the common yet erroneous notions of God's mercy and justice from being adopted by the children? Are there not some, who are less careful to teach their little ones about the paternity of God, than others are to tell them of his tyranny? Is there, among us, that solicitude to impress the youth of our order with the lovely image of the Son of God, that there is among others to impress the character of the devil and total depravity upon them? Let us remember that early impressions are the strongest; and that as we impress the child, so will be the man; and act accordingly. J. S.

Ministering brethren present—N. Sawyer, Kenadyville; A. Upson, Hornellsville; C. Carpenter, Townsend, Chemung county; W. M. Delong, Binghamton; A. G. Clark, McLean; J. B. Gilman, Brooklyn, Pa.; L. Hyatt, Marathon; H. E. Whitney, Columbia Flats, Pa.; O. B. Clark, Amity.

Lay delegates in attendance.—South Dansville, Benj. Preston, Elisha Robinson; Howard, David Whitwood, Wm. Goff; Bath, Henry Smith, Zera Brady; Cohocton, Simeon Holmes, Edward Parmenter.

Read minutes of last session.

Committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of conferring ordination on Br. O. B. Clark. Report accepted and ordination conferred.

Committee of discipline reported no complaint. Accepted.

Proceeded to appoint committees. On fellowship and ordination, D. Alger, Conesus, N. Sawyer and A. Upson. On discipline, Seth Rice, Howard, Z. Brady, Bath, T. C. Grover, Springwater.

A. Upson, N. Sawyer, ministerial—James Alley, John T. Andrews, lay, delegates to State Convention.

Voted, upon request of Br. E. Carpenter, that this Association embrace the county of Chemung as part of its territory.

Voted, that this Association hold a special session at Springwater, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in October next.

Voted that this Association adjourn to meet on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in October, 1847, at such place as the Standing Clerk may appoint.

Voted that the Standing Clerk prepare the minutes for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, with request that other papers of our denomination in this State copy them. Adjourned.

WM. GOFF, Moderator.

O. B. CLARK, Clerk.

Sermons were preached by the following brethren, in the order in which they are named—Carpenter, Gilman, Whitney, Hyatt, Delong and A. G. Clark.

Ordination services.—1. Voluntary. 2. Reading the Scriptures by Br. Whitney. 3. Prayer by Br. Carpenter. 4. Hymn. 5. Sermon by Br. Sawyer. 6. Voluntary. 7. Ordaining prayer by Br. Delong. 8. Delivery of the Scriptures and charge by Br. Hyatt. 9. Right hand of fellowship by Br. A. G. Clark. 10. Hymn. 11. Benediction by Br. O. B. Clark.

REMARKS.—Although we have some complaints to make, yet, our meeting, on the whole, was a good one. The preaching was good—and the performances of the choir excelled all that we have ever witnessed in these parts. In our council, every movement received unanimous approbation.

Many of our friends were hindered from attending our meeting on Wednesday, on account of incessant rain; but on Thursday our congregation was full. Our friends in Howard received us with kindness and hospitality; for, they certainly appeared to use every exertion to make us comfortable during our stay with them.

We might speak of more good things in reference to this meeting, but we leave that part and turn to another that bears with weight upon our mind.

It will be seen by the minutes that only four societies were represented at our present session.—About 130 members in the whole. Brethren, these things ought not so to be. When our territory embraces certainly more than a thousand firm believers in universal salvation, and only a tithe of that number known to us to be in a state of organization—the remainder scattered upon the mountains and in the wilderness like lost sheep; we can not but mourn over the desolation of Zion, and are constrained to cry out, 'O, tell it not—publish it not in the streets.'

Brethren, we think you must see the importance of organization. As Br. Hayward says, 'In union there is strength.' And we add our firm conviction, that in numbers and 'union,' there is not only strength but influence also. Do, brethren, make one effort to organize societies, as soon as practicable. There will be an extra session of the Steuben Association held at Springwater on the first Wednesday in October next. We appointed that meeting for the express purpose of gaining a more full representation of societies and members, and for further statistical information of our cause in this Association. Brethren, try your best, and report to us by delegation, or even by letter.

There is another thing of which we would speak. The late practice, (at least, to us late,) of bookselling at our meetings. Now, brethren, we mean no offence. We are willing to have you bring on your books, and sell them. But we would ask, would it not be better to 'open store' at more seasonable hours, say, in the morning—during intermission—and after service—and 'shut up' in time of public service; rather than keep up a constant sale—detaining many from seating themselves and attending to the main object of the meeting? We merely suggest the propriety of the former course, in preference to the latter. We felt hurt about that business during the whole process. And many of our friends were cut to the heart on hearing the sarcastic taunts thrown out by bystanders and opposers. One man came in, and after service he invited some of our friends to go and sup with him. 'Well,' said he, 'I thought I was going to a religious meeting to-day, but, come to get there, I found I was in a book auction room. I guess some of your folks think more of making a little money, than they do of the meeting.'

By request we have given a little hint upon this matter, in this place; we hope hereafter to see something in shape of change. Per order,

A. UPSON.

Prospectus of the third volume of THE GAVEL:

THOMAS L. HARRIS AND JOHN TANNER, EDITORS.

The first No. of the third volume of the Gavel will be issued previous to the first of August, and contain a magnificent mezzotint likeness of JOHN G. TREADWELL, Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of New York.

In presenting the prospectus of the third volume of the GAVEL to the Brotherhood, the publisher would return his thanks for the support thus far received at their hands, and he pledges himself to renewed exertions in carrying out the improvements which will be made on the forthcoming volume. He would also state that the subscription list for the second volume is more than double that of the first.

Among the list of contributors will be found the names of some of the most distinguished literary characters in the United States.

The GAVEL will be published monthly at the city of Albany—each No. to contain 32 large 8vo pages, printed on superior paper, with new and beautiful type, at $1 per annum, payable in advance, being undoubtedly the cheapest Magazine devoted to the Order, ever published in the United States—thus placing it within the reach of every brother who takes an interest in the principles we advocate.

Any person forwarding us the names of five subscribers, (enclosing $5) will be entitled to the 6th copy gratis. If such person will forward us the names of 10 subscribers, (enclosing $10,) will be entitled, and the Lodge of which he is a member, each to a copy gratis, and 20 per cent. on all monies over that amount.

All subscriptions must commence with the volume and none will be received for a less period than one year.

Address, JOHN TANNER, publisher of Gavel, Exchange Building, Albany, N. Y.

DEATHS.

In Nunda, on the 1st inst., after a short, but distressing illness, SARAH EDGARTON, eldest daughter of Rev. A. Kelsey, aged 4 years 5 months and 7 days. Thus has an interesting and promising child been taken from earth. At half past 4 o'clock on the morning of the 1st, amidst a perfect anthem of praise, caroled by the songsters of the grove, did her pure spirit take its departure from the scenes of mortality, and left her fond parents bedewed with the tears of sorrow and mourning. Though they mourn, they mourn not as those who have no hope. The consolation of the gospel was tendered to them, and sympathizing friends, on the subsequent day by the writer.

'A rose-bud has been gathered;

To grace the bright bouquet,

Which on the Savior's loving breast

His trusting followers lay.

It blossomed but a little span

In this fair world of ours;

Then angel hands transplanted it

'T'p bloom in brighter bowers;

May God bless their mourning breasts.

SCIENCE.

BY LAURA EGGLESTON.

Awake, my harp, to strains exulting,
And join the minstrels' thrilling lyres;
Fair Science comes our weal consulting,
To kindle intellectual fires.

In our lov'd land her courts are holden,
Accessible to high and low;
Her reign is free, sublime and golden,
And highest honors can bestow.

The mists of error are dispersing
Before her brilliant rays of truth,
And seas of knowledge are immersing
Th' expanding minds of age and youth.

Pale Superstition, queen of terror,
Retreats to regions dark and void,
Her slaves, emancipated from errors,
Shall tread the courts of science broad.

The loftiest intellects are bending
Before her pure and hallowed shrines,
And brilliant scintillations sending
To ignorance's remotest lines.

Her purest streams around are flowing,
In moral channels wide and deep;
Her fruitful vines are brightly glowing
On green Improvement's tow'ring steep.

She shall exalt our happy nation
High in the scale of mental worth,
And gild the halls of legislation,
The gay saloon, and lowly hearth.

Roll on, fair Science, pure and splendid,
In all thy noontide glories blaze;
Till moral darkness shall be ended,
And all drink in thy lucid rays.

THE JEWISH RULER.

BY MISS LOUISE M. BRAWNER.

There was a man of the Pharisees named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews—the same man came to Jesus by night—St. John iii.

Darkness encircled the land called Holy—night, with her train of shadows, mantled mountain and hill and valley, and deep sea and placid and gurgling rivulet.—There were no stars visible; the sweet sparkling things were hidden behind dense clouds that had been clustering in the heavens since the decline of day, and the fair, pale moon ventured not to glance from beneath her vapory mantle, lest she should behold some devastation on earth, for a rude and terrible storm was portending. All nature appeared conscious of the approaching battle of the elements, and hushed their murmurings. Men, women and children, birds, beasts and insects, remained quiet and expectant. Soon the artillery of heaven disturbed the calm, and flash after flash of lurid flame illuminated the vast concave and revealed the sea beneath—the cities, towns and villages, the hill sides and pleasant vales of blessed Palestine. Proudest among its proud places stood Jerusalem; her costly palaces, her stately towers, her splendid domes and spires and temples brightening under each successive gleam shot from the electric heavens. The reverberating thunder and the long streams of brilliant lightning were accompanied by thick and fast-falling rain drops, as though an ocean above gave vent to its superfluous waves.

In an apartment of a rich and sumptuous dwelling of that eastern clime sat one of its loveliest daughters, now ministering tenderly to a tall and stately man who tossed on a couch in all the restlessness of a troubled spirit, and anon gazing upon the conflict without. The chamber was supplied with every luxury, and lighted by lamps emitting a sweet and pleasant odor, while upon the forms of its occupants shone jewels of rare beauty and value, and robings from the most famed looms of the age.

The storm continued an hour, and then the dark drapery fell from the blue vault, and the beautiful stars were disclosed to view one by one, like glittering gems, and the moon, gentle and smiling, scattered her rays, until the expansive sky was flooded with mellow light, softening and beautifying every object. The breath of countless flowers—such flowers as bloom but in eastern lands—floated up and filled the atmosphere with delicious fragrance, while every thing seemed to whisper—

There's light to follow darkness—e'er—
There's joy for those who doubt and fear—
There's calm when threatened storms are done—
There's peace for all beneath the sun.

'Look up, my lord, the elements have stayed their contention—look up, I pray, and gladden the heart of thy handmaiden,' murmured the lute-like tones of Serah the wife of Nicodemus. 'The gloomy clouds obscure the celestial orbs no longer—all is brightness.'

The ruler pressed his hand upon the heart that throbbed wildly beneath his costly robe of purple and fine linen, and, sighing, replied, 'There is no brightness in my soul, Serah; there is nought but darkness and gloom away. In halls of state, in synagogue or temple, at home by thy side, my adored, or abroad, tranquillity eludes me, and doubts of a future kingdom, thoughts of another life disturb my bosom.'

'Hast thou heard the Nazarene?' questioned his beautiful listener, while to her fair face there sprang an expression of awe and reverence. 'Hast thou hearkened to the great teacher whose fame has extended all over our lovely land, the ambassador of God whose voice has been heard on Olivet's mount, in the garden, by the stream so dear to my heart, and elsewhere?' And there was that in the light of the speaker's beaming countenance that told a Christian woman's undying faith in Him who had gathered around him so many of her fair sisters.

'He is an impostor, Serah; he has deceived thee and others—our Messiah is yet to come,' spoke the ruler.

'Dost forget the miracles he has performed? There was no deception in the awakening of the noble brother of the fair sisters of Bethany from the slumbers of the grave—in the resuscitation of the only son of the widow of Nain, and the sweet, childish daughter of Jairus, nor in the healing of poor wasted frames.'

'Ah! Serah, can he heal the mind? Can this boasted one dispel the doubts and fears that have gathered in sad confusion about my aching bosom?' and the ruler hid his noble countenance amid the rich cushions of the sumptuous couch on which he had been seeking repose in vain.

His companion placed her soft hand on his head, and bending down whispered in his ear. He rose from his pillow and flung his arm around her fair person, 'Weary of thy presence, my loved one! Weary of aught so good and true? Sooner the golden sun forget his risings and declinings, the moon to gladden the earth with her smile, the stars to sparkle on heaven's robe, the blossoms we love to fling their fragrance on the breeze; sooner all things forget their appointed destinies, that I remember not thy affection, thy truth, thy gentle devotion.'

The Jewish wife bent modestly beneath the glance of her lord, cherished next to her God, and murmured, 'Thanks, thanks—and now, bearken to thy servant.—Whose power bade the clouds disperse and unmantled the glory of the night-gems, stayed the rain and swift-footed lightning, kept us here unsated by the fiercely contending elements, recalls my heart and thine. Go to the Bethlehemite, and learn what thou wouldst of a future state.'

There had long been a shade on the brow of Nicodemus, a grief in his bosom unrevealed, and this shadow had deepened, this grief worn heavier and darker, until his noble frame bent under its influence. Amid the halls of state he remained gloomy and abstracted; and when he sought his rich and gorgeous dwelling and encountered the soft caresses of his dark-eyed Serah, his troublesome dreams increased, his mental inquietude became insupportable, and he longed in the bitterness of his spirit to die. Now he trembled beneath the music-words that greeted his ear, but he replied—

'Men will scoff at me, Serah—my people will denounce the traitor to the religion of his fathers,' and he rose to his feet and paced the apartment impatiently, while his companion poured forth the language of condolence, though her full heart was overflowing with sadness for his anguish. Oh! woman—woman! what is not thine to do and suffer?

'Seek the one I have named, my lord; seek him to-night,' she pleaded. 'His voice steals on the heart like the melodies of our minstrels, and each tone will bring thee peace.'

'Not to-night—oh! not to-night can I seek peace,' exclaimed the ruler. 'The season of darkness is not a time to unveil the soul.'

'There is a flower, my master,' meekly answered the Jewess, 'that unfolds its petals when all eyes are shrouded save His to whom its fragrance floats up. It pours its incense out in darkness and secrecy. Be like that plant, and bare thy breast to the gaze of heaven.'

What can not the persuasions of the gentle and pure effect?

Nicodemus sought the abode of the Nazarene, and uttering his simple 'Rabbi, Rabbi,' was admitted to his presence.—Fair as a woman's were the broad brow, the delicate cheek and full orbs of that lowly one, while the long flowing curls of radiant hair lent a wondrous beauty to the meek countenance. He spoke, and the ruler harkened as to a strain of celestial minstrelsy—fear fled away, doubts vanished, and to his heart there stole a thrilling of perfect happiness. He knelt and worshipped in sincerity, and when the first faint streak of early dawn became visible he left the side of his angelic instructor and sought his proud home, thenceforth to live for the eternal and fadeless clime allotted to those who are 'born again.'

Jerusalem's pride has been humbled in the dust—centuries have sunk to their graves—nations have risen and fallen, but the power of the teacher still remains; it is glorious, illimitable.

He beholds us, he loves us, he hears us alway;
In the darkness of midnight, the brightness of day;
Though his reign on the rude earth forever is past,
From yon heaven arched o'er us his blessings are cast.

AN OLD VIRGINIA SERVANT.

Died, at Cumberland Church, Cumberland county, Va., on the 6th ult., Syfax Brown, aged one hundred and fifteen years, four months and five days. He was born at Westover, the residence of Col. Wm. Byrd, Oct. 1, 1730, and sold when a small boy by Col. Byrd, to John Randolph, Esq., of Mattoax, the father of the Hon. John Randolph, of Roanoke. Mr. Randolph visited Europe before the Revolutionary war, and Syfax accompanied his master, and discharged the duties of a servant, ably and faithfully. After Mr. Randolph's return to the United States, Syfax served with fidelity, Judge George Tucker, of Williamsburg, a gentleman who acted a very conspicuous part throughout the whole revolutionary struggle. He then fell into the hands of Richard Randolph, Esq., of Bizarre, and was manumitted by him in 1795.

Syfax was patriotic, honest, polite, polished and intelligent,—one who had seen much of the world, and when his countenance was lit up by a social glass, would descant fluently on the French war in Canada, and of the scenes he had beheld at Crown Point and Ticonderoga. He also entertained the hearer with a spicy synopsis of men and things in the West Indies and Europe—was known to some of the lords of England, nobility of France, and many of the most distinguished officers of the American army.

Syfax rode Postillion, and guided the first pair of a set of six horses in Mr. Randolph's coach. While in the discharge of his office, an English nobleman asked him the names of his fine horses; he very promptly gave the names of the two lead horses, and boggled. At this moment, Mr. Randolph, scowling on Syfax, said in a passion, 'Tell his lordship the names of my horses are Firebrand and Hailstone, Dentatus and Dare Devil, Cream O'Tartar and Quicksilver.' He trembled under the sound of his master's voice, and knew his fate. After returning, he was flagellated by the butler for not recollecting the names of his coach horses; his memory then became very retentive on the subject of names.

Syfax attended his young masters, Theodor and John Randolph, when students at College, and could rehearse some of the finest passages in Shakspeare and Addison; two acts of Cato's tragedy he committed to memory, and would rise in the morning and exclaim, 'The dawn is overcast, the morning lowers,' and so on.

The writer of this has known Syfax Brown for half a century, and most that is said in this obituary notice came directly from him, and is given to the public for what it is worth. He was a man of some fine traits of character; yet like many others, had his faults—was too fond of alcohol—drank his glass and loved his lass—and they were probably his besetting sins. Fifty years ago, Syfax was a good looking man, sprightly and active, having a cheerful countenance, and a fine retreating forehead. His person was rather short than tall, rather fat than thin, muscular and round, with a full and prominent chest, which gave him the fairest claim to longevity. He lived until the grasshopper was a burden; his limbs grew stiff, the arteries ossified, the senses decayed, and the system was oppressed with a load it could not bear.—[Richmond Compiler.

A REGIMENT OF GIANTS.—Frederick the Second, King of Prussia, was remarkable for an extravagant humor of supporting the tallest men that possibly could be procured; and he would give a fellow of six feet and a half high, eighty or a hundred guineas bounty, besides the charge of bringing him from the farthest part of the globe, if it so happened.

One day, while his majesty was reviewing this regiment of giants, attended by all the foreign ambassadors, and most of the officers of rank both in the court and army, he took occasion to ask the French minister, who stood near him, if he thought his master had an equal number of troops in his service able to engage those formidable men? The Frenchman, who was no soldier, said he believed not.

The King pleased with such a reply from a native of the vainest nation in the world, asked the imperial ambassador the same question; and the German frankly declared his opinion, that he did not believe there was such another regiment in the world.

'Well, my Lord Dinford,' said the King to the British Ambassador, 'I know you have brave troops in England; but would an equal number of your countrymen, do you think, beat these?'

'I will not take upon me absolutely to say that,' replied his lordship, 'but I dare be bold to say, that half the number would try.'

UNIVERSALISTS AND UNIVERSALISM DEFENDED;
A Discourse in reply to the slanderous attacks of Matthew H. Smith. By A. C. Barry. Richmond, Va., 1846.

Such is the title of a handsome pamphlet, just received from the author, of 21 pages. Mr. Smith, so famed of late among Partialists for his world-wide opposition to Universalism, had recently visited Richmond and poured out the vials of his wrath and spleen in one of the Richmond churches against this benevolent system. Br. Barry does not attempt to follow him in all his serpentine and malicious attacks, but simply lays before his audience a brief outline of the character of the man who thus 'bears false witness against his neighbor,' thus showing that his testimony is worthless, being that of a false witness, a crazy and fallen man, a wandering star to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness continually. In conclusion he defends our faith ably from the assaults of its enemies and shows that Universalism is the truth of heaven, adapted to the wants and necessities of suffering humanity, and necessary to be preached because it is so.

As Smith's book and pamphlet against Universalists and Universalism has been circulated in this region, with great zeal and avidity by a few of his rabid admirers, it may be of service to them as well as to our friends to present them in our columns with some of the facts in the history of this unfortunate and hapless man. We accordingly make the following extract from the pamphlet before us:—

'It will be recollected by all those who were present on the evening of Mr. Smith's first lecture, that he spoke of his parentage—of his childhood—of his earlier associations, saying that he was cradled under the influence of Universalism—that the Bible was not read in his father's house—that the voice of prayer was never heard there—that all his associations were irreligious. What says his brother to this? 'The description he gives of his early life and conversion, are so untrue to nature, that we recognise nothing of resemblance in his biography to the actual history.' He further says of his poor brother, 'He has prepared for himself the bread of sorrow, humiliation and shame, which should his life be prolonged, he will be made to eat in his latter days.' (See Christian Warrior of May 20th, 1843.)

The facts with reference to Mr. Smith's parentage—childhood—associations—the commencement of his ministry, are these:—His father at the time of his birth, was a Christian preacher and not an Universalist preacher as he says,—his mother he acknowledges never was a Universalist—by his father he was baptised when a child, and through this religious rite dedicated to the service of God. With what truth, therefore can he say, that he was cradled under the influence of Universalism, and that his first associations were irreligious? This statement taken together is false, even on the supposition that his father, at this time, was an Universalist preacher; which is not true.

Mr. Smith says that he entered the Universalist ministry when about nineteen years of age. He leaves out of the account entirely that he first commenced preaching with the Christians; and probably at about this age; and was not an Universalist up to that time; but became a convert from among that people to Universalism. He conceals this fact, and will have it that he was cradled under the influence of Universalism; that no other influence was brought to bear upon him; though his mother never was an Universalist, but a Christian woman; that all his associations were irreligious; and that finally under this kind of nurture, and thus trained and schooled, with an unsanctified heart and life of course, he entered the Universalist ministry. Now the facts in the case show, that, though his childhood may have been neglected; though all his associations may have been irreligious from his boyhood up; yet Universalism was not to blame. His father was for many years after his birth a Christian preacher; his mother was a Christian woman and never an Universalist; he himself was first of all a Christian preacher; and still he confesses to have been trained and nurtured in irreligion, and to have been far from the kingdom of God.

With this confession we shall be prepared for what follows. Unredeemed in heart and in character, he commenced preaching Universalism. He was unsuccessful; he gathered about him only the loose, the abandoned, the profane; his preaching in every case had a downward tendency; the very fruits we should expect from such a ministry. Irreligion would naturally beget irreligion; impiety would beget impiety; falsehood would generate falsehood; but, from his own showing Universalism is to blame for none of this; the fault was in his previous training, previous habits, and previous associations, and not in the doctrine he attempted to preach, and which he is now laboring to destroy.

But let us examine Mr. Smith's testimony further; and certain I am as we proceed we shall be more and more satisfied of the correctness of his brother's statement concerning him; that 'his lectures are not to be relied upon; that they are the fruits of a mind diseased; a spirit bereft of reason.' In his lecture on Monday evening, Feb. 16th, he stated in substance that the results of his preaching not being what he supposed they should be, his faith in Universalism was shaken; his confidence in it measurably destroyed. This fact he communicated to his congregation in Salem. He was urged to remain, and do the best he could. To this he could not consent, and in May 1840, the connexion closed. Now there is nothing in this statement that bears the least resemblance to the facts in the case, save, it may be, that in May 1840 the connexion closed; even that is not true, as the records of the Salem society will show.

Becoming opposed to the discipline of the Massachusetts Convention of Universalists, for the reason, that he came too often in conflict with it, Mr. Smith determined to withdraw from its connexion—not by renouncing Universalism—not by relinquishing his ministry but by casting off the fellowship of the denomination, and becoming an independent preacher. He knew that he had lost his standing in the denomination—that confidence was no longer reposed in him—that almost every Universalist desk in the land was closed against him and this justified him in the step he took. The society in Salem still retained him as its pastor; though fallen, though disgraced by his own acts, he was retained.

But what does he now do? Does he rest satisfied and contented? No: he would have his society also cut loose from the Convention, renounce its fellowship, declare itself independent, and no longer be subject to the rules and discipline of the Convention. So he addresses the following letter to the Standing Committee:

Salem, March 17th, 1840.

To the Committee of the Universalist Society in Salem Mass.—

Brethren—No man can feel more than myself the sacred nature of that tie which binds Pastor and People—nor be more sensible that it should not be severed for a slight or trivial cause.

My connection with the society which you represent, has been of the most pleasant character; for it I have a high esteem; and the attentions which I have received at the hands of its members, have endeared them to my heart. From repeated and friendly conversations with prominent members of the society, I have reason to believe that they expect their minister to subserv an interest which in conscience I can not. They expect him to feel a sympathy with the denomination of Universalists; to act in concert with it; to be called by its name, and to be in reality, if not in form, identified with it.

As I can not answer this expectation in any of the above named particulars, justice to myself and to you, seems to require, that we have a clear understanding of this matter.

With the fact that I have received no new revelation of theological faith, you are advised by what I have repeatedly said to you. And with the motives that have led me to separate myself from the denomination of Universalists, you are also acquainted, at least, with the most of them. And as you can inform those members of the society, who are not informed, and who wish to be, I need not repeat them here. To this society, of which I am the pastor, I have devoted a portion of the best part of my life. I am conscious of having served it to the best of my ability, and of having spared no labor that I thought would add to its profit.

I DESIRE NO BETTER FRIENDS; I SEEK FOR NO BETTER SOCIETY. If I could serve the society without acting in concert with the denomination of Universalists, I should be ready and happy to do so. If, however, the society should insist upon such concert of action, I shall hold myself ready, cheerfully and with the kindest feelings, forthwith to tender my resignation of the office of pastor, and with it all the duties, trials, and responsibilities of that trust.

We have lived together affectionately; let us part, if we must, in peace and kindness.

I will ask your earliest attention to the subject of this epistle; and offering you individually and collectively the assurance of my esteem, I subscribe myself affectionately, your obedient servant,
M. HALE SMITH.

Notice, that he confesses to no change of sentiment or doctrine—he declares, that he had received no new revelation of theological faith; he finds no fault with his society; no fault with their Christian characters; does not say that they were profane and irreligious, and he must therefore leave them; but he writes, I desire no better friends; I seek for no better society.

On receiving this letter the Committee sent for Mr. Smith, and stated to him that they did not know what to make of his letter; if it was true that his faith had undergone no change, he could have an opportunity of withdrawing it, and thus save the action of the Committee upon it—save the necessity of their laying it before the society, from whom it would meet with no favor in its present form. To this, Mr. Smith replied 'that he knew the feelings of the society better than the Committee, and he was willing to risk it.'

After some further conversation between them, the Committee requested Mr. Smith to resign his pastoral charge, otherwise they were confident he would be dismissed; but this, asserting that he knew the feelings of the society better than they, he refused to do. A meeting of the society consequently was called, the letter laid before it, and a resolution immediately offered, 'that the Rev. Matthew Hale Smith be dismissed from the office of pastor of this society forthwith.' To say his feelings, this resolution was withdrawn and the following offered in its stead, and passed by the unanimous voice of two hundred members present:

Resolved, That the views and feelings expressed by Rev. M. H. Smith, in his communication, are such, that this society, as believers in the universality of the grace of God, can not sanction or approve without giving up our denominational name, and of surrendering the doctrine for which we have contended for forty years, through good report, and through evil report; that as Universalists we have ever been known; and although we love our minister much, we love our religion more.

Mr. Smith now found himself in a sad dilemma, and must have been sorely troubled as the following letter will show:—

'Brethren.—The proceedings of the meeting of the New Universalist society, held March 23d, 1840, to act on a communication of mine are before me. I beg leave to place my protest against a part of the views and feelings attributed to me in that resolution which embodies the sense of the meeting. I have never desired the society to give up the principles for which it has contended for forty years. I have not desired it to give up its distinctive denominational name. Nor have I placed before it the alternative of choosing between their love for its minister and its religion.

I disclaim and repudiate each and all of these sentiments attributed to me, by the resolution before me. The ground on which we are about to separate must not be misunderstood nor misrepresented.

There is, I believe no complaint against my ministerial or personal character, against my preaching, my doctrine, or my life.

There is, I am happy to believe, a strong feeling of attachment and good will on your part towards me, as I am sure there is, and always has been, on my part towards you. I have withdrawn from the Universalist denomination, as a sect; but I have joined myself to no other. Nor have I ever sought to change your doctrine, to influence you to give up your faith, nor to lead you into any other denomination of Christians. As I have announced to you my determination to maintain the position of an Independent Christian minister; not identified with, nor accountable to the denomination of Universalists, as established and organized in this Commonwealth; and as I understand this position not to be satisfactory to this society, but that it requires its minister to give his influence and sympathies to the denomination as at present organized. I therefore tender to the society of which I am pastor, my resignation of that trust, to take effect when it shall suit the convenience of the society. I remain respectfully and affectionately, your obedient servant.

M. H. SMITH.

This letter changed nothing; effected nothing, the die was cast with his own hands; and by one foolish and mad act, he has cast himself from the confidence and affection of his people—he had turned their hearts sorrowfully away from him, and destroyed himself forever as a man of integrity and honor. He was cast off by those who once loved him, and clung to him, but who could now no longer respect him, or confide in him as a Christian minister. He had trifled with their affection—their attachment, and sought to make them subservient to base and unworthy ends; and by the following resolution his fate with that society—his only refuge and stay—and his fate consequently with the Universalist denomination was forever sealed.

'Resolved, That Rev. M. H. Smith be dismissed from the office of pastor of this society; and that the committee of this society forthwith inform him, that the connexion of this society with him, as pastor and people, is henceforth dissolved.'

Now look at all these facts, which hundreds will certify to—that he had lost his standing in the denomination—had withdrawn from its fellowship—had endeavored to cause his society to sever its connexion with the Massachusetts Convention—declared himself still a believer in Universal Salvation—professes no change up to the very time of his expulsion—entered no complaint against the moral standing or the religious character of his society, but affirmed that he desired no better friends—he sought for no better society—look at his letters in which he manifests a strong desire to retain his standing and connexion—in which he repeatedly declares that his religious faith is unchanged and that he does not ask his society to change theirs; take all these things; these facts into consideration, and place them, along side of Mr. Smith's present affirmations, 'that he could no longer preach to the Universalist society in Salem, because of the licentiousness of its members, and because he could no longer conscientiously preach the doctrine they desired to hear.' I leave you to draw your own inference—to form your own conclusions—to pass your own judgment. I can only say, that from the bottom of my heart, I pity the man; and would commend him in his lost estate to the mercy of God!

It is painful to speak of the errors and frailties of my fellow men—I had rather spread over them the broad mantle of charity, and say to the offender in the forgiving spirit of my Master, go and sin no more. I would do it even now—I would say thus to our offending brother, while a sense of duty compels me to speak yet farther on truth's behalf.

It is not my intention to pass in review the lectures of Mr. Smith. I have not the time—neither is it necessary that I should do so. A fact or two more with reference to him and his course, and you will all see that he is not a creditable witness, and that his testimony is not to be relied on.

It has been proved, that, while Mr. Smith was yet pastor of the Universalist society in Salem, and affirming in the most solemn manner that his theological faith was unchanged, and that he desired no better friends than Universalists; he was at the same time negotiating with the Unitarians, and endeavoring to obtain a settlement with them; and also, while ascertaining his chance of success with them, was secretly conferring and treating with orthodox ministers.

By and by, not being successful with the Unitarians, and having been dismissed by the Universalist society, he went over to the Presbyterian denomination. Orthodox pulpits were now thrown open to him—he preached against Universalism as he now preaches against it—he was received every where with open arms, and in a little time he was pronounced a truly converted man, and a day set apart when he was to be admitted into the church. That day came—but with it came only disappointment to his new friends. At early dawn Mr. Smith had arisen, and giving no note of his departure, had taken the road to Boston, and suddenly appeared among his old friends. They were amazed—astonished; and wondering, inquired into the cause of the strange step he had taken. He told them that he knew not what he was doing—that he was insane—that he knew not even how he had got to Boston—he was there—and that was all he knew about it.

A few weeks after this—and you will remember that he had been dismissed by the Universalist society in Salem—had gone over to the Presbyterians and preached against Universalism, and finally gave his too confiding friends the slip, and returned back again to the Universalists—a few weeks after this he preached a sermon in Salem Hall renouncing orthodoxy. In this sermon he alluded to his lectures against Universalism and Universalists, and said, 'Some of the remarks he made he felt to be true, and some of them not true; such as he would on no consideration whatever repeat. He believed there was as large a portion of honest, worthy, and virtuous persons among the believers of the Restoration, as in any other denomination. Nor was he willing to admit that his own ministry in Salem, had been without success, he had evidence to the contrary, men had been made better and holier!—He said also, that, 'He had now recovered his health, and reason, and he felt cheered on his way, by a firm belief in the doctrine of the restitution of all things!' He then spoke of his sorrows and trials, and felt that they had been ordered for his good, by that Being, who will carry on his purposes of love, manifested in the gift of Him who shed his atoning blood, till God shall be all in all.

It will be recollected that Mr. Smith, in his first lecture, declared that in May, 1840, he took his leave of the Universalist society in Salem and of Universalist company generally, and had never renewed his association. You will please compare this with the fact, that after being dismissed from his society, and going over to Orthodoxy and renouncing Universalism, he came back again to his old friends, renounced Orthodoxy, said he had recovered his health and reason and that he felt cheered on his way by a firm belief in the doctrine of the restitution of all things. Does this look like not renewing his association? Does it not look rather like an extreme anxiety to renew his association, his connexion:—to be received back again, and restored to former favor?

Look now at another fact, which contradicts the assertion that he had never, since May 1840, renewed his association with Universalists. In Sept. 1840, Mr. Smith received an invitation to become the pastor of a new society in Salem, composed of Universalist brethren who reposed confidence in his sincerity. This invitation he accepted, recalling his acceptance, however, after a few days, on the plea of ill health. But he certainly had renewed his association with Universalists; though true it is, that he and they soon parted company again to fellowship each other, no more unto this day.

And here let one other thing be observed. Instead of leaving a large and wealthy society, for the reason that he could no longer preach, the doctrine they wished him to preach;—instead of giving up a large salary, and voluntarily turning away from fast and tried friends, who urged him to remain, 'and do the best he could,' he was in the first place dismissed by the large and wealthy society who paid the large salary; and in the second place, when he finally left to return no more, he only turned his back on a small congregation, without a meetinghouse, and which could pay him only a very small salary.

There is one other thing that reflects on the credibility of this witness. He solemnly declared in one of his lectures, and called God to witness, that up to the time of his joining the Orthodox, or prior to his conversion, he had been only an Universalist clergyman—that the tale of his many changes was false. I would for his sake, and the credit of our common humanity, that it were false; but it is too true. He may not have been a regular ordained clergyman save in the Universalist denomination, up to the time of his last renunciation; but how can he have the impious effrontery to call God to witness, that he had always been an Universalist preacher in good standing, under salary, and never changed, is a mighty marvel to me. As we have already stated, he was first of all a Christian preacher. He next became an Universalist. In 1835 he renounced Universalism and became a Presbyterian. In a little time he was converted back again. In 1839 he went over to the Unitarians, and from them, in 1840, to the Orthodox. After a few weeks he returned again to the Universalists, declared himself again in possession of his health and reason and a firm believer in universal salvation; but his insanity returning, he renounced Universalism again, and has since been employed in an unholy warfare against it, and its believers and friends. These are facts universally known and admitted at the North—none would hazard their reputation there by denying them. Mr. Smith has, therefore renounced backward and forward, according as he was sane or insane; and what is not a little singular, he was always insane when he went over to Orthodoxy, but when reason returned he in every case came back to Universalism, and felt cheered 'by a firm belief in the doctrine of the restitution of all things.' The legitimate inference therefore is, that he is now laboring under a protracted fit of insanity, and that when he recovers his health alias reason, he will be an Universalist again, and enabled to rejoice as before in the ultimate triumph of divine grace.

We should be glad to make some further extracts, but this must suffice for the present. Br. Barray published enough on the character of Matthew, to satisfy any reasonable man of his depravity or insanity, or both; but still suppresses some of the darkest parts of his history; such for instance as his forged letter, or letter over a fictitious signature, to Br. W. S. Balch, to prevent his going to Providence, that he might thereby secure the place to himself, and when charged with writing it, solemnly denied it, and that repeatedly, and called God to witness his innocency of the charge, till it was fairly proved upon him, and then, snivelling and crying, confessed his crime, and begged forgiveness! This and similar derelictions, Br. B. did not publish to the world; nor was it necessary. Enough is published to make any decent man blush to be found circulating his books or listening to his foul aspersions.

DYING SAYINGS OF DR. PAYSON.

We last week noticed one of the dying sayings of this Orthodox minister: viz. 'I long to measure out a full cup of happiness to every body, but Christ wisely keeps that prerogative in his own hands.' Here follows another of his excellent sayings:

'Speaking of the temper requisite to the right discharge of ministerial duty, he said,—'I never was fit to say a word to a sinner, except when I had a broken heart myself; when I was subdued and melted into penitence, and felt as though I had just received pardon to my own soul, and when my heart was full of tenderness and pity—no anger, no anger.'

Here we have, not only the true secret of the success of the minister of Christ, but the true spirit of Christ—of Christianity—of the Gospel. The heart must be 'full of tenderness and pity—no anger, no anger.' How often, how generally, has this been forgotten by the professed ambassadors of Christ! Instead of having the heart 'full of tenderness and pity' for sinners, how often have the professed ministers of the Gospel come down upon the poor culprit, like the stormy tempest full of bitterness and wrath! How often, instead of their being able, like Dr. Payson, to say 'no anger, no anger,' have the preachers themselves been angry with sinners, and wrought themselves into a tempest of passion, denouncing the pains of hell without stint or reserve; and not only so, they have also represented our heavenly Father as exceedingly angry, as burning with almighty and infinite wrath, ready to devour the helpless offender in the flames of an endless hell! Nay, not devour, but forever burn and never consume! Does any one doubt this? Let him read the following extract from Dr. Edwards, one of the most distinguished orthodox divines of the past generation. He wrote and preached thus:—

'So that thus it is that natural men are held in the hands of God over the pit of hell; they have deserved the fiery pit, and are already sentenced to it: and God is dreadfully provoked, his anger is as great towards them as to those that are actually suffering the execution of the fierceness of his wrath in hell; * * * the devil is waiting for them; hell is gaping for them; the flames gather and flash about them, and would lay hold on them and swallow them up.' 'They are now the objects of the very same anger and wrath of God that is expressed in the torments of hell. And the reason why they do not go down to hell at each moment is not because God, in whose power they are, is not very angry with them; as angry as he is with any of those miserable creatures that he is now tormenting in hell, and do there feel and bear their fierceness of his wrath.' 'The God who holds you over the pit of hell, much as one holds a spider or some loathsome insect over the fire, abhors you and is dreadfully provoked: his wrath towards you burns like fire, you are ten thousand times as abominable in his eyes as the most hateful and venomous serpent is in ours.'

We might thus proceed and fill page after page with the same and similar horrible blasphemies of Orthodox ministers against the beneficent Majesty of Heaven; but we forbear. We have quoted enough from Dr. Edwards to show what is the true spirit of orthodoxy so called: and it is the real spirit of the so called orthodox doctrine—no mistake! But thanks to the increasing light and improvements of the present age! Orthodoxy is being 'converted'—is meeting with a 'change of heart'—is even 'obtaining a hope,' as its teachers say; or rather the benevolence of heaven and of the age in which we live, has infused into the hearts of its advocates a benignity and a mercy too broad for the narrow creeds of the past age—they loathe and abhor the very sentiment they have been taught, and their hearts go out in universal benevolence to man. Its staunchest friends now, instead of using such language or manifesting such a spirit as Dr. Edwards did, or ascribing such a horrid character to God, can talk like the dying Doctor Payson, while their 'heart is full of tenderness' for sinners, 'no anger, no anger.' Such is the language now used—it is the spirit of Universalism, the spirit of Christ and his Gospel, and to it we can heartily say amen; God speed it and diffuse it as widely and universally as the race of man. 'No anger, no anger'—the heart must be 'full of tenderness' to succeed in converting sinners. D. S.

The first No. (for July) of the Ladies Repository has come to hand. It is prefaced by a likeness of its Editor, Rev. Henry Bacon, which, from what we can collect of the expression of the man's face, which we saw some four years since, is a very correct one as far as expression is concerned, but it strikes us that the representation here given would give the impression to those who had never seen him, that he was a large, full faced person, while it is far from being the case. But to leave the picture and return to the Repository. We find that well filled with good reading, and have no other fault to find with our copy, than that it is provided with a duplicate copy of the first four leaves—a mistake of the binder, probably. Now is a good time to subscribe. Two dollars a year, in advance. Address A. Tompkins, 38 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.

APPOINTMENTS FOR PREACHERS.

We frequently receive letters from ministering brethren at a distance informing us they will visit this or some circumjacent places, and would like appointments for one or more Sabbaths during their stay. We also frequently hear of places where our brethren, either with or without organized societies, would be gratified with a visit and one or two Sundays' preaching from these ministering brethren. And yet, if we make appointments for them at random, we may be lucky in making them where some other brother has an appointment at the same time, or where our friends can not at the time be accommodated with a convenient place of meeting. We therefore propose, when we receive such letters in season to do it, to announce that such a brother would like an appointment on such and such days, in such and such region; so that societies or communities near may be aware of it, and make arrangements accordingly, and notify us (or the preachers) of the fact, so that all parties may be accommodated.

We have just received a letter from Br. L. C. Browne, now of Norwich, Conn., and formerly long and favorably known in this region, informing us that he wishes to visit his connections in Trenton and Fort Plain, in September, and would like an appointment for the second Sunday in that month at some place convenient of access from those places.*

We have also a letter from Br. D. H. Plumb, of Jersey City, informing us he wishes to visit Sherburne, Chenango county, early in August, and would like appointments for the first and second Sundays in August, at places convenient to that point; though the first might be any where between Albany and Sherburne.

Br. J. Whitney of Rochester also informs us he would like appointments for the first and second Sundays in September in this region, or at points convenient for him to reach on his way to Troy to the Convention.

If our friends in any neighborhood convenient to the places named, would like appointments from either of the brethren named, at the time specified, they will please advise us of it forthwith, so that notice may be given of the appointments, both to the preachers and the public.

D. S.

* Since the above was written, Br. O. Whiston has written us that there has been an appointment made for Br. Browne at Cooperstown on the day named.

Harpers Publications.

The life of the Rt. Hon. GEORGE CANNING, by Robert Bell, author of the history of Russia, 'Lives of English Poets,' etc., 362 pages 12mo. neatly bound in muslin.—This appears to be the biography of a man noted as a politician and public speaker among the lords and distinguished men of England. He also appears to have been somewhat of an author. This forms No. XVI of the New Miscellany.

FRENCH DOMESTIC COOKERY, is a volume of 340 pages including an index, in which new culinary implements and processes; the management of the table; instructions for carving; French, German, Polish, Spanish and Italian cookery are described, in twelve hundred receipts, besides a variety of new modes of keeping and storing provisions, domestic hints, &c. This book is well bound in leather and is doubtless an excellent guide to house keepers.

No. 5 of the PICTORIAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND contains the conclusion of Book II and commences Book III which is to contain the history of the period from the Norman conquest to the death of King John 1066-1216. This work, judging from the numbers that have already been issued, will be truly a full and excellent history of Great Britain. 25 cents per number.

Nos. 93-94 of the ILLUSTRATED SHAKESPEARE contains notes on 'Pericles' and a greater part of the tragedy of 'King John.' 25 cents.

MORSE'S GEOGRAPHIC MAPS, numbers V and VI contain Mexico, Central America, Yutacan, Mississippi, Canada West, Vermont and New Hampshire, New York—N. Y. city and vicinity, Florida West and Alabama. These maps are got up in superior style, on excellent paper, and are but 25 cents per number.

No. 86 of the Library of Select Novels is CAPTAIN O'SULLIVAN; or adventures, civil, military and matrimonial of a gentleman on half pay. A large amount of amusing reading matter for 25 cents. The above books for sale by G. N. Beesley.

We have received from Maj. Dudley Smith and Mr. Joel N. Adams of Galway, N. Y., ten dollars ($5 each) as donations to the Clinton Theological Institute.

ORDINATIONS, &c.—Br. B. W. Tingley was ordained pastor of the Universalist society in Sutton, Mass., on Tuesday, 30th ult. Sermon by Br. A. Case of Worcester, Mass.

Br. A. Hitchborn was installed pastor of the Universalist church and society in South Reading, Mass., on the first day of July, inst. Sermon on the occasion by Br. J. G. Adams.

Br. C. H. Webster was installed pastor of the Universalist society in South Dedham, Mass., on the 24th ult. Sermon by Br. C. H. Fay.

Br. C. May, jr. was ordained to the pastoral charge of the Universalist society in Hinsdale, N. H., on the 23d ult. Sermon by Br. L. J. Fletcher of Cambridge, Mass.

The Maine State Convention of Universalists held its annual session at Bangor, on the last Wednesday and Thursday of June ult. A glorious and profitable season was enjoyed.

NEW SOCIETY.—Br. H. E. Whitney informs us by letter, that a Universalist society, consisting of twenty-two members, has lately been formed in Jackson, Tioga co., Pa. He says Universalism is 'rapidly running down' in that region—meaning that it is running down into the hearts of the people—and prays that it may continue to do so till the whole earth is filled with its heaven-inspiring, peace-giving and sin-destroying influence.

Br. E. Carpenter requests us to say that his Post Office address is Townsend, Chemung co., N. Y. He wishes to be addressed accordingly.

We are in the weekly reception of the 'Odd Fellow,' an excellent and large quarto paper, devoted to the interests of the Order, miscellaneous news, literature, &c. It is published in Boston, Mass., by Cochran, Cole & Co. at $2 per year in advance.

The last Star in the West brings us the melancholy news of the death of Br. George Rogers, of Cincinnati. He died on the 6th inst., aged 42, calm and tranquil as a summer's setting sun. Mrs. Gurley and Thomas were with him at the time of his death and will publish further particulars soon.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street, Buffalo.

Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn, keeps a general assortment of Universalist Books for sale. He is also agent for the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist publications generally.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. N. SNELL will preach in Litchfield on the first Sunday in August.

Br. G. W. VAN VLECK will preach in Brieville on the first Sunday in August, and in Oran the second Sunday.

Br. HICKS will preach in Graves' Hollow on the fourth Sunday in July.

MARRIAGES.

In Buffalo, on the 16th inst., by Rev. S. R. Smith, Mr. HORACE S. NICHOLS, of Detroit, Mich., to Miss SARAH B. RUMRILL, formerly of this city.

In Mansville, on the 7th inst., by Rev. L. Rice, Mr. WM. BRIMMER to Miss ANN F. SEARLS, both of Ellisburg, Jefferson county, N. Y.

In Niles, by Rev. J. M. Peebles, Mr. JOHN REID of Skanateles, to Miss DORLISKA ODELL of the former place.

By the same, Mr. WM. WOODARD to Miss MARY MOORE, daughter of Eld. J. Moore, (Baptist,) all of Kelloggsville.

By the same, Mr. SAMUEL LAMB of Skanateles, to Miss LUARA CLARK of Kelloggsville.

By the same, July 8th, Rev. D. H. STRICKLAND, Pastor of the Universalist Societies of Cortland and Homer, to Miss ELIZABETH AVERY of Genoa.

LINES TO A DEPARTED FRIEND.

And art thou gone—forever gone—
Thou lovely flower that erst was blooming?
And hast thou left me here alone,
All future joy from me entombed?
And must I never see thee more?
Thou whom so many were adoring—
Has death's dart pierced thy young heart's core?
Which all so deeply are deploring?
Though death has chilled thy flowing veins,
Methinks with life I see them flushing;
And from thy lips I fancy strains
Of sweet melodious music gushing.
O! has thy spirit truly fled?
Thou seem'st but calmly, gently sleeping—
Too true indeed! for round thy bed,
Are stricken friends in sorrow weeping.
'Tis hard to yield thy beauty o'er
Unto the grave, cold, dread and yawning,
Farewell to bid the tender flower,
Thus snatched away in life's bright morning!
And must it be—O, can it be—
That one so like a rosebud blushing,
Slight as cerulean anemone,
Has fled, my dearest hopes thus crushing?
O, there is rising o'er my soul
A pressing wave of bitter feeling!
My brain's convulsed—my flesh is cold—
Alas! 'tis frenzy o'er me stealing!
But hush, my raging spirit, now!
Be calm, and cease all thy repining;
Though I have lost a gem below,
On high with kindred ones 'tis shining.
Shine on! thou fairest one of earth;
When pained, I'll fancy thou art smiling:
Thy smile will give emotions birth,
Pure, pleasant—lonely hours beguiling.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the Genesee Association, convened at Alabama, June 17th and 18th, 1846.

1. Council proceeded to business by choosing EARL KIDDER, of Alabama, Moderator, and J. S. BROWN, of Perry, Clerk.

Opened with prayer by Br. Chase.

2. The Standing Clerk read the minutes of the proceedings of last year, after which, letters were received from the following delegates, viz: A. Bolton and Abbot Wight, Alabama; A. R. R. Butler and Earl Kidder, Alabama; A. Cravath, Gainesville; W. J. Ferris, Perry; S. M. Burnham and S. Burnham, Pavilion.

Recess of Council.

Convened on Thursday, A. M., at half past 7 o'clock.

3. Committee of Arrangements were, Brs. Bemmas, Thomas Cabot, J. R. Johnson, and A. R. R. Butler.

4. Committee of Discipline reported no cause of complaint during the past year. Report accepted.

5. Committee on Fellowship and Ordination reported no application. Report accepted.

6. Appointed Brs. W. B. Cook and J. S. Brown Committee on Fellowship and Ordination the present year.

7. Appointed Brs. J. S. Flagler, James Sprague, Jr., and H. Jordan, Committee of Discipline for the ensuing year.

8. Appointed Brs. T. L. Clark and H. Van Campen, clerical, A. R. R. Butler and W. J. Ferris, lay delegates to represent this body at the State Convention to be held in May next, with power to appoint substitutes and fill vacancies.

9. Voted, That when this Association adjourn, it adjourn to meet in Gainesville on the third Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1847.

10. Voted, That Br. J. S. Brown, Stand. Clerk, be appointed to give a discourse upon the condition and statistics of the societies of this Association, at its next annual meeting.

11. Voted, That the Clerk prepare the minutes of the proceedings of this body, and publish the same in the Western Evangelist.

12. Adjourned to meet in Gainesville, on the 3d Wednesday in June, 1847.

Ministers present.—J. R. Johnson, Alabama; J. Chase, Middleport; T. J. Smith, Gaines; S. W. Remington, Churchville; U. Clark, Lockport; A. B. Copeland, Kendall; L. L. Spaulding, Webster; W. B. Cook, Alexander; T. L. Clark, Morganville; D. Pickering, Buffalo; S. Goff, Aurora; E. W. Reynolds, Java; H. Van Campen, Gainesville; J. S. Flagler, Darien; J. S. Brown, Perry; G. S. Abbott, Covlesville; H. Beckwith, Me.

E. KIDDER, Moderator.

J. S. BROWN, Standing Clerk.

This was an interesting, and, we believe a profitable session of our Association. The public services, were, as a whole conducted with ability and zeal, and the congregations manifested by the numbers present, and attention given, an interest which quite sustains the pleasing character of the former meetings of this body. The Society at Alabama, were cordial in their greetings, and hospitable and attentive to the friends who had come up to the spiritual feast. The Baptist society generously opened their house for the occasion, and several members of different denominations welcomed us to their homes. May we ever appreciate and bless them for their kindness and imitate their liberality.

There seems to be one great delinquency in our Association. Societies are not fully represented in our Council. A little more sacrifice is necessary on the part of the laity, and more encouragement is needed from the Pastors of the churches. Let our councils be blessed with the best wisdom of our societies, and measures would be set in operation that will do much for our common cause. This year, the business of the council was not strictly, or to say the least very promptly attended to. This can not be right. Our prosperity must depend more upon the Annual deliberations of our council, than upon the character of our public services, and, if we can not do justice to both, the council stands first in importance, and should bring to its deliberations the best wisdom of our heads, and the purest zeal of our hearts. Heaven grant that we may be faithful, not slothful in business, but fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. Amen.—[Evangelist.]

J. S. BROWN.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the Alleghany Association of Universalists for 1846.

Met according to adjournment in Nunda, June 24, 1846. Organized by appointing Br. L. Graves Moderator, and Br. J. B. Sax, Clerk. The following delegates were present:

A. Smith, H. Merrick, Nunda; A. Adams, P. Mills, Hume; P. Banister, J. Charles, Rushford; S. R. Crittenden, Yorkshire; Elias Wood, Freedom; R. C. Kent, H. S. Richmond, Independence; I. Baker, Amity.

Read minutes of last year. Received into the fellowship of the Association, new societies from Rushford and Amity. Committee of discipline report no complaint. Adopted. Granted fellowship to Br. E. W. Reynolds.

Resolved, That the Council look with favor upon the application of Br. R. C. Kent, for fellowship, and recommend that it be granted as soon as it can be constitutionally.

Accepted the resignation of Br. H. Van Campen, as Standing Clerk, voted thanks for his services, and appointed Br. J. B. Sax, Standing Clerk. Appointed Brs. J. B. Sax, I. B. Sharp, and S. Wilson, committee on Fellowship and Ordination; Brs. A. Kelsey, A. Adams, and S. R. Crittenden committee of Discipline; Brs. A. Kelsey, J. B. Sax, clerical, and A. Adams, S. Wilson, lay, delegates to attend the State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes and fill vacancies; and Br. J. Lewis to preach the next Occasional Sermon, embodying statistics, with power to appoint a substitute.

Authorized Standing Clerk to appoint Conferences.

Voted that the Clerk prepare the minutes for publication in the Western Evangelist, with a request that they be copied into the Magazine and Advocate, and Union and Messenger.

Adjourned to meet next year at Sandusky, Cattaraugus county, N. Y. L. GRAVES, Moderator. J. B. SAX, Clerk.

REMARKS.—The time of the meeting of our Association was pleasantly, and we trust profitably spent. The weather was delightful, the attendance good, and the preaching excellent. Sermons were preached by the following brethren in the order named: H. Van Campen, B. Hunt, S. Remington, G. S. Gowdy, E. W. Reynolds, and C. Hammond.

The following statistics of societies were obtained:—Rushford, 25 members; preaching half the time. Nunda, 38 members; preaching half the time. Amity, 17 members; preaching half the time. Freedom, 17 members; preaching half the time. Independence, 34 members; occasional preaching. There are societies in Hume, Yorkshire, Portage, Franklinville, and perhaps in other places, but we have no statistics from them. We have meeting houses in Nunda, Portage, and Freedom.

I would state that the Council appointed no Conferences, but authorized the Standing Clerk to appoint them. Wherever the friends want Conferences during the year, they may send in the request to me, in season, and it will be attended to. According to request, a Conference is appointed at Whitesville, on the third Wednesday and following Thursday in September next.

In explanation of the vote directing Br. J. Lewis to embody statistics in his occasional sermon next year, I would say that we desire all the information we can obtain concerning the rise, progress, and present condition of our denomination within the limits of this Association:—a discourse similar to Br. Reynolds' published statistical sermon. May God bless the cause of truth and righteousness in our midst, and throughout the moral heritage of our Redeemer.—[Evangelist.] J. B. SAX.

BEAR AND HER CUB, OR EDUCATION CORRECTS FAULTS.
A bear had a new-born cub which was horribly deformed. It bore no resemblance to an animal, but was an ill-shaped mass. The mother, ashamed of her son, called upon a female crow which made a ceaseless clack upon a neighboring tree. 'What shall I do,' said she, 'my good gossip, with this little monster? I have a mind to strangle it.' 'Do no such thing,' said the prattler; 'I have seen other bears in the same embarrassment. Go! lap your son gently; it will soon become pretty and delicate, and be your pride.'

The mother readily believed what was said in favor of her son. She patiently licked it for a long time. Finally it became less deformed; and the mother thanked the crow thus: 'If you had not moderated my impatience, I should have cruelly torn my child in pieces, which now constitutes the whole joy of my life.'

Oh! what good does impatience prevent, and what evils does it occasion!

Oh! what evils does education prevent and what good does it bestow!

OCCASIONAL SERMON.

Preached before the St. Lawrence Association of Universalists, at Malone, Franklin county, June 24, 1846.

BY REV. A. M. WORDEN.

'What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us?' Rom. viii: 31.

One of the many subjects to which the apostle Paul had occasion to invite the attention of his Roman brethren was the certainty of the progress of Christianity, and the doctrine by them promulgated. They were confirmed in the faith, by all the numerous predictions of the prophets. And in fact the doctrine which they advocated, was but a repetition of the promises which God had made to the patriarchs; that in their seed (which was Christ) all the families, all the kindreds, and all the nations of the earth should be blessed. And which blessing, the apostle Peter instructs us, consists in 'turning away every one from his sins.'

This promise was made by the Almighty himself: and that mankind might not fear to confide in his word, he confirmed it by an oath. Accordingly, the author of the text says, 'wherein God, willing more abundantly, to show unto the heirs of promise, the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath; that by two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge, to lay hold on the hope set before us.'

This seems to have been the motive which actuated the apostles in all their ministerial labors. It was to impress upon the minds of their hearers, the certainty of the fulfilment of the promises of God. And the basis of their hope seems to have been his immutability. He had sworn by himself, because he could swear by no greater. And inasmuch as he was immutable, the followers of Christ were happily anticipating the fulfilment of his promise. Accordingly, they not unfrequently referred to the promised blessing of the human family, through the instrumentality of their divine Master. Peter, speaking of the same event, calls it the restitution of all things; and says, God has spoken it 'by the mouth of all his holy prophets, since the world began.' Inasmuch as God himself had spoken of the restitution of all things, he being 'without variableness or shadow of turning,' the true Christian must necessarily have expected that all things would finally be restored. This was the Christian's hope, which was like an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast.

The author of the text, while taking into consideration the 'exceeding great and precious promises' of God, his immutability, and his loving kindness, manifested in every display of his providence, inquires of his brethren, in the language of the text, 'What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us?' If that Being, whose wisdom is infinite, whose goodness is unlimited, and whose power is as boundless as space, who doeth his will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; if such a being be for us, who, or what being shall be able to oppose? The apostle well knew that there was no power in being that was able to compete with omnipotence. He knew that omnipotence comprehended or included all powers that exist: and if God possessed all power no other being could possess a part of that all, independent of God. For if any other being possessed any power, independent of the Almighty, it is evident God would not possess all power; consequently could not be omnipotent. But if omnipotence includes all powers that be, then all powers must be forever subject to the control of omnipotence. Again, it was and still is, evident to the reasoning mind, that infinite wisdom would not ordain, or create, a power opposed to the power of God. This would be making 'a good tree bring forth corrupt fruit.' It would be making 'the same fountain send forth both salt water and fresh.' It would be dividing the kingdom, or power, against itself: and if the Saviour's words be true, it could not stand. Paul, addressing his Roman brethren, being acquainted with the fact, that there was but one independent power in existence, and that power was God, could not have been ignorant of the important truth, that if the only existing power, (which was the Almighty,) was in favor of the future happiness and welfare of the human family, there was no power which could successfully oppose. In view of these facts, in his remarks subsequent to the text, he says, 'It is God that justifieth: who is he that condemneth?' The apostles had been taught of God, (and even all the prophets left the same testimony on record,) that through the efficacy of a Saviour's blood, salvation and justification should extend to the last erring child of humanity. Accordingly, in the fourth chapter of the epistle from which the text is selected, Paul makes use of the following language:—'Now to him that worketh, is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness.'—Agreeable to this portion of the divine testimony, it appears that even the ungodly are to be justified in the sight of God. We do not pretend to say that mankind shall be justified in their sins. But by being 'turned away, every one from his sins,' and made just. Accordingly, we read, 'as judgment came upon all men, unto condemnation, even so the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life.' Hence, it appears that among this vast number, (which is all men,) there will be found those of all ranks and stations in life; of all grades and characters. Thus we are instructed, that 'every mouth shall be stopped, and the whole world appear guilty before God.' The most righteous will appear guilty in the presence of a holy God, that all may stand in need of justification, and obtain 'the free gift unto justification of life.' Accordingly we read, 'God hath concluded all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all.'

Then in view of the efficacy of a Saviour's blood, and the consequent justification which is to be realized by the whole human family, well might the apostle exclaim, 'It is God that justifieth: who is he that condemneth?' Or using the language of the text, which is a parallel passage, 'If God be for us, who can be against us?' It is plain that if God be for us, or in other words, if he be favorably and mercifully disposed towards the human family, he will not condemn; but justify. Hence the interrogation of the apostle is, if God justify us, who, or what power shall be able to condemn us? Or if that being, who possesses all power, be for us, or a friend to humanity, what being shall be against us? as an enemy to humanity?

The Psalmist declares God to be 'a king, against whom there is no rising up.' Accordingly, if such a king be for us, no being can rise up against us. Although it is contended by many that there is a being who will rise up against the king of heaven, and deprive him of a vast majority of his rightful subjects, still as such a sentiment is contradicted by Holy Writ, we preferring by the decision of the inspired volume. The small amount of testimony already selected from the sacred pages of God's holy Word, has been a sufficient encouragement to the true believer, in all ages of the world. It has taught him that righteousness and truth shall yet reign triumphant. Accordingly, the apostle declares, 'we can do nothing against the truth; but for the truth.' Not all the slander, reproach and false reports, which might have been, or may now be in circulation; nor even the bloody hand of persecution, could, or can, retard the progress of divine truth. Its march is steady, progressive, and onward. It has long continued to progress, confounding the professedly wise, and astonishing the simple.

Since the day when God himself first preached the Gospel unto the patriarchs, we hear, for the first time, the promises renewed and the truth proclaimed in all its purity, by a youth only twelve years of age. Surrounded by the wise men of that age, he confounded and astonished them with his superior wisdom. Since that time, the 'stone cut out of the mountain without hands,' has continued to roll on with increasing velocity, and is destined to become a great mountain and fill the whole earth. 'And in this mountain, shall the Lord of hosts make a feast of fat things unto all people.'

That same Jesus, who was seen disputing with lawyers and doctors when but a child, is soon beheld travelling from city to city, healing the various maladies to which humanity is exposed. The sick are restored to health; the tongue that was dumb is loosed and is heard praising God; the deaf are caused to hear the glad tidings of a world's salvation; the blind receive their sight, and behold the wonderful works of their Maker; the dead are restored to life, and the lame leap for joy. And not only so; but he was the great physician of souls. He came into the world to heal the maladies of the human mind, as well as of the body. Those who 'through fear of death, had all their life time been subject to bondage,' were delivered 'into the glorious liberty of the children of God.'

All fearful apprehensions of the future were eradicated; doubts expelled; the tear of sorrow wiped away; the angry voice of revenge, changed to the sweetest tones of kindness; the wail of despair to thanksgiving and praise; confidence was increased in the promises of our Father in heaven; and to be brief, mankind were turned from the error of their ways to 'trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe.' But this was not the extent of his goodness. He is heard saying, 'Thy sins, which are many, are forgiven thee.' And the 'word of God has gone forth, and shall not return void,' giving us the assurance, that 'the blood of Jesus Christ, the Son, shall cleanse from ALL sin.' And this was the object of his mission into the world. He came to 'save his people from their sins.' He came 'to finish transgression, to make an end of sin, to make reconciliation for iniquity, and bring in everlasting righteousness.' Sent by the Father to be the Saviour of the world, he 'finished the work he came to do.' He died 'that he might destroy death, and him that had the power thereof, that is, the devil; and that he might be made 'perfect through suffering' and 'enter into his glory.' He burst the bonds of death, 'led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men.'

It was by the commission of such a being as this, that the disciples and apostles were sent abroad into the world to proclaim to every creature the glad tidings of a world's salvation. God had been with this divine Master, and sustained him in every circumstance in life, and finally raised him from the silence of the tomb, and seated him forever at his own right hand. And in like manner, Christ promised to be with his disciples and stand by them in every event of providence.' When he sent them out into the world, in vindication of the truth, he said, 'Lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.' This was even so; he gave them wisdom of words beyond the power of the gainsayer. He gave them power over all the various maladies which he himself had controlled; even to take up the most poisonous serpents and scorpions; and if they drank any deadly poison, it should not harm them.

Thus they controlled the most difficult diseases by the power of God, in and through the name of Jesus of Nazareth. And when taken captive by the enemy, and chained down in the dark cells of the prison, the strongest fetters were broken; the prison doors opened unto them of their own accord, and they passed out safely. Power was given them to overcome the most cruel tortures which their enemies were capable of inflicting upon them. God had stood by them also in the conversion of multitudes to the soul-reviving truths which they advocated. They had witnessed the illumination of the most beclouded minds; the eradication of error, superstition and prejudice; and the renovation of the heart by the power of God. Three thousand had been added to their church in a day. Multitudes flocked around them to listen to their teaching, and as many more to be baptized in the name of Jesus of Nazareth.

Thus far God had stood by them, in every event of his providence. Well, then, might Paul address his brethren in the language of the text, 'What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us?' No power had yet been able to compete with the power of God, with which they had been endowed from on high. They had been blessed with the possession of that kingdom which is 'righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.' They had 'come unto Mount Zion, to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the first-born.' They had entered 'through the gates into the city;' into that 'holy city, the New Jerusalem, which cometh down from God out of heaven.' Therefore, taking into consideration all the innumerable blessings which had been conferred upon them by the hand of their Maker; and the power which had upheld and sustained them in all their persecutions and afflictions, which they had been called to pass through; with hearts overflowing with gratitude, they exclaimed, 'What shall we then say to these things?' &c. In this manner, for more than five centuries after the crucifixion of Christ, Christianity continued to triumph over error, superstition and vice. But alas! the time arrived when the 'kingdom of heaven suffered violence, and the violent took it by force.' Mankind were given up to their own wicked devices, to grope their way through life in mental blindness. Truth was banished for a season, and error occupied its place in the human mind.

During the 'dark age of the world,' that sentiment which claims to be the only doctrine, moralizing in its tendency, was the prevailing faith among mankind. And like a ruthless plague, it swept more than forty millions of human beings, martyrs, from the shores of mortality, by the relentless hand of persecution. The thought of rivers of human gore, which a partial faith has shed, so often forcing itself into the reflecting mind, is sufficient to chill the very blood in the veins of every philanthropist. Yet all this barbarity was the work of professed Christians, who, bearing the name, knew nothing of the spirit of Christ! It seems to have been one of the most pleasing recreations, for those who were ready to cry out, 'I am more holy than thou,' to crimson their murderous hands in the heart's blood of a fellow mortal who chanced to differ from themselves in religious opinion; and to sport with his death struggles and dying agonies. But notwithstanding all opposition, the light of the Gospel again dawned upon the world. The cheering rays of the Sun of righteousness again beamed upon the understanding of man. Mankind began to refuse longer to be trod upon by the iron hoof of ecclesiastical tyranny, and again like the primitive disciples, began to exercise freedom of thought and of speech.

Notwithstanding the sentence of death pronounced by the British parliament, upon those who denied the doctrine of a future judgment; and notwithstanding the murderous outrage of the celebrated John Calvin and others against the glorious truth that was beginning to dawn upon the world, it nevertheless continued to progress. The church came out of the wilderness, 'fair as the moon, bright as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners.'

The truth of a world's salvation, was by our venerable ancestors, (whose renovated spirits are now praising God in heaven,) brought across the briny deep, to enlighten the people of the new world. But they did not bring it in their hearts; it was brought in that ancient history of Universalism, the Bible. Mankind had long sat 'in the region of darkness, and the shadow of death.' 'Darkness had long covered the earth, and gross darkness the people.' 'Consequently, mankind were almost entirely ignorant of the truths revealed in the divinely-attested testimony. But permitting a more free exercise of the reasoning powers which God had given them, they commenced 'growing in grace, and in the knowledge of the truth.' And notwithstanding those of a liberal sentiment have been 'persecuted from city to city,' still they have ceased not to obey the injunction of the Saviour. When they could no longer remain in one city, like the primitive disciples they have fled to another; boldly declaring 'the whole counsels of God.' We have seen, that the time once was, when Christianity was not even known on the eastern continent, and no voice proclaimed the truths of the Gospel. But a Saviour was born, who diffused the light of salvation throughout the (then known) world. So, also, the time once was, when no voice proclaimed the glad tidings of a world's salvation on the shores of America. And strange as it may seem, there was, at first, but one individual, who raised his feeble voice in its defence. As Christianity was first defended in the Eastern world by a single individual, and from such a state continued to spread throughout the world, while three thousand were added to the church in a day; in like manner it was first defended in the Western world by but one individual. And notwithstanding the opposition with which it has met, still it has continued to increase. And now, instead of one individual, preaching in the only house built for so holy a purpose, in all the western world; there are between seven and eight hundred, proclaiming the glad tidings of the Gospel, occupying about the same number of houses built for that purpose. And instead of one society, there is now about eleven hundred. Also seventy nine annual ecclesiastical Associations; nineteen State and Provincial Conventions, and one U. S. Convention. And not only so. But the minds of all religious sects are becoming more liberal, and are approximating nearer and nearer to our broad and liberal faith.

Those now, of the most contracted views of the divine goodness, would once have been denounced as heretics, and expelled from the church in consequence of this liberality. The great wheel of intelligence is speedily rolling on the evangelization of the world. All excitements and enthusiasm of a professedly religious character only serves to expose ignorance and error, and when the flame dies away, increases the numbers of that sect, which has been every where so unsuccessfully spoken against.

'What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us?' It has in all ages of the world, been the case, with principalities and powers, of every description and character, in like manner as they have increased they have also decreased. The once powerful Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, who speedily increased in power and wealth, until it is said of him, 'his greatness reached unto heaven, and his dominions to the ends of the earth;' was as speedily cut down to the ground, and made even to eat grass like the ox.

Rome too, once the most powerful of all nations, after rapidly extending her power and dominions, until the phrase, 'I am a Roman citizen,' was a shield against harm in every nation; after all, lost that power more speedily than she had gained it. Jerusalem too, that so rapidly increased in wealth, power and magnificence, until it was the most powerful, splendid and opulent city in the world, and the monastery of all nations, notwithstanding all its power and wealth, was suddenly destroyed. And so it is with reference to ecclesiastical powers. All that has been so speedily gained, by enthusiasm and excitements, must and will be as speedily lost. Strife, contentions and divisions, are already working the sure destruction of the various sects throughout the length and breadth of the land. But truth is destined to prevail. It conquers the world with the simple weapons of morality and intelligence. Hence, the conclusion is, that the one sentiment, which is destined to triumph over all others, is the one towards which all others, through an increase of intelligence, are so rapidly approximating. When the bearer considers the increase of liberal sentiments among all denominations, he will not hesitate a moment in forming the opinion of the one particular sentiment to which we referred. It must be the one, among all others, the most liberal and charitable. That ours is the most liberal of all sentiments, no one will pretend to deny.

And as all others are daily becoming more liberal, we may reasonably conclude, that the Gospel which we preach, is destined to 'leave the whole lump.' Hence we remark, the spread of truth is steady and progressive. Every obstacle will be removed from before it. It is destined to flood the whole world; to banish sin, superstition, ignorance, error and prejudice.

Accordingly, the divine testimony predicts the time when 'the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth.' Again, the prophet Daniel says, 'The kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him.' Again, 'the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever.'

My brethren and sisters, what shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us? It is true, that there is still opposition to the truth. It is an awful thought, to many, that God should be represented as the Father of all our race. And still more offensive to them are the Saviour's words, that 'they that are raised from the dead, are as the angels of God in heaven; neither can they die any more; for they are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.'

Those zealous opponents of the Saviour's words would still cling to the doctrine and precepts of our fathers, and fain would they impress upon our minds a sentiment opposed to the universality of God's love and salvation.

It is not our object, in the present discourse, to question the honesty or sincerity of any particular sect. But to those of such a faith, we would remark that the sentiment is annoying to the peace of humanity. It is opposed to every philanthropic feeling; it is opposed to the word of God, and to the object of Christ's mission into the world. It is opposed to the desire of saints, of angels, and of every good being. All Christian people pray that it may not be so; and finally, to make a long story a short one, it is not so. God hath said 'he will not cast off forever.' And 'if God be for us, who can be against us?'

Again, while we reflect upon the prosperity and increase of believers in the final restitution of all things, during the last ten years, we can not but consider that God is for us.

The hearer will not be surprised, when we say, that from eighteen hundred and thirty-five, to eighteen hundred and forty-five, our increase has been nine State Conventions, thirty nine Associations, four hundred and twenty four societies, three hundred and seventy three ministers, and three hundred and ninety two meeting-houses.

And yet, this increase has not been gained by excitement; but through a sober exercise of reason, and a candid and unbiased investigation of the divine testimony.

Thus, the hearer will discover that the believers and advocates of that great truth, which 'God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began,' have increased more than half, in numbers, within the ten years to which we referred. And there has been an increase in the same ratio in our houses of public worship.

We do not make these remarks for the sake of boasting, but merely to show that, as there has been a vast improvement in the public mind, within the last ten years; just in proportion to the improvement of the civilized world, and the increase of morality and intelligence, has been the spread and reception of the truths we advocate. Intelligence and the doctrine of the restitution are both of God, and are united together by an indissoluble tie.

Accordingly, an increase of intelligence only serves to confirm us in the great truth which God has proclaimed by the mouth of all his prophets. The continual increase of liberality in the world, establishes the fact, that intelligence is for us. And if intelligence is for us, God is for us. And 'if God be for us, who can be against us?' The waters of life and salvation are continually renovating and reclaiming multitudes from their misconceptions and partial notions of the divine character; and the whole civilized world are hastening on, to slake their thirst at the same crystal fountain, as fast as time can move. Benevolence is increasing; the laws of our country are becoming more compassionate; the unfortunate prisoner is beginning to be treated with pity. And we trust the time will soon hasten on, when murder will be no longer returned for murder. We accordingly discover that the whole public body is approximating nearer and nearer the standard of perfection and the doctrine we advocate.

And, my hearers, will you consent now to 'lay hold on the hope set before you?' Or will you wait for time to bring you in with the whole public mass. You have seen that God is for us; Christ is for us; angels are for us; Providence is for us; and the prayers of all mankind are for us; that the doctrine which we advocate may prove true. And my brethren, 'what shall we then say to these things?' If God, if Christ, angels, providence, and all mankind are for us, 'who can be against us?'

What greater inducement could we have to cause us to press forward in the glorious warfare of our divine Master? Let us therefore close our feeble remarks in the language of the beloved John.—'Now, unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the throne of his glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever.' Amen.

LETTER FROM OHIO—DISCUSSION.

Bloom Township, Wood Co., O., June 7th, 1846.

Dear Br. SKINNER,—I take this opportunity to write a few lines to you, to let you know that even in the Northern part of Ohio, you have many brothers and sisters in the Abrahamic faith; and that I have commenced preaching the Gospel of peace. But like many others, I have much opposition to contend with. I have had three discussions within the last six months; and I believe they will result in great good to the cause of truth. Some four months since, I was preaching in Hancock county, Ohio, in the town of Beaton, and at the close of my discourse, a Mr. Rice, a Campbellite preacher, challenged me to debate the following question with him publicly: 'Do the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments teach that the whole human family will become righteous and happy?' To which I replied, I had no objection, if there could be a suitable place obtained for the discussion, and I could have the affirmative, and have the discussion continued from day to day until the parties should be satisfied; each speaker to occupy thirty minutes at each speech. Accordingly there was a house obtained, and the preliminaries fixed, and a day appointed. At the time there was a goodly number assembled, Moderators chosen, and the discussion commenced. Good order prevailed throughout the debate, which was continued three days; at the close of the second day, Mr. Rice gave up the ground. There was a Mr. Bonnum present who had attended throughout the debate; and being a preacher of the same order of my opponent, he no doubt felt as if there might be something more done than had been brought about by Br. Rice, to maintain their cruel dogma. He (Bonnum) arose, asked the privilege of being heard in the evening, and requested me to follow him in his remarks, if I chose. His request was granted, and at early candle light the house was filled, and Mr. B. arose to make his objections against universal salvation.—And what do you think they were? I will give them as he offered them. Here they are:

Objection 1. Says Mr. B., 'It is utterly impossible, for human beings to be happy in the future world, unless they are agents in obtaining that happiness.'

Objection 2. 'I believe that happiness in the future world depends upon our obedience as Christ's subjects; and if the Scriptures teach that all mankind shall obey, then, and in that case, I must believe that all will be saved.' But it was his opinion, although a teacher, that there was no such quotation to be found in the sacred volume.

Objection 3. To arguments that have been offered in favor of universal salvation: when and wherever the word everlasting is used, when applied to the punishment of the wicked, Universalists use it in a limited sense. And whenever used or applied to salvation, Universalists use it in an unlimited sense.

After having made these objections, Mr. B. informed us that he believed that infants would be saved; he believed the heathen would be saved, and the idiot; and thus closed his remarks.

I arose to answer his objections, and proceeded in the following manner. In Mr. B.'s first objection, he says that we can not be happy in the future world, unless we are agents in obtaining that happiness. But he believes that infants and the heathen will be saved. But what follows, if his ideas are correct? Why, they can not be happy, because they are not agents in obtaining that happiness.

To his second objection I answered, Mr. B. believed that all will be saved if the Scriptures teach that all shall obey. Daniel says, vii: 14, 'And there was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him.' Again 27th verse, 'And the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High: whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom and ALL DOMINIONS SHALL SERVE AND OBEY HIM.' And again, Heb. v: 8, 9. 'Though he were a son, yet learned he obedience, by the things which he suffered: and being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him.' Hence then it is evident, if we can place any confidence in Holy Writ, that all mankind must eventually become obedient; and if obedient, they will be saved with an eternal salvation.

I would say to you that, previous to this discussion, there were but three families of Universalists in Beaton; but immediately after the discussion there were enough to employ me to preach one fourth of the time for one year.

Br. Skinner, perhaps you may think strange that I should write to you, you not having knowledge of me. But it is nothing strange, when we take into consideration the multitudes we address, and every hearer can recognise the speaker. I am the person that came to you in the village of Fayetteville some 9 or 10 years since, as you was about to deliver a discourse in the school house at that place (which could not hold half the audience) and informed you that we could have the Methodist church, to hold meeting in; to which we removed, and I shall never forget the grateful thanks that were returned to our Methodist friends for opening their house even at the eleventh hour. Br. Skinner, you may if you think proper give this letter a place in the Magazine; and I should like to have the present volume. But I have not the means of paying for it, unless I do it by writing for you. If you conclude to send it to me, direct to Cass Post Office, Hancock county, Ohio,

JAMES M. BRUNSON.

ORIGINALITY.

Br. SKINNER:—It was well said by one of old, 'there is no new thing under the sun.' How nearly literally the wise man may have intended these words to be taken, I can not tell; or whether they would be as applicable to the present time, as they were to his, I do not say. Appearances, at least, would indicate, that there were many new things in these latter days. For instance; the thousand and one papers and periodicals which flourish (or at least exist,) in our country, are filled with articles long or short, as the case may be, and in prose or verse as the fancy of the writer dictates,—which are very modestly marked 'original,' and sent forth as the veritable cogitations of some, (perhaps anonymous), seeker after fame. These 'thoughts that breathe and words that burn,' are thus supposed to flow directly from the capacious cranium of some gifted, but unrenowned, contemporary.

Well, says the reader, there is something new then; Solomon's words are clearly unapplicable to the nineteenth century. Not so fast. 'Is there any thing whereof it may be said, see, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us.' When you read an article marked 'original,' and feel inclined to add it to the list of new things, first be sure that it has not been published 'already of old time, which was before us.' Be not too positive that it has never been in print before, simply because you may never have read it. There may be 'more things in heaven and earth, than are dreamed of in your'—book of remembrance.

But to come at once to the kernel of the matter, Methinks I see, (with the mids eye of course) some lover of poetry, and hater of priestcraft, 'grinning like mad' over an article marked 'original' in the 27th No. current Vol. of the Magazine and Advocate, entitled 'the loud call,'—as though it was in reality, as it purports to be, a new gem freshly struck out in some 'forge of thought.'—Gammon! reader, all gammon! If you will take the pains to look into the January number of the 'Reformer,' a paper published in Philadelphia, in the year 1829, on the 14th page you will see said poem entitled 'the loud call,' printed verbatim et literatim as it is in the Magazine and Advocate—and credited to an 'old paper'! Enough said!—Thinking that some correspondent had imposed the article upon you as his own, I wrote this; which you can use as you please. Yours, &c.

Cuba, July, 1846.

J. B. SAX.

* The article referred to, was copied from the 'Gospel Fountain,' (Br. Bell's paper of Lowell, Mass.,) and from some mistake of the printer (to which he pleads guilty) the word original was placed at the head. Br. Bell we believe, did not say where he found the article and indeed it is quite immaterial—it was not a bad one any how.

HAPPINESS.

O happiness! what is it? and where to be found?
Is it breathed in the wind, as it whistles around?
Or dwells it in other lands hid from our view,
By the high vaulted archings of heav'n's own blue?

Though I delve in the mine for its treasures so bright,
Or soar with the eagle in her heav'nward flight;
My steps are less buoyant, my spirit's oppressed,
As I seek for the friend of the lone and distressed.

Though I mingle in crowds with the lovely and fair,
This heavenly effluence is seldom found there;
While the sweet cup of promise is filled to the brim,
A poison that's deadly is lurking within.

Though I dwell in the land where our forefathers dwelt,
And reap all the blessings, while the bardship they felt;
Where all are acknowledged as the children of God,
When slumbering they lie 'neath the valley's cold clod.

Still vain is my search, though in gold dusted halls,
While oppression is graven on the poor man's walls:
And those who call vainly excitement a pleasure,
Will soon find it nought but a poor empty treasure.

In friendship's pure off'ring, in love's gentle glow,
Mirrored forth by the waters of truth as they flow,
With music angelic to the lone and distressed,
And tidings of gladness to the weak and oppressed—

Is a joy that will brighten the dark cloud of sadness,—
Change grief's whelming tide to rejoicing and gladness,
And open the well-spring whence flows happiness,
As I give to assuage a dear brother's distress.

FLOW BOY.

DEATH AND BURIAL OF BR. GEORGE ROGERS.

Last week we briefly noticed the death of Br. Rogers, and promised to refer to it more at length this week. We will now proceed to perform the melancholy duty, and to make such allusions to his last illness as may be interesting to the multitude of his friends who are scattered over the whole Union.

About one year ago he started from Cincinnati on a long preaching tour. I accompanied him to St. Louis, Mo., and from there on to Burlington, Iowa Territory, in which place the Territorial Convention of Universalists was held, and where we both preached. We separated—I to return home and he to travel through Illinois and on through the State of New York, and from thence to Boston in season to attend the United States Convention in September. At that time he seemed to be in the enjoyment of good health; but before he reached Boston he complained of illness, and when the Convention met he found himself unable to attend the religious services of that occasion. He so far revived in a short time as to be able to travel and preach in Maine. He left that State in the early part of winter, and proceeded to New York City (stopping on the way I believe in Mass.) for the purpose of preaching and disposing of some books which he had written. Meanwhile he complained in his letters sent home, of illness, and after preaching in the vicinity a short time, he was seized with a sickness that brought him to the gates of death. Several times his life was despaired of, but he finally recovered so as to be able to return home to this city. The friends in New York were very attentive and kind to him, and did all they could for his comfort. What his disease was there we have never been able to ascertain, and doubt whether the physicians understood its nature. The most definite information conveyed to us on the subject was that in a letter from a friend, who said he was afflicted with a 'complication of diseases.' Doubtless the climate was unfriendly to him, as he returned from the East two years before, after spending a winter there, an invalid, almost helpless from rheumatism.

When he arrived in this city, just six weeks before his death, we were all deeply pained and shocked at his emaciated appearance. He had the appearance of a man in the last stages of the consumption, although he did not seem to realize his situation. He thought that he would probably recover; and many of us were induced at first to suppose that he might realize his expectations, although all the symptoms in his case were decidedly against him. At times he seemed better, but he lost strength steadily till the period of his decease. Before he had been home two weeks the friends who visited him almost daily, indicated by their mournful looks and conversation when referring to him that, in their opinion, his departure from earth was not distant.

Several weeks before his death, he told me that he had been examining his case with care, taking into view his craving appetite and increasing weakness, and he had come to the conclusion that he could not live long. From this time onward he made all his business arrangements with reference to that event, notwithstanding at intervals his flattering disease (consumption) would give him some hopes of recovery; and although he frequently conversed as though he expected to get well, it is presumed that he never lost sight of the probability of his decease. He felt that his physical strength was steadily leaving him, and that he was daily sinking beneath a malady that bids defiance to the combined skill of medical men.

But what was the state of his mind under these circumstances? will be the inquiry of thousands who have read his books and listened to his discourses. Did the doctrine he had so long proclaimed and so ably defended by his pen, sustain him in his last hours? We are happy to be able to answer such questions from frequent conversations with him, and the testimony of others to whom he freely communicated his thoughts at different times.

It may be said with peculiar emphasis, that death to Br. George Rogers had not a single terror. On one occasion he said to Br. Williamson, 'I have travelled much in my life and have beheld much delightful scenery, and have seen much beautiful country; but it is all nothing in comparison to the beautiful country to which I am hastening.'

'But,' said Br. Williamson, 'there is a dark valley of shadows between—'

'That is of no account to me,' quickly interrupted the dying believer—'all I shall ask will be an easy transit from life. The valley of shadows is of no account. All beyond is bright and clear.'

—Such, indeed, was the constant tone of his thoughts and feelings, as expressed in various forms in conversations with his friends. Not a single cloud obscured the vision of his faith and hope: the sunshine of heaven rested ever on his heart.

A few days previously to his departure, he gave a charge to Br. Thomas concerning his burial.

'I have thought much about a place of burial; and have decided on lying in the grounds of the Delhi Society. I organized that society and dedicated the meeting-house. It seems to me now that in reposing there I shall be in the midst of my brethren.—In the quietness of the scene, with the beauty of nature all around,—I charge you to have me buried there.'

In this tranquil frame of mind, cheered by the presence and attentions of his kindred and friends from day to day, Br. Rogers continued until the closing moment of his earthly career. We can but repeat what we stated in our last paper, that his last hours were calm and peaceful, and he fell asleep as gently as a child in its mother's arms.—Br. Abel C. Thomas and myself stood by his dying bed, and heard the last breath which proceeded from his lips. As it came forth, a most remarkable smile lit up his countenance—one that caused those standing around to lift their hands with astonishment and break forth in exclamations of surprise. A moment before his face had the appearance of solemnity, so that the change was more striking if possible than that produced in the heavens by a sudden burst of sunshine through a dark cloud. A sweeter and more heavenly smile probably never illuminated his face—a very remarkable circumstance seeing that he never breathed again.

His remains were taken to the church in Delhi, followed by many of his friends in this city; and the funeral services were performed in the order here subjoined.

1. The following hymn was sung.

Life is a span, a fleeting hour;
How soon the vapor flies!

Man is a tender, transient flower,
That in the blooming dies.

The once-loved form, now cold and dead,
Each mournful thought employs,
And nature weeps her comforts fled,
And withered all her joys.

Hope looks beyond the bounds of time,
When what we now deplore
Shall rise in full immortal prime,
And bloom to fade no more.

Then cease fond nature, dry thy tears;
Religion points on high;
There everlasting spring appears,
*And joys that never die.

2. Prayer by our aged Br. Clark.
3. A very appropriate address by Br. A. C. Thomas.
4. Remarks by Br. Gurley.
5. Also prayer by him.

His body was borne to the grave from the church, by four of his ministering brethren, viz. Brs. Thomas, Longley, Johnson, and Gurley. Six preachers were present. All, both preachers and laymen, seemed to feel that it was a deeply solemn occasion, and the eyes of nearly every one were suffused with tears. Br. Longley offered up an appropriate prayer at the grave, after which the friends retired home with saddened hearts.

His remains repose in one of the most quiet and pleasant spots in the region of this city, six miles distant, and about one mile and a half from the Ohio River. Delhi is a township—there is no village of the same name; and the society owning the house and burial ground live in the vicinity, varying as to distance from less than half a mile to three miles. The number of believers is not large; but they are among the most moral and substantial citizens. How much better does a place of this character correspond with his feelings when alive, than a large burial ground, where even pomp or show find their way, and where (among sincere mourners) thousands thoughtlessly wander to gratify an idle curiosity—or go to see and be seen.

In his decease the denomination of Universalists has lost one of its most powerful minds—and one of its ablest and most popular writers. He was endowed with an uncommon share of intellect; and his various productions will live in generations to come, and his name be pronounced with reverence by thousands yet unborn, who shall rise up and call him blessed.

He has left a wife and three children—the two eldest are girls, and the youngest a boy, who, in appearance, is nearly a transcript of his father, and is called by the same name. He is now nearly eight years old. May God of his infinite mercy and goodness bless and protect the widow and surviving children, and overrule the severe affliction of their hearts to their highest good.—[Star in the West, (Cincinnati, Ohio.)

UNIVERSALISM IN WISCONSIN.

Br. Price—The following letter, from Br. Le Fevre, was addressed to me as Secretary of the Universalist Historical Society, and would, perhaps, have been most appropriately presented to the body at its next session. But I flatter myself that it may do more good at the present time than at a later date. Those who are familiar with the affairs of the Historical Society, are aware how little interest many of its Corresponding Secretaries have taken in communicating local information, and thus giving the Society the means of performing its duty to itself and the public. With the hope that this letter from our Corresponding Secretary in the remote territory of Wisconsin, may quicken the spirit of twenty other gentlemen holding the same office in different parts of the Union, and lead them to inquire whether it be not in their power to contribute something to the public stock of information relative to the condition and prospects of Universalism in the various States. I send it for insertion in my old friend and favorite, the Union and Messenger, and would solicit the favor of the editorial fraternity to allow it to appear in their respective papers.

T. J. SAWYER.
Clinton, N. Y.

To Rev. T. J. SAWYER, Sec. of the Uni. Hist. Socy.

Br. Sawyer—I wish to communicate to you, and through you to the U. H. Society, such information respecting this remote part of our Master's heritage, as I have been enabled, during my residence in the Wisconsin Territory, to collect. All our operations are of course of a very recent date; for, ten years ago, this extensive country was to the white man almost a 'terra incognita.' I have not been able to ascertain who first preached the doctrine of universal salvation in the territory, but believe that we have to thank the brethren in Illinois for having prepared the way of the Lord. The first, and as yet the only meeting house in the territory, is in Milwaukee, and the brethren feel much indebted to a week's preaching from Br. S. Barnes, before their building was erected, for the impetus which he gave to the cause. His preaching was judicious, and the time was auspicious. The 'Wisconsin Association' was formed at Whitewater, in the month of February, 1844, at which time Br. T. J. Bartholomew was chosen clerk, and was the only regular officiating minister in the Territory. This brother, who supports himself chiefly by his trade, only devotes his Sabbaths, and occasionally a day or two in the week, to the office of the ministry. In the month of May, 1844, I came to Wisconsin with my family; Br. Patterson, from Schoharie county, with his family, came in the same boat. Br. P. went to Whitewater, and I to Southport. The expectations which I had formed were certainly very humble, and those of my travelling brother equally so, but still they were above the mark. No encouragement was afforded, by which a bare support could be obtained. Our friends were few and scattered, and far from wealthy, and the prospect of a living from preaching alone, was most unfavorable. I remained three months in Southport, occupying a long room, which was fitted up as a church, when having received an invitation to settle over the society at Milwaukee, and having purchased a farm in the immediate neighborhood, I removed there with my family. Br. Patterson returned to New York.

Though it is still 'the day of small things' in the territory, the signs are more encouraging. There are already seven societies organized, and ten preachers residing within the territorial limits. It is true that only two or three are solely engaged in the ministry, but all preach more or less, and in their excursions abroad scatter the good seed. At Janesville our brethren have the Court House one half of the time, and they have the benefit of the stated services of Br. F. Whitaker, who is doing his work effectually. The Wisconsin Association convened the 21st of June, and the attendance was very large. There must have been 600 persons. Many could not get into the Court House. At Racine, the brethren have engaged the Court House for one year exclusively, and they are now in communication with some brother at the east to settle with them. Having furnished Br. Grosh, of the Register, with statistics, it is not necessary to enter into detail in this communication. I have travelled far and wide in the territory, and preached in many places. I have found the people ready and pleased to hear, and not backward according to their ability to contribute of their substance. If we had a missionary fund at our command, and two or three active ministers to travel and visit among the people, I doubt not that in two or three years Universalism would be the prevailing doctrine. Other denominations are now busy occupying the ground, and receiving from the east the means necessary for establishing their churches. The subject of Missionary effort especially engaged our attention during the late session of our Association, but we can scarcely hope without aid from some other quarter, to be able to send a laborer into the field. Books and Tracts are eagerly sought after, and meet a ready sale, and a travelling minister who could be supplied with these on a liberal scale, would make a profit which would materially tend to remunerate him for his labors.

Where our cause is of so recent introduction, and the laborers few, the report must of necessity be limited; but our territory is growing with astonishing rapidity, and we are encouraged to believe that a system of religion which is so much in unison with the bounty and goodness which are so lavishly displayed around us, will find a favorable reception in many grateful hearts; and we look for a fulfilment in our moral and spiritual condition of that prophecy which has been already literally accomplished in the lovely country we inhabit, 'The wilderness and solitary places shall be glad, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose.'—[Messenger.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

The following article appeared in the Havana Republic on the 15th of April last. The Northern Christian Advocate, the Methodist paper of Auburn, we take it, is the paper referred to, whose sentiment the Republican echoes to its readers.

'TRIAL OF M. BRAYMAN FOR POISONING HIS WIFE.—By a correspondent of the N. C. Advocate, we learn that Milton Brayman of East Hamilton, Madison county, had his trial at the Circuit court held week before last. He says, 'The testimony, though circumstantial, was very clear and convincing. On Friday forenoon, the jury came into court and said they could not agree, and were discharged. The jury stood nine for conviction, and three for acquittal. The trial is postponed until next September.'

We copy below the writer's last paragraph, giving the views of many in that section, as he says, 'who have conscientious scruples about inflicting capital punishment.' They say 'it is a relic of barbarism.' To our mind, this is as much as to say that God's law for punishing certain crimes with death, was a barbarous law, and the law-maker a barbarous being. Another argument is, 'that God will punish every man as he deserves, therefore, all penal laws should be erased from our statute books.' Mr. Sawyer, a Universalist preacher, and President of the Clinton Liberal Institute, says, in one of his published letters to Dr. Brownley, (xix: 13), 'The time, I trust, is not far distant, when the vindictive and sanguinary penalties yet remaining on human statute books shall be blotted out forever.' Let this sentiment prevail, then farewell to human safety and human happiness in life.

Yours respectfully,

I. P.

Morrisville, March 30, 1846.

Such are the merciful and benignant sentiments put forth by the Methodist writer in this 'Advocate' of a wrathful and vindictive God, who is represented as capital punishing immortal souls, his own offspring, in an endless hell! How true it is that the doctrine of endless misery hardens the heart and steels the soul against all the pleadings of mercy and the tender sympathies of humanity, curdling all the milk of human kindness, freezing up the very fountain of benevolence, and transforming man into a personification of malignity itself, like the divinity he worships! Fortunately for the human race, the doctrine of total depravity is false, else the last vestige of goodness would be erased and its last spark extinguished. But in spite of the horrid principles of vindictiveness ascribed to the Deity by that doctrine, and its deleterious influence upon man, there is yet left in a large portion of our race enough of the milk of human kindness to plead for mercy for the benighted and erring, and strive for the abrogation of the bloody code of Draconic laws, that, in pure vindictiveness or revenge, would return only evil for evil.

The writer quoted above is very fearful that the 'vindictive and sanguinary penalties, yet remaining on human statute books, will be blotted out forever!' What an awful thing this would be! In anticipation of so great a calamity he thinks we must 'bid farewell to human safety and human happiness for life!' This is the next step to the sublime, viz. the ridiculous. What! human safety and happiness can only exist under sanguinary and revengeful penalties!! Did the writer learn this idea from the Gospel code, that tells us to 'return not evil for evil; but contrarywise, good for evil—to revenge not ourselves, but rather give place to wrath—to love our enemies, bless them that curse us, and do good to those who hate us—that if our enemy hunger, feed him, if he thirst, give him drink, &c., &c.? In short, is there one precept or principle in all the teachings of Christ and his apostles that, either directly or indirectly, countenances revenge, or goes to uphold vindictive and sanguinary penalties? Not one! Not one!

As to the penalties of the old Jewish code, to which the writer refers, we would ask whether he wishes them re-instituted and again put in force in our day? If so, then he would abolish hanging and adopt the good old practice of stoning to death; and that not merely for murder, and the few other crimes recognised as capital under our laws, but for picking up sticks or kindling a fire on Saturday, for disobedience to parents, for cursing father or mother, and for various other acts not now recognised as very criminal by our laws.

It is not our province to fathom the depths of infinite wisdom, or to account for the fact that God permitted the Jewish code to go into force and remain binding on that people for a season. In regard to some of those institutions our Saviour told the Jews that because of the hardness of their hearts, God suffered them to be so for a time; but that it was not so from the beginning. But it is enough for us as Christians to know that those laws were abrogated, or superceded by the law of Christ, the law of love, and that the latter expressly forbids revenge in every form. But this writer in the N. C. Advocate would, instead of going forward in the religion, and laws and love of Christ, again go back to the dark and bloody ages of vengeance, and the hard hearted cruelty which the Gospel was designed to supercede or set aside. God grant him a better religion, and with it we doubt not he would obtain a better heart and a better spirit.

MORALITY NOT RELIGION.

BY REV. G. S. ABBOTT.

Much has been said by learned Theologians of the old schools, to support the idea, that morality is not religion. It has in fact been argued that—morality is dangerous without religion—that there is more to be feared from the man who lives a good moral life than from the hardened sinner.

Now as long as this idea was confined to those who believe in miraculous changes of the heart—total depravity—original sin, and endless hell torments, I could keep silent on this point. But when preachers of our most holy faith begin to labor to prove to their hearers that there is no distinction between pure morality and religion,* I think it time to discuss the subject. In my humble opinion the great object Christ had in view in his teachings was (aside from revealing the truth of immortality and man's future destiny) to animate all mankind with new moral life and lead them to the attainment of true moral dignity, and consequent happiness. The means by which this was to be effected were the great principles which he taught—a religion purely moral. We have but to recur to his instructions every where exhibited in the New Testament, to discover the moral adaptation of every thing he delivered. He labored to abolish a pernicious superstition—destroy an unbelief equally prejudicial to morality—and suppress a skepticism which called every thing in question, even the principles of morality itself.

The view of God therefore which he laid at the foundation of his system was of a strictly moral character and represented him as the Supreme Father, loving and educating mankind as his children. The consequences that flow from this fundamental view are also moral. A man can not honor nor worship this universal Father by mere ceremonies and external exercises, but only by doing his will and striving to imitate him. With the truth that represents God as the Supreme Father no other truth can be connected but such as reduce every thing back to love. 'God is love.' The practical part of what Jesus taught, therefore, had the great excellency of containing principles, not only benevolent, but pure, noble and exalted, every where adapted and applicable to man's moral nature. He who loves God and man according to the precepts of Jesus, is in every respect a moral man, and without this love no man can be purely moral in his thoughts and actions. He may, it is true, perform many acts of charity and do many deeds of goodness, in themselves considered, and still there will be no pure and exalted morality in them. But the man who is influenced by love to God and good will to men—who has become imbued with the spirit of the Gospel—is a most willing, punctual and disinterested performer of all his duties—a most active promoter of all that is true, beautiful and good—a most faithful and useful citizen—a most sympathising and benevolent friend, and in all the relations which he sustains, whatever they are called, the author of innumerable blessings to those around him.

* I have during the past winter heard two preachers assert and labor to prove that morality is not religion.

Nor does the external part of the religion of Jesus have any other object in view than to strengthen man's moral nature—to raise and exalt his powers and faculties above sordid selfishness, and lead him to a performance of those duties which would render him happy. In order to preserve a lasting consciousness of their high vocation, and their destination in moral attainments, and thereby become perfect as their Father in heaven is perfect, his followers are exhorted not to 'forsake the assembling of themselves together,' but to associate as a body in pious and devout exercises—and the object to be attained by these meetings was to advance in knowledge and virtue.

The religion of Jesus then is in all respects, and in all its parts, a moral religion; and it is adapted to man in every situation and in every clime: nor will it lose its universally practical character until man ceases to be a moral being, capable of and in need of improvement.

REMARKS.—In the above article Br. Abbott uses the term moral and morality in a somewhat restrictive sense; not in their primary, most general and proper sense.—Webster defines the word moral thus: '1. Pertaining to practice or manners in reference to right or wrong. 2. Conformed to rules of right, virtuous.' Walker thus: 'Relating to the practice of men toward each other, as it may, be virtuous or criminal, good or bad; reasoning or instructing with regard to vice and virtue; popular, such as is known in the general business of life.' Walker defines morality thus: 'The doctrine of the duties of life, ethics, the form of an action which makes it the subject of reward or punishment.' Hence, from the first or primary sense of moral given by Webster, and the whole definition by Walker, it will be seen that a moral action may be a bad instead of a good action, and a moral man a vicious instead of a virtuous man. And there may be bad morality as well as good morality. The word moral is used, not necessarily to signify virtuous, but is applied to particular classes of subjects in contradistinction from those of a gross, physical, ponderous or tangible nature or character. A rock, a tree, a mountain, or a river, has no moral properties, and the term moral or immoral can not be properly applied to either. They have nothing to do with ethics or morality, one way or the other. So of the brute creation: they are not moral, nor yet are they immoral, because not belonging to a class of subjects to which the word moral is applicable.

Again, we must beg leave to dissent from Br. A. in his opinion that morality is religion, and agree with those whose opinions he questions and controverts. True, we should equally differ from the antiquated orthodox notion that 'morality is dangerous' and 'that there is more to be feared from the man who lives a good moral life than from the hardened sinner.' A correct moral life is good. But still morality is not necessarily religion. A man may lead an exemplary and outwardly correct moral life, and yet have no religion. An atheist has no religion; and yet he may be honest, fair, upright in all his dealings with men; generous, philanthropic, hospitable; exempt from particular and general vice; exemplary in all his habits and conversation. But why has he no religion? Because religion, according to Webster, signifies, 'a system of faith and worship, piety,' and according to Walker, 'virtue, as founded upon reverence of God; a system of Divine faith and worship as opposite to others.' Now the atheist has no system of Divine faith and worship. His virtue, whatever it may be, is not founded upon reverence of God: because he neither believes in nor worships any God. He therefore has no religion. The word religion is derived from the Latin word re-ligio, to re-bind; and implies the reclaiming, reuniting, and binding man to his God. As with morality there is both good and bad, so with religion; there may be very good, and there may be very bad religion in the world, and most obviously there are both. A religion is bad if it lead man to worship a bad Divinity and imitate him; and good, if it lead him to worship and imitate a good Divinity: for all religion implies the union and harmony of the worshipper with the object worshipped. A bad religion makes its votaries unhappy, and leads to bad moral practices. A good religion makes its votaries happy, and leads to good, pure and elevated moral practices. Pure religion will produce a pure morality; a corrupt religion, a corrupt morality. The tree will be known by its fruits. Pure religion, the religion of Jesus, is eminently spiritual. It presents God, our Father, as a pure and holy spirit, to be worshipped, obeyed and imitated, 'in spirit and in truth.' And 'the fruits of the spirit are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness and temperance: and against such there is no law.'

Religion is both theoretical and practical: the theory is the tree, the practice the fruit; the theory the fountain, the practice the stream flowing therefrom; as the apostle says of the genuine faith of the Gospel, it 'works by love and purifies the heart;' and if the heart, or fountain of action, be pure, the stream will be pure also. 'Whoso hath this hope (of the Gospel of Christ) purifieth himself even as he is pure.' A man may practice a very respectable outward morality from different motives than those presented in the Gospel. He may do it from habits early formed, from early associations, from the examples of those around him, from the hope of obtaining popularity or the praise of men; or from a naturally good and benevolent heart, or the absence of any strong incentives to vice. But this, though not inconsistent but in harmony with religion, is not religion itself: as we have seen, religion binds us to God, and leads to the reverence, worship and imitation of God—to love him supremely and our neighbor as ourselves, and do good to all men as we have opportunity, because God is love and is good unto all and his tender mercies over all his works.

To the latter part of Br. A.'s article above we make no objections: it is in entire harmony with our views.

WESTERN N. Y. UNIVERSALIST S. S. ASSOCIATION.

The organization of this body was effected in the winter of 1845; and its first regular meeting was held in May following. This meeting directed its Secretary to report its doings and statistics to the State S. S. Association; and it was represented in the parent body for the purposes of recognition, and the establishment of mutual friendship between the co-workers in a great and benevolent enterprise. Again, the Western N. Y. Universalist Sunday School Association, held its second annual meeting in May 1846; and again reported its proceedings and sent delegates to the State Association. The resolution appointing the delegates, reads thus—'Resolved, That this Association send two delegates to the State S. S. Association about to convene at Newark, to report in regard to the organization and condition of this body, and suggest such measures as may be deemed expedient to unite and co-operate in our common cause.' The delegates as appointed attended accordingly—and thus a second time, the matter was ended. Not the slightest notice has ever been taken of the doings of this Western N. Y. S. S. Association by the parent body—nor its name so much as mentioned on the annual Minutes, except in an insignificant note at the bottom of a newspaper column—no sign of recognition or fellowship has ever been given; and no evidence, save the note just named, that it ever heard of such a thing as the 'Western N. Y. Universalist S. S. Association.'

And yet such an Association actually exists; and comprises within its limits—the section of N. Y. lying west of Genesee River, very nearly one third of the schools and pupils of the order, in this great State. These schools are as well provided with all the essentials for instruction, are as well conducted, and as well sustained as any others in the denomination. And what is perhaps most singular, is, that this district so emphatically called, Western N. York—has a great number of Sunday Schools in proportion to the number of societies, than any other part of the State.

May we not ask then, without the imputation of excessive presumption, why we have not received on our repeated applications, some token of recognition—some decided evidence of sympathy and fellowship from the State Association? Is the sudden and successful establishment of one third of the number of Universalist Sunday Schools in the State of N. York, their embodiment and efficient co-operation under a suitable organization—a matter of so little interest or consequence to the order, as neither to merit nor receive any notice? Are the members and officials of the State Association, so engrossed with 'weightier matters,' in their public meetings, that they have neither time nor temper to attend to us? If so, the humble Secretary of that body will confer a favor, if he will inform the public what were the subjects of deliberation. How then, are we to understand these things? Is it from carelessness that we and our affairs are overlooked?—or is the neglect intentional? If the former, the business of the State Association should be committed to more considerate hands—if the latter, to such as are less enamored of an official position than desirous of promoting the Sunday School cause among Universalists. We are not very ambitious of a name—but we have a place, and shall not easily be jostled out of it by the blunders of ignorance or the sorry assumptions of misjudging vanity. And without any affectation of humility, while we trust that our actions have fully evinced our desire for the most cordial sympathy with the State Association—we shall neither deceive ourselves, nor suffer the Universalist public to be long deceived, with the idea, that we are the submissive members of a family by whom we are not owned.

UNIVERSALIST QUARTERLY AND GENERAL REVIEW.

The third number (for July) of the current volume of this valuable periodical has come to hand, laden, as usual, with the most interesting and valuable matter. We can hardly conceive it possible that our denomination will allow a work of this kind so ably conducted as this is and always has been, to languish for want of patronage. Its articles are generally labored, critical and highly instructive, being the best productions of the best writers in our denomination.

The first article of the present number is from the pen of Br. Adin Ballou on 'War and Personal Injury.' His doctrine upon this subject is that of Non-resistance—that is, as he explains himself, that we are never authorized by the New Testament to resist injury by injurious treatment of the aggressive party. He cites much Scripture and writes a strong article. The Editor allows it is 'one of the ablest defences of Non-resistance which we have seen brought into so narrow a space.' And yet most men and professing Christians will hesitate to admit the extreme conclusions to which the writer comes, especially in the existing state of society and the world.

The second article is from the pen of our venerable father Ballou on the subject of Divine Love. It is a powerful plea for the Divine character against the mysticism and darkness with which human learning and ingenuity have surrounded it. No one acquainted with the writer, and the many productions of his pen could possibly mistake the authorship, even had no initials been annexed to the article.

The third article is a disquisition by Br. Henry Bacon, on 'The Attractions on the Cross,' being a review of a work with this title from Dr. Gardner Spring of New York, justly exposing the monstrous absurdities of modern orthodoxy upon this subject—showing that the common views presents the cross in connection with the character of God in the most repulsive form, while the views we entertain harmonise all the attributes of God and present the cross, or the death of Christ, in the most interesting and affecting possible light. It is a valuable article from an able writer.

The next article is from the pen of the Editor on the character of 'Justin Martyr; or the Orthodox Faith, A—

D. 150-165.' It exhibits the patient and faithful research of the author in ancient literature and Ecclesiastical History; and presents many very striking and peculiar characteristics of Justin and of the orthodox faith of his times. No one in our denomination can excel, if he can equal, Dr. Ballou in this department of ancient literature. If Justin adopted some strange and whimsical notions by attempting to unite the Peripatetic and Platonic philosophy of his times with the more simple and sublime principles of the Gospel, he was nevertheless a most exemplary, devoted and self-sacrificing disciple of Christ, and one whose example in these respects we could wish to see followed by many in our own times more nearly than it is.

The other articles are 'The Seal of Christ's Messiahship,' by Br. A. A. Miner, of Lowell; 'Illustrations of New Testament Words,' by Br. T. B. Thayer, of Brooklyn; Poetry, by J. G. H., entitled 'If man die, shall he live again?' and by Mrs. N. T. Munroe, on 'The Saviour's Prayer'; and Literary notices, by the Editor. We have not found time to read these last named articles through; but the work where they appear and the names of the authors are a sufficient endorsement of their value.

FRAGMENTS.

Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.—BIBLE.

Gold and Religion. The two great staple commodities of the world. The one secures the approbation of man; the other, the approbation of God.

'The poor rich man and the rich poor man.' The one lives for himself; the other, for his fellow beings. A clear conscience is better than a full purse.

A prayer, and 'God bless you,' are good in their places and should not be dispensed with; but for the famishing orphan, bread is better.

'Do you ever think of dying?' inquired Elder S. of one whom he considered to be a great sinner. 'Certainly, but I think much more of living,' was the reply. The answer was wise, for let a man live right, and he will assuredly die right.

As the man who wrestles with a chimney-sweep gets well sooted, even if he falls on top; so he that contends with one of bad character, comes off but second best though he gains a victory.

The world is full of great men—in their own estimation! and equally full of small ones—in the estimation of others!

Piety. Once the hallowed virtue of the human heart; but now, a composition formed of four ingredients—a long face, a doleful prayer, a heaven for self, and a hell for neighbors!

Knowing—doing. To know, without doing, is hair-brained recklessness—to do, without knowing, is haphazard activity—but to know and to do, is the highest glory and honor of man.

Man. A being whom God made a little lower than the angels of heaven, but whom self has made but a little above the beasts of the earth.

'They were pricked in their hearts,' saith the Scripture. It was well in that olden day; but now, the most of men may be more deeply wounded by pricking them in their pockets! S. J. G.

No. XIV (and the last) of popular lectures on SCIENCE AND ART, by Dr. Dionysius Lardner, has been issued, by Greeley and McElrath, Tribune Buildings, N. Y. The remainder of the lectures on the steam engine, is contained in this number. A preface and introduction, title page and index to both volumes, etc. This work is a valuable and instructive one, specially to the searcher after scientific knowledge among the heavenly bodies, or to him who attains to an understanding of mechanics. The cheap, though handsome, style in which the work is got up places it within the reach of almost any one desirous of obtaining it. Full sets may be had of G. N. Beesley of this city at the publishers price—25 cents per number.

Harpers Publications.

No. XIV of the New Miscellany, is THE CONNECTION OF THE PHYSICAL SCIENCES, by Mary Somerville. It is a neat muslin bound 12mo. book of some 460 pages, treating of the physical connection of the plants of the Solar system, with each other, the forces that govern them, the effects of those powers upon vegetation,—indeed it shows the dependance that the different kinds of matter, material and invisible necessarily have upon each other in order to their existence. An interesting and useful work.

A SCHOOL DICTIONARY, of Greek and Roman antiquities, abridged from the larger Dictionary by Wm. Smith, LL. D., Professor of Greek and Latin Languages, &c., in Columbia College, New York. This book contains 373 closely printed double column 12mo. pages including an index of Greek words. It is copiously illustrated and is a very valuable work for Greek and Latin students, and also for the English learner, the words being given in both English and Greek with an English definition.

TEMPER AND TEMPERAMENT, comprised in two interesting tales entitled 'the managing wife' and 'imprisoned mind,' by Mrs. Ellis. This is a neat 12mo. volume of 267 pages by an excellent and much read author. It will no doubt find an extensive sale.

Nos. 95-96 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE contains the remainder of the tragedy of 'King John,' with notes. 25 cents.

No. 17 of the illustrated WANDERING JEW is issued, profusely embellished as usual. This edition is now nearly complete. 25 cents.

GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE, and the COLUMBIAN for August, both beautifully embellished and well filled with good articles from their usual excellent contributors, as well as all of the above books, foreign papers, &c., are received and for sale by G. N. Beesley.

Daniel Adee, No. 107, Fulton street, N. Y., has issued No. 12 (and the last) of the TREASURY OF HISTORY.—This number contains nearly 200 pages of matter, concluding the general history of the United States, to which is added a short history or outline of the different States separately, sketch of Oregon and California. The index and title page of the second volume accompany this No. 25 cents per number—a cheap and good work.

THE GOSPEL BANNER, published in Augusta, Me., and edited by Br. Wm. A. Drew, has just entered upon a new volume enlarged and greatly improved in appearance. It is one of our oldest and best papers, and edited by one of our oldest and ablest editors, always interesting and instructive, and always well spiced with variety and good humor. It is a large sheet, published weekly at $2 per annum. We wish it ten thousand good paying subscribers and a hundred thousand attentive readers.

THE TALISMAN and Illustrated Odd Fellows' Magazine. Theophilus Fisk, Editor and Proprietor. Philadelphia and Washington. We have received No. 1, of this neatly got up monthly, and we doubt not it will be a valuable addition to the already respectable number as well as creditably conducted periodicals devoted to the principles of the Independent Order—'Friendship, Love and Truth.' The very low price at which the Talisman is to be published, must, we think, secure it an extensive circulation. The following are the terms—

It will be published monthly, on fine white paper, with entire new type. It will be embellished with engravings and beautiful illustrations of important places and events both in ancient and modern history, and will be afforded to subscribers at the unusually low price of One Dollar per annum, payable in advance. It will contain an equal amount of matter to other similar periodicals, and at only half their price. The members of the order are very earnestly and respectfully requested to use their best exertions to obtain subscribers in their respective neighborhoods and Lodges.

There will be two volumes of the work published each year; six months to the volume.

Those who forward five dollars shall receive eleven copies of Volume I, for the first six months; ten dollars, twenty-three volumes; and for twenty dollars, fifty copies of the first volume will be forwarded—reducing the price to forty cents.

Those who prefer it can subscribe for both volumes, for the year, by forwarding double the amount stated above. The price is unexampled in the history of literary publications.

All letters to be directed to the Editor, Philadelphia. Office at the new Book Store of the Grand Secretary, Odd Fellows' Hall, North Sixth Street, and at No. 113 Chestnut street.

A REQUEST.—Will Brs. Price, Everett, Gurley, Tompkins, and any and all others who favor me with their papers, please to take notice; that my present residence is at Fort Plain, Montgomery county, N. Y., and hence that it is unnecessary to address me any longer at Scipio. Some of our publishers have noticed my removal, but continue to send their papers as formerly. By hereafter directing to Fort Plain as above requested, they will confer an especial favor upon one of their readers.

Fort Plain, July 21, 1846. H. L. HAYWARD.

Br. Robert Queal desires all papers and letters designed for him, sent for the present to Lee, Oneida co., N. Y.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street, Buffalo.

Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn, keeps a general assortment of Universalist Books for sale. He is also agent for the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist publications generally.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The EDITOR will preach at Little Falls, in the Grove, next Sunday, should the weather be favorable. If very unfavorable, the meeting will be in the Hall as usual.

The EDITOR will preach in Ilion the second Sunday in August.

Br. D. H. PLUMB will preach at Frankfort next Sunday.

Br. J. H. HARTER will preach in Cedarville the first Sunday in August, and in Columbia Center at 5 o'clock P. M. of the same day.

Br. N. SNELL will preach in Litchfield on the first Sunday in August.

Br. G. W. VAN VLECK will preach in Erieville on the first Sunday in August, and in Oran the second Sunday.

DEATHS.

In Niles, July 10th, CHARLES BURGESS, Esq., in his 52d year. It is but justice done, when we say of our departed friend and brother, that he was a worthy citizen, kind neighbor, devoted husband, and an affectionate father. In all truthfulness we may say, he was universally respected in life, and died lamented by all that knew him. He was a member of the Universalist society, punctual in attendance upon divine worship, and led an exemplary life before the world. He died, as he had lived, a firm believer in the salvation of all men—declaring upon his death bed, that he was 'perfectly resigned to the will of God.'

May the richest blessings of the Gospel abide with the mourning friends and relatives—and may that faith which cheered him in sickness, and sustained him in the hour of death, be theirs—assuring them of a blissful reunion in the spirit-land, to ever mingle their praises around the throne of God and the Lamb.

'I know he has gone to the home of his rest;

Then why should my soul be so sad?

I know he has gone where the weary are blest,

And the mourner looks up and is glad.'

J. M. PEEBLES.

In Massena, June 21st, Capt. WM. NIGHTINGALE, in the 86th year of his age. Br. Nightingale had long been a firm believer in 'the restitution of all things,' and the same glorious faith sustained and cheered him, even after he had commenced his journey down the steep of death. He has 'fought the good fight, and kept the faith, and henceforth for him is laid up a crown of righteousness.' A sermon was preached by the writer. A. M. WORDEN.

WAR—ITS TWO VIEWS.

Hark! hark! hear that cry, how it thrills, how it charms;
'Tis the prelude to glory: 'to arms!' then 'to arms!'
Up! up and be doing! fame call thee afar;
On! on to renown then! speed! speed to the war!
Ha! gloomy forebodings? what! turning away?
Would ye die then inglorious when one holyday,
In the ranks of an army would gain ye renown,
With fame for thy pillow, much softer than down?
Would ye lie then supinely, with nothing but peace
For thy pillow? then list and thy murmurings cease.
Then up! why that shud'ring? quick, harness thy car,
And swift as the lightning away to the war.
The trumpet is sounding, 'to arms!' is the cry;
Oh! wipe, my good fellow, that tear from your eye;
Though parents, and kindred, and love have a claim,
All these ye should give up in the prospect of fame.
No cringing, but fearless the cannon's mouth face,
Nor fly from the enemy: stand to thy place!
What though it be doom'd that in war thou shalt die?
Thou knowest thou diest most gloriously.
What! frightened art thou at the clangor of arms?
For thee then has war, blood and carnage no charms?
Wast never familiar with carnage and gore?
And never didst hear of a dead man before?
What matters it whether mid kindred or host
Thou yieldst thy spirit, and giv'st up the ghost?
'Unto dust,' Heaven's mandate is, 'thou shalt return';
What matters then, when, how, or where is thy urn?
'Twere better thy life's blood should water the plains,
Than slow burning fevers consume in thy veins.
Thou'rt wounded! what of it? thou sank to the tomb,
What more couldst thou hope for hadst thou been at home?
What say'st thou in death is no friendly hand nigh,
To cheer thy last moments and close thy dim eye?
Be cheer'd, fame and glory more cheering thoughts bring,
And angels and cherubs thy requiems sing.
'To arms!' then, 'to arms!' the whole populace cry,
Your life, be it glory, or glorious die.

But now the scene changes, dull peace is proclaimed;
Come home from the wars now, ye gloried and famed;
See! there is a man with his arm in a sling,
A soldier, let's hail him—what news does he bring?
Ho! weary worn soldier, what news from afar?
Hast heard of the battle? ah! been in the war!
All those who for glory and fame lately burned,
And went to war with thee, why not now return'd?
Did they perish in battle, or in the next town,
Do they reap of their glory, and fame, and renown?
Oh! sad, and lamentable too, was his tale.
'Seest thou the sad mourning of widow? and wail
Of the orphan do'st hear? They plainer can tell,
Why absent my comrades and what them befel.
Death, grim and insatiate, too long had been foiled'
(He said, and I sunk back and shud'ring recoiled.)
'Of his prey; them by thousands he stretched on the plain,
And for tardiness made up in number of slain.
All ghastly and rampant he stalked through the war,
The mourning of widows, what orphans deplore:—
All red and ensanguin'd the fields, and the blood
Flowed reeking in torrents, a bright crimson flood.
We manfully bore up 'gainst death's leaden rain,
And hundreds and thousands fell dead on the plain,
Mid cursings and groanings they gave up the ghost,
For the regions of Pluto, a terrible host.
Oh! better had they 'mid their kindred at home,
Their souls yielded up than thus sunk to the tomb!
From war now returning, worn, weary and lame,
The whole of our Glory, our Honor, and Fame,
We fight and we conquer, we bleed and we die,
And we gain,—we gain what? a great victory!

The art of war when will man study no more?
For kindred and home, when leave carnage and gore?
When the shield and the sword into implements beat
To make life a blessing; when dare to be great?
Then 'Glory' shall be (and it never shall cease.)
'To God in the highest, and on the earth peace.'

Henderson, July 18, 1846.

Br. SKINNER—We should be glad to have the enclosed Report inserted as soon as convenient, that the result of the business may be generally known.

I would also have the following vote added to the minutes of the Black River Association. By some means it has been omitted from the published minutes; and though I have not seen Br. Boughton since their publication; yet I am not alone in knowing it should be there. Yours, as ever,

P. MORSE.

'Appointed Brs. P. Morse, L. Rice and R. Cheever, committee of Discipline for the ensuing year.

REPORT

Of the Committee of Discipline of the Black River Association of Universalists in the case of Br. Wm. Sias.

The Committee to whom the case of Br. WILLIAM SIAS and the Society in Mexico was referred by the Black River Association at its last annual session, with ample power for its final adjustment and disposal; together with a brother to sustain the prosecution and Br. Sias to defend, having met at Ellisburgh, July 13th, 1846, according to previous notice: after reviewing the charges and evidence and hearing the defence, present the following Report, viz.

1. Br. Sias has fallen into indiscretion and excitement, and has discolored subjects by statements productive of erroneous impressions: but we see no clear evidence that he has wilfully perverted the truth.

2. He has acknowledged the imprudence of some part of his proceedings, admitted some of the charges brought against him, and expressed his determination to walk in future according to the rules and requirements of the Gospel: we therefore conclude that he should still be recognized as a minister of Christ.

3. Notwithstanding certain insinuations and reports in relation to Miss F. Campbell, who resides in Br. Sias' family, yet no evidence whatever appears in support of any thing derogatory to her moral character.

4. It would, we think, have been preferable for the society in Mexico to have originally referred this subject to one of the committees recognized in the Constitution of this Association, rather than pass condemnatory resolutions relating to Br. Sias, before the adjudication of the case: but we discover no evil design in that procedure.

5. We believe our social relation and our holy religion require the constant and universal practice of mutual charity, patience, forbearance, forgiveness and love as well as justice and truth.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

Br. Price, of the New York Christian Messenger, copies the article from Br. J. Kingsbury which we published a few weeks since, recommending a new plan of raising funds, and adds the following remarks by way of earnest appeal to the denomination in behalf of the Institute. We hope it will be read by all and duly considered, aye, and acted upon likewise.

CLINTON INSTITUTE.—We ask the attention of our readers to the article of our old and zealous friend, Col. Kingsbury, of Sheshequin, which we copy this week, from the Magazine and Advocate. It is a matter in which Universalists, as a denomination, are deeply interested. The School at Clinton is the germ of an important Institution. It should be sustained—it CAN BE SUSTAINED—IT MUST BE SUSTAINED!

And further—it must have its endowment Fund; it must avail itself of Collegiate privileges, and take its stand, in point of ability, for conferring Educational privileges, among the best Institutions of the land. Why not? Have we not pecuniary means to found it, or the intellectual ability to sustain it? No understanding Universalist will pretend this. What then shall hinder the work? Nothing—just nothing, friendly reader, but our own supineness. Are we ready to father this last character! Shame on us, if we are!

Whether Father Kingsbury's plan is the best, we will not pretend to say. But as yet it is the only one systematically before us, and let us continue to ding that in each other's ears—at least, till we find a better. Talk, talk, brethren, about it. Keep it before the people. There can not, possibly, come harm from mere consultation about it. If it fails, it costs merely a little breath. But who talks of failure? There is no such word in the category. To will, in most things of this nature, is to do! Try it now. This willing a thing to be done, many times works wonders—especially if you can unite many wills into one, or concentrate them to one object.

We have faith to believe this work can be accomplished within a smaller circle than Br. Kingsbury has pointed out—that this State alone can effect it. We would by no means lightly esteem aid from any of the States named. It would be highly gratifying and acceptable. But the grand question is, whether New York should wait for the movement of her neighbors, or for their equal co-operation, in a business abundantly within her own power, and measurably, to say the least, her own. At all events, we should rejoice to see one grand, united effort made in the Empire State. Brethren, put the ball in motion, in some way!

We had thought of suggesting a little different plan—though after all, amounting to about the same thing. And that was, the setting apart a particular Sabbath, some time hence—say, if you please, the first Sunday in January, 1847—for a simultaneous effort through the State—a general collection to be taken up in every society for this object; and in the meantime let every preacher, editor, and layman, preach, write and talk about it earnestly, and urge its importance and advantages upon one and all with whom they meet. A thorough effort of this sort, would accomplish the work.—There are men of substantial wealth, who, when they see a hearty movement of this kind, would at once lend a helping hand. They only want to be certified that the work is to be completed, to induce liberal aid. Who can blame them for hesitating, until they see the mass engaged heart and soul in the work? For without a general engagedness of the denomination, there is no encouragement for them to do any thing. They could not be expected to all do; and to commence without pretty clear indications of a general movement, would only be laying the foundation of a series of spasmodic efforts, certain to end in dissatisfaction, and quite likely in failure at last.

But we have no desire to divide attention with plans—we would rather unite. Take almost any one, and let there be union—concerted action—and it will succeed!

Let us get $50,000, and we can go into the Legislature with confidence, and secure a special charter, and doubtless a liberal appropriation from the State. Other Institutions, in the hands of denominations behind us in general classification, have had this aid—why should not ours be equally favored? It is time for us to ACT. Who goes for the endowment of the Clinton Institute? Let every zealous Universalist respond a hearty affirmative, and then talk to his luke-warm neighbor! Do it now!

SUBSTANCE OF A DISCOURSE,

Delivered at Canadea, April 26th, 1846. [Published by request.]

BY REV. J. STEBBINS.

'If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it.' 1 John v: 16.

I am not unapprised that the words of my text are, by some, supposed to refer to a sin that can have no pardon, and by others deemed of difficult interpretation. And in discoursing upon them I shall not attempt to be wise above what is written. Neither shall I hesitate, because of the difficulties with which the subject may be surrounded, to give the testimony of Scripture, as it appears to me, to bear upon it. Before inquiring what is meant by the sin unto death, and what death is meant; it may be well to observe that whatever meaning is attached to the text, it must not be one that arrays this passage against the plain and uniform testimony of Scripture. We are told, 'the soul that sinneth, it shall die;' and 'to be carnally minded is death;' and 'so death passed upon all, for that all have sinned.' This being the uniform testimony of prophet, priest and king, it appears that the legitimate result of sin is death, and that a state of sin is death itself. Hence the language of John, 'there is a sin, not unto death,' must be taken in an accommodated sense. It will not do to suppose he meant to affirm, that any sin would not be followed by death, as its natural concomitant; because that would make him contradict the whole tenor of the Bible, his own writings included. He says, 'he that hath not the Son of God hath not life.' 'There is a sin not unto death'—that is, there is a particular sin not unto a special kind of death. Now I wish my hearers to remember, that whatever kind of death they suppose the penalty of sin to be—death temporal, death spiritual, or death endless—the particular sin here spoken of 'not unto death,' can have nothing to do with this penalty; because this is a universal penalty, for all sin; and knows no sin not unto death. Whereas, the sin spoken of is not unto death; therefore it must be sin and death in an accommodated sense. I need not tell you that the same death is meant in both the phrases. The bare reading of them is evidence of this. 'There is a sin unto death: there is a sin not unto death.' Hence the deduction negatively. The sin here spoken of is not unto that death which is the proper penalty of the law of God, and never should be adduced as proof of endless death. This being the case, will you, my friends, bear in mind, that whether I succeed in giving you a satisfactory exposition of the text or not, that this one thing is certain, viz. That it can not teach the dogma of never ending woe in the future state.

Let us now attend to the words of our text. You perceive that the individuals there spoken of were brethren. The first wish of the mind in regard to the subject is to know of whom it was said, 'If he sin a sin,' &c. This may not be possible to ascertain beyond a doubt any farther than that they were brethren. I will however venture an opinion, founded upon circumstances that will come up as we proceed; remarking that the fact of their being brethren, is evidently inconsistent with the idea that some outcast—some abandoned sinner was meant, who was doomed to 'the world of woe'—and that opinion is, that by the men spoken of, was intended the believing and unbelieving Jews—brethren—heirs of the same promise—but the one receiving the Lord as his Messiah—while the other rejecting him—committed that sin which was unto death—a most terrible death from the presence of God and the glory of his power.

What was the sin? and what was the death? you ask. I have hinted at the answers to these questions in anticipation. Now to the word and the testimony. In Sam. iii: 13, 14, it is said, 'For I have told him (Eli) that I will judge his house forever, for the iniquity which he knoweth: because his sons made themselves vile and he restrained them not. And therefore I have sworn unto the house of Eli, that the iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged with sacrifice nor offering forever.' Here was a sin not to be prayed for—what was it? [Read 1 Sam. ii: 12-17.] And the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phineas, were slain. They died the death—and Eli did not long survive the shock. At the 16th verse of the 7th chap. of Jeremiah it is said, 'Therefore, pray not thou for this people; neither lift up cry nor prayer for them; neither make intercession to me; for I will not hear thee.' Here again is a sin not to be prayed for; and we are informed in the context of the sin of this people. [Read Jer. vii: 8-16 inclusive.] This was their sin; blasphemy, in committing all these abominations in the name and in the house of the Most High. Now we have only to turn back and read the fate of Ephraim, and what the Lord did to Shiloh, to know the punishment of the sin not to be prayed for. Here the sin of Eli's sons again comes up. It was they who did abominable things in Shiloh—who defied the ordinances of God at his altar—who dared appropriate to themselves the things of God—thus blaspheming his holy name. It was their sin which should not be purged with sacrifice nor offering forever.

What was their punishment? They were slain—and with them there fell of Israel 30,000 footmen in battle with the Philistines. And the ark of God was taken. This was what God did unto Shiloh. This was the news the messenger brought unto Eli; 'Israel is fled before the Philistines; and there hath been also a great slaughter among the people; and thy two sons also, Hophni and Phineas, are dead, and the ark of God is taken. And it came to pass, when he made mention of the ark of God, that he fell from the seat backward, by the side of the gate; and his neck broke and he died: and lo! in the pains of death was the child of Phineas named Ichabod, saying, The glory is departed from Israel: for the ark of God is taken.' 'Therefore will I do unto this house as I have done unto Shiloh; I will take the glory of God from it; and pray not thou for this people.' 'Yea, I will cast you out of my sight as I have cast out all your brethren, even the whole seed of Ephraim.' But how was Ephraim cast out? and for what? Hosea tells us, 'Because Ephraim hath made many altars to sin, altars shall be unto him to sin. I have written to him the great things of my law, but they were counted as a strange thing. They sacrifice flesh for the sacrifice of my offerings and eat it; but the Lord accepteth them not: how will he remember their iniquity and visit their sins: they shall return to Egypt, Ephraim shall return to Egypt, and they shall eat unclean things in Assyria.'

Here we have the sin and the punishment of Ephraim. The same sin and similar punishment with the people of Israel in the time of Eli. Can there be any doubt as to the punishment of Judah? Of whom it was said on account of the same kind of sin as Hophni and Phineas and Ephraim had committed; 'Therefore pray not thou for this people.' Still to fix the matter firmly in the mind, let the vivid description of the prophet (Jer. vii: 29-34) of the destruction of Jerusalem, for the sin not to be prayed for, be attentively examined. See also Jer. xiv, where it is said of this same people, 'The Lord doth not accept them; he will now remember their iniquity and visit their sins. Then said the Lord unto me, pray not for this people, for their good. When they fast I will not hear their cry; and when they offer a burnt offering and an oblation, I will not accept them; but I will consume them by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence.' And why? Let the same prophet answer, 19th chap. 4th to 9th verses inclusive. 'Because they have forsaken me, and estranged this place, and have burnt incense to other gods,' &c. We deem it necessary thus to establish the facts, that there was a sin not to be prayed for, known in old times—that that sin was blasphemy, and was punished with banishment from the ark of God—by banishment into Egyptian darkness—by the departure of the glory of God—that the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem were guilty of the same sin, and were threatened with the same kind of punishment, viz. destruction, and the departure of the glory of God from their city and temple—for the reason that we are thus enabled to come from the prophetic to the gospel age; with the inquiries where were the people guilty of this sin not to be prayed for? and when was visited upon them the long threatened punishment? We answer—They were about being assembled in Jerusalem—the furnace of the Lord—to be consumed—to see the glory of the Lord depart—their city destroyed, and their children devoured for food in the extremity of their distress. The overthrow of the holy city took place about 700 years after the prophet, whom we have quoted, wrote. St. John stood upon the verge of the great calamity that overhung the Jewish nation—a calamity foretold as certain to befall them as the consequence of a sin not to be prayed for—a sin unto death. Thus standing in full view of that tribulation; and contemplating the sin that was its cause—of whom would he be likely to say, 'If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death?' &c. Of the Jews, most certainly, especially as they were known to be guilty of the sin unto death; and as believing Jews had unbelieving brethren.

But, says the objector, Does not your view seem to change the subject from an individual to a national one? Not at all. For while the Jews as a nation were guilty of the sin unto death, there were persons among them, who believed in Christ and were saved from the destruction of Jerusalem. In like manner individuals might have been guilty of this sin. Hence the propriety of saying, 'If any man see his brother sin,' &c. One word as to the duration of the death not to be averted, which we have seen to be destruction from the presence of God and the glory of his power. Two of the examples referred to have come to an end. The ark of God did not always remain among the Philistines. 'And Ephraim shall say, what have I to do any more with idols?' Hosea xiv: 8; see also xiii: 4, and Jer. xxxi: 20.

We believe the Jews shall be restored. 'O Israel! thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thine help.' Hosea xiii: 9. 'Blindness in part is happened unto Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in, and so all Israel shall be saved.' Rom. xi: 25, 26. And the individual can not go beyond the reach of mercy. Amen.

If we look to ourselves alone—if we think of ourselves alone—we shall meet with disappointments. But if we regard the good of others as well, we shall rarely miss attaining the end we seek, and with it will come a blessing for our own hearts.

MIRACLES IN GENERAL—THE MIRACULOUS CONCEPTIONS—HEREDITARY DESCENT.

BY EV. J. LEWIS.

'Truth is always consistent with itself.' One truth never conflicts with another. Facts in natural history must of necessity be in accordance with the truths of natural science. Whatever is true in theology can not contradict what is true in philosophy.

The miracles recorded in the Bible are, for the most part, so well attested that it were incredulity to doubt the reality of them, especially when it is considered that they occurred in connection with, and for the purpose of calling attention to, a great system of truth communicated to mankind in aid of the cause of human improvement. And since one portion of truth always harmonises with another, how much soever the different portions thereof may seem to do otherwise, it can not be that the definition sometimes given of a miracle is really the true one, namely, that it is an event happening in violation of some law or laws of nature; for the laws of nature, or the natural laws, so called, are manifestly no other than the laws of God. And if miracles ever occurred, they were wrought by the power of God; and as God is a wise and consistent being, he can not have done any thing in violation of his own established laws. But it often happens that the operation of some of what we are accustomed to call the natural laws, is in a manner suspended, or rather overcome by the action of some higher law of the same character. Thus a piece of iron, or any other higher body, unless supported by some solid substance under it, falls; and this tendency, which has been usually called the attraction of gravitation, is thought to be a law of nature, acting throughout the universe. But a magnet may so counteract the operation of this law, as that a piece of iron, with no solid substance under it, may not only fall, but it may even rise to meet the magnet. Yet in this case no law of nature is violated, since it is not the law that a piece of iron unsupported by a solid substance under it, shall fall in all circumstances. So I conceive that the miracles recorded in the Scriptures happened (for I have full faith that they actually did happen) not in violation of any law or laws of nature, but in perfect accordance with some law or laws of the same character, that is to say, some law or laws of God, superior to what we call the ordinary laws of nature, which last expression can only mean those laws with which we are best acquainted. It should not be lost sight of that our acquaintance with the laws of nature is at best but very imperfect, as is evinced by the fact that new truths in this department of knowledge are announced to the world every now and then. Thus, a few years ago, who would have doubted its being a law of nature that if a person were deliberately to wash his hands in red hot melted lead he would be burned? Yet this has been done with impunity, so far at least as burning the hands is concerned. To affirm then that miracles never happened because they are inconsistent with the laws of nature, is, in the present state of human knowledge respecting those laws, extremely unphilosophical, to say the least.

One of the miracles of the Bible, however, is from the nature of the case, attended with so little of testimony, that many sincere Christians have doubted its truth. I allude to what is usually called 'the miraculous conceptions of Jesus Christ.'—This has always, by the more thinking portion of the Christian world, been believed more on account of the credibility of the narrators, than from any other cause. But the labors of Phrenologists have established the truth of the doctrine of 'hereditary descent,' which doctrine shows the miraculous conception to be probable in a very high degree, approximating closely to absolute certainty. Thus, if the alleged circumstances attending the introduction of our Saviour into this mortal existence, are true, it is obvious that the law of procreation must have been suspended; but if those circumstances are untrue, then certainly the law of hereditary descend must have been suspended; since under the operation of this latter law, no man then living, or who had lived, could have been the natural father of Jesus; and to suspend, or supercede, or set aside, or overcome, the law of hereditary descent, would be as truly a miracle as the age in question.

But it may be well to state the argument somewhat more in form, attended with the necessary definitions and illustrations.

The doctrine of hereditary descent, as I understand it, is, that children resemble their progenitors, especially their immediate parents, not only in form, size, complexion, and other merely physical characteristics, but also in their mental and moral qualities. Thus if the parents are tall, well formed, light skinned, and strong constitutioned, or if they are the reverse of this, the children are so too, especially if this was also the case with the grand parents and their progenitors. So also, if the progenitors of a family of children are imbecile, or covetous, or dishonest, or intellectual, or benevolent, or conscientious, the children must necessarily form and possess exactly the same kind and measure of characters as their progenitors, for their tendencies may be restrained, directed, and in a great measure controlled, by education and other extraneous influences, acting upon, and calling into action, the faculties, and feelings, and sentiments, of the individuals themselves. Man is a progressive being, capable of great physical, mental, and moral improvement. And he may retrograde. It should also be observed, that the natural tendencies of children are subject to various modifications according as the parents and their progenitors differed from one another; and there are probably other circumstances which may somewhat modify their natural tendencies, but which are not necessary here to be mentioned; yet, doubtless the subject is not yet perfectly understood. But it may safely be affirmed that the law of hereditary descent, as it truly exists, is truly a law of nature. And it may not be amiss to observe that the existence of this law is recognised in various instances in the Scriptures, especially in the Old Testament. Thus not only is it there stated that the iniquities of the fathers shall be visited upon the children—which some regard, and I think justly, as a direct inculcation of the doctrine of hereditary descent—but we often find it promised to virtuous parents that they shall be blest in their children, which supposes, at the least, that such children shall perform faithfully all the filial duties, and of course be virtuous like their parents.

If it be asked why no man of that age could have been like the father of Jesus, I reply, because he was so unlike any man of that age in his intellectual and moral characteristics.* It is not my purpose to attempt a full delineation of his character. To give even a tolerable sketch of it, would probably require an abler hand than mine. Suffice it to say that while others gloried in patriotism, and considered the love of country to be a cardinal virtue, he cherished and taught love to the entire race of man. While others supposed it to be the perfection of human conduct to love one's friends, and to hate one's enemies, and to speak and act accordingly, he commanded men to exercise love both in their feelings, and words, and deeds, towards not only their friends, but also towards their most determined and active foes; and he practised his own precepts in life and in death. Whilst all religionists of that day, the Jews by no means excepted, considered themselves and those of the same religion with themselves, as entitled to and actually enjoying a monopoly of Heaven's love, he inculcated the sentiment that God loves the world, that the Divine Being is the Father of universal man, kind even to the unthankful and the evil, more ready to bestow blessings upon his offspring than are the kindest of human parents to bestow food upon theirs. Whilst all the religions of that age were believed to be designed respectively for a particular nation and country, he conceived the gigantic project of giving to man a universal religion, suited to human beings in all parts of the earth, in all periods of time, in all states of society, in all conditions of life. Now to my mind the great principle manifested by the Saviour in all this, is benevolence—a deep-rooted, wide-spreading, far-reaching, all-embracing benevolence—connected of course with veneration, ideality, and the other 'superior sentiments' in their most perfect development, and directed by an exceedingly acute, clear-seeing, far-detecting, comprehensive, discriminating, untiring, and powerful intellect. And I do not learn from the history of that age, that he had any prototype in his own nation, nor indeed among any of the nations of the earth. It seems to me, then, an unavoidable conclusion, that he either had no earthly father, or else that mental characteristics existed in him which were not possessed by either of his parents, nor any of their progenitors, which last, as I have before said, would be as truly a miracle as the first. And however reluctant I may be to give credit to miracles—and I am by no means extra-credulous—I am, as an honest man, compelled, in the case of Jesus, to admit either the miracle or that—one horn or the other of the dilemma, I am compelled to take. And independently of the credibility of the Evangelists, I can as readily yield credence to the account contained in the gospels, as to the suspension or setting aside of the law of hereditary descent.

* Children may be somewhat unlike their parents, and the difference may arise from the law of progression. But He differed so greatly from all men of that age, as that progression alone fails to account for the dissimilarity.

I know it may be said that the history of Jesus is a fable—his character a mere fiction. And now suppose this to be said truly. Suppose the vast amount of evidence which goes to demonstrate the truth of his history and the reality of his character to be all swept away—annihilated—and that we are driven to the necessity of admitting both the one and the other to be wholly fictitious. Would this rid us of miracle? 'I trow not.' The existence of the fabulist would then have to be accounted for. From whom did he inherit his extraordinary powers of invention? for it must be confessed that no model existed after which he could have copied. Hear what Rousseau says respecting such a supposition. Not that Rousseau believed in miracles, or supposed that he was writing any thing which could be employed in proof of miracles—no, by no means—for he was an infidel writer.—'Shall we suppose the evangelic history a mere fiction? Indeed, my friend, it bears not the marks of fiction; on the contrary, the history of Socrates, which nobody presumes to doubt, is not so well attested as that of Jesus Christ. Such a supposition, in fact, only shifts the difficulty without obviating it: it is more inconceivable that a number of persons should agree to write such a history, than that only one should furnish the history of it. The Jewish authors were incapable of the diction, and strangers to the morality contained in the Gospel, the marks of whose truth are so striking and inimitable, that the Inventor would be a more astonishing character than the Hero.'

WESTERN N. Y. UNIVERSALIST S. S. ASSOCIATION.

New York, July 31st, 1846.

Br. SKINNER.—There is in the 'Magazine and Advocate' of this week an article by Br. S. R. S., on the above subject, which seems to require some notice at my hand. With the temper of that article I have nothing at present to do: your readers must judge whether its tone is warranted by the facts of the case, or under any circumstances worthy of the high character and standing of the writer thereof. I propose to offer a brief statement of all the facts in relation to the matter of that article.

At the session of the State S. S. Association held at Cortland in 1845, not a word was offered in relation to the Western Association: not an item of its doings or statistics was reported. Does not this satisfactorily account for the silence of the minutes of that meeting respecting the latter body?

Again: the session of the State Association for 1846 at Newark was called for Tuesday, May 26th.

On that day, the whole of which was devoted to S. S. affairs, no one attended in behalf of the Western Association. After the Address in the evening, it was deemed advisable to adjourn over to Wednesday evening, merely for the purpose, as was understood, of voting upon the resolutions which had been discussed, and formally adjourning. Accordingly, at about 9 o'clock on that evening, the Association was called to order, and the resolutions referred to were passed. Then the delegates of the Western Association, for the first time appeared, stated in substance the fact of their appointment, and inquired whether the Constitution of the State Association would permit their admission as members? The Constitution being referred to, it was concluded that it did not; and after some conversation, which owing to the lateness of the hour, was very hurried, a vote was adopted appointing a committee of five to suggest a plan of reorganization of the whole body, of which committee two were members of the Western Association. No report of proceedings or statistics of the Western Association was presented. I humbly submit that the enumeration of the representatives of that body among the delegates, with the record of the vote referred to, is all that can be reasonably required of the 'humble Secretary' of the late session of 'the parent body,' and that if there be any fault in the case, it rests upon some other head than that of the undersigned.

For the rest, I unhesitatingly and most sincerely disclaim any and all sectional feeling in regard to the Universalist Sunday School cause, and especially any and all hostility to the Western S. S. Association; and I believe every other 'official' of the State Association will heartily unite in this disclaimer. In closing, I can only regret that Br. S. R. S. did not seek an explanation in a more private way than through the columns of your journal.

Very respectfully, your brother,

G. L. DEMAREST,

Sec'y pro tem. at the late session of the N. Y. State U. S. S. Association.

STRANGE ARGUMENT.

Mr. Powers, a Methodist preacher, while debating against Universalism, in Ohio, with Br. Doolittle, a short time since, argued, that God could not make all men holy and happy in the resurrection, because he could not release them from their obligation to love and obey him. He repeated this several times, and seemed to place great reliance upon it in proving the endless damnation of all who die without repentance. I doubt not that this subject appeared to him as he represented it, but to me it appears quite otherwise. I consider the indissoluble obligation under which man is placed to love God, an argument for universal holiness and happiness. If man can never be released from his obligation to love God, then the opportunity for so doing must be continued until this obedience is rendered. If men do not love God in this life, they must love him in the life to come, unless God consents to release them from their obligation to love him. While the obligation remains upon them, they can never be placed beyond the reach of divine mercy, for this would prevent their doing what God requires of them. If the Almighty holds men after death to their obligation of love and obedience, he will of course give them an opportunity after death to perform these obligations. So that the whole weight of this argument must be thrown in favor of universal holiness and happiness. J. W.

A FIGHTING CLERGYMAN.

The N. O. Tropic of a late date states that a Methodist clergyman, Rev. R. A. Stuart, is now west of the Rio Grande River, and has the command of 'a fine body of Volunteers.' He is of Louisiana, and the Editor says has 'gone into the field with the enthusiasm of a patriot, and all the high duty of a Christian clergyman'! And moreover, on the 1st of June the 'venerable Captain' preached to his fellow soldiers in Mexico!

Let us now suppose Christ to be on earth, to meet this saint on the line of march into the interior of Mexico:—

Christ. 'All hail!'

Captain. 'Hail! fellow soldiers—stand at ease.'

Christ. 'My servant, which way? and what meaneth those carnal weapons?'

Captain. 'The Mexicans have insulted our nation, and we are going to scourge them.'

Christ. 'Have ye not been taught in my school that the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, and that under my reign swords shall be beat into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks?'

Captain. 'O yes—but the world are not ripe for the adoption of such principles yet.'

Christ. 'If thou art a follower of me, I command thee to sheathe thy sword—he that taketh the sword shall fall by the sword.'—When I sent thee out, I charged thee when thou shouldst enter a house to 'say peace be to this house,' and art thou carrying destruction and war among thy brothers?'

Captain. 'But, Master, we preached peace, and they being our enemies would not hear us.'

Christ. 'Have I not taught thee, that if smitten on the one cheek to turn the other—if your enemy hunger feed him—love him—and how can ye if ye thrust that murderous steel which ye hold to his heart?'

Captain. 'Master, I plainly perceive that I have not thy spirit, and am not of thee. Thou shouldst have been my great exemplar, and whom hast thou thrust through with the sword? Thou taught me not to resist evil with evil, to regard all as my neighbors and preach peace on earth, every command of which I have violated.' He now divests himself of his weapons, commands his soldiers to ground arms, and we will leave him preaching to his army from a text in Mal., 'Have we not all one Father?' &c.

This fighting minister must be far from the kingdom, for war and Christianity are as opposite as the poles. Let Mr. Stuart fight under the banner of the Prince of Peace. J. R. JOHNSON.

FUTURE PUNISHMENT.

There is one consideration which makes eternal punishment almost impossible consistently with the character we ascribe to God as a wise, just and benevolent Being,—and that is the nature of man as a free agent. In a future world he must either continue to be a free agent, or else he must be a necessary agent. By the former, I mean that he will still have a control over his character and actions, and may become a holy or sinful being as he chooses. By the latter, I mean that he will be impelled to certain conduct, feelings and motives, by some external or internal controlling power or impulse for this purpose, which he will be altogether unable to resist. If he continue to be a free agent, it is manifest that although he may enter the other world as a sinner, he may effect an entire transformation of character, and become a saint. In this case then, the further infliction of punishment could be of no further use,—and it certainly would be a singular and revolting spectacle to see a Being whom we considered perfectly wise, benevolent and just, continue to inflict punishment upon one of his creatures, who had repented of his former course of conduct, become a virtuous and holy being, and was disposed to live in obedience to the Divine will hereafter. We ask in such a case, what good would the infliction of pain and misery do to such a person or any one else? Would it not on the other hand do much mischief, by lessening our confidence in the goodness and wisdom of God, and destroying the connection which we have been accustomed to consider as existing between virtue and happiness, and an obedience to the Divine will and the bestowment of the Divine blessing.

If on the other hand, the ground is taken, that he becomes a necessary agent and has no control over his character and conduct, it is manifest that he can be no longer a sinful being, since he can be no longer an accountable being. What he is and what he does is no longer of choice with him, but is produced by some controlling power from within or without, under which he is perfectly passive, so much so as a brute animal under the influence of instinct. He would be in the same situation as an insane person or idiot in this world, to whom we attach no moral character and hold in no way accountable for their actions. And there would be the same justice and benevolence in punishing the insane or the idiotic on earth for their mischievous conduct, as in punishing a person in another world after he had ceased to be a free agent and become the subject of a blind and resistless influence.

Now as the infliction of future punishment with those who believe that it will be eternal, generally proceeds upon the ground that the person punished continues to be a sinner, and that his continuing to sin will make it necessary that he should continue to suffer, it is obvious that it will apply to neither a man viewed as a free agent, since he may cease to be a sinner in the former case, and can not be a sinner in the latter. And as he must be either a free agent or a necessary agent in the other world, it follows that he may avoid making himself subject to eternal punishment on the one or the other of these grounds.

Punishment in another world has been viewed by those who believe in the doctrine of eternal punishment as in the nature of a Retribution, and being inflicted for this purpose, and not for its reforming and purifying influence, it is contended that the sinner never can be changed by its operation, but will always remain such. And always remaining a sinner, he must always be deserving of punishment, and always be subjected to it. This I believe is the Calvinistic view of the subject. But this position in my apprehension clearly assumes that the individual will be under some irresistible influence which will compel him to remain a sinner, which in other words is depriving him of his free agency and reducing him to the scale of a necessary agent. And if he becomes a necessary agent, it follows as I before said, that he can no longer be a sinner, since he is no longer an accountable being, and has no longer any control over his feelings and his actions. But if it is contended that he still remains a free agent, I then say that he may change his character, and be no longer a sinner—and then what becomes of the doctrine that he will sin forever, and must therefore suffer forever. So that they may take which side of the dilemma they choose, and on either horn of it, whether on that of free agency or necessary agency, the doctrine of eternal punishment in the view they take of it, will fall to the ground.—[Christian Register.]

COLLEAGUES —A curious illustration of the severance of acquaintance and society in this vast maze, London, was exhibited a few days ago at one of the metropolitan police courts. Most persons are aware that the magistrates at these courts relieve each other by taking it a week, or about three days in the week each. One day last week a magistrate of the semi-habdomadal regulation, turning to the chief clerk, asked, 'How is Mr. —?' meaning his brother magistrate. The clerk replied that he was very well; upon which the magistrate added, 'I am glad to hear it, as I have not seen him, I think, these three years.' It seemed very odd that two persons acting as alternate judges, week after week, in the self-same court, should pass three years of their life without contiguity, contact, or communion—but such is London. These are two men who pass a great proportion of their lives presiding in the court, occupying the same bench, fulfilling the same functions ministered to the same officers, surrounded by the same familiar faces, and yet three years, without even a chance rencontre between them. Yet they are colleagues. By the mass, though there may be concert in the court, there can not be collusion.

TO H. B. V.

'Tis said, the hand of change is laid
On all things here below;
That beauty, health and pleasures fade,
As down life's stream we go;
That even Friendship's ties are broken,
When separation once takes place,
The friends of yesterday forgotten,
Their image from our minds erased,
Like written names, as records left
On sands by ocean's waves made smooth,
The first returning billow past,
And every trace of them's removed.
Vail! will that bright, that golden chain,
That round our youthful hearts entwined,
By absence break? No more remain
In distant years of future time?
Believe it not! the tale is vain;
'Twill only stronger grow;
In youth, or age, 'tis still the same;
Man's solace here below.
Nor when the change of death shall come,
Shall Friendship's ties be riven;
Those pleasing ties, on earth begun,
Will stronger grow, in Heaven.

UNIVERSALISM IN DEATH—REMARKABLE ILLUSTRATION.

It is our duty this week to record a remarkable illustration of the superior power of Universalism over the doctrine of endless misery to sustain and comfort the mind in the immediate prospect of death. Three weeks ago last Sunday, I was called in haste to see a young man, who, it was supposed, would live only a few hours. When I approached him, he cast upon me a despairing look and exclaimed, 'God will never forgive me—I shall be dead in a few moments and in hell!' Although clothed in his right mind, his mental agony could hardly be conceived—large drops of perspiration rolled down his cheeks, and his whole countenance indicated that he was in a state of utter despair.

I endeavored to calm his fears, but he at first would give no heed to my remarks. He still exclaimed, 'I am sorry you have come to see me—I never saw my sins as I now see them—God will never forgive me—no, never! never!' It was painful indeed to hear him talk.

He had been brought up in the faith of endless misery, and knew nothing of Universalism; but the lady with whom he boarded, Mrs. Oliver, being a Universalist, thought I might do him some good and accordingly had sent for me.

I called his attention to the lady of the house, Mrs. Oliver, and to several members of her family who were standing around his bed and weeping. See! said I, how kind these friends are! how attentive to your wants! how deeply they sympathize with you! Any of them would take you to heaven if they had the power. Do you not think they would? O yes, he replied. Well, I added, God is as much better than they are as he is greater.

In this way I finally gained his attention, and he heard me afterwards with great interest. I unfolded to him the character of God, in the best way and manner I could, and pointed him to the precious promises of his grace—to Jesus Christ and heaven as his final home. The result of the interview was an entire change in his mind.—'What?' said he, 'is that God? I never knew him before. I always believed in him, but never saw him in that light. If that is God you tell me about I am not afraid—I am happy! happy!! I am ready to die this minute.'

From that time forward to the day of his death, three weeks, he was one of the happiest men I ever saw. The second time I called to see him he grasped one of my hands in both of his, saying, 'God sent you to me! you first shewed me the way to heaven—I have no fear of death—all is clear!' His conversation was of this character in all his lucid intervals—and the attempts he frequently made to express his gratitude to me for having shewed him the way to God and heaven melted the hearts of those who heard him.

Our aged Br. Clark was with him many times after my first visit, and by his prayers and conversation gave him great consolation and joy. He seemed at times to be at the very gates of heaven.

He lived till last Saturday evening, when he calmly bid farewell to earth and all its troubles. Being out of town I could not attend his funeral, but Br. Clark addressed the mourning friends.

His father died some years ago; but his mother still lives, as we suppose, in Philadelphia whither he designed to go, in a few weeks from the time he was taken sick. His name was Charles Haggerty, and his age was 24 years. He died at the house of Mrs. Oliver, on Walnut street; and if he had been her own son he could hardly have received more kind and constant attention.

Here reader is a very plain renunciation of endless misery on the death bed. You see what horror it produced—and you also see what peace and joy Universalism afforded the mind in contrast with its opposite. Judge ye between them. Can a sweet fountain send forth bitter water? Can a bitter fountain send forth sweet water?

This is the fourth renunciation of endless misery on the death bed which we have listened to in this city.—[Star in the West.

A GENEROUS FRENCHMAN.

Mr. LePellitier, a citizen of Orleans, was so much affected and impressed by the wretchedness among the poorer classes, that, not content with having expended his own fortune in charities, he sought in their behalf, that aid from others his own means could no longer supply. Meeting one day an old friend, Mr. Aubertot, he said with his customary warm-heartedness, 'My dear, Mr. Aubertot, how much can you spare for my friends (so he invariably designated the poor) to-day?'

'Nothing.'

'You would not refuse me if you knew why I ask; a poor woman has just been confined—she has not a rag for her child, nor a morsel of food for herself.

'I have nothing, Mr. LePellitier.'

'A young and beautiful girl who is penniless and cannot get work—a trifle may save her from destitution and vice.'

'I repeat, Mr. LePellitier, I have nothing.'

'A poor workman, Mr. Aubertot, whose daily labor earns his daily bread, and who, having broken his leg by falling from a scaffold, has no resource but the charity of the more fortunate.'

'Let me entreat you, Mr. Aubertot, you never will find objects more deserving, nor can charity be more necessary.'

'When I give I do not require to be asked twice.' So saying, Mr. Aubertot turned on his heel and passed on.

Mr. LePellitier sorrowfully turned away, but in a moment recalling the destitution of the poor wretches he had mentioned, walked back, and, overtaking Mr. Aubertot, renewed his entreaties. At last, his friend, transported with rage, struck him. Mr. LePellitier with a kind smile, simply said, 'Now that you have given me something, you certainly can not deny the poor.'

It is perhaps unnecessary to add that Mr. Aubertot, with tears in his eyes, pressed his friend's hand, and left his purse for the sufferers.—[New Nork Mirror.

JUDGE NO MAN BY HIS DRESS.

A few years ago there lived in Nantucket, a most excellent old gentleman, who, by manly prudence and other proper attributes of character had amassed much wealth. No man was more respected by all who knew him, but he had one eccentricity—an utter carelessness about his dress. His clothes were always of the most common kind, though clean, and a stranger would never supposed him to be worth a dollar. One day, there arrived at Nantucket, a lumber packet laden with boards, the master (or skipper) being a young man, making his first trip as captain, and feeling not a little proud of his new distinction. The vessel had arrived at the wharf and the master was walking fore and aft over the lumber, ready for a customer, when the poorly dressed old man above mentioned, approached and asked the price of boards. 'Don't retail, sir,' was the reply. 'I only sell by wholesale.'—'Well, what is the price for your whole cargo?' '$12 per thousand feet'—(the price was named without thought or care.) 'I will take the whole,' said the old man, 'unload them at once.' 'You will, will you?' said the captain, 'you take the whole—you poor, ragged, old fellow! I'll throw this billet of wood at your back if you aint off at once! You, without a cent in your pocket to think to impose upon me!'

The old man walked off without uttering a word,—the captain turning to a person who came near at the moment, told him the story, pointing to the old man, who turned and looked at them and then continued his way.

'Do you know that old man?' asked the person to whom the captain now spoke. 'No sir.' 'Well, discharge your cargo. I rather guess he can pay for it.'—The captain soon felt his error, and in due time the lumber was landed at the wharf. The next morning the old man was there again. 'So, young man,' he said mildly—'you concluded to accept my offer?' The captain, humbly approaching the old man, said—'Sir, I did not know you. Please excuse—sir,—sir—I—sir—the old man was too busy examining the lumber to notice the stuttering apology and merely heard enough to know for what it was intended. 'Give the surveyor's certificate,' said he. It was given him. 'Your bill, sir.' It was also given. 'This is correct, and there's a check for the amount.'—'Sir,' interposed the captain, feeling very anxious to atone for his error—'Young man,' interrupted the purchaser, and he emphasized 'young' with a peculiar tone of voice—'all is settled, if you will allow me one word of advice—never again judge a man by his coat. Farewell!'

The check was duly paid, and had the captain but observed the circumstance, he might have seen that the name of the giver of the check, and that of the President upon the bills received for it belonged to the same person.

The above anecdote is strictly true, and carries a good moral with it.—[Transcript.

TRADITIONS OF OLDEN TIMES.

Among the unpublished anecdotes of revolutionary times we have often heard the following:

Mathew Lyon was a member of the Old Congress, and strongly opposed to kings and royalty. When the question of a national coin was started, Mr. Lyon objected to the eagle being put on, because he was the king of birds, and therefore inappropriate as a republican emblem.—Judge Thatcher of Massachusetts, who was always characterized by good-natured mirthfulness, replied, that perhaps it would be well to take the goose for our emblem; for that bird had nothing majestic in her deportment, nor could her humble rank among the feathered tribe give any offence to the most fastidious republican. Moreover, (continued the Judge) goslins would be a very convenient stamp for the ten penny pieces, and fippenny bits. This caused a great deal of mirth among the members, excepting Lyon, who was so offended by it that he challenged the facetious Judge to a duel. 'What arrangements will you make?' inquired the man who carried the challenge.

'None at all,' replied the Judge.

'Why, are you willing to be called a coward?'

'Yes, because I am a coward; and he knew it very well, or he never would have challenged me!'

This turned the laugh upon Lyon, who wisely concluded there was no use in trying to fight with a man who fired nothing but jokes.

The Judge's reply to a challenge from Blont, of North Carolina, was equally characteristic.

'I will consult my wife; if she consents, I will favor you with a meeting.'

To a challenge sent him on another occasion, he is reported to have returned the answer that he had a strong aversion to being placed in a position where his life was imminently endangered; but if agreeable to his opponent, he would have a likeness of himself chalked out on a board, at which his opponent might shoot—and that if he hit it, (the Judge) would acknowledge that he hit him. Tradition does not say whether this proposal was accepted by the challenger, or not.

Those who have truth on their side have time as their friend.

THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

The importance of providing a suitable Library for the recently established Theological School under charge of the Rev. T. J. Sawyer, at Clinton, N. Y., must be apparent to all who have given the subject any attention.—Nor can it have escaped observation, that the use of a private Library however well adapted to such general purposes, and however courteously and generously tendered, is both improper and unjust. There are very few clergymen who possess an extensive Library of choice books; and those who do, ought not to be supposed indifferent to their wear and tear, highly as they may esteem or devoutly love the cause in which they are employed. Besides, it is as palpably unjust to wear out the books of an individual without an equivalent, as to take and use any other private property for public purposes. Nor is wrong mitigated in the least, by the consideration that it is the property of a clergyman. It may be very consistent with prevailing opinion to regard clergyman as public property; but it does not follow that their books, like themselves, should be worn out in the public service.—The Universalist denomination has no legitimate right to the continued use of the private library of the esteemed principal of its Theological School. As a denomination, we are abundantly able to relieve him from this burden; and our self-respect ought to impel us to do so, without unnecessary delay.

It is also due to ourselves and to the public which observes our movements, that we make a beginning, and lay the foundation of a Library which shall be worthy of the cause to the elevation and promotion of which, it is devoted. But it is worse than useless to attempt to do this, by calling for a general contribution of Theological works. Libraries so collected may comprise some valuable and appropriate works; but the far greater portion will be made up of such as cost little and are of no use to the donors. In collections for general purposes, where the number, rather than the character of the works is principally regarded, this process may do very well; but for a Theological Library, it will only result in the accumulation of an unmanageable and useless pile of worthless books.

It is proposed therefore, that the Rev. T. J. Sawyer make out a catalogue of books, 'the estimated cost of which shall be $1000,—that he divide them as near as may be, into 100 lots of $10 each, and then send his order to 100 persons for the respective proportions of the works which he names. That is, that he assign to each individual of the hundred, the donation of the books which he may point out—the value of which shall be ten dollars. And also, that he then proceed to form another catalogue, the estimated cost of which shall be $500, that he divide the same into 100 lots of five dollars each, and address his order as above to such individuals as he may deem proper, for their respective donations. Let these donations be made by clergymen and others of the State of N. York. And when this is done, our friends in New England and other parts of the Union will be satisfied that something effectual will be accomplished beyond the formal resolutions of public bodies. They will feel safe in doing something for us, and we may hope for their sympathy and co-operation. And we may then ask aid from others with some degree of confidence, on the ground that we have done something for ourselves. The denomination in New York, is at this moment as ready and able to respond to such a call, as it will be for years to come; and the amount of books proposed—of substantial theological works, can be placed in Library, in a few weeks.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE UNIVERSALIST'S ASSISTANT, or An Examination of the principal objections commonly urged against Universalism, by a Believer. Boston: Abel Tompkins & B. B. Mussey, 1846.

Such is the title of a neat little 18mo. volume of 234 pages, handsomely bound in muslin and lettered, from the pen of Br. D. Forbes and the prolific press of Br. Tompkins. It is what its title purports, and a valuable assistant to the serious inquirer after truth. It is written in a serious and candid style, and fully meets and answers the frequent and flippant objections so commonly brought against Universalism by its superficially informed and prejudiced opposers, and especially by the pseudo-orthodox Tracts of the 'American Tract Society.'

The subjects treated of are, in CHAPTER I. The importance of religion—sources of information concerning it—need to be interpreted—Universalism not a negation, but an affirmation—its transcendent beauty—the one thing needful in certain cases.

CHAP. II. Miscellaneous objections considered. Section 1. The safe side. 2. The safest side. 3. Christ and his apostles incompetent teachers. 4. Why did the preaching of Christ and his apostles alarm the fears and excite the enmity of wicked men? 5. Universalism inconsistent with the character of God as a rewarder. 6. Universalism inconsistent with God's mercy. 7. God treats the righteous worse than the wicked. 8. There is no such thing as forgiveness. 9. The necessity of repentance. 10. Universalism not needed by the true Christian. 11. Universalism pleasing to the carnal heart. 12. A Universalist meeting in a new place.

CHAP. III. The original words rendered everlasting, eternal, &c., considered as an objection to Universalism. Section 1. Preliminary remarks. 2. Admissions of those opposed to Universalism. 3. The arguments by which it is attempted to fix upon the terms aion and aionios the sense of endless duration, considered. 4. Additional considerations to show the terms aion and aionios do not mean 'absolute eternity'—statements of Lexicons—classical usage—Scripture usage—usage by the Christian Fathers. 5. Conclusion.

CHAP. IV. The Hebrew word sheol, commonly rendered grave and hell, considered as an objection to Universalism. Section 1. Preliminary remarks. 2. Admissions of the learned. 3. An exhibition of the usage of sheol.

CHAP. V. The Greek word hades, commonly rendered hell in the New Testament, considered as an objection to Universalism. Section 1. Preliminary remarks. 2. Classical and Jewish use of hades. 3. New Testament usage of the term hades. 4. Exposition of Luke xvi: 23.

CHAP. VI. The Greek word tartarus, rendered hell in our Common Version of the New Testament, considered as an objection to Universalism. Description of tartarus—not used in the Heathen sense by the Apostle—used in the sense of sheol.

CHAP. VII. The Hebrew-Greek word Gehenna, always rendered hell in the New Testament, considered as an objection to Universalism. Section 1. Preliminary observations. 2. The derivation of Gehenna. 3. New Testament usage of the term Gehenna. Expositions of the passages where the term occurs.

CHAP. VIII. General conclusion.

From the examination we have been able to give the work now noticed, we are led to believe it a valuable addition to the works extant among us on the subjects treated of, and cordially recommend it to the reading community. It is for sale at this office. Price 50 cents. We intend making some extracts from it as soon as we find room.

ADVENTURES OF ELDER TRIPTOLEMUS TUB; Comprising important and startling disclosures concerning Hell; its magnitude, morals, employment, climate, &c., all very satisfactorily authenticated. To which is added The Old Man of the Hill-Side. Boston, Published by A. Tompkins. 1846.

Such is the title of another new work just from the press of friend Tompkins. It is about the size of the work just noticed above, and got up and bound in similar style. We understand it is from the pen of our lately deceased Br. George Rogers. It is written in a strain of humorous and playful satire, (of his capacity for which the author has given repeated proof,) and designed to bring into ridicule some of the absurdities of modern creed makers and pretenders to superior titles to heaven, while they unhesitatingly send many of the best men the world has ever known to an endless hell for want of their own peculiar notions and qualifications. The scene is laid on the Virginia side of the Ohio River; and the hero of the narrative is a certain worldly wise, India-rubber conscience, fat, well-to-do-in-the-world, Elder Tub, who has sundry interviews, in spite of himself, with the ghost of one Shadrach Paddle, who, with the Elder's father and a large company of the early pioneers of that country, was suddenly murdered by the Indians; and though all were very good men, good husbands, fathers and patriots, yet because they had not taken the precaution to get converted and be born again, according to the Orthodox notions, they all found themselves in hell, and in company with most of the patriot fathers of the Revolution and of our country's independence and constitution—such as Warren, Greene, Moultrie, De Kalb, Paul Jones, Decatur, Lawrence, Jefferson, Franklin, Adams, (and it is even hinted that Washington is among them,) together with nearly all the sages, philosophers, poets and moralists of antiquity. The Elder is much startled at first, and quite incredulous about the revelations of his ghostly visitor; till the latter argues the case with him and shows from his own doctrines and those of his church, and the popular expositions of the Scriptures, that it must be true—no mistake—and, that, on the whole, they have quite as decent and respectable company in that abode, as they have in the upper region—And furthermore, that, as there is 'no change after death,' those ancient sages, philosophers, historians, poets, and philanthropists, pursue their old studies, discussions, employments and amusements, having made great advances and improvements, since they left this world.

The book is readable, amusing, laughable; but still, we can not but question the moral tendency, in general, of such works. We fear that some tender and fastidious, yet conscientious and honest minds will allow themselves to be offended and wounded without being instructed; and that others naturally inclined to levity and satire will make a bad use of it, and pervert it from its obvious intention, to the contempt and ridicule of every thing sacred. Satire is occasionally, though seldom allowable on religious subjects. What we most fear in this work is too frequent mention of the names of the Deity and the Saviour, in connection with the most ludicrous ideas that ever entered into the brain of a satirist. Still, we believe the author had a serious and commendable object in view; and we doubt not but what, on some few minds similarly constituted to his own, the effect will be good; and perhaps the appeal may be more effectual and convincing on them than any other style that could have been adopted.

From the author's explanatory remarks in the Appendix to this part of the book, we make the following extract.

'The foregoing narrative, gentle reader, is in a lighter and more ludicrous strain than suits the author's general taste to write, or yours, it may be, to peruse; if you have supposed his design therein to have been mere amusement, at the expense of opinions and usages held sacred by many, you have greatly misconceived it. An author, as well as a public speaker, finds that different modes of address must be resorted to, in order to gain access to different minds. Some may be reached by close, closely reasoned argumentation—some would prefer to have the argument diluted with some florid and gratuitous declamation—some require to be stung into reflection with sarcasm—and some with playful satire. In this case the design has been to bring before the mind some facts connected with the notion of endless misery, which are not generally taken into account when that topic is under consideration; but which, on account of their magnitude, are worthy a place in the serious thoughts of all; and if the undeniable results of a doctrine are to have any bearing on the decision as to its truth or falsity, then ought those herein exhibited to seal the fate of the dogma of endless woe, effectually and forever.

The last part of the book is an amusing narrative of 'The Old Man of the Hill-Side'—an odd and quaint old genius, a native of the Emerald Isle, who in his youth came to this country, and after a few years of city life settled in the back-woods of the country and lived an honest, industrious and philanthropic life, but was a perpetual thorn in the side of all hypocritical pretenders to sanctity, whose religion was made up of affectation and parade. It is both amusing and instructive. The book is for sale at this office. Price 50 cents. D. S.

'OUR COUNTRY, RIGHT OR WRONG.'

The national difficulties in which the American people have of late become involved, have brought out an expression of the different principles by which different individuals are governed in the discharge of those duties which they conceive themselves to be under toward the people individually, and also, toward them as a nation.—That all opinion will be the same in detail, is not to be expected, because the perceptions of right existing in different minds, possess various degrees of acuteness and strength. But with the present organization of the human mind, and at this age of scientific and religious intelligence, none may unknowingly swerve entirely from the principles of justice, in the judgment which may be formed upon the subjects which come within the reach of their powers of comprehension. Hence, if we find individuals striving to accomplish that which is wrong—decidedly wrong—against the principles of justice and equity, we must conclude that they are either woefully ignorant, or else, have wilfully taken upon themselves the responsibility of acting upon principles in direct opposition to those of right.

The war with Mexico and those by whose actions it was produced, by one class of community, have been zealously supported; by another class, unsparingly condemned. The members of the former class, whose patriotism we doubt not is full as efficient in the airy hall and upon paper, as it would be under the broad canopy of the heavens with a burning sun above and maiming bullets and balls rattling round—they have, or at least some of them have, declared it the duty which the individual owes to the country to stand by that country, right or wrong. In one sense it is the duty of every man to do so, but not his duty in another sense. It is his duty to endeavor to extricate his country from wrong, but not his duty to endeavor to do this by aiding in heaping a double wrong upon an already injured nation, but in making a reparation for the wrong already done, and at the same time giving assurance to the injured party that the wrong shall not be repeated.

If a man's son trespass upon the possessions of a neighbor, it is the bounden duty of that parent to endeavor to extricate his son from the difficulty in which he may become involved by the action of trespass. But the parent is not to do this by doubling the trespass itself; not by following up that neighbor with brickbats, smashing in his windows, putting a fire brand into his buildings, and then telling him if he will give up half of his farm and pay the expense of throwing stones, brickbats and firebrands, there shall be peace! This would be a most unrighteous way for a parent to extricate a son from difficulty. But the first thing should be, to order the son to retrace his steps, and at the same time give the neighbor assurance that full and complete reparation should be made for the injuries already done. No parent is bound by the laws of God or the principles of justice, to aid and support his son in a wrong.

In agreement with the above premises—premises which no man can, in justice dispute or deny, the duty which an individual owes to his country in the present war with Mexico may be, and must be, determined by the question whether the actions producing the war on the part of this country were right or wrong. If right, then it is the duty of the individual to give the country his cordial and hearty support; but if wrong, the individual is bound to use his endeavors to extricate the country from the difficulty, not by committing farther depredations upon Mexican territory, but by making reparation for those already committed. No man is obligated by a law of God to support his country in a wrong, and if he is obligated to do so by a law of his country, then that law is a most unrighteous one and such as will eventually bring down the judgment of Heaven upon the nation. But which is right, this country or Mexico?

Upon this question we have an opinion of our own and though we shall express it with great plainness of speech, yet neither this paper or the Editor, is responsible for what may be said, but that responsibility, whatever it may be, must rest upon the writer alone. We give it as our individual opinion then, that our government is in the wrong. It has been said and probably with truth, that Mexico shed the first blood; but this by no means makes her the first aggressor. Grant that she did shed the first blood, but it was shed on her own soil, and if the soldiers of this government had not been there where they had not the first shadow of right to be, the first blood would not have been shed, and the country would not have been plunged in an expensive, ruinous, and most unrighteous war. But the army having been ordered to take possession of Mexican territory, and obeyed those orders, of course Mexico, in agreement with the laws of nations, was right in attempting to defend her territory as she did; right in ordering our army to retire, and right in opening a cannonade upon it when that army refused to obey that order, and we believe will be so looked upon by all honest men, by all disinterested nations of the earth, and by the God of the universe.

Some may say, however, that the army upon the Rio Grande was upon territory belonging to this country. But those who thus declare, only show their own hardihood and Heaven-daring disposition; a disposition to make a falsehood a truth, by the sanguine manner in which it is reiterated and defended. We know not that the territory beyond the Neuces was at all claimed as our territory from the period of annexation up to the time of the army's being ordered to march from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande; and certain it is that a declaration was made upon the floor of Congress, that the Neuces was, and must forever be the boundary between this and the Mexican Republic. But a few, whose ambition is far more powerful than their love for either God or man, have planned and set the present war in motion in order to answer their own base and selfish ends, and now call upon others to fight it out for 'twenty five cents a day,' while they, brave patriots, keep aloof from the smell of gunpowder, and receive eight dollars per day for playing at blackguardism in the halls of the Capitol. They are sure not to go near the battle field, unless they can go as officers with fat pay and no prospect of being shot.

But enough. This war we consider to be a most unrighteous one, and no man by the laws of God, or the principles of justice, is bound to support his country in it. It is the duty of every man to endeavor to get his country out of the difficulty by lifting up his voice against the war, and using his influence to make the government do justice to an injured nation. This is our opinion, plainly spoken—no man is in duty bound to support his country in a wrong. And though Christians (!), and editors of religious newspapers, may labor hard to make it appear that it is the duty of the individual to do so, yet if such is either patriotism, justice, or Christianity, then indeed have we mistaken the nature of them.

But the war will go on. Two thousand human beings have already been made to bite the dust. Hundreds more shall be maimed and killed—widows and orphans made—a nation despoiled of the best of its territory, and to cap the climax, a pious recommendation will come from headquarters and a day be set apart for the nation to lift up its blood-red hands and thank God that it has been successful in the wholesale murder and robbery! S. J. G.

The above is the free expression of Br. Gibson's opinion on the subject of the war with Mexico; and he has the same right to express it that we have to express ours.—We do not feel called upon to express our own opinion at this time on the subject; any farther than this, that all wars are to be deprecated and avoided if possibly consistent with the safety and well being of the country. We believe most wars might be avoided; and we most devoutly pray that the present one may be terminated, and justice done to both countries. Ed.

HEAVEN AND HELL—WHICH IS PREFERABLE?

Attaching to Heaven and Hell the common idea of locality, it must be a question of difficult solution to many which of the two places they would prefer, under certain circumstances, even granting that the vulgar and yet popular views of them are correct. Taking into view the common opinion of 'no change after death,' and the prevalent doctrine of many pulpits, that many of the greatest and best men who ever lived—patriots, statesmen, historians, philosophers, moralists and benefactors of our race; Plato, Seneca, Socrates, Xenophon, Plutarch, Sallust, Warren, Green, De Kalb, La Fayette, Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, Adams, &c., &c., have all gone to hell because they had not experienced the new birth, according to Orthodox notions on that subject; and likewise the idea cherished by the same teachers, that many of the greatest villains that ever disgraced humanity, such as murderers, pirates, robbers and thieves, have gone to heaven, because they had repented and complied with certain conditions in the last moments of their mortal career—it will appear probable to many that the society in the former place must be quite as intelligent, as moral, as respectable and as desirable as that in the latter; and hence they might either find it difficult choosing between the two places with their respective societies, or else, perhaps, be quite as likely to choose hell as heaven. The author of the Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub, has exhibited this subject in a variety of most ludicrous aspects by the revelations from the infernal regions by the ghost of Shadrach Paddle, which those having a taste for such kind of revelations can peruse at their leisure.

But we did not commence this article so much with a view of calling attention to the ghostly revelations made to Elder Tub, as for the purpose of presenting the reader with some matter-of-fact conversations, occurrences and opinions of veritable men and women in this matter-of-fact world of ours, touching the subject in hand. A few months since the Trumpet published an anecdote of an old lady who was very sick.

'Her clergyman called to see her, and asked her where she expected to go to when she died. She said she expected to go to hell. The astonished clergyman gazed at her, and asked, if she desired to go to that place. She said 'Yes; for she had been told that all her friends and relations had gone there; and she desired to go where they were.'

Br. Drew of the Gospel Banner copied the above, and appended the following narration of a most interesting circumstance.

'This reminds us of a fact which we once witnessed at a funeral, and which made a strong impression on our mind at the time—an impression we shall never entirely lose. The deceased was a father—one of the most intelligent, upright and universally respected men of the town in which he lived and died. He was a Universalist. His wife was a Baptist, and at her request a clergyman of that denomination was called upon to attend the funeral and preach the sermon. Amongst the mourners, was one daughter, the beloved of her father, and whose afflictions on account of his death were almost insupportable. Elder B. in the course of his sermon took occasion to assail Universalism, and at one part of his remarks more than intimated that if a person lived and died a Universalist he must go to hell. Instantly a shrill voice of wailing was heard in the mourner's room, which rose above that of the preacher—it was the voice of a female—that of the afflicted daughter, exclaiming—'Do you, Elder B., mean to say that my father, being a Universalist, has gone to hell? Speak out, sir—say so!' The astonished preacher felt his embarrassment and could only reply, 'I say nothing to the dead, but I speak to the living; and if you would avoid perdition, I exhort you to beware of Universalism.' 'Your exhortations to me are vain,' exclaimed the daughter; 'I loved my father; and, urge me not to seek a place where he is not! No!—if my father is in hell, I wish to go there too! The last words were like a thunderbolt. They told the heart's affections, that would sacrifice every thing, for love. We have often thought of that scene since; and really we could never condemn the poor, afflicted girl for her protestation. It was the evidence of a filial love that God could but approve.

The above touching incident brings fresh to our recollection the following narrative, which we had some twenty two years since from the lips of the venerable and eloquent brother who now occupies the place and preaches to the society in Boston where the sainted Murray stood half a century ago and proclaimed the Gospel of a world's salvation.

I was once travelling, said Br. S. in the interior of New Hampshire, and at the close of a cold and stormy day, called at a public house to procure entertainment for the night. Here I was introduced to a Calvinistic clergyman with whom I was soon earnestly engaged in conversation upon religious subjects. As a matter of course, Calvinism and Universalism were the two principal and opposing doctrines discussed. As we progressed from one point to another, he at length advanced the idea that the endless damnation of the non-elect was as essential to the glory of God and the happiness of the saints as was the salvation of the elect.

S. And do you suppose the saints in heaven will have a full knowledge of the miseries of the damned, see all their sufferings, and hear all their groans?

Calvinist. Most certainly. And they will rejoice at the prospect, and shout 'glory to God' in higher strains at the prospect thus presented.

S. Well, sir, I do not know which I should choose—your heaven or your hell—there would be very little to choose between them. On the whole, though, come to reflect on it a moment, I should rather prefer your hell to your heaven.

C. Why, you surprise me Mr. S. You surely can not be serious in such a declaration.

S. I am entirely serious. I certainly should prefer your hell to your heaven. And moreover, I am perfectly satisfied that you would yourself do the same.

C. You talk like a crazy man. You certainly can not be in earnest.

S. I certainly am in earnest. And I think I can convince you that I am right in my estimate of the choice you would make. Now, sir, we are seated here in this comfortable mansion—we see the pleasant blaze and feel the genial warmth of this fire—everything within is comfortable, while we hear the raging of the tempest without, the howling of the wintry wind, the rattling of the hail, sleet and snow as it drives against the windows: and we appreciate our comfortable condition, mayhap, the more fully on that very account. But suppose now, while we are thus comfortably provided for within, we should hear the shriek of distress from without, of some one perishing in this bitter storm, or some one sinking beneath the ice in yonder lake—which would you prefer—to remain here by this comfortable fire, or to rush out into the storm to the rescue of a perishing fellow being?

C. Why, of course, I should prefer, under the circumstances, to rush forth into the storm to relieve a suffering fellow being.

S. You have decided just as I supposed you would, just as I knew you must, if you are a man and possessed of the common feelings of humanity: and in so deciding, you have decided that you yourself would prefer your hell to your heaven. And so, sir, with me. Were I in heaven, surrounded with all the glories of the upper world, in the midst of your expected paradise, that moment I should hear the shriek of my wife or my child in hell, I should leap the battlements of heaven and be out to their relief.

'And there was silence in' the Calvinist 'for half an hour.'

We do not pretend that, in every respect, we have given the exact words as father S. related the above narrative to us: but although it is now above twenty years since we heard it, we are confident that we have given the substance, the gist of it, as we had it. It goes to justify the propriety of the query at the head of this article, and shows that heaven itself, admitting Partialism and endless misery to be true, can be no place of happiness for man, till he is first divested of every particle of humanity—of every thing that makes him man—and sunk to a level with brutes, or rather below that—in short till he becomes a very demon of hatred and malice, and the very reverse of what every principle of the Gospel of Christ requires.

REMOVALS.—We learn by the Gospel Fountain that Br. John Moore of Troy has received and accepted an invitation to take the pastoral charge of the Third Universalist society in Lowell, Mass. This is an excellent choice for the Lowell society, and we heartily wish great prosperity to both pastor and people: but really we do not like the idea of Br. Moore's leaving this State so soon after his location here.

Br. T. L. Clark has removed from Yorkshire to Morganville, N. Y.

Br. S. C. Eaton from Strafford to Hartford, Vt.

Br. E. G. Brooks from Lowell, Mass., to Dover, N. H.

Br. G. R. Brown to Green Creek, Sandusky county, Ohio.

Br. I. George is about returning to the State of New York, and wishes all papers now sent to him at Perrysburg, Ohio, to be discontinued until further notice.

RECOGNITION OF A CHURCH.—The Church recently organized in connection with the South Universalist society in Canton street, Boston, we learn by the last Trumpet, was publicly recognized on Sunday the 19th ult.—Sermon on the occasion by Br. C. H. Fay.

DEDICATION.—The church recently purchased of the Methodists by the Universalist society in Cleveland, O., has been beautifully finished, and was to have been dedicated on the 1st inst.

One of our most faithful sentinels, the 'UNIVERSALIST WATCHMAN,' has just commenced its 18th volume. To say that Br. Ballou has made the Watchman one of our best denominational papers heretofore, would only be repeating an oft told and well known truth. The paying patronage it has received enabling Br. B. to pay off the old debt, is another good evidence of its value. We doubt not the Watchman will continue its active vigilance, and to 'fight the good fight' as well and bravely as ever. Victory to its arms. $1.50 per annum in advance.

The modern BRITISH PLUTARCH; or lives of men distinguished in the recent History of England for their talents, virtues or achievements, by W. C. Taylor, LL. D.

This book contains sketches of the lives of Burke, Byron, Canning, Earl of Chatham, Dr. Adam Clarke, Sir Humphrey Davy, Lord Eldon, Fox, our own Benjamin Franklin, Grattan, Warren Hastings, Sir John Moore, Lord Nelson, Wm. Pitt, Walter Scott, and many other distinguished men of Great Britain. It occupies 360 12mo pages, put up in neat muslin binding, and is an interesting book.

THE STATESMEN OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF ENGLAND, with a treatise on the popular progress in English history. By John Forster—to be completed in five numbers, at 25 cents per No. Two numbers have already appeared, containing the above named treatise and the lives of Sir John Elliott, the Earl of Strafford, and John Pym, with well executed portraits of the first and last named persons.—The work is got up in octavo form, on good paper and handsome type, double column pages, and will make a large, valuable and cheap book.

Nos. 97-98 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE contains nearly the whole of the tragedy of King Richard III, with the usual quantity of engravings. 25 cents.

No. 17 of the illustrated WANDERING JEW is also issued. 25 cents. All of the above books at Beesley's.

THE UNIVERSALIST COMPANION AND REGISTER FOR 1847.

BR. PRICE.—Please state that this small annual will be printed in Philadelphia; consequently orders should be sent to me in Reading, that I may attend to them in season—unless such orders are expressly provided for in contract with some of the principal booksellers. For instance—Br. Walker, of Utica, wishes to know positively, how many he shall order from me, before he orders them; for as he must pay me in cash, he will not order any except what are to be paid for, to him, in cash also: and so of other sections.

Please also to state that the work will be increased from 60 to 72 pages, of the same size as last year, and that a calendar will be given for every state in the Union—all the addition I can possibly make; for the sales have not increased to warrant my printing a larger edition than last year, and consequently I shall make but scanty wages at editing and publishing it the present year. But the statistics are increasing, and I therefore need more room. May I not hope, then, that at least the entire edition of this year will be sold, and that I may receive encouragement to continue the increased size next year also? To do it I should have orders for several thousand copies more. I print only 12,000 this year, and fear that all these will not be sold. Send in orders!

Please state further, that I will have a supply at Troy during the Convention, where packages can be delivered, if so ordered, (and ordered in due season,) and the payments ready. I shall not, probably, be present in person, but by agent, and therefore cash will be the best arrangement.

Fraternally yours,

A. B. GROSH.

DEATHS.

In Sennett, on the 14th of June last, Mrs. RACHEL HOWE, wife of Mr. Bowers Howe, aged 73 years, 10 months, and 18 days. Mrs. Howe lived a long and exemplary life, discharging in a faithful manner, all her duties as a wife, a mother, a neighbor, and a Christian. For many years she had been a sincere and zealous believer in the Gospel of the world's salvation through Jesus Christ. She not only professed to believe this doctrine, but she adorned it by a life characterized by all the Christian graces, and thus commended it to the favorable regards of those who were strangers to its benign influences. And the sentiments she so greatly loved in life, imparted to her the sweetest consolations and the brightest hopes in the hour of dissolution, that can prepare a soul to leave the world in peace. She was not only willing to die, but longed anxiously for the hour to arrive when her spirit could wing its flight to the land of rest. The writer attended her funeral, and addressed a large collection of sympathizing neighbors and friends, from John xiv: 1. J. M. A.

In Phoenix, Oswego co., July 11th, STEPHEN BROOKS, in the 63d year of his age. The disease with which the deceased was afflicted during the several last years of his life, and which at length terminated his earthly existence, was consumption. While he wasted away under its slow but steady progress, his belief in the impartial and changeless love of God, and his faith in a world's salvation, grew stronger and stronger. He possessed a strong mind and a clear understanding; and his mental vision remained unclouded while his lamp of life continued to burn. A few hours previous to his departure from earth, I enjoyed the privilege of standing by his bed side and listening to his dying whisper as he said—I am happy—farewell. To his companion a few minutes before he expired he said—continue to cherish the hope you now possess, a hope of future immortal blessedness as the gift of God to all mankind, a hope which enables me to rejoice in these my last moments.

'Holy and heavenly is the soul,

Where dwells a hope so bright as this;

We wish and long to reach the goal,

And seize the prize of endless bliss.'

The funeral of the deceased was attended on the 13th, and a discourse delivered by the writer. L. M. HAWES.

FLOWERS.

BY LAURA EGGLESTON.

The bright tribes of Flora their beauties unfold,
With snowy corollas and purple and gold.
Sweet emblems of beauty, of purity, love;
Embellished by Heaven's nice pencil above!

Perchance, on them angels their alphabet trace,
As beings poetic with language them grace.
They speak in their fragrance in bright eyes of love;
But pure are their glances, as seraphs' above.

In emerald landscapes they sparkle and glow,
And are the bright jewels that band nature's brow.
I love to behold them, in wild wood and dell,
And drink in their beauties, their mystical spell.

But the flowers are fading, they wither in bloom;
So the fair and the lovely go down to the tomb.
Then cherish sweet virtue's bright buds and soft flow'rs,
To deck the pure spirit for amaranth bowers.

There joyous we'll wander, in the blest spirit-land,
And the sweet wreaths of Sharon, adorn the pure band.
Till each bud shall blossom and each soul shall expand
To light, love and glory in the Paradise land.

CHRISTIANS MUST LABOR.

BY REV. J. B. SAX.

'For we are laborers together with God.' St. Paul.

Nothing valuable can be obtained by man without labor. No great work can be accomplished without persevering and laborious industry on the part of those who have it in charge.

Long days and years of toil reared the pyramids, and excavated the catacombs. Work, and that alone, has converted America from a howling wilderness, where only savages pursued the chase or the war path,—to heavy-laden harvest fields, where civilization smiles, and plenty crowns each succeeding year. Labor built our cities; constructed our ships; reared our national defences; dug our canals and made our rail-roads; in fine, every thing in which civilized man boasts is the result of labor; and without it we can have nothing.

The same is true of the religious world. Just in the same manner as our nation has been formed by laborious industry out of a chaotic wilderness, must the kingdom of heaven be constructed by the labor of Christians out of the elements of a great moral waste. And as the pyramids were reared by unceasing toil, so must the beautiful structure of Christianity be carried up by the labors of its builders, until the cap-stone is placed upon it amid shoutings of 'grace, grace unto it.' As labor has covered our country's plains with glittering cities,—so must the heavenly Jerusalem be builded upon all the earth.

It is necessary that Christians should be active and laborious, in order that they may preserve from destruction that pearl of great price which has been entrusted to their keeping. The ship of faith which is to carry us smoothly over the tempestuous ocean of life, like the ship of state, would be wrecked amid the storms of human passion, unless those who had it in charge were constantly at their posts, and vigilantly active in their duty. The banner of the cross must be borne aloft by sinewy arms, sustained by lion hearts, or it will be cast to the earth and trodden under impious feet in the very heat of battle,—leaving the soldiers of Emmanuel without a rallying point, or an emblem on which to gaze. The car of salvation must be rolled forward to the ends of the earth by vigorous effort, or it will sink to rise no more in the slough of skepticism. This necessity for work was distinctly perceived by the early Christians, and hence they were more distinguished for their activity and zeal than for any other quality. They were laborers in the true sense of the word. Dear friends, let us covet their character, and lawfully obtain it by following their example.

We are laborers, and must not neglect our appointed work. We are God's husbandmen, and must not omit to plant, and water, and watch over the seeds of truth, until in our Father's own appointed time they shall spring up, flourish, blossom, and bear fruit—righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost—an hundred fold. We must strive by all the means in our power to root up the noxious weeds of error and sin, which the enemy has sowed in the Lord's garden, before they choke the spiritual plants which ought to bloom there in perennial beauty.

We are God's builders laboring on the temple of Christianity; we are doing a great work, and must not come down from the walls lest the work cease, and original chaos again envelope the moral world. We must labor upon this great temple according to the rules laid down in the Gospel, having for a foundation the rock of ages, and for materials wherewith to build, unpolished men whom the spirit of God shall mould into the likeness of Christ,—until we see the glorious structure in all its beautiful proportions gradually rising above the clouds of strife and tempestuous confusion, and its spire piercing the heavens, when it will form a sanctuary where all nations and tongues shall meet to worship the God of their fathers in spirit and in truth.

We are the soldiers of the cross, and must valantly wield the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God, or error will triumph and truth come to nought. Great mountains of error have been accumulating for ages upon the precious jewels of Gospel truth, which must be removed by infinite labor, before the precious gems can be obtained by those to whom they belong, and set in the Christian's crown of rejoicing. Great walls of prejudice, as huge as high Olympus, have been reared around spiritual Zion, the city of God, the New Jerusalem which came down from heaven,—keeping the people away from the feast of fat things therein prepared, while they are hungering for the bread of life, and thirsting even to death for the sweet waters of salvation, which are for the healing of the nations. These huge walls must be battered down by moral artillery—this citadel of sin laid level with the ground—so that mankind can walk over the ruins as they come up to the spiritual feast in the new temple of God. This can not be done without effort.

The pestilential mildew of sin has obscured the glorious effulgence of the Christian character;—this must be wiped away, so that the heavenly light may go forth into the darkness, and light up a benighted world with the sun-light of truth and holiness. 'The fields are already white unto the harvest.' 'The harvest is indeed plenteous, but the laborers are few.' There are few to declare the lovely character of Adoni Jehovah, and defend it from the dark aspersions which have been cast upon it. Few to declare the real and eternal brotherhood of man. Few to affirm that God will really recompense every man according to his work.—Few to declare the great salvation to a dying world. So much the more reason then why that few should be faithful to their task, and labor unremittingly to evangelize the world.

Again; the encouragement to work is as great as it was in the apostle's day. 'We are laborers together with God.' God is our helper. He will bless our efforts, if they are faithful. He will shed the heavenly dews of grace upon the tender plants which we shall cultivate, and give sunshine and rain in due season. We can not fail. Omnipotence is our helper. Let us then take courage.—Let us go out into the moral vineyard, labor in the sunshine and bless the shade.

Again; although we are laborers and must toil in the Gospel field, yet if our hearts are in the work, as they must be, the employment will not be painful as many foolishly pretend, but very pleasant and agreeable. If we are in mental and spiritual health,—not sick in head nor heart,—our Christian labors will be the very spring from which our sublimest pleasures flow. They will be themselves as a crown of rejoicing, and as songs of praise.—But if we are mentally or morally diseased, our religious efforts, if we make any, will be painful, like the moving of a gouty limb, or labor performed by an invalid.

The followers of Emmanuel have a great task assigned to them; no less than the purification of the moral atmosphere, and the spiritual renovation and regeneration of the very heart of the religious. Universalists stand foremost in the ranks of those laborers together with God, who are to accomplish this herculean task. That system of theology, drawn from the Bible, called Universalism, is the great spiritual weapon with which the mighty battle is to be fought. Other systems of doctrine have been tried for ages without success, while people have waxed worse, deceiving and being deceived. The world's last hope is in the doctrine of impartial love, and grace, and salvation. If that fails, humanity may weep her own moral requiem; for there can be no spiritual resurrection until the last trumpet sounds. But it cannot fail, if we are faithful in our labors. Shall we not then be faithful? Shall we sacrifice the time-lasting good of humanity, to indolence and inaction? Tell it not in Gath! Forbid it fellow Christians! Forbid it justice! Forbid it merciful heaven! 'We are laborers together with God;' let us work for his cause.

ANOTHER VICTIM TO CRUEL DOCTRINES.

The following article is copied from a late number of the Union and Messenger. It is but one of the many melancholy instances of a similar nature which are constantly occurring around us.

We are under the painful necessity of recording another instance of the cruel effects of the doctrine of endless punishment. It is the case of Mr. Shepard Rollock of Elizabethtown, N. J., who put an end to his mournful life, June 11. He was ever considered an amiable and Christian man, a worthy member of the 1st Presbyterian Church in E., though as a writer who knew him well remarks, 'he was often clouded with despair,' and suffered for months under lamentable depression of spirits and alienation.' He fancied himself, we have been told, unfit to either live or die, and forsaken by both God and man.

Is such the effects of the religion of Christ? Did his preaching, or the preaching of his Apostles ever produce insanity or suicide? No! No! 'He came to bind up the broken hearted;' to assure man of a Father's deep unchanging love. But man has invented a religion which has produced hundreds of suicides; and of that religion we can truly say, as said Saurin, one of its preachers—'I cease to wonder that the fear of hell, (meaning endless punishment) has made some men melancholy, and others mad.' No, we do not wonder that the preaching of such doctrines produce such effects. At this moment, can we call up before our minds, numerous cases of insanity and suicide, caused by the preaching of endless punishment. I would not bear the responsibility of preaching such doctrines for worlds.

THE MIRACLES OF CHRIST.

BY REV. N. C. HODGSON.

'He hath done all things well; he maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.' St. Mark vii: 37.

The life and character of Jesus will never become uninteresting. Every benevolent heart, and every mind in the least degree accustomed to reflection and study, can not read the history of his life, and learn the nature and design of his miracles, without being convinced that he is not only the Sent of God, but that the time will come when universal purity and holiness shall cover the whole earth, as the waters cover the sea; yea, when it can be said in truth and reality, 'HE HATH DONE ALL THINGS WELL.'

Now the purity of Christ's life shows what man can be, when he is properly governed; and what he will be when he shall be like him, and behold him as he is, seated at God's right hand.

The doctrines of Christ are to become universal, when men every where shall be governed and influenced by the spirit of their author.

We learn that the people who heard his sublime sentiments were not only astonished, but they marvelled—they were filled with amazement and wonder: because they were not only new, but entirely different from what they expected from the lips of the despised Nazarene. Now we have known people to attend our meetings, and the sentiments from the speaker's lips being so different from what they expected, and from what they had been taught we preached, that when they come to hear for themselves, they were astonished—filled with amazement and wonder. 'If this is Universalism,' they exclaim, 'I will listen to it now and forever.' Thus was it in the days of Christ; the people, when they came to hear for themselves, and see his works, were astonished. 'The common people heard him gladly.' Why? Because he came laden rich with truth, and truth being suitable for the common mind, those people could not but eagerly rush to hear the words of life, or see the Son of God, 'who hath done all things well.' If we read the record of his miracles, and learn the object he had in performing them, and behold the happy effects which each and every one of them had on the object of his love and compassion, we shall, like them, be filled with wonder and amazement. I ask for no stronger evidence of the truth of universal happiness, than what I can deduce from the noble and mighty acts and wonders of 'the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.'

Go, learn what he would have you believe, when he fed the multitude, and satisfied the wants of nature with a few small fishes and a few loaves of bread. We see not only his power manifested, but his benevolence and willingness to feed the hungry. The conclusion is, he is able and willing to feed and fill us all with the bread of life—the true and living bread from heaven.

When he healed the sick, he would have them believe that he was the great moral Physician of the world, and that he was able to master the disease. Or, in other words, 'destroy the works of the devil,' which is sin—to destroy him also 'that has the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death, were all their life time subject to bondage.'

When he cured the lame—restored sight to the blind, and gave hearing to the deaf, he would have them believe that he was the true Messiah, of whom the prophet spoke, when he said, 'He will come and save you. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing, for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert.'

When he raised the dead to life; or gave life and activity to the body, he would have them believe that there is a power that can speak life and activity into the cold and lifeless frame. In a word, that man shall live again—that he was the resurrection and life of the world. Yes, we are to live beyond the confines of this mortal life, where we shall be beyond the power of temptation and sin, and all the evils of this transitory existence.

This is what Jesus would have his followers believe—it is what he would have us and the world believe. He came to bear witness unto the truth. And he at all times spake forth the words of truth and soberness. But he says, 'If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true.' Now it is evident that the purity of his life would have been a witness of himself, because he only lived as he taught others to live. His words, or sentiments, would have been a witness of himself, though no man hath spoken like him. Hence, there was but one alternative, and that was, he must resort to works, in order to prove that he was the true Messiah.—'If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not,' was his language to the unbelieving Jews.—Will the reader turn to x: 30-38 of St. John's Gospel, and read?

Even Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews, went to Jesus by night, and said unto him, 'Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God.'—Why? Was it because of the purity of his life? Was it because of the sublimity of his sentiments? No—for none of these things. What then? 'For no man' (that is, no human power) 'can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him.' St. John iii: 2.

Thus we learn that Jesus must give the very best of evidence that he was the Son of God. And this he did give. It was convincing to many of the Jews. They could but exclaim, 'He hath done all things well.'

The miracles which Jesus did were open to investigation. They were not performed behind the curtain—at midnight—or in any obscure place. But at noon-day—before a mixed multitude, enemies, and where, if they had not been real, the imposture could have been detected.

Now, if I deny the miracles of Christ, then I must deny the record. And if I deny the record, then I must deny that such a person as Jesus Christ ever lived. Now if I do this, then I am skeptical—yea, I am an infidel. Because if I deny that there can be any thing miraculous, then I must deny there is a Being, whom Christians call God, who possesses almighty power, and can impart power unto others. Or if I merely deny the miracles of Jesus, then I must deny that 'he hath done all things well.' But if I believe that there was such a man as Christ Jesus, who was crucified about 1800 years ago, and that the New Testament contains an account of him, then I must believe the whole history to be true, or else I have no evidence but what the whole is a tissue of lies. The same evidence that I have to convince me of the birth of Jesus, convinces me of all that is written about him in the New Testament.

How vain the attempt to prove that the birth of Christ is a fact, that he lived and died as other men; but that the story that he arose from the dead is a falsehood! How does any one know that the former is a fact? What reason has any one to deny the latter? But I must leave this part of my subject. I could not well withhold the few observations, just thrown out. They are applicable to the times and seasons in which we live. Then,

'Come, let us join in sacred songs,
With sweetest music on our tongues;
Let every voice conspire to tell,
Our Saviour hath done all things well.'

The words at the head of this article, were spoken in reference to one of the miracles of Christ. Rev. Mr. Paige in his comment, says, in reference to 'He hath done all things well'—'That is, his cures are perfect, or he hath in all things manifested a kind, a gracious spirit; his works are good.' Yes, Jesus went about doing good, having God with him. That is, his good spirit was with him, to govern and direct his thoughts and feelings. He is with every one of us, if we will but open our hearts and let the king of glory come in and sup with us.

They brought unto Jesus 'one that was deaf, and he had an impediment in his speech; and they besought him to put his hand upon him.' Now the multitude knew that he was deaf and dumb. 'But Jesus took him aside from the multitude, and put his fingers into his ears, and he spit and touched his tongue, &c. And straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spoke plain.' The people were then astonished beyond measure. That is, this was a great work, and they wondered greatly. Why? 'He maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.'—Surely, he hath done all things well. Now, I have every reason to believe this account to be a fact, or else I must deny that he is the Son of God, and that the Almighty is able to impart wisdom and power to any creature!

Now we all have wisdom and power. From what source were they derived? From God, the Giver of every good and perfect gift. Well, then, if he has imparted these unto us in a measure, what reasons have we to doubt, but what he has imparted unto his own dear Son, 'without measure'?

If Jesus has power to work miracles, and has all power in earth and heaven, then he will do all things well:

'He'll finish sin, and man restore.'

He will continue to rule and reign, till the great and grand object of his mission is fulfilled. That is, till he has sought after and saved that which was lost. When his work is finished in reality, as it was in prospect, when expiring upon the cross, then he will be enabled to say as he then did—'It is FINISHED.'

We have the happy assurance that Jesus tasted death for every man. That he gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time. Now when his work is actually finished, inasmuch as he hath done all things well in the means to fulfil the Creator's designs and purposes; then will the time come, when the redeemed shall walk the streets of the New Jerusalem.—And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.'

'God's own soft hand shall wipe the tears
From every weeping eye;
And pains; and groans, and griefs, and fears,
And death itself shall die.'

Now we all long for, and ardently desire that this time may come. And when this happy period arrives, then

'—All that Heaven decreed,
And all the ancient prophets said,
Will be fulfilled, as was designed.
In Christ, the Saviour of mankind.'

It is this truth that fills the heart with joy and gladness, and lifts the soul far above the ills of life.

The blessed Jesus will not leave one stone unturned, for he will see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied—satisfied with the labors of his love—and the salvation of souls. Then,

'——! let the joyful sound
Be heard through all the nations round:
'Tis finished! let the echo fly
Thro' heaven, and earth, and sea, and sky.

For the time has come at last, when 'every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, shall be heard saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever.' This is the time when the Son delivers up the kingdom to God the Father, having finished his reign, so God may be all in all.

All creatures being gathered unto Christ, sin being destroyed, and man redeemed, the anthems of praise and thanksgiving will fill the courts of heaven, and we shall forever rejoice in the presence of the Lord. Let all the people say, Amen! for Jesus hath done all things well.

TO WHOM SHALL WE GO?—JOHN VI: 68.

This is indeed a most important question, for all the quiet and satisfaction of life depend upon the practical answer we shall render to it. Whose doctrines shall we embrace? Whose precepts shall we obey? Or, to what doctrines and precepts shall we resort for consolation in seasons of affliction, and trouble and death, when all things sublunary fail to impart consolation? Shall we go to infidelity technically so styled—for strictly speaking, less or more of infidelity attaches to every denial of the Word, and even the oath of God, 'That unto [Him] every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely, shall say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength.' But shall we go for doctrinal and preceptive direction, or for support in time of need, to infidelity, as it is commonly understood to include atheism, deism, and other phases of unbelief, which set themselves in array against the Divine Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures?—We should not go to atheism, for, recognizing no God as the Creator of the universe, the beauties and glories of which could never have originated fortuitously, it can present no doctrines or precepts worthy of the slightest attention! The generous, warm heart, which would look up in gratitude and blessing to the great and good Being from whom have proceeded all the beauties and bounties alike of nature and of grace, can never be satisfied with a nullity! That generous breast can never reconcile it to its truthful and just dictates, to worship any other object than the One, Only True God, by whose munificence we all 'live, move, and have our being.'

Shall we have recourse to deism, that other absurd dogma, which, more inconsistent still, (if that be possible) denies the authenticity and inspiration of the word of God, professing, though it does, notwithstanding, to ascribe to God the authorship of the works of nature! Shall we go to so preposterous a system of death and doubt, so full of empty declamation respecting the great God, who created all the beauties and sublimities of nature, and yet, so strangely inconsistent in questioning that true Revelation in the Holy Scriptures, of the works and ways of God, so perfectly in harmony, as it is, with all the manifestations of nature? The deist looks abroad upon nature, and owns in its works, the Divine hand, and yet, (mortifying to the reason of man!) rejects a Revelation of such Divinity, in full harmony with all the admired and adored phenomena of the universe!

Shall we resort to any professedly Christian teaching, which inculcates a partial salvation; and, of course, a partial God and Saviour. Shall we go to the dogma of 'destruction'? What stupendous self-sufficiency and arrogance, to suppose that one immortal destiny—one resurrection to immortality and incorruption, is to be effected or affected by any acts of faith and obedience, of which, in this life, our finite powers are capable! Could we raise ourselves from the dead—(a conclusion thrust against the dogma in question, which I once heard from a former pastor of the Universalist church in Richmond)—Could we raise ourselves from the dead, there might be some pretext for such 'speculations' in reference to the immortal destiny of man!—Could we by 'works of righteousness' of our own, purchase a resurrection to immortality and incorruption, it might be proper to affirm the dependence of human destiny upon human conduct in this world. But, then, we should be plainly contradicting Paul's testimony in Eph. ii: 9, in relation to salvation by GRACE through faith; the GIFT OF GOD; NOT of works, lest any man should boast.—If our own agency have aught to do in the procuration of our salvation in the immortal world, then, that salvation is NOT a FREE GIFT—it is [not] the gift of God; [but is] of works, and boasting is NOT excluded!!

But even such a dogma as 'destruction' is almost good news in comparison of that blasphemous 'abomination of desolation,' which in violence to all Christian sentiment—all Christian feeling—to the Scriptures and to reason, vainly asserts the endless anguish of a portion of the offspring of the Lord of all! (See Acts xvii: 28.) Exhibiting as does this profane fable of Paganism, no compassion, no sympathies, nothing of the Christian spirit, nothing that bears even the remotest resemblance to the Gospel of the grace of God, it surely, can not be resorted to for doctrine, or for instruction in righteousness.

Both the Bible and Reason would direct us, as to true riches, to the Heavenly Teachers of Universal Grace and Salvation. The Gospel of Universal Divine Love gives light and life to the 'ignorant and dying, and ministers peace and joy to the troubled soul, while every opposite of that everlasting Gospel creates and augments anguish and the bitterness of death itself. How transporting must be the welcome sound of the Gospel to that forlorn soul, and ready to succumb under the ponderous burden of desolating and distracting partial creeds, who, by the sweetly inviting voice of Jesus, as mildly sounds in His Gospel, is invited away from all gloomy forebodings, and tormenting fears, to the peace and rest appertaining to true and hearty Christian faith! Hail! lovely Spirit of Truth, breathing the soft accents of compassion, how blessed art thou to every faithful heart! The sublime truth of Universalism is the inculcation of the Word, inspired by the Holy Spirit of God, to whom be glory forever and ever.

MR. KELSO.

We publish the following letter that our friends hereafter may be upon their guard against receiving the man referred to as a preacher.

BR. GURLEY:—Before I close this letter I will say a word to you of Mr. Kelso, who is now in our city lecturing against, and pretends to have recently renounced Universalism. What this Rev. Mr. Kelso was before he came here, I am not well informed—I only know that he came here last fall and introduced himself as a Universalist preacher—he was of course invited to preach, and he did so, when we found directly that he was not of the material or capabilities to suit the Universalists of this place, and we advised him in a very friendly manner to seek a place where his talents would be more likely to be appreciated. But he was out of money—we furnished him with that—and as he was desirous of going to Iowa City, we were induced to give him a letter of introduction there. He however remained about here some two weeks after this, stopping principally at my house, in which time we very soon learned that he knew but very little of Universalism or its doctrines, and he himself acknowledged that he never had read a Universalist work—he however stated he had never believed in the doctrine of endless misery or preached it, although he had preached as a Methodist five years.

His favorite topic in conversation, while he stopped at our house, (until it became odious) was continually of Methodism, always ridiculing it, and representing it and its ministers as licentious in the extreme, yet he at the same time represented himself as having been a perfect hero among them in the way of making converts.

He finally left however, and went to Iowa City and spent the winter, sending us word occasionally of the wonders he was performing there in the way of making converts to Universalism. This spring he sent us word that he was coming down here to preach for us; in answer to which we sent back to him not to come down—that he could do us no good—and that he had better remain where he was. He came however about two weeks since—called upon us and stopped at our house nearly all day on Friday before he renounced on Sunday, when he at least pretended to be as good a Universalist as ever. The Universalists here, however, did not invite him to preach, which I have no doubt really is the whole secret and cause of his dissatisfaction to Universalism. He left us on Friday evening as he said to take the first boat to return to Indiana, and we supposed he had gone, until Sunday, when it was announced at all the churches in the city, that the Rev. Mr. Kelso, formerly a Universalist preacher, would that evening lecture against infidelity at the Methodist church. This was his renunciation sermon. I did not hear him, but I learn from those that did, that he pronounced Universalism the worst kind of infidelity, and that the doctrine was pre-eminent over all others in leading to licentiousness—he then eulogised Methodism, and concluded by rejoicing that he had got back into the old track.—He stated that he had preached Methodism five years and Universalism three years, but that while he was preaching Universalism he was laboring under a nervous delusion, &c.

He has lectured two or three times only, and though he still remains in town, I hear nothing from him lately. I suspect his new Methodist brethren are getting pretty sick of him, for his lectures I learn are stale affairs—and if they do not soon get sick of him, I must confess they have a bountiful supply of patience, for he is really the most perfect hanger-on I ever met with—at any rate the Universalists here seem rejoiced to get rid of him so easily, even on those terms; for we have become fully satisfied that he never could do us any good, unless it be by lecturing against us.

He was asked after his lecture if what he had stated last fall about Methodism was still true—he could return no answer—and he has since told a Universalist, that he was very unhappy, and that if he could take back what he had said against Universalism, he would give any thing in the world at his command. But we want no such Universalist preachers. As ever yours,

N. C. NEALLY.

Mr. Kelso professed to renounce Methodism and embrace Universalism, in Louisville, Ky., several years ago. He subsequently came to this city, where he received many kindnesses from our friends; but at the expiration of a few weeks preached for the Methodists here, and renounced back again. Soon after he left for Indiana; and the next thing we heard, he was preaching Universalism again. He met with poor success and we understood that he had ceased speaking altogether. I was surprised however to hear, as I did two weeks ago, that he was preaching in Iowa City. It seems that his stock of sermons was soon exhausted, and he was induced to leave for a new place. If report speaks true, he has renounced Universalism and Methodism by turns six or eight times within the last six years.

He is an unfortunate man—rather frail in body, nervous and without ballast of mind. He has not intellect enough to make an acceptable Universalist preacher, and he is most decidedly lazy. I gave him his board many weeks, and furnished him with books, but could never induce him to study. He can preach a few stirring sermons, and cause the people to believe for a time that he is quite a man. From this circumstance the Universalists here, (myself among the number,) were deceived in him.

We wish him no harm, but hope he will find no more encouragement among us as a preacher.—

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOLS

Held their sixth annual celebration Saturday, 25th. They with many friends repaired to a beautiful grove near Potsdam Village, and enjoyed another Pic Nic party. The exercises as usual consisted of prayer, singing, speaking, &c. The occasion was one of interest and great joy—all present (and the party it was estimated numbered nearly 500 souls,) seemed to enter into the spirit of it.—The table which was one hundred or more feet in length, was bountifully supplied with the good things of life, and really it was a splendid sight, after all the religious exercises were closed, to see teachers and children move in such fine processionary order to the banquet prepared for them. It was well done—an aged brother remarked that this act alone richly compensated him for his journey of several miles to attend the celebration. The company after the feast, and after a few exploring expeditions through the grove was called together, when all joined in singing 'Home sweet home,' and then dispersed, feeling grateful to kind Providence for the favors and blessings enjoyed.

CHRIST SATISFIED.

It is a peculiarity of Universalists, that they believe Christ will be satisfied with the final result of his mission. And for this peculiarity, they have the authority of God's word, revealed in Isa. lii: 11. 'He (Christ) shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied. By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify [the] many, for he shall bear their iniquities.' Now, what will satisfy Christ? His soul was in travail for the redemption of all. The 'many' whose 'iniquities he bore,' were all mankind. 'He died for all.' 'He bore the sins of the whole world in his own body on the tree.'—The word 'many,' in the original signifies, 'the whole multitude or bulk of mankind.' So says Parkhurst in his Lexicon. We have an example of the same word in Paul to the Rom. v: 19. 'For as by the offence of one (Adam) many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one (Christ) shall [the same] many be made righteous.' 'Many' means all here, for 'all have sinned' in the first Adam; and just as many shall be made righteous in Christ as were made sinners in the first Adam. One shall be as universal as the other.

Christ, then, came to make all righteous. To this end he died for all, 'the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God.' To bring all to God and make them righteous in heaven, was the great object of his mission. For this his benevolent soul was in travail. Shall he not be satisfied in the accomplishment of this? He shall; for the word of God declares, 'He shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied'—fully satisfied. To be satisfied signifies, not that he shall be reconciled to a result that is disagreeable to his desires; but that all his original desires be accomplished. We say this, because some, perhaps, may say, though Christ do not see all men saved, yet he may be reconciled to behold many of those he died for unrighteous and miserable forever in hell. The word 'reconciled' is not the word; it is satisfied. You may be reconciled to a failure of your plans, but will not be satisfied unless those plans are accomplished—that is, if they are good plans. Now, Christ shall be satisfied. His plan was to save the world, and nothing short of the salvation of the world will satisfy him.

Do you suppose, reader, that the righteous soul of Christ would be satisfied, if he should see his great plan of salvation defeated, and should behold millions of the souls he died for, blaspheming the name of God forever, and suffering in hell to all eternity? Nay—nay—nothing could be farther from satisfying him than this. This is not what his soul was in travail for;—therefore such a result could never satisfy him.

We rejoice with an exceeding great joy, in the belief that our divine Redeemer 'shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied.' All good Christians have the same desires that moved his soul. They all desire and pray for the conversion and salvation of the world. It seems to us that they need our faith to satisfy them. Let them try it and test its glorious power. Let them 'believe and enter into rest.'—[Gospel Banner.]

OLD-FASHIONED PREACHING.

The old way of preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ is becoming so unpopular and so offensive to delicate ears, that those of us who have endeavored to 'preach Christ and him crucified' in such a manner as to convince the unlearned, may as well turn our attention to some other profession. We can't keep along with the times, and we may as well give it up, for we are too old to learn 'another Gospel.' It is more than we can do to understand what the Reformers (?) would be driving at, so very deep have been their researches, and so very refined is their language. Understand? Bless us, should 'we have the presumption!'

If it would not be disrespectful, we would inquire if the modern style of preaching is as well calculated to make understanding Universalists, as was the plain and apostolic manner which characterized the pulpit labors of Ballou and his contemporaries? Would 'strangers from the covenant of promise' as easily understand the sentiments of our denomination from the discourses of this very refined class, as from those of our fathers in Israel, whose eloquence was borrowed from Jesus and his apostles? If we dared to express an opinion on this subject, we should say that though they might be pleased and even delighted with the language and gesticulation of the speaker, they would in most cases leave the sanctuary uninstructed in the things 'pertaining to the kingdom of God.'

Of all subjects we believe the Gospel should be proclaimed in its simplicity, as well as in its fullness and purity, so that all classes may be benefited. It concerns all. It is 'good tidings' for all people. This glorious truth was proclaimed by angels in language suited to the capacities of the shepherds, and was by them considered of sufficient interest and importance without the aid of rhetorical figures to recommend it to the favorable attention of the meek and lowly. The Gospel, when unadorned, is adorned the most. If our ministering brethren are anxious to make a display of their literary acquirements, would it not be well to select a subject other than the Gospel of Jesus, and then, if they choose, they may

'Strut their hour upon the stage,' and receive their reward—the praise of men.—

BRIEF EXPOSITION OF SCRIPTURE.

BY REV. D. FORBES.

'But Jesus said unto him, Follow me; and let the dead bury their dead.'—Matt. viii: 22.

'It is generally agreed that the word dead is here used in two senses.* It denotes those who were destitute of spiritual life, or who were dead in sin. It also denotes those who are physically dead, or whose bodies had ceased to live. The meaning is, let those who are spiritually dead, bury the physically dead; other members of the family who have no faith in me and no relish for eternal life, will pay the last offices of humanity to your father; follow thou me, therefore, and become capable of rendering more important service to mankind.—'Let the dead bury their dead,—dead while they live,—dead and is alive again,—dead in trespasses and sins,—are all similar modes of speaking.'—Gilpin.

'The man makes his filial duty a plea for temporising, and cloaks his hesitation under that sacred garb, Jesus strips off the disguise, and forcibly rebukes his state of indecision and procrastination. There are enough to bury the dead and perform the ordinary offices of life, who are indifferent to the soul and eternity. Let them know their work. But thou, who hast a taste and aspiration for something better, go and preach the kingdom of God.†

It hardly need be said that our Saviour was not unmindful of the claims of filial duty. His own life is a beautiful proof of it.* But he would teach, that, in certain situations, it is our duty to forsake the nearest relatives for the cause of the Gospel; and that the love of God should be stronger than the ties of kindred or affection, and the call of duty before all other calls.†

The idea intended to be conveyed by the language of the text under consideration is elsewhere expressed in this language:—'He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me.†' 'Ye can not serve God and Mammon.‡'

The simple meaning of all this is, that we are required to have a higher regard for God and the demands of duty than we have for any person or thing beside. We are allowed, and it is right for us to become attached to other persons and things; but this attachment must be subordinate to our love to God and duty. Every thing must bend, and if need be, must be sacrificed to this. Our obligations to God and duty are above all other obligations; and if we do not so regard them and so act, we are not suitable persons for the kingdom of heaven; or, in other words, we are not true Christians.—[Miscellany.]

THE UNIVERSALIST COMPANION AND REGISTER FOR 1847.

BR. PRICE.—Please state that this small annual will be printed in Philadelphia; consequently orders should be sent to me in Reading, that I may attend to them in season—unless such orders are expressly provided for in contract with some of the principal booksellers. For instance—Br. Walker, of Utica, wishes to know positively, how many he shall order from me, before he orders them; for as he must pay me in cash, he will not order any except what are to be paid for, to him, in cash also: and so of other sections.

Please also to state that the work will be increased from 60 to 72 pages, of the same size as last year, and that a calendar will be given for every state in the Union—all the addition I can possibly make; for the sales have not increased to warrant my printing a larger edition than last year, and consequently I shall make but scanty wages at editing and publishing it the present year. But the statistics are increasing, and I therefore need more room. May I not hope, then, that at least the entire edition of this year will be sold, and that I may receive encouragement to continue the increased size next year also! To do it I should have orders for several thousand copies more. I print only 12,000 this year, and fear that all these will not be sold. Send in orders!!

Please state further, that I will have a supply at Troy during the Convention, where packages can be delivered, if so ordered, (and ordered in due season,) and the payments ready. I shall not, probably, be present in person, but by agent, and therefore cash will be the best arrangement.

Fraternally yours,
[Christian Messenger.]

Br. SKINNER—The following effusion from the pen of the well known N. P. Willis is of so important and instructive a character in its tendency that I can not resist expressing the desire I have of seeing it in the Magazine and Advocate. It ought to be perused and solemnly pondered upon by all, by both young and old. Mr. Willis has written much that might be termed good, much that might be termed indifferent, but none bad. Of the good, none that is more solemn and impressive, and calculated to make man look upon his fellow man as he ought than this. It is to be hoped that none will read it but to be touched and melted by its persuasive eloquence. W. R.

CONTEMPT.

I have unlearned contempt. It is the sin
That is engendered earliest in the soul,
And doth beset it like a poison-worm,
Feeding on all its beauty. As it steals
Into the bosom, you may see the light
Of the clear, heavenly eye grow cold and dim,
And the fine upright glory of the brow
Cloud with mistrust, and the unfettered lip,
That was free and changeable as the wind,
Even in the sadness redolent with love,
Curled with the iciness of constant scorn.
It eats into the mind till it pollutes
All its pure fountains. Feeling, reason, taste, Breathe its chill corruption. Every sense
That could convey a pleasure is benumbed,
And the bright human being, that was made
Full of rich, warm affections, and with power
To look through all things lovely up to God,
Is changed into a cold and doubting fiend,
With but one use of reason—to despise!
Oh! if there is one law above the rest,
Written in wisdom—if there is a word
That I would trace as with a pen of fire
Upon the unsunned temple of a child—
If there is any thing that keeps the mind
Open to angels visits, and repels
The ministry of ill—'tis human love!
God has made nothing worthy of contempt.
The smallest pebble in the well of truth
Has its peculiar meaning, and will stand
When man's best monuments have passed away.
'The law of Heaven is love; and though its name
Has been usurped by passion, and profaned
To its unholy uses through all time,
Still the eternal principle is pure;
And in these deep affections that we feel Omnipotent within us, we but see
The lavish measure in which love is given;
And in the yearning tenderness of a child
For every bird that sings above his head,
And every creature feeding on the hills,
And every tree and flower and running brook,
We see how every thing was made to love!
And how they err, who in a world like this,
Find any thing to hate, but human pride.

SHOW US THE FATHER AND IT SUFFICETH.

BY REV. E. G. BROOKS.

'Philip saith unto him, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us.' John xiv : 8.

The request that Philip intended to make in these words, doubtless was, that Christ would give or cause to be given to his apostles some outward and visible manifestation of God. Such manifestations had been given 'at sundry times and in divers manners,' under former dispensations, for the confirmation of the faith of patriarchs and prophets, and of the people through them; and what Philip desired for himself and others, probably was, that some such manifestation should then be granted, they should have nothing more to ask for to strengthen their faith, or confirm their confidence.

The first thought suggested by this confidence is, that the same curiosity or desire which led Philip to say, 'Show us the Father,' and thus to ask for some manifestation of God to the outward senses, is still in the world. There are still those who, like Philip, are not satisfied with the manifestation of himself which God has given; who want some special manifestation, some visible appearing, some marked and direct interposition of God's hand or voice, by which he shall give immediate assurance of his existence, even as he did on Sinai and to the prophets of old. Especially is it the case with many in times of discouragement and misfortune, when they are bowed under adversity or bereavement, in sickness or distress,—times when the need of the assurance of the Father's existence and care is felt pressing upon the soul as never else, that they yearn for some direct manifestation of God to the senses, assuring them of his existence and superintending care. They feel that if they could only have something of this character granted them, they could bear their burdens better—with more of fortitude and patience. They say, 'Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us.'

Perhaps this is natural. The recognition of the Divine Existence is a matter of faith, and not of sight, although of faith founded on things revealed to sight. It is something resting on evidence, and although that evidence is of such a character as to amount to demonstration, it is still only evidence. Perhaps, it is not strange, then, that to some minds peculiarly constituted, there should seem to be a want of something more to give them perfect satisfaction, a lack which a direct and visible manifestation of God alone can supply. We shall, all of us, readily perceive, however, that the cherishing of such feelings and of the cravings consequent upon them, is wholly useless, not to say improper, and that whoever cherishes them is doing himself a great and entirely unnecessary wrong.—The time for special manifestations of himself by God, has passed. The necessity for them has passed. In the early history of our race, when men had not learned to appreciate the manifestations of God which were around them in creation and providence; when there was not that moral and intellectual development which now exists, and the world was still enveloped in the darkness of barbarism and idolatry, it was necessary that such manifestations should be given that men might be led to the recognition and worship of the one true God. Hence, they were given. God appeared to the patriarchs. When a new dispensation was given, he spoke from Sinai and manifested himself to the people there. But the necessity for these things has ceased now. We have the record of those olden appearances and manifestations, and all the lessons and evidences of the Past to teach us of God, as well as those things which are ever speaking eloquently of Him around us. The doctrine of the Divine Existence has become established. The world has made such progress, morally and intellectually, that the voice of God in the soul and the manifestations of God in the things that are made, can be thoroughly understood. We can, therefore, no longer look for visible appearances, or special manifestations. We need them not. And to wish for them—to nurture in the heart a yearning and hungering after them, is not only wishing for that which we shall not and can not have, and which we do not need, but it is also nurturing a morbid distaste for, and dissatisfaction with, the manifestations and evidence which have been given, thereby disqualifying ourselves to appreciate their sufficiency and force, and depriving our hearts of that measure of faith and joy, which is to be derived from their contemplation. In the realization of these self-evident considerations, those who are suffering themselves to be restless and dissatisfied in their hankerings after some more direct and palpable manifestation of himself than it has pleased God to give them, and who, in the midst of all that God has revealed of himself, like querulous children, still cry, 'show us the Father,' should cease from these things as unprofitable and wrong. The Father is showed to us—showed fully and blessedly; and if we will but receive these showings with pure and loving hearts,—if as God's children, we will but stand with open eyes and ears, and listening, willing spirits, in the midst of them, we shall be made to see and feel how fully and how blessedly the Father is shown to us. In all the phenomena of this wonderful universe; in the bending heavens, sparkling in sunshine, glistening with stars, or overcast with clouds; in the ten thousand varied scenes of earth; in the running streams and the billowy ocean; in the perfect mechanism of our bodies; in the aspirations of our spirits; and above all, in the life and teachings of Jesus Christ; in his precious unfoldings and assurances of God's favor and care; in his sympathy for poor sinful man; in his tender mercy, and his love even unto death; in all these God is manifested and the Father is showed unto us. Let us, then, learn to be satisfied with these manifestations of our God and Father, seeking always to study them and striving in view of them to learn continually more and more of him—to feel ourselves drawn by a filial trust nearer and nearer to him, and so to live as to secure the promise, 'The pure in heart shall see God.'

Philip said, 'Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us.' A great and important truth is suggested by this last expression—'it sufficeth us.' It is this:—a true conception and understanding of God as the Father comprehend every thing necessary to satisfy the soul; 'it sufficeth us.' When we have risen to the perception of the Divine Existence, there is not in all the range of belief or thought, so great and glorious and comprehensive a truth as the paternity of God;—the truth that God, the sovereign and omnipotent Creator and Governor of the universe, is the FATHER, not merely in name, or form—not merely by the necessity of creation, but really and truly, with all the feelings and affections of the true parent.—What is there of assurance or doctrine that the soul needs, or that it can ask for, which is not embraced here? We are here in a world of vicissitude and trial; we find ourselves unable to tell what a day or a moment may bring forth; continually subject, therefore, to disappointment and the blasting of our best plans and our fondest hopes; we are called to suffer and to see others suffer misfortune, bereavement, sickness, sorrow, death. What do we need to reconcile us to these allotments—to give our hearts strength and patience under these burdens, and to make us ever peaceful and happy, more than is given us in the assurance that the superintending God is our Father, that all these things are ordered or permitted in a Father's providence and under a Father's eye? Sin is in the world. 'What do we need to certify us that it shall be righteously and wisely overruled for good—that it shall not be permitted to destroy a single human soul, and that the time must come when it shall cease, more than to be told that God, the Almighty Governor of the universe, is the Father of every human soul? God has ordained laws. What do we need to make us feel that these laws are good and to lead us to obey them, more than to feel that they are the expressions of a Father's will? We must die. What more do we need to give us peace in our departure and to assure us that a good destiny finally awaits us beyond the grave, than to see God as our Father? It is impossible, indeed, for us to conceive of any assurance concerning any of the interests or relations of man that he needs to give him reconciliation or strength, which is not embraced and given in the one great truth that God is his Father. Look upon a father or a mother, in the midst of the children that God has given them. And as you see the heart beating, and the eye kindling with a parent's love, and feel that that father or mother is true to the relation and the name—what do you need more to assure you that whatever devoted affection and untiring solicitude and the ability and strength God has given, can do for the welfare of those children, will be done—in sickness and health—when they obey and when they disobey? Will you feel it necessary to enter into an argument to show that those children will not be neglected, or made unnecessarily to suffer, or abused, or cast away? Surely not. The bare fact that they have a father or a mother, true to the name, will certify you without any argument, that no such thing can take place. This one fact embraces the answer to every other question that can be asked in reference to their interests and welfare. And just so it is with the great doctrine that God is our Father. In this one truth are embraced all other truths in reference to the relations of God to men—his government over them and his purposes with them. In this, we have the assurance that he loves them, and ever cares for and watches over them; that all his dealings with them and all his commandments to them are designed for their good and happiness; that however they may forget and wander from him, he will never forget or be indifferent toward them; that he will not only be mindful of them in this life, but in all future stages and states of their existence; and that the period will arrive when he will gather them all into his presence, redeemed and glorified. All this, I say, I embraced necessarily and unconditionally, in the one great truth that God is our Father. Well, then, may we say, in view of it rightly understood in all its bearings and consequences—'it sufficeth us.' Is God our Father? It is enough. We can ask no more. It is the pledge of God's enduring mercy—a mercy higher and broader than all our sins—more comprehensive than all our interests—and lasting as his own existence. It is the pledge of his kindly dealing with us on earth—of our everlasting redemption and purity in heaven.—[Ladies Repository.]

THE EMIGRANT FAMILY.

In the month of September, 1845, business called me to Cincinnati, and at Wheeling, I stepped on board one of the small stern-wheel boats that ply on our Western rivers, during the summer months. At that time the river was extremely low, in consequence of a long continued draught of the summer, and in addition to this, the heavy fogs of the season prevented our running at night, so that we made very slow progress.

The boat was full of passengers, and owing to the well-known frankness of the western character, we all became, for the time being, well acquainted with each other.

Among the deck passengers were some German emigrants, and there was one family consisting of five persons, father, and mother, two daughters and a little boy about five years old, the youngest of the family, that attracted the notice of the cabin passengers, from the neatness of their attire and affection evinced toward each other.

The mother said they came from the neighborhood of Bremen, where they had a few acres of land, and lived in peace and comfort, until the husband was seized with the desire of emigration, and after four years of opportunity on his part, she consented to leave the land of her father in the hope of making a better provision for their children.

After leaving Portsmouth two or three miles behind us, on the third day of our toilsome journey, and as the passengers were relapsing into listlessness after the stir that always occurs at a landing, they were suddenly startled by the wild cry of 'a child overboard!' that arose far above the bleaching of the steam-pipe.

There was a general rush from the cabin to the after part of the boat, and the first person we saw was the German mother, on the farthest plank astern, raising her hand imploringly to Heaven, and crying—O, mine Gott, heelf mine kind!—(O, my God! help my child.) At some distance in the rear, in the midst of the tossing waves, there was a man struggling with the child in one arm whom he had caught as he was sinking, never more to rise. The boat was stopped, and the yawl instantly manned, and sent to pick them up, but before this could be done we had floated some three hundred yards from the struggling couple. There were two or three minutes of intense anxiety to the passengers; no one spoke; we almost ceased to breathe. The yawl, pulled by stout arms, foamed through the water, and when she reached the spot, and the two persons were hauled in over her side, there was a glad shout of 'they are saved!' that ran from end to end of the boat. 'How did it happen?' and who saved the child?—were rapidly asked. The little fellow had been playing on the forward deck, where there was no railing, and slipping, he fell overboard, and fortunate for him was it that the boat had no side wheels, or he must have been dashed to pieces. It was one of the deck hands who plunged in and saved him. He was poor, and had a wife and small family at Pittsburgh. All were filled with admiration at the noble philanthropy that prompted him at the risk of his own life, and without the idea of a reward, to rescue the little German boy. Some one proposed that a purse be made up for him—it was responded to unanimously. Accordingly Capt. S., a well known citizen of Cincinnati, was called to the chair, and after a brief and appropriate address by him, a hat was passed around and a considerable sum was collected.

The man, the child and the parents were brought up into the cabin. In the centre of the circle stood the brave fellow, still pale and panting from exertions; opposite him stood the mother with her child on her breast, while tears of gratitude rolled down her cheeks.

The Chairman expressed to him the warm admiration of all present, at his generous deed; then presented to him the money, to which the mother had added two bright German Thalers, he urged upon him the propriety of keeping what she had given him as a memento of an act, the remembrance of which must always afford him happiness.

During the remainder of the journey to Cincinnati, where we arrived the next day, the man and little boy were objects of great interest to the passengers.—[Cin. Atlas.]

'A child overboard!' Truly it must have been a startling cry! and well did he merit all rational commendation who, thoughtless of personal peril and not dreaming of profit thereby, leaped into the waters to rescue a junior fellow mortal.

'They are saved!' Truly it was a cry of exultation, welcome to every ear, and especially enrapturing to the mother's heart. Was it any marvel that the passengers made voluntary contribution in behalf of the brave fellow who had a soul beneath his dirty vestments?

Doubtless the substantial tokens of gratitude and respectful regard, freely tendered, were thoughtfully received—though not sought in the perilous leap into the river; but the satisfaction ministered by his own brave spirit, was of more value than the silver placed in his hand.

It does not follow, however, that the Chairman spoke truly, when he said that the remembrance of the act would always afford happiness to the deliverer of the child.—That is, (and I beseech the reader to remember this proviso—namely,) if a certain fundamental doctrine of my neighbor's 'doxy' be true.

Let us briefly consider the matter.

Here, then is a little boy of five years of age. According to the strictest line of modern theology, he had not yet entered the realm of accountability. Be this as it may, if he had been drowned, he would have incurred no hazard of exclusion from the kingdom on high. The testimony of all voices would have spoken to the mother's heart—'It is well with the child!'

Will it certainly be thus, a score or two score of years hence?

Surely it is a supposable case, that a boy thus saved from drowning, may become a very vicious man and may so live, and so die. What then?

The day of final reckoning arrives. The stout brother who saved the child from perishing in the Ohio river, may behold the man plunged headlong into a river of fire! Is it certain that the remembrance of the former act, will afford him happiness in beholding the latter final doom?

O neighbor! thy doctrine must needs be false, else consistency therewith would not unhumanize humanity so awfully. If thou lovest the soul of the child, why wilt thou rejoice in the deliverance of his body from death? Is it nothing to thee that the union of soul and body in the child grown to manhood, may result in the endless ruin of both?

—But would you have me stand by and see the boy drown, without an effort to save him? Would you have me repress the strong feeling of rejoicing and thankfulness, in sympathy with the enraptured mother?

—Certainly not, O neighbor. I would have thee encourage the growth of all such human love and sympathy with thy fellow beings; and I would have thee abandon for ever the doctrine with which such human love and sympathy can never be made to consist. The doctrine of endless woe, in any contingency, is the chief of that legion of 'dammable heresies' whereof the church was forewarned—but which for ages has been the 'abomination that maketh desolate, standing in the holy place! I pray thee, cast out the foul fiend, even though it should require of thee much prayer and fasting.

Souls are overboard struggling in the dark waters; but in the issue of The Victor's mission, the heart of the Universe shall shout in triumph, They are saved!—[Star in the West.]

UTICA, FRIDAY, AUGUST 14, 1846.

STRAINING AT A GNAT—SWALLOWING A CAMEL.

There is not a little straining at gnats and swallowing camels at this age of the world, by individuals, by societies, and by nations. The reader will doubtless remember that but a few years since no small stir was made among the leading politicians, because of efforts which were then being made by some church-going people, to prevent the mails being carried on the Sabbath. A venerable member of the House of Representatives, made a report upon the question, which was much praised and admired among the members of the political party to which he belonged, and also, by many of those of the other party, and in consequence the effort to stop the mails on the Sabbath was defeated to the no small discomfiture of maddened bigots, and to the joy of those who would not refuse to do a deed of benevolence on the day set apart to the worship of the living God. There the matter rested and remained quiet for a long time, but now, by some means and for some reason unknown to the people, that object so much and so loudly spoken against by those who called themselves the lovers of freedom of thought and liberty of opinion, is steadily being accomplished and has been in progress some three or four years. Many daily mails, and upon large routes too, where they have been run for years, have been stopped upon that day called by some—'the Lord's day'—just as though there was but one day in seven which belonged to the Lord! But if we judge by the conduct of professedly pious people, or some of them, we must conclude that there is but one day in the week to be dedicated to God, and that the rest is to be devoted to the service of a certain gent, who swings a suspicious looking foot! Be this as it may, we inquire by what authority and for what purpose this work has been commenced and is now progressing? We have a few suppositions and words, which may be beneficial, if not to law makers, at least to some of their constituents.

1. Perhaps 'the powers that be,' meaning of course the law-making and law-executing powers, are getting somewhat pious. And Heaven grant that it may be so, for surely there is sufficient need for such a work. But instead of commencing with stopping the mails on the Sabbath, would they not act a part more becoming penitents by beginning to stop something else? both upon the Sabbath-day and during the week time? There should be less language used in the halls of Congress disgraceful to a rum-hole—less profanity—less rows—less blackguardism—less bargaining by mutual consent to set at defiance both the laws of God and man! To stop mails on the Sabbath while these things are permitted and countenanced, and to send forth an armed force to butcher the inhabitants of a weak and defenceless nation, because it would not sit itself quietly down and be robbed of portions of territory, to fill the pockets of speculators and extend the area of slavery, is what we call the biggest kind of straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. Let the 'powers that be' wipe out these foul stains upon our national character, and then we may believe the object in view in prohibiting the mails being carried on the Sabbath, to be an object dictated by correct religious principles.

2. Perhaps it is not because of the actual sin incurred in a national point of view, that the mails must be stopped, but to prevent stage-drivers and others journeying on the Sabbath to the detriment of public and private morals. If this is the object in view, it is truly straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel—skinning a flint for a sixpence, and spoiling a knife worth a dollar!

There are three classes of men concerned in this matter—Christians in principle and action—Christians in profession, but not in action—and unbelievers. Now Christians in principle and action, will not journey on the Sabbath unless the case actually requires it; and hence the prohibition of running stage-coaches, respecting them, is entirely useless, because they would not travel on Sunday were there a dozen coaches running where there are none at present. Christians in profession, are those governed by pecuniary considerations, and if by travelling on the Sabbath they could make a dollar or two more than by stopping to worship God, they would push through, mail or no mail, post-coach or no post-coach, sin or no sin; and perhaps make an atonement for the sin, by a few additional words to the prayer offered up with great solemnity on the next Sabbath in the synagogue where they were wont to worship God—and plan schemes to cheat and defraud their fellow mortals! Or if it were imperative, and stop they must, they would commit more sin by the harsh epithets which they would throw, both upon the law and the law-makers, than they would by pursuing their journey; so let them go. In regard to the anti-christians, if we may so designate unbelievers; which would be the wiser course, to permit them to go quietly along on the Sabbath, or to congregate at the hotels, taverns, and grog-shops of low degree, and there spend the day in drinking, carousing, and profaning every thing sacred and divine? The latter, would be putting in the beam to get out the mote—mending the arm but breaking the neck. The wiser policy, and productive of less iniquity and far more beneficial results, would be to let them go on their way rejoicing regardless of the day, in preference to adopting prohibitory measures to remedy the evil.

3. 'It is the Sabbath,' saith the bigot, 'and hence the mails must be stopped and the nation be freed from the sin which has so long rested upon it.' It is the Sabbath—it may be, it is true, but is there not some doubt upon the subject? 'Who shall decide when doctors disagree?' This is a question we believe that has never been answered; and are there not doctors—of divinity—who disagree in regard to the day which should be regarded as the Sabbath? And is there not a large body of worthy Christian people, the members of which firmly believe Saturday to be the Sabbath? And if the object of mail stopping is to free the nation from the sin of Sabbath-breaking, would it not be better for the wise and knowing ones to decide which day of the week constitutes the Sabbath of the Lord? If Sunday should not prove to be that day, the 'refiner's fire and fuller's soap' would still be upon the nation—the gnat would be strained out, but the camel swallowed.

There is too much 'thou art the man,' at the present age; too much looking from home, and hence we do not wonder that so many should regard the carrying of the mails on Sunday, as a grievous national sin. Cry aloud, spare not, until the mails are stopped, and that accomplished, endeavor to make a law that he who does not attend church on the Sabbath-day—your church of course!—shall be subject to a fine, and perhaps imprisonment. What right has a man to think for himself? What right to worship God on any day but the Sabbath—our Sabbath—Sunday? And he must worship as directed by our creed—ours is the true faith, and all must bow before the altar and give God the glory! For what?—because they have become slaves to a creed!

The truth is; it is necessary that a man should so conduct himself that evidences of his piety may be seen in some shape, or his neighbors might neglect to award him the credit of having any religion at all, and as it is much more easy for one to be constantly harping away because of his neighbor's sins, than it is to look into his own heart and see if all is as it should be there, hence the noise about stages, canal boats, railway cars; and 'a better observance of the Sabbath,' recommended by conventions of ministers and very pious people; and the agents of the government, that their places in power may be more secure, are ever ready to turn this disposition to their account, although the religious sentiments of many of them may be questioned, especially if we judge from their conduct, either public or private.

For ourself, we endeavor to respect and observe what we believe to be the Christian Sabbath—Sunday—making it a day of rest to us, and a day for intellectual and religious improvement, and we like to see it observed by others, in a way that shall be conducive to public and private morals. But we believe it highly unnecessary at this enlightened day and age to call in law to compel men to worship God. Worship from compulsion, we believe to be of no great benefit to the worshipper, and not very acceptable to the Supreme Being. And we believe that were there more of the Gospel and less Law preached, the Sabbath would be better observed, and there would be less strife and contention to disturb the peace and harmony of society. Reader; what thinkest thou?

CLOSED AND OPEN DOORS.

Br. E. M. Pingree, in a late number of the 'Star in the West' gives an account of visiting Shelbyville, Ky., where he appointed to preach; but on arriving there, found no place to preach in—neither orthodox nor heretodox church could be had—Campbellites, who have long and loudly declaimed against the orthodox for similar treatment, refused the use of their church. The Court house, never before denied, was refused. The old College Hall, occupied at times for all sorts of speeches and sights, slight-of-hand tricks, jugglery, etc., was refused, because the pious controllers thereof were resolved that that dreadful heresy, Universalism, should never defile its sacred portals! And so Br. P. was obliged to abandon the idea of preaching in Shelbyville!

Now we will suggest to Br. P. and all other brethren in similar circumstances, a better plan than to abandon such heathenish places to their own cherished darkness. Let him adopt the plan we did at Manlius, N. Y., about a year since. In May 1845 we were to spend a day (Monday) in the neighborhood of Manlius, and notified our friends that we would preach a lecture in the village, if a suitable place could be procured. Application was made, we believe, for each of the Partialist churches; and though not in use, (except the Episcopal church which was then undergoing repairs,) they were all refused for the purpose. There was a spacious room over a store, where public, political and other meetings had been held; but even that was too sacred a place to be desecrated by a Universalist meeting, and was refused! We then told our friends that we would preach Universalism in Manlius village, and the people, volens volens, should have a chance to hear for themselves what this awful doctrine is. Accordingly, we appointed a meeting for a Sunday in July, in a beautiful orchard near the centre of the village, the owner consenting, and our friends fitted up a stand and a large number of seats in the shade of the trees, and there we had a most glorious meeting. The day was very fine, and one of the largest and most attentive congregations attended that we had addressed for years.—Some of our friends estimated the audience at fifteen hundred persons: and a more attentive audience we know not that we ever addressed. And thus the bigotry of the place contributed to the spread of Universalism. 'Surely, the wrath of man shall praise thee, and the remainder of wrath wilt thou restrain.'

Having appointed to preach at Little Falls on the first Sunday of the present month, and having no church to preach in, (although our friends can have the occupancy of a large hall by paying rent for it,) we suggested that we had better hold our meeting in a grove convenient to the village. Accordingly, on the day previous, seats were fitted up for the meeting under some beautiful shade trees near the river, and there, in nature's most beautiful temple, we held our meeting, worshipped the God of nature in peace and quietness, and preached the Gospel of His Son to a numerous and attentive audience; we doubt not, quite as numerous if not more so than would have attended either in a church or public hall.

Indeed, groves, well seated, in fair weather and in the hot season of midsummer, are really more comfortable and pleasant, even than churches. And then, there is something in these meetings so primitive, so sublime, that they have an attraction for, and a solemnizing influence over, nearly all classes of sober and reflecting people.—They remind one of the preaching of John Baptist in the wilderness of Judea, and especially of Christ's sermon on the mount and the numerous instances recorded in the New Testament of his addressing multitudes in the open air.

There is something in these primitive temples well-calculated to inspire reverence to the Great Author of nature and awaken devotion in the contemplative mind.—And it is a fact that, however often camp and grove meetings have been disturbed when held by some sects around us, we have never known any disturbance in a Universalist grove meeting, but uniformly the most earnest and devout attention has been paid to the services.

We would say then to Br. Pingree, and all others whom Partialists would deprive of a place in which to worship God, let them close their doors if they please, and shut up their temples against us. The God of nature has built us a better temple for the fair and sunny days of summer than ever the orthodox did or can build: and from this temple they can not exclude us. Let us not neglect to preach the Gospel because bigots close their doors against us.

By the by, though our Little Falls friends are thus furnished with a convenient summer temple, we hope and trust they will not much longer neglect to furnish themselves with a commodious temple in which to worship the Father, on stormy days and in winter as well as in summer.

CLINTON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

It will be seen by a notice in this week's Magazine and Advocate that the Fall term of the Liberal Institute, both Male and Female departments, will commence on the 2d day of September next. On the same day will also commence the second year of the Theological School, under the direction and instruction of Rev. T. J. Sawyer, whose well known literary and theological attainments so eminently qualify him for the station.

A good beginning of this school has been made during the year past: something over a dozen young men, preparing for the ministry of reconciliation, have availed themselves of the advantages afforded them here for improving their education and qualifying themselves for the important and responsible duties of the sacred calling. A number of them will continue in the class for the year to come, as we understand; and we can not doubt that many more will avail themselves of the privileges afforded at Clinton. They are required to pay nothing for tuition; and can board themselves on very reasonable terms if they choose. We bespeak then an increasing number of students for the Theological School for the coming year; and an increasing interest in the Universalist public to sustain it as well as the Institute itself.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

Please take notice, that the next number (34) of this volume closes the subscriptions of some of our patrons, and that in accordance with our published rules all papers will be discontinued after that number, unless and until, a further remittance is received. Those whose papers cease to come will of course know the cause. We hope they have been well enough pleased with the paper thus far, to induce them to forward another remittance at once. One dollar will pay for 8 months to come—or, 50 cents to the close of the year. We tender to them and to all our patrons our sincere thanks for their kind and prompt assistance thus far, and hope to have cause to thank them for further similar favors, and will do our best to deserve them.

PUBLISHER.

Our grateful acknowledgments are due to Hon. Timothy Jenkins for important and valuable Congressional documents.

Harpers Publications.

THE EXPEDITION TO BORNEO OF H. M. S. Dido for the suppression of piracy; with extracts from the journal of James Brooke, Esq., by Captain the Hon. Henry Keppel, R. N., is an interesting narrative, contained in a neatly bound 12mo. book of 413 pages just issued by the above indefatigable publishers. The book contains much exciting incident of fights with pirates and other occurrences of the expedition. 50 cents.

No. 6 of the PICTORIAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND contains 79 double column octavo pages, occupied with a relation of the civil and military transactions of that country from about A. D. 1180 to 1200. It is profusely illustrated, 25 cents per number.

No. 99-100 of the ILLUSTRATED SHAKESPEARE concludes 'King Richard 2d,' and contains a part of 'King Henry the fourth.' 25 cents.

No. 19, and the last, of the illustrated edition of the WANDERING JEW is issued. Full sets of this lengthy and exciting work can be had of G. N. Beesley of this city, who also has all of the above named works for sale, as well as English and American papers of latest dates.

THE SON OF TEMPERANCE AND RECHABITE.—We have received the first number of a neatly printed monthly of the above title, devoted to the advancement of the principles of the Orders of Sons of Temperance and Rechabites. The two orders, number we believe something like seventy thousand members in the United States, are rapidly increasing and without doubt are doing a great and good work in the way of reforming the unfortunate inebriate, and confirming him in his reformatory resolutions. May success attend their laudable efforts. The following is a portion of the prospectus of the above named work, terms, &c.

The 'Son of Temperance and Rechabite' will be published monthly, each No. to contain 32 large octavo pages, printed on superior paper, with new and beautiful type; at the extremely low price of ONE DOLLAR PER ANNUM! Which will make it one of the cheapest Magazines in the United States, and within the means of every Son and Friend of Temperance.

Brethren and Friends! Will you step forward and contribute your mite towards establishing and sustaining this work, and make it an organ worthy of our beloved orders and glorious cause? Will you enable us, by your liberality and zeal, to devote our entire time and energy to make the work what it may and should and must be made? What say you—yea or nay?

Any person forwarding us the names of five subscribers, (enclosing $5.) will be entitled to the 6th copy gratis, and 20 per cent. on all monies over that amount.

All subscriptions must commence with the volume, and none will be received for a less period than one year.

Address JOHN TANNER, Publisher, No. 9 (up stairs,) Exchange Buildings, Albany, N. Y.

NEW PAPER.—We have received the first number of a neatly printed quarto sheet, entitled the 'PHILANTHROPIST' (whether monthly, semi-monthly, or weekly, does not transpire) edited by C. E. Hewes, assisted by Brs. A. Peck, G. Smith, A. B. Manley, E. Guilford and R. K. Brush, and issued at Pittsfield, Mass. The above named assistants are we believe all clergymen in good standing in our denomination, and doubtless will make the paper an interesting and useful one. The terms are 50 cents per year in advance. The objects of the paper may be gathered from the following extract of the Editor's introduction.

All the Reforms and Philanthropic enterprises of the day, will receive attention. News of a religious character, will be inserted without regard to sect, and the cause of the distressed defended, wherever they may be. In our theological department, we shall earnestly contend for the doctrine of the Divine Unity, and the 'Ultimate holiness and consequent happiness of all mankind,' upon such ground as we think right and tenable, independent of the opinions of others.

No. I Vol. III of the 'GAVEL' for August is a creditable beginning to this volume. It is prefaced by a well executed and correct mezzotint likeness of John G. Treadwell, Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge I. O. O. F. of N. York. It is well filled and we select a piece of poetry from the pen of Thomas L. Harris entitled 'Odd Fellowship.' This is a good monthly, devoted to the interests and diffusion of the principles of the Order, and is only one dollar a year in advance. Now is a good time to subscribe. Thomas L. Harris, Paschal Donaldson and John Tanner, Editors. Address John Tanner, publisher, Albany, N. Y.

That mammoth receptacle of literature, amusement, useful knowledge, and miscellany, calculated to interest all classes, from juvenility to the age of wisdom, the N. Y. SATURDAY EMPORIUM has recently commenced a new volume. A tale of thrilling interest entitled, 'Old Cro' Nest,' or the outlaws of the Hudson, is in progress of publication in its columns. The scenes are laid along the banks of that noble river, and among those stupendous cliffs and peaks, of which 'Old Cro' Nest' is one. The terms of this excellent family paper are $2.00 per year in advance. A good time to subscribe so as to secure the numbers from the commencement of the tale above named. Address Ward & Co., 30 Ann street, N. Y.

CHENANGO ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS.

This body will hold its session for 1846, in North Norwich, Chenango co., on the first Wednesday and Thursday, (2d and 3d,) of September. The Council will convene at 8 o'clock, Wednesday morning. Religious worship will commence at half past 10. It is expected that no church or society will fail to be represented by two lay delegates prepared to report the number of members now living within their bounds, the increase or decrease during the past year, the amount of preaching they support, the condition of their Sunday School, (if they have any,) and impart all information pertaining to their prosperity that is important and interesting. Clergymen and laymen, brethren and sisters, from every part of Chenango, Broome, Delaware and the adjoining counties are earnestly invited to attend. Let us have by hundred the largest gathering of Universalists ever known within the limits of our Association. J. T. GOODRICH, Standing Clerk.

MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE CHENANGO ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS.

This body will hold its third annual meeting in North Norwich, on Thursday and Friday, the 3d and 4th of September. All officers and friends generally should be present. Let no ordinary excuse in any case cause absence. The question is often asked by our friends, can we be satisfactorily supplied with lectures, &c., the ensuing year? IF EVERY TRUSTEE, AND IN EACH PLACE WHERE THERE IS NO TRUSTEE AND MEETINGS ARE DESIRED, IF SOME PERSON PREVIOUSLY communicates to me or AT ITS SESSION informs the Board what SUM CAN BE RAISED in their locations, for Sunday or week-day or evening preaching, YOU CAN. If the assemblage is thin, and this information is not imparted, IT IS HIGHLY IMPROBABLE, IF NOT ABSOLUTELY IMPOSSIBLE. Brethren, each and all, be up and doing. J. T. GOODRICH, Secretary.

Will the Union and Messenger, and Western Evangelist, please copy the above notices?

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The Fall Term of this well known School, Male and Female Department, will commence on Wednesday, the 2d of September, proximo. It will continue under the same government and teachers as during the year past, with the exception of teacher of Mathematics.

Br. R. QUEAL will preach in Westernville on the fourth Sunday in August—in Taberg on the fifth Sunday—in Stockbridge on the first Sunday in September, and at Lee Centre on the second Sunday.

Br. J. W. MCMASTER will preach in Marshall on the 4th Sunday, 23d inst.

DEATHS.

Drowned, in the River De Grasse, at Canton, JEHIEL, son of William Clark, aged 13 years and 3 months. The deceased was a promising little lad, much endeared to his parents and his kindred in general, and his untimely exit from the family circle will long, long be lamented.

In West Potsdam, July 8th, Mrs. ELIZA MURRAY, wife of Wm. K. Rich, aged 28 years. Sister Rich was an excellent woman—possessing the faith of Israel's God, she lived it, and died in it, and found peace. She has left a husband and several children to mourn their loss. The God of peace be with and bless them.

In Pierpont, July 8th, Miss MARTHA AUVILLA, daughter of Benjamin Cox, aged 24 years and 8 months. That cruel disease, consumption, cut down this beautiful young lady and consigned her to an early grave. Many were the tears shed at her death, and many the hearts that sorrowed at her funeral.

In Potsdam, July 29th, Mrs. DORCAS, wife of Nathan Parmeter, aged 83 years. The deceased was a lady who had reared a large family of children, and she had the pleasure of seeing them all step out into the world and taking an active and honorable part in its duties. She lived a long life, and a life too of virtue and usefulness. The poor will long have cause to remember her, and her respected husband, whose age is some four years in advance of hers, is fast following her to the grave. Peace be with all who mourn, and with all who die. W. H. WAGGONER.

In Paris, on the 3d inst., Mr. ELISHA WETMORE, aged 77 years. The deceased was one of the first settlers in that section of country; has left a good name, and was universally beloved and respected. An aged widow, eleven children, seventy-two grand children, and ten or more great grand children, mourn the loss of a valuable counsellor, and the community in which he resided, of an esteemed friend. The consolations of the Gospel were administered to the mourners and a numerous congregation of sympathising friends, in the Presbyterian church at Litchfield, on the 5th inst., by the writer. T. J. W.

ODD FELLOWSHIP.

BY THOMAS L. HARRIS.

Where Northern hills with starry crowns and emerald mantles stand;
Where Southern founts bedew the flowers that fringe their golden sand;
Where Eastern cities proudly lift on high their sculptured crest;
Where Western woodlands view the sun roll down Pacific's breast;
Where Hudson swells its waves, and sweeps the lone Columbia's tide,
Where Warren fell, and Marion fought, and bold Montgomery died,
'Tis there ODD FELLOWSHIP leads forth its armies brave and strong,
To strive for Truth and Peace and Love, to war with Hate and Wrong.

Their banners flash with golden gleams along the purple sky,
Their burnished robes the radiant hues of sunset's glow outvie;
Their rallying shout is that which once through Judah's midnight rang:
Glory to God on high: on Earth good will and peace to man;
One holy brother tie has bound ten thousand hearts in one,
And valiant deeds from them go forth like brightness from the sun;
And from their willing hearts and hands unbounded blessings flow,
Sweet as the breath of Angel lips, yet still as falling snow!

All precious memories cluster round 'the Order's' holy shrine,
The deathless things of old renown, of thoughts and lives sublime,
With Truths, eternal and divine, 'the Order's' lips are rife,
Our Father, God; our Brother, Man; the Soul's progressive life;
And when our sacred portals ope, all free and far go forth,
The deeds of charity and peace to bless and gladden earth,
And strong and true, and guided on with glory from above,
We move, Earth's noblest Chivalry, THE BROTHERHOOD OF LOVE!

We come, and splendor dawns, and Day lifts high its crown of light,
And break and fade the clouds that veiled the throne of ancient Night;
The walls of Sect, the chains of Creed, in shattered ruins lie,
And free our Brother Man comes forth with gladness in his eye;
They crush the old Sectarian spite, 'the angry discords cease;
'They join our throngs with snowy robes of blessedness and peace,
And Seraphs tune their harps of flame to hear the music rise
From wedded thoughts of truth and love, and mingled hearts and lives.

We come, and lo! the Widow's heart once more is learned to sing,

And sudden joys within her breast like living waters spring.
We come, and see, the Orphan brood in silent bliss rejoice,
Find in our care a mother's breast, a father's gentle voice.
We come, the stricken wanderer, laid upon a wasting bed,
Sees angel forms around him bow, and move with silent tread;
'And tearfully, when all is o'er, we gather round the sod,
And bear our Brother's 'dust to dust,' his spirit's with our God!

ODD FELLOWSHIP! 'Tis ever blest with blessings from above,

'Tis twined amid the widow's prayer and in the orphan's love.
The living God hath arched its dome, and built its bulwarks high,

It rests beneath the loving light of His unslumbering eye.
So shall its grandeur never wane, its glory never fade,
Its Halls arise with Truth, and Love, and Liberty arrayed,
And in the blessed HUMAN HEART A SACRED TREASURE LIE,

Too great to fail, too sweet to fade, and TOO DIVINE TO DIE!

HEALTH.

BY REV. J. B. SAX.

One of the organic laws is, that if we would preserve the body in health we must have a constant and regular supply of proper food and drink. If we take that which is improper, disease and perhaps death is the consequence. So one of the laws of our moral nature is, that if we would preserve the soul in health, the mind must be fed with proper spiritual food, which is the true doctrines of the Gospel;—otherwise, if it be fed with the husks of error—false dogmas—it will languish, the moral health will decline, and the soul become diseased with sin. We shall become wretched moral invalids, unable to labor in God's harvest field without experiencing excruciating pain. Let us strive for spiritual as well as bodily health.

THE DEACON OUT-DEACONED!

A Presbyterian preacher in Peru, Ohio, Dr. Salmon, and by the by, a very clever, humorous sociable man, though not distinguished as a peace-maker in the Presbyterian ranks; and at the date of the following incident certain charges were preferred against him by his parishioners. The Dr., withal, was something of a money-getter, and was in attendance at a vendue, to purchase such articles as he might deem profitable. This was all right.

At a distance from the crier, he saw a group of men earnestly engaged in conversation, and he soon placed himself in their midst. The chief speaker was a rare genius, to whom the crowd were continually putting questions for solution, and whom they continually called Deacon. The Dr. listened for a time, being fond of a joke, and when an opportunity presented he hailed the speaker—'Deacon, Deacon! Who made you a Deacon?' 'Sir,' said the wit, 'I am Deacon of the world's people, you are Deacon of the saints; and I have been credibly informed that they intend to turn you out of the church, into the world, and so soon as they do I shall resign my office!' The Dr. was mum—the wit had the advantage of him, and he walked!

JESUS' FIRST LOVE.

Br. SKINNER—Please copy the following into the Magazine and Advocate. It is the closing paragraph of a sermon 'by Rev. J. Burns, of London,' from Rev. ii: 4, 5, published in 'The Morning Star' of Aug. 13, 1845. The Morning Star, as you are doubtless aware, is a Free-will Baptist paper, printed at Dover, N. H. In relation to the extract, I have only to say, How is it possible that a man who would write thus can believe the doctrine of endless misery? J. LEWIS.

'We have one more word to say—Remember, Christ has not lost his first love. That love which brought him from heaven—which made him a babe in Bethlehem—which caused him to appear in the world as a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief—that love which immersed him in an ocean of suffering and kept him there while the billows rolled over him—that love which transfixed him to the cross and made him a spectacle to angels and to men—that love which induced him to open his own heart, that sinners might find a passage to it and dwell there forever, and which caused him to atone for sin by his own death—that love still exists in all its intenseness; it is not altered in the least; it is as warm, as free, as glowing, as intense, and as unspokeable as ever. O think of that! May the love of Christ constrain you: may we be brought to feel the power of that love—the influence of that love—and may we retire, exclaiming—'We love him,' and we will love him more and serve him better, 'because he first loved us.'

Smithville Flats, July 22d, 1846.

Br. SKINNER—The following is a sermon you are requested to publish. It was delivered the 4th of April; and the reasons of its long delay are these—It was delivered at the time from short notes, but at the request of the family I promised to write it out for publication. On examination, after the lapse of a few weeks of toil, I thought it would be impossible to write it out, so as to have it the sermon delivered; at least, in many respects; so I thought to let it pass. But the friends once more sent in their earnest request, and were unwilling to be put off; so I have now completed my part of the work. It is imperfect in many respects, but to alter would be to publish a sermon not delivered at the time. It is therefore given without further excuse.

● ORIGINAL SERMON,

Delivered April 4, 1846, on the death of Mrs. MARY B. ROUNDS, wife of Charles Rounds of New Berlin, who departed this life, April 2d, aged 60 years.

BY REV. A. O. WARREN.

'Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there?' Jer. viii : 22.

Such was the language of the Prophet as he viewed the condition of his people. He saw them bowing down under every form of affliction. Their national pride and glory were overthrown, the splendor of their cities ruined, their morals corrupted, and the consequent happiness of his people gone forever. Prospects like these filled his mind with the greatest distress, and caused him to give utterance to the language of our text. But it is not my design to dwell on the circumstances that called forth our text, for the language is not only appropriate for a prophet, situated as Jeremiah was at the time of its utterance, but for all men, under a great variety of circumstances. We see man groping his way through life surrounded by darkness, and he meets with disappointments and troubles in every hour: how appropriate for such an one is the text. We see one deprived of health; disease preys upon every function of his body; and how anxiously he inquires, 'Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there?' Or see again, one destitute of Gospel truth, ignorant of God's loving kindness and immortal life, and as he sees the grave opening before him, and his friends and himself descending into its cold embrace, how ardently he repeats this language of the Prophet! So too, when we are called upon to bid adieu to friends and relatives, who are resting in the sleep of death, as our tears find free course down our cheeks, we ask, 'Is there no balm in Gilead?' I doubt not, mourning friends, this has been, and is now the inquiry of your minds. I proceed then, briefly to answer the questions in the text by pointing you to several balms, great and exceeding precious, that are able to soothe all the sorrows of this world. I declare to you,

I. The consoling fact that there is a God, who is our Father, and his goodness is over all his dependent children. I trust I need not stop to offer one argument to prove that there is a God. This is a self-evident fact almost; for how could a world be created, or exist by immutable laws, and yet there be no creator, or law-giver? I pass then to notice the evidence of his goodness to man. Who, that has considered the beauty and adaptation of nature's productions to the wants of man, can fail of seeing evidence of goodness? The sunlight of heaven, the shades of evening, the changing seasons, the gentle showers and balmy breezes, all, in their endless variety, proclaim God's goodness to man. The entire work of God in creation, and the formation of man, an intelligent, moral and religious being, and the ample provision made for the satisfaction of all his wants, are a practical commentary on, and irresistible evidence of God's goodness. It is seen in the revelation he has given to the world. O! how good to reveal his matchless, boundless, exhaustless goodness! to make known his will, pleasure, purpose, and our duty and happy destiny beyond this veil of tears! We see it prominent in the promise made to Adam after his transgression. How cheering that promise, the promise of a Saviour, and that too, for all. The same glorious promise is made to Abram, and often repeated to the time of its fulfilment, all of which is the work of goodness. If then there is a display of goodness in these promises, how much more is their fulfilment? But this great goodness is displayed in one other instance in a most transcendent manner. Abram was far advanced in years, and he had one only son, in whom his soul delighted, and God called him to make a burnt offering of that son. O, how sad his heart, as he wends his way to the place appointed of Heaven, where he expects to see his son, his only hope on earth, and the only means by which his name should be transferred to coming generations, and he to become the father of many nations, expire in the agonies of death! But the voice of the Lord says to him, 'Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him.' Abram, lifting up his eyes, beheld a lamb caught by his horns in a thicket, and that became the offering accepted of God. O, the great goodness of God as displayed in this hour of human necessity! These are only a few out of the thousands of instances that might be brought, but the greatest is the gift of his Son, as a sin offering, for the world, that he, Christ, might be its Redeemer. The prophets are ample proof that this was his object. They speak of him as a Redeemer, a Deliverer, a King, whose government and peace should increase and have no end. Here then is one balm for troubled souls, a great and precious balm for us and all men.

II. Another balm is hope. This is truly a precious balm: one that comes to us in the darkest hours of affliction to give us strength and consolation. It is hope that often keeps the heart from breaking, and points to more sunny days. It lifts the veil of sorrow from over the soul, and by its power shows us heaven's own glory. Hope is a compound of expectation and desire. We can not hope for what we neither expect nor desire. Nor can we hope for what we do not both expect and desire. These two combined show us the nature and extent of our hope. The mind is always filled with expectations and desires. We expect to die, to have this body moulder back to dust. We also expect to live again. Every man, however skeptical he may be, has the former of these expectations, and most men the latter: for they are planted in our minds by the hand that made us. We desire also to live again, and for this we most ardently hope. To have only this hope is worth more than all the world besides. To realize in the hour of affliction, that our friends are alive still, separated from us only by a few brief hours, is a balm; but its most healing quality is discovered to us, when we ourselves feel the ties that bind us to earth sundering; then we desire; then we hope to live again and ever. Who does not see the blessing of this hope and feel the spirit of the same warming his own bosom? Man, however, not only desires to live again; his desires reach to something more important than this. To live is but a small part of our aspirations. To live merely, or to live in pain or solitude, answers not our desires; for here, where we experience more joy than pain, the universal language is, 'I would not live always! No; welcome the tomb.' We desire to live in perfect happiness, 'where not one wave of trouble rolls;' where peace and joy, union and happiness, crown our spiritual existence; where not one sigh escapes the anxious bosom, where all desire is fulfilled; where no more tears shall course over the cheek: for 'tears shall be wiped from every weeping eye.' Though this is consoling, yet we desire more than this. We not only desire to live ourselves in the full enjoyment of these glories, but we desire the same for our friends and all men. It seems to be a fixed law of our minds that as happiness increases with us, selfishness vanishes, and the more we enjoy the more we desire it extended. Hence, when man possesses perfect bliss, free from all pain, or when the mind even dwells upon it, and he feels its spirit, then he desires it to become universal. It is so of this; we desire Heaven's glory and bliss to become universal. We hope it may be so, and this hope is to us a balm, that cheers and supports. I know there are some, who have rashly said, 'if all were to be happy hereafter, they did not wish to inherit that heaven;' yet I can not think any one, after the 'sober second thought,' would repeat such an unchristian sentiment. We neither expect, desire, or hope for such exclusiveness, and if we did, there could be no balm there. But how full of precious balm is the Christian's hope, that as an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, enters into that within the veil; that embraces all our reasonable expectations, and our most ardent and Godlike desires; a hope that shows bliss and life unending for all souls. But I pass to remark,

III. That faith is another balm. Faith, says the apostle, 'is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.' The substance of our hope embraces immortal and endless felicity for all men, and we believe this hope will end in the reality. Regarding God as our Father, we have faith in his word, like faithful Abraham, 'who staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God, and being fully persuaded that what he had promised, he was able also to perform.' We believe, yea we know, that God is good unto all, that his tender mercies are over all his works; that he is unchangeable in all his attributes and perfections, that he is our Friend, Father and Saviour; that he will not contend forever, neither be always wroth; that he will not cast off forever, but have compassion according to the multitude of his tender mercies. These are balms indeed; but this is not all. We believe in a resurrection to a state of immortality. A faith embracing this truth has ever been cherished by some men, in all ages of the world, and it has been truly a balm in Gilead; yet no well grounded evidence was given till the days of Christ. He it is who 'bath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel.' He taught his disciples that he should live after death, and that as he lived they should live also. Paul tells us 'that as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive,' and that 'this mortal,' without distinction, 'must put on immortality.' We believe it will be thus, because it is revealed in God's word, and corresponds with our best desires and hopes. How cheering to believe we shall live beyond this life, where the cares, the perplexities and the sorrows of time come not; where sickness, pain and death never enter; that we shall live on and live forever. Such a belief prepares us to relinquish our grasp on this world gladly, for one more enduring. But O! mourning friends, even this is not all we believe. We believe this state of immortality will also be a state of rest and happiness; a state of purity and bliss for all men. There we shall meet our friends to part no more forever; there we shall enjoy God's love forever. O what a balm is such a belief, when we mourn! It lifts up the soul and gives it consolation. To see with the eye of faith all God's children freed from sin and pollution, and redeemed with an everlasting salvation, is a balm indeed. Such a balm is the faith we entertain.—But I add, we have another balm more precious, if possible, than all these. It is assurance, the assurance of God's word, that our expectations, desires, hopes and faith, all glorious, shall all be realized. This is above all price, and it gives power to hope and faith. Hope alone may fade away, and faith be groundless; but the assurance of truth, of God, gives them new life. God's word assures us that our hopes embracing life and glory, for all, shall be realized; that our faith encircling all men, in an immortal and happy rest with God, and angels, will be fulfilled. The Bible assures us that God's purposes shall all stand, his will all be executed and his pleasure done in all things. To the apostles he 'hath made known the mystery of his will according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself;' and it is 'that he might gather together in one all things in Christ.' He sent his Son to save the world, and the work shall prosper in his hand; yea, he said he had finished the work. We are assured that Christ shall reign till all enemies are subjected unto him, and that 'death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed;' that every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength. O, glorious assurance, precious balm! God's word is full of the same truths; but I need not add one more. It is enough already. We have found a balm for every wound, a cordial for all our fears. Let us look to Christ; for he is our Physician that came to heal and save his people. He shed his precious blood freely for all men, that he 'might be Lord both of the dead and the living,' that we might have the consolation, that whether we 'live or die we are the Lord's.' Dear mourning friends! Come to this fountain of balm for consolation; learn its sacred truths; for they will make you wise unto salvation. It shows us our friends in an eternal rest, where no pain shall ever come; where the weary are at rest; where God reigns all in all, blessed forevermore; where will be heard in one eternal, and harmonious, and happy song, the voice of 'every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever.'

BEWARE WHAT DOCTRINES YOU CHERISH.

BY REV. N. C. HODGSON.

'Then Jesus said unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and of the Sadducees.' Matt. xvi. 6.

Then Jesus said unto his disciples, to whom he was giving instruction concerning the truths of the kingdom; Take heed and beware of the leaven (or doctrine) of the Pharisees, and of the Sadducees. That is, take heed how you hear, and beware lest you go back again unto the doctrines of the Pharisees, and of the Sadducees.

It needs no labored argument to shew, that 'the leaven,' spoken of in the text, has reference to doctrine. The 12th verse of this chapter reads as follows—'Then understood they how he bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees.' The Saviour, in Matt. xiii. 33, says, 'The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal till the whole was leavened.' Now the leaven of Gospel truth—the true doctrine, is to work till the whole lump of error is purged out, and the doctrines of Christ become universal. For it is the nature of leaven (or yeast) to work till it has finished its duty. Rev. Mr. Paige says, 'It is the characteristic of leaven, that it ceases not its operation till it has changed the character of the whole mass with which it is mixed.' 'A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.' So it is with the truths of the Gospel. They are to work out in the hearts of men the peaceable fruits of righteousness, and build us up in every holy work.

It was an exhortation of Paul, to purge out the old leaven, that they might become a new lump, as they were unleavened. See 1 Cor. v. 6-8. Although leaven is a substance, yet it is used as a figure, and is a striking and forcible metaphor, in many respects.

The true leaven of the Gospel is to root out all error, and fill the whole earth with love and peace. The doctrines of Christ are like the leaven—they are sure to accomplish their object—and when that is fulfilled, they have nothing more to do. Now it is well known that the Pharisees taught for doctrines the commandments of men; and that the disciples were cautioned against these errors—to shun them. They were exhorted to be cautious how they imbibed false notions. They were to beware, and receive what they taught only so far as it corresponded with the truth—what Jesus taught.

Now, it is a well known fact, that there is no system of faith among us, but what has some truth mixed with it—and it may be that there is error in all systems. So was it with these people, whom the Saviour cautioned his disciples to beware of. We should seek to know the truth of God—to find it out, and then to reject all that is contrary to what is revealed as truth in God's word.

It may be interesting to make the following inquiries with their proper answers—

1st. What did the Pharisees believe and teach?

2d. What did the Sadducees believe and teach?

3d. What did the Saviour teach and call upon the people to believe?

With these few remarks, we are prepared to investigate this all important subject: for there is as much necessity to beware now, as in the days of Christ.

1st. What did the Pharisees believe and teach?

And here we must confine our remarks to one or two subjects. 1st. What were their views in relation to God, and the destiny of his offspring?

They believed in, and worshipped a partial God supposing themselves the favorites of his love and grace, and all others as outcasts. They trusted in themselves, and boasted of their works—and they taught for doctrines the commandments of men, and were more zealous for the traditions of their fathers, than for the law. As God is at the foundation of faith—our faith will correspond with our ideas of God's character. Hence, if the Pharisees believed in, and worshipped a partial God, they would teach as a natural consequence, that he had his favorites and that he would bless them in preference to any one else. Now history informs us that such was the character and the belief of the Pharisees. 'They boasted that from their accurate knowledge of religion, they were the favorites of heaven, and thus trusting in themselves that they were righteous and despised others.'—See St. Luke xviii. 9-13.

HORNE in treating on this subject gives them a similar character.

JOSEPHUS, who was a Jew, who lived in the age of the Saviour, and whose history can be relied upon, makes the following observations.

'They believed in the resurrection of the dead; but it was after the Pythagorean manner, that is, of the soul only, by its transmigration into another body.' He says, 'From this resurrection they excluded all who were notoriously wicked, being of the opinion that the souls of such persons were transmitted into a state of everlasting woe.' In another place, he says, 'They believed that the souls of men are immortal, and that under the earth, there will be rewards and punishments accordingly as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; and the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again.'

As a general thing, they believed that the benefits of the resurrection would be confined to their own nation—the Hebrews; and advocated the endless imprisonment of the wicked—the Gentile nation. If we read the first part of the 15th chapter of St. Matt. we shall learn that they taught contrary to the commandments of God—made void the law by their traditions; and thus made the true teachings of none effect. And it was against this and other doctrines, that the Saviour cautioned the disciples to 'take heed and beware.' He told them in plain language, 'Every plant, (or doctrine) which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up.' In various places he gives a full description of their character and teachings, and every person who has a New Testament, can form some opinion of the life, character, and doctrines of the Pharisees. Now we know that when any sect becomes exclusive in their feelings, they are governed by their faith. We also know that sects become divided in consequence of the spirit of investigation. Now, inasmuch, as the Pharisees advocated the resurrection of the righteous to the enjoyment of life and peace, and the imprisonment of the rest, it led some to examine or inquire—and the consequence was, a new sect came out from them. This sect were called Sadducees. And this will lead us in the second place, to notice them—

2d. What did the Sadducees believe and teach?

If we read the 8th verse of the 23d chapter of Acts, we shall learn that they denied the resurrection of the dead. 'For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit: but the Pharisees confess both.' This agrees with the account given by Luke in his Gospel—'There came to him certain of the Sadducees (which deny that there is any resurrection) and they asked him, saying, &c., &c. Luke xx. 27-38. From the account here given, as well as that by St. Matt. xxii. 23-33, we draw the conclusion that the Saviour taught a very different resurrection from what the Pharisees believed in.

Now if the Sadducees believed in no resurrection—no future life—then they were what we call infidels at the present day. And if the Pharisees believed, as we have shown, in a partial resurrection—or that only a part were to be benefited by this resurrection, and the wicked were 'to be detained in an everlasting prison,' what was their faith—but what we term Partialism at the present day, though in a different form?

Now, every candid student of the New Testament will, and must acknowledge, that the doctrines of Christ are entirely different from the two just noticed. And also, that he often cautioned the disciples to beware of these two sects—to have no communion with them, but to treat them with respect—to love and pray for them; 'to bless and curse not.'

These few remarks, will lead us to examine in the next place,

3d. What did the Saviour teach and call upon the people to believe?

The Saviour taught, and it is what he would have us believe, that there is one true and living God, who is impartial: 'for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.' When we pray, he has taught us to say 'OUR FATHER,' &c.; informing us that we are the children of God—and consequently, brethren,—heirs of immortality, and that we are destined to the same home—where we are forever to remain. Jesus taught us that he came to seek and save that which was lost. To save us by the regenerating power of his glorious truth, which he came to bear witness unto.

He has taught us that God has no favorites in particular, but that we all stand on the same common level—that we are all sinners, and stand in need of salvation.

As the leading doctrines of duty he has called upon us to love God supremely, and mankind universally. Every doctrine he set forth teaches us to look upon each other as belonging to the same family, and that ultimately, we are all to share alike in the blessings of the resurrection, the crowning excellence and glory of the Saviour's work.

In the account given of his conversation with the Sadducees, he does not hold out the idea that there is to be no resurrection—or that it is to be confined to any particular class of people; but on the contrary holds out the idea that THE DEAD are to be raised.

They are to be raised up to a state of immortality, and glory, and happiness. To a perfect state of felicity where they 'neither marry, nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. Now that the dead are raised, even Moses shewed at the bush. * * * * For he is not God of the dead, but of the living: for all live unto him.'

Jesus taught that he was the resurrection and life, and that because he lived, we should live also. He taught—'And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw ALL MEN unto me.' He states the object of his mission—that he came down from heaven, 'not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me, I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day.'

If the reader will read and learn how many the Father hath given to his Son, then he will discover how many the resurrection will benefit.

We must come to the happy conclusion that the family of mankind are destined to the regions of immortal bliss; and nothing but a conviction that the Saviour will fail to do all things well, will lead us to reject the doctrine of universal holiness and happiness.

Every other doctrine now in existence among Christians, can be summed up in one word—it is PARTIALISM. Take heed then, and beware of the leaven of Partialism, and of Infidelity.

Embrace the truth as it is in Jesus—confide in a Father's love—rest in the bosom of the Saviour—and believe what he has taught as the truth of heaven, and you will share a blessing with Abraham, and enter into the joys of peace, and love, Come and eat of the true and living bread from heaven, and life shall be yours, ever and forever. 'For I give you good doctrine,' says Solomon. And a wiser than Solomon is here, who says, 'Come unto me, and I will give you REST.'

With our views of heaven, and of the destiny of the human race, we can say with the poet.

'From north and south, from east and west,
Advance the myriads of the blest:
From every clime of earth they come,
And find in heaven a common home.

In one immortal throng we view
Pagan and Christian, Greek and Jew;
But, all their doubts and darkness o'er,
One only God they now adore.

How'er divided once below,
One bliss, one spirit here they know,
Here all their errors are forgiven,
And Jesus welcomes them to heaven.'

THE COUNTRY PASTOR.

Since the appearance of my articles concerning the 'Country Pastor,' his efforts and his friends, I am informed that some have affirmed that I must answer for them to a legal tribunal. To this I shall not object. Others have reported that he has written to me to induce me to make retractions; which is without foundation. It has been frequently declared that a reply would come in due time, and I hope it will not be delayed. I have heard it stated that he is procrastinating for the publication of a communication I have promised; that he may, at once, fully vindicate himself, and others implicated, and end the matter. The production referred to will be forthcoming at my convenience.—The subject is the exclusion or retention of certain books in district school libraries. It will not be personal, but general; and he, and those who act with him, can have no interest in it, but as members of a party whose views upon it differ from mine, and who may be troubled at the conclusion at which it will arrive. I shall issue nothing assailing them individually, unless in reply to something they have not yet advanced, or in vindication or support of what I have already written. If it should be demanded for this purpose, they may learn that I am 'deeper in their books' than they imagine; am in possession of facts which are not, and that they would not wish to have, very generally known.

I would suggest then that they defend themselves immediately through the Magazine and Advocate, that they may reach those who have read the accusations. This justice clearly demands. Its columns will doubtless be opened for any respectful communication of reasonable length that they may send. Should they choose any other medium, I shall not complain, if it inserts my articles with their review of them, and my rejoinders when received. If these are excluded, an impartial community will judge them to be doubly infamous; guilty of the deeds alleged against them, and seeking to extricate themselves in public estimation by misrepresentation and deception, instead of making the 'amende honorable,' or meeting me where both can be heard. That my article may have contained one or two unessential errors is possible; but any exceptions to invalidate their principal accusations will be worse than useless. They can be substantiated by proof that can not be impeached; by testimony so overwhelming as to convince even the most skeptical.

J. T. GOODRICH.

P. S. In 'setting up' my communications exposing the 'Country Pastor' and others, several grammatical and typographical errors and omissions were made, the most of which I will not notice, as they were unquestionably obvious and corrected by the reader. One, however, would give him a false impression. In the 28th No. of the present volume of this paper, 218th page, 1st column, 11th line after first paragraph, place but before fifteen. The number specified was fifteen, and not less, as it now reads. On the same page, 2d column, 23d line below 1st paragraph, put since between has and been placed.

U. S. CONVENTION OF UNIVERSALISTS.

The General Convention of Universalists in the United States, will hold its next Annual Session in the city of Troy, N. Y., on the third Wednesday and following Thursday (16th and 17th) in September, 1846. Occasional Sermon by Rev. Asher Moore of Philadelphia.

J. M. AUSTIN, Standing Clerk.

HUDSON RIVER ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of the Hudson River Association of Universalists for 1846, will be held in Albany the 1st Wednesday and following Thursday in September. The council will be organized on Wednesday morning at 8 1-2 o'clock, and public services commence at 10 1-2. Br. T. L. Harris was appointed to preach the Occasional Sermon.

J. A. ASPINWALL, Standing Clerk.

CHENANGO ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS.

This body will hold its session for 1846, in North Norwich, Chenango co., on the first Wednesday and Thursday, (2d and 3d,) of September. The Council will convene at 8 o'clock, Wednesday morning. Religious worship will commence at half past 10. It is expected that no church or society will fail to be represented by two lay delegates prepared to report the number of members now living within their bounds, the increase or decrease during the past year, the amount of preaching they support, the condition of their Sunday School, (if they have any,) and impart all information pertaining to their prosperity that is important and interesting. Clergymen and laymen, brethren and sisters, from every part of Chenango, Broome, Delaware and the adjoining counties are earnestly invited to attend. Let us have by hundred the largest gathering of Universalists ever known within the limits of our Association.

J. T. GOODRICH, Standing Clerk.

MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE CHENANGO ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS.

This body will hold its third annual meeting in North Norwich, on Thursday and Friday, the 3d and 4th of September. All officers and friends generally should be present. Let no ordinary excuse in any case cause absence. The question is often asked by our friends, can we be satisfactorily supplied with lectures, &c., the ensuing year? IF EVERY TRUSTEE, AND IN EACH PLACE WHERE THERE IS NO TRUSTEE AND MEETINGS ARE DESIRED, IF SOME PERSON PREVIOUSLY communicates to me or at its session informs the Board what SUM CAN BE RAISED in their locations, for Sunday or week day or evening preaching, YOU CAN. If the assemblage is thin, and this information is not imparted, IT IS HIGHLY IMPROBABLE, IF NOT ABSOLUTELY IMPOSSIBLE. Brethren, each and all, be up and doing.

J. T. GOODRICH, Secretary.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The Fall Term of this well known School, Male and Female Department, will commence on Wednesday, the 2d of September, proximo. It will continue under the same government and teachers as during the year past, with the exception of teacher of Mathematics.

WORSHIP.

BY L. D. JOHNSON.

Great God! who flung so fair a robe
Of clouds around yon hills of blue—
Those mountain pillars of the globe,
That deck thy throne of azure hue!
Now glittering round the brow of night,
Their fleecy robes are lightly furled,
As if to hide from mortal sight
The glories of the upper world.
These giant trees, unshorn and tall,
Shall be thy unpolluted hall,
And standing there, alone, aloof,
Shall form a sculptured Gothic roof,
And leaves that spread their carpet o'er,
Shall be the temple's humble floor,
While you fair moon, the sky its home,
Shall be the lamp to light the dome.

The stars—those twinkling isles of light,
Round which the clouds unfurl their sails—
As pure as woman's robe of white,
That trembles round the form it veils,
With holy thoughts shall touch the heart
And set the soaring fancy free—
How sweet the tales they thus impart,
Of faith, and hope, of love, and thee!
And thou, whose mind is wrapt in night,
Who spurns the true impartial light,
At midnight hour, with awe and fear,
Kneel down in truth and worship here.
Thy walls of pride will fall away,
The freed soul basks in beams of day,
And hope that ever rapture gave,
Shall sweetly smile o'er Error's grave!

DESTRUCTION OF THE INQUISITION.

[The following account of the destruction of the Inquisition at Madrid is related by Col. Lehmanowsky, a colonel in the French Army, who was entrusted with the duty of demolishing the Inquisitorial buildings in 1809. Col. L. is now a minister of the Lutheran church in one of the Western States.]

It had been decreed by the Emperor Napoleon, that the Inquisition should be suppressed, but the decree was not executed. Months passed away, and the prisons of the Inquisition had not been opened. One night, about 10 o'clock, as Col. L. was walking one of the streets of Madrid, two armed men sprang from an alley, and made a furious attack. He instantly drew his sword, put himself in a posture of defence, and while struggling with them, he saw, at a distance, the lights of the patrols—French soldiers mounted, who carried lanterns, and who rode through the streets of the city to preserve order. He called to them in French and as they hastened to his assistance, the assailants took to their heels and escaped, not, however, before he saw by their dress that they belonged to the Guards of the Inquisition.

He went immediately to Marshal Soult, then Governor of Madrid, told him what had taken place, and reminded him of the decree to suppress the institution. Marshal Soult replied that he might go and destroy it. Col. L. told him that his regiment was not sufficient for such a service, but if he would give him two additional regiments, he would undertake the work. The troops required were granted and I proceeded (said Col. L.) to the Inquisition, which was situated about five miles from the city. It was surrounded with a wall of great strength, and defended with a company of soldiers. When we arrived at the walls, I addressed one of the sentinels, and summoned the 'Holy Fathers' to surrender to the Imperial army, and open the gates of the Inquisition. The sentinel, who was stationed on the wall, appeared to enter into conversation for a moment with some one within, at the close of which he presented his musket and shot one of my men. This was a signal of attack, and I ordered my troops to fire upon those who appeared on the walls.

It was soon obvious that it was an unequal warfare.—The walls of the Inquisition were covered with the soldiers of the holy office; there was also a breastwork upon the wall, behind which they kept continually, only as they partially exposed themselves as they discharged their muskets. Our troops were in an open plain and exposed to a destructive fire. We had no cannon, nor could we scale the walls, and the gates resisted all attempts at forcing them. I could not retire and send for cannon to break through the walls, without giving them time to lay a train for blowing us up. I saw that it was necessary to change the mode of attack, and directed some trees to be cut down and trimmed, to be used as battering-rams. Two of these were taken up by detachments of men, as numerous as could work to advantage, and brought to bear upon the walls with all the power they could exert, while the troops kept up a fire, to protect them from the fire poured upon them from the walls. Presently the walls began to tremble, a breach was made, and the Imperial troops rushed into the Inquisition. I caused the 'Holy Fathers' to be placed under guard, and all the soldiers of the Inquisition to be secured as prisoners. We then proceeded to examine all the apartments of the stately edifice. We passed through room after room, and found every thing to please the eye, and gratify a cultivated taste; but where were those horrid instruments of torture of which we had been told; and where those dungeons in which human beings were said to be buried alive? We searched in vain. The 'Holy Fathers' assured us that they had been belied—that we had seen all; and I was prepared to give up the search, convinced that this Inquisition was different from others of which I had heard.

But Col. De Lile was not so ready as myself to give up the search. He advised that water should be poured over the floor of the Inquisition which was composed of large and beautifully polished slabs of marble, and a careful examination of every seam in the floor, to see if the water passed through. By the side of one of these marble slabs the water passed through fast, as though there was an opening beneath. All hands were now at work for further discovery. The officers with their swords, and the soldiers with their bayonets, seeking to clear out the seam, and pry up the slab. Others with the butts of their muskets, striking the slab with all their might, to break it, while the priests remonstrated against our desecrating their holy and beautiful house. While thus engaged, a soldier who was striking with the butt of his musket, hit a spring, and the marble slab flew up. Then the faces of the Inquisitors grew pale as Belshazzar's, when the handwriting appeared on the wall: they trembled all over.—Beneath the marble slab, now partly up, there was a staircase. I stepped to the altar, and took from the candlestick one of the candles, four feet in length, which was burning, that I might explore the room below. As we reached the foot of the stairs, we entered a large square room, which was called the Hall of Judgment. In the centre of it was a large block, and a chain fastened to it. On this they had been accustomed to place the accused, chained to his seat. On one side of the room, was an elevated seat called the Throne of Judgment. This the Inquisitor General occupied, and on either side were seats less elevated, for the Holy Fathers, when engaged in the solemn business of the Holy Inquisition.

From this room we proceed to the right, and obtained access to small cells, extending the entire length of the edifice; and here such sights were presented as we hope never to see again!

These cells are places of solitary confinement where the wretched objects of Inquisitorial hate are confined year after year, till death released them from their sufferings, and there their bodies were suffered to remain until they were entirely decayed, and the rooms had become fit for others to occupy. To prevent this being offensive to those who occupied the Inquisition, there were flues or tubes extending to the open air, sufficiently capacious to carry off the odor. In these cells we found the remains of some who had paid the debt of nature: some of them had been dead apparently but a short time, while of others nothing remained but their bones, still chained to the floor of their dungeon.

In other cells, we found living sufferers of both sexes, and of every age, from three score years and ten, down to fourteen and fifteen years—all naked as when born into the world! and all in chains! Here were old men and aged women, who had been shut up for many years!—Here, too, were the middle aged, and the young man and maiden of fourteen years old. The soldiers immediately went to work to release these captives from their chains, and took from their knapsacks their overcoats and other clothing, which they gave to cover their nakedness. They were exceedingly anxious to bring them out to the light of day, but Col. L. aware of the danger, had food given them, and then brought them out gradually to the light as they were able to bear it.

We then proceeded to explore another room on the left. Here we found the instruments of torture, of every kind which the ingenuity of man or devils could invent. Col. L. here described four of these horrid instruments. The first was a machine by which the victim was confined, and then, beginning with the fingers, every joint in the hands, arms and body, were broken or drawn, one after another, until the victim died. The second was a box, in which the head and neck of the victim were so closely confined by a screw, that he could not move in any way. Over the box was a vessel from which a drop of water a second fell upon the head of the victim—every successive drop falling on precisely the same place on the head, suspended the circulation in a few moments, and put the sufferer in most excruciating agony. The third was an infernal machine laid horizontally, to which the victim was bound, the machine then being placed between two beams, in which scores of knives, so fixed, that, by turning a crank, the flesh of the sufferer was torn from his all in small pieces. The fourth surpassed the others in fiendish ingenuity. Its exterior was a beautiful woman, or large doll, richly dressed, with arms extended, ready to embrace its victim. Around her feet a semicircle was drawn. The victim who passed over this fatal mark touched a spring, which caused the diabolical engine to open its arms, clasped around him, and a thousand knives cut him in as many pieces, in the deadly embrace.

Col. L. said that the sight of these engines of infernal cruelty kindled the rage of the soldiers to fury. They declared that every Inquisitor and soldier of the Inquisition should be put to the torture. Their rage was ungovernable. Col. L. did not oppose them; they might have turned their arms against him, if he had attempted to arrest their work.

They began with the Holy Fathers. The first they put to death in the machine for breaking joints. The torture of the Inquisitor, put to death by the dropping of water on his head, was excruciating. The poor man cried out in agony to be taken from the fatal machine.—The Inquisitor General was brought before the infernal engine, called 'the Virgin.' The soldiers commanded him to kiss the Virgin. He begged to be excused. 'No,' said they, 'you have caused others to kiss her, and you must do it.' They interlocked their bayonets so as to form large forks, and with these they pushed him over the deadly circle. The beautiful image instantly prepared for the embrace, clasped him in its arms, and he was cut into innumerable pieces. Col. L. said he witnessed the torture of four of them—his heart was sickened at the awful scene—and he left the soldiers to wreak their vengeance on the last guilty inmate of that prison-house of hell.

In the meantime, it was reported through Madrid, that the prisons of the Inquisition were broken open, and multitudes hastened to the fatal spot. And O, what a meeting was there! It was like a resurrection! About a hundred who had been buried for many years, were now restored to life. There were fathers who found their long-lost daughters; wives were restored to their husbands, sisters to their brothers, and parents to their children; and there were some who could recognise no friend among the multitude. The scene was such as no tongue can describe.

When the multitude had retired, Col. L. caused the library, paintings, furniture, &c., to be removed, and having sent to the city for a wagon load of powder, he deposited a large quantity in the vaults beneath the building, and placed a slow match in connection with it. All had withdrawn at a distance—and in a few moments there was a most joyful sight to thousands! The walls and turrets of the massive structure rose majestically towards the heavens, impelled by the tremendous explosion—and fell back to the earth, an immense heap of ruins. The Inquisition was no more!

REMARKS.—Such were the horrors of the Spanish Inquisition—such the cruelties and abominations practised, even in the present century, by Catholics on Catholics and all others within their power who fell under the condemnation of the ghostly Fathers and Familiars of the Inquisition! How does the heart shudder and recoil, and the very blood curdle in the veins at the bare recital of such abominable cruelties! And yet, kind reader, will you believe it? cruelties and horrors far more dreadful than any ever invented or practised by Catholic Inquisitors, are ascribed in this our own day and our own country, and by Protestant Christians, to the 'Father of the spirits of all flesh'—to the God that made us; who is, by the popular orthodoxy of our day, represented as preparing torments for a large portion of his own offspring inconceivably more dreadful than the 'Embrace of the Virgin,' or any other mode of torture described above—torments to last, not for an hour merely, or a day, or a week, or a month, or a year, or an age even, but of which the countless ages of ETERNITY ITSELF shall never witness the end!

Reader, pause for one moment, and reflect—can that doctrine be true that ascribes such a character to our heavenly Father? If so, and he is still a good being, how truly amiable must appear the character of those Spanish Inquisitors in comparison with his! For they put a final period to the sufferings of their victims; but He, according to this doctrine, never!

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

Among the antiquities of London, none will excite more profound interest than the Tower. This building occupies a space of twelve acres, is surrounded by a strongly fortified wall and ditch, which formerly contained water, but is now dry. The Tower was formerly the palace of the monarch, but it has not been for a long period used for that purpose. The entrance is through four successive gates some of them guarded by a double portcullis, and which is still opened in the morning with great ceremony and precaution. Here is the prison of Queen Elizabeth, and the watergate called the Traitor's Gate, through which the Queen refused to enter, declaring that she was no traitor. This prison is in the principal or 'White Tower,' the foundation of which is attributed to William, the Conqueror. It has, however, by others, been declared to be the work of Julius Cæsar. The Tower was described by Fitz Stephen in the 12th century; he does not state who was the founder. He says, 'London hath on the east part, a Tower Palatine, very large and very strong, whose court and walls rise up from a deep foundation. The mortar is tempered with blood of beasts.' Immediately opposite the Traitor's Gate is the bloody, a rough, forbidding place, in which the infant princes are said to have been strangled by their uncle Richard III. After passing the gate of the Bloody Tower, we come to the chapel of the Tower: here is the burial place of the Queen of Henry VIII, Anna Boleyn and Catharine Howard; Earls of Essex, Cromwell and Deverux; Lady Jane Gray and her husband, and many others. Opposite to the church is the room in which the commissioners met to examine Guy Fawkes. The Beuchamp Tower was the prison of many illustrious persons; among the number was Queen Anna Boleyn, Earl of Warwick, Earl of Arundel, Earl of Leicester; but this room is no longer a prison, but is now employed as a mess room for the officers of the garrison.

One of the interesting rooms of the Tower is what is called the 'Horse armory.' The room is 150 feet in length, and 52 in width, and contains in the centre a line of equestrian figures, running its entire length, representing the varieties of armor worn at different ages. These armors are of most extraordinary workmanship. They are mostly of polished steel, many of them inlaid with gold, all conveying the idea of immense labor in their construction. A soldier armed cap-a-pie, was very securely shielded, until the introduction of fire arms; but the weight of the armor, often amounting to one hundred pounds offered a great impediment to free motion. The horses were also shielded with steel plates. Here also, are ponderous lances, huge, ill-looking swords, spears, battle axes, bridle-cutter hooks for dismounting horsemen, and every possible variety of war instrument.

Another very interesting room is called Queen Elizabeth's Armory. This is supposed to have been the prison lodging of Sir Walter Raleigh, and several inscriptions are still visible which were engraved by other unfortunate prisoners. This room contains also an equestrian figure she wore on her way to St. Paul's to return thanks for her deliverance from the Spanish. In this room are seen various hellish instruments of torture, and to form an opinion of the people from the implements, we might readily infer that the country had been infested with devils. The infernal thumb-screw, or thumikin, is composed of two bars of iron, approximated by means of screws, and then made fast by a lock. The Iron Collar of Torment weighs about fifteen pounds, and is provided with sharp points to pierce the neck. Another instrument is the Cravat, or Scavenger's Daughter, used for the purpose of forcing the body into the smallest space, by incredible force and inhuman torture. Here is also to be seen the Heading Block and the identical Heading Axe used on several occasions. The instruments of war are also numerous and singular. Among these is the Morning Star, or Holy Water Sprinkler, consisting of a ball of wood and spikes, used by the infantry, the term 'Holy Water,' referring to the loss of human blood which it occasioned: also the Military Flail, the Catchpole, and the Military Fork, Two-Handed Battle-Axe, and Two-Handed Swords.

In passing through the Tower, the theatre of so many intrigues, horrible deeds of cruelty and murder, the mind becomes oppressed with the baseness of humanity and the degradation of the mind of man; but as we contemplate with pleasure the bright sun that dispels the dark shades of night, so we rejoice in the influence of civilization and true Christianity, which have deprived man of his demon-like propensities, and restored him to his God-like nature. With pleasure we turn from this dark record of crime and pass to the Jewel room.

The Regalia deposited in a room recently appropriated to that purpose, presents a magnificent spectacle. Here is the ancient imperial crown of Charles II., Prince of Wales' Crown; the ancient Queen's Crown: but the magnificent display of England's Regalia, is the crown of her present Majesty. The cap is of purple velvet, with silver hoops covered with diamonds, with a cross of brilliants, containing a remarkable centre sapphire; on the front is a heart-shaped ruby, said to have been worn by Edward the Black Prince. This diadem weighs 13.4 pounds and is valued at one million pounds sterling. The Baptismal font of her present Majesty, and the Prince of Wales, is four feet high, and cost forty thousand pounds. There are various other costly paraphernalia belonging to the Regalia, such as St. Edward's staff of pure gold, 4 feet 7 inches long, the Royal Sceptre of gold, 2 feet 9 inches long, the Queen's ivory sceptre mounted in gold, with a dove of white onyx; the orb six inches in diameter, edged with pearls, is surmounted with roses of diamonds. The sovereign holds this orb in the left hand at the Coronation—the Swords of Justice temporal and ecclesiastical, and numerous other articles which we can not mention. The value of this whole regalia is estimated at thirty million pounds sterling, equal to one hundred and forty millions five hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

'Live on a sixpence a day, and work to earn it,' was the guinea's worth of advice the eccentric Dr. Abernethy, of London, gave to the lazy gormond of a dyspeptic, who wanted of physic, what neither man nor God, except by miracle, could do for him. Nature's laws are never broken with impunity.

UTICA, FRIDAY, AUGUST 21, 1846.

WESTERN N. Y. UNIVERSALIST S. S. ASSOCIATION.

An article in the Magazine and Advocate of the 7th inst., over the proper signature of the Secretary of the N. Y. Universalist S. S. Association, contains the acknowledgment, that he is aware of the existence of a body organized for similar purposes in Western New York.—He also admits, that my article of the preceding week, 'seems to require some notice,' at his hand. This may be very well—but it seems to me that it was the Western N. Y. Universalist S. S. Association which required his notice, long before.

Again, he says—'With the temper of that article, I have nothing at present to do,' &c. Whether he had, or had not, is of little moment; and it is probably as well that he did not attempt to do any thing with it. For we assure all concerned, that the temper of the article is quite as mild, and benignant, as that of its author.

In his second paragraph, the Secretary says—'At the session of the State Sunday School Association held at Cortland, in 1845, not a word was offered in relation to the Western Association: not an item of its doings or statistics was reported. Does not this satisfactorily account for the silence of the minutes of that meeting respecting the latter body?' I think not. For though the formal report of our proceedings did not reach the Secretary at Cortland, still one of our delegates (Rev. D. H. Strickland) did reach that place, and was present during the session. And there is some reason to believe, that he then and there furnished an abstract of our statistics.—And further—without assuming the fact, it seems quite probable that the corrected statistics, published in the Christian Messenger of June 28, 1845, as far as they related to Western New York, were drawn from our published report. I am therefore not quite prepared to admit—that not one word was offered respecting this subject, at Cortland.

In his third paragraph, the Secretary says—'The session of the State Association for 1846, at Newark, was called for Tuesday, May 26. On that day, the whole of which was devoted to Sunday School affairs, no one attended in behalf of the Western Association. After the address in the evening, it was deemed advisable to adjourn over to Wednesday evening, merely for the purpose as was understood, of voting upon the resolutions which had been discussed, and formally adjourning. Accordingly at about 9 o'clock on that evening, the Association was called to order, and the resolutions referred to were passed. Then the delegates of the Western Association for the first time appeared, stated in substance the fact of their appointment, and inquired whether the Constitution of the State Association would permit their admission as members? The Constitution being referred to, it was concluded that it did not,' &c.

Very well. No person can complain that the Association met on Tuesday, nor would I consider it a fault of the Secretary, that our delegates did not arrive till nine o'clock on Wednesday evening. Be this as it may, they did arrive and present themselves before the State Association closed. And the public is now for the first time told, that certain inquiries were made by them, and certain measures adopted in consequence, and a particular result obtained—viz. that the Constitution did not admit of their being received as members. The only absurd thing connected with this transaction, is the privacy observed respecting it. Why was not some reference made to all this, either in the minutes of the session, or in the report and remarks? By the showing of the Secretary, the attendance of our delegates and the investigation consequent on their inquiries, gave rise to the appointment of a committee for the purpose of altering the Constitution. One would suppose that these proceedings were as legiti-mate portions of the business of the Association as any other; and therefore they as effectually belong to the public. And if the State Association did nothing respecting this matter of which it had no reason to be ashamed, there was no good reason for the suppression of this part of its proceedings: and if it did not order the suppression—then its Secretary must bear the responsibility, unless indeed, 'it rests upon some other head.' S. R. S.

THE MOTE vs. THE BEAM.

It is not a little surprising that some ministers of the Gospel can so easily observe the faults of others and remain so totally blind to their own. We have now in our 'mind's eye,' a good brother who has labored many years in the vineyard of the Master, and with tolerable success too; but like all others that we have met with, he is far from being perfect. He is not without his faults, and many of those faults are equal in magnitude to those of others of his ministerial brethren who like himself maintain at least a respectable standing in the order. Yet he is continually harping upon the errors and imperfections of his brethren; upon the faults of this brother and the faults of that brother; this one has done one thing and that one has done another thing; this one preaches thus, and that one preaches so, and many other imperfections he observes in the conduct of his brethren of the ministry, and he spares no pains in trumpeting them abroad and thus putting weapons into the hands of the enemy to be wielded against that cause for which he has declared. And the good man supposes that he is clothed in the beautiful habiliment of perfection. He has been so long engaged with the view of the 'mote' in his brother's eye, that he has forgotten that there is a 'beam' in his own. My dear brother; there is an old saying running on this wise—'If every man would sweep before his own door we should have clean streets.' Brother, have you lost your broom?

And the laymen too. They are too fond of looking after the 'mote.' We fear that they do not see as clearly as they might were they to turn their attention in another direction. 'My neighbor has been guilty of a wrong—it is indeed strange that one will let selfishness so govern and direct his mind and sway his actions—there is a way which is right, but he is far from being in it.'—'One has said this, and another has said that—the heart of man is prone to iniquity.' And now, what have you done, my brother? What have you said? And how is your heart?

Reader; do you wish to know when the Millennium will commence? We will tell you—when every man minds his own business and does not trouble himself about his neighbor's! Just think of it. S. J. G.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR—NEW WORK PROPOSED.

Montreal, August 6, 1846.

Sir,—It appears to me that one thing is much wanted among Universalists and Unitarians; it is a pocket manual of liberal Christianity. It might be composed easily within the space of a small pocket; with that and a pocket Bible the liberal Christian might be almost always able to silence, and frequently to convince, any opponent. But at present very few can devote sufficient time to study the subject so as to have all the texts in their head, while there are many who can reason well if they have the data. This especially applies to persons travelling, or those going to the far West. The plan is as follows:—in one page is two columns:—1st column, Partialist and Trinitarian texts; 2d, explanatory texts; the other page to contain concessions of Trinitarian and Partialist writers. The book might be divided something in the following way. Unitarian Manual. Texts adduced to prove I. The Deity of Christ. II. Of the Holy Spirit. III. The Trinity, generally. IV. Atonement. V. Original sin and total depravity. VI. Unitarian texts classified. Universalist Manual. Texts in which, I. Hades is brought forward to prove eternal punishment. II. Sheol. III. Gehenna.

IV. Tartarus, of course with references and concessions as explained above. V. 'Everlasting,' 'forever,' &c., explained. VI. Universalist texts classified. The texts might be quoted at large, or not, according as room could be spared. I could, if required, do the Unitarian manual myself and send, as I have access to a large work by John Wilson.

Considering the stupidity of the people here, Unitarianism gets on at an astonishing rate; owing in a great measure to the kindness of other sects in running it down. This spring, lectures have been given against it in almost every pulpit in the city. That is the way to make opinions thrive. By stupidity I mean want of a literary spirit, and want of a go-aheaditiveness. There is but 8 English book-stores here to an Anglo Saxon and Irish population of 23,000. How many are there in Utica? I want to get some statistics on that subject, to see how much per cent. democracy adds to intelligence.

The whole compass of liberal Christianity lies in a nut shell—(or a small pocket book)—and I think it high time to stop this quibbling. It has been going on for centuries; whereas with the 'Manual' I would undertake to stop the mouth of any Goliath of the other party in half an hour. And what is all this fuss about? Why one says 3 times 1 equals 1. Unitarians say 3 times 1 equals 3—and there's the whole matter.

TEXTS. EXPLANATORY TEXTS. CONCESSIONS.

Matt. iii: 12.

Chaff; disobedient and rebellious Jews;—unquenchable fire, that can not be extinguished by man.—A. Clarke.

Matt. xii: 32.

* * * 'neither in this dispensation (the Jewish) or that which is to come (the Christian)—olam-ha-bo, the world to come, was a constant phrase for the times of the Messiah in Jewish writers, etc. A. Clarke.

Matt. xiii: 24-30.

Some learned men think that all this refers to the Jewish state and people, and that the words com, trans, 'end of the world,' should be 'end of age,' or end of the Jewish polity. That the words have this meaning in other places there is no doubt.—A. Clarke.

'Everlasting.' Gen. xvii: 8, xlix: 26. Ex. xl: 15. Lev. xvi: 34. Heb. iii: 6.

See Greek and Hebrew Lexicons.

The above is a sample. The 'Concessions' might be more condensed if necessary; and the texts given in full. Also might be given a Universalist Concordance copied from Cruden's. I know this plan will answer. I am extremely anxious that it should be tried; and would do any thing in my power to set it going. I am, &c.

ALFRED CRIDGE.

P. S. Yet again, how many millions of Anglo Saxons are there on every quarter of the globe—scattered abroad, far from the institutions of civilized society. They can't be all of them furnished with a theological library; but this Manual, with a Bible, would be a library itself, on the points it treats of. There are well educated missionaries in most parts of the world which a well informed Universalist would find a difficulty in arguing with. This should not be. But leave talking alone; the work must be done. A. C.

REMARKS.—Reader, above you have the plan proposed by friend Cridge, of Montreal, for a Unitarian and Universalist Manual. What think you of it? It is certainly feasible, and to many, no doubt, it will appear plausible. And there many among us who are abundantly competent to the performance of the work. In this region, however, and in most places in the Northern and Middle States where our doctrines have been much preached and our books and papers extensively circulated, it will by many be deemed an unnecessary work, on the ground that the believers in our faith, having battled so long and successfully for the truth, are already furnished by memory, both in head and heart, with all the necessary weapons to defend the truth and to assail error without any such Manual—and also because we have an ample supply of works published by Universalists to meet all emergencies—in Winchester's Dialogues, Streeter's Familiar Conversations, Ballou's and Whittemore's works on the Parables, the Discussions of Thomas and Ely, Skinner and Campbell, and others of a like character, Balfour's Inquiries, Ancient and Modern History of Universalism, Universalist Guide, Universalist's Assistant, Universalist Book of Reference, Paige's Selections and Commentary, etc., etc., with all our periodicals and smaller works on the subject. Those Universalists who are slower to reading at all, and who would read such a Manual, must be already supplied with the means of meeting and answering all objections, and defending our faith against all opposition.

But still there are places and sections in the Northern and Middle States, and other vast regions, no doubt, where the works above named are almost if not wholly unknown, and where such a Manual, if it could be introduced, would be of great service; and it might possibly be of great service to our Unitarian brethren: but to what extent they stand in need of such a work we know not. At all events, such a work would do no harm, and might, do great good. We are willing the subject should be discussed; and if thought advisable, let the work be prepared by a competent person, or competent persons, and published. D. S.

FRAGMENTS.

Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.—BIBLE.

'He is a pretty smart man in his way,' said one, while speaking of another. So is the fool, but it is a foolish way.

ADVERSITY.—'Solitary and alone.' PROSPERITY.—Friends enough—and to spare!

'Take heed to thyself.' It is the language of Paul to one of his brethren, I believe. But how much more in agreement with the inclination of men at the present age, had it been—Take heed unto thy neighbor.

'The fear of the Lord, is the beginning of knowledge.' There are by far too many who have not yet commenced their education.

'Wisdom crieth without; she uttereth her voice in the streets.' Why? Because mankind refuse her admittance into their habitations.

Distinguished men seldom receive their due from their fellow mortals, until after they have gone down to their sepulchres. Then the tyrant is condemned, and the patriot praised. Before his death, the fear of the tyrant's power drove men to flatter him; but now that he is dead, fear is removed and men are unsparing in their condemnation. But relative to the patriot, envy ascribes his actions to selfish and sinister motives; until the grave closes over his remains; and as envy has but little to do beyond the tomb, his deeds receive their meed of praise.

Were it not for us, we should neglect to place a proper value upon meals. It is by contrast that we more fully learn the nature and worth of our blessings; or to speak it with a homely comparison, we must burn one finger in order to fully know how good those feel which are not burned. But it is folly to argue from this that pain will always be necessary, for the time shall come when mankind shall be in possession of knowledge so far superior to that which they obtain in this world, that contrast will no longer be necessary to convey to the mind a just appreciation of that which is good.

Were one to speak with the tongue of an angel, proclaiming the most rich, grand, and glorious truths of Heaven; yet the first inquiry with some would be—To what church does he belong? They are not much unlike the man who wished to be excused for not weeping during the delivery of a powerfully sympathetic discourse; giving as a reason therefor, that he belonged to a different church!

The leopard can not change his spots, it is true; but there are many professed Christians who must change theirs, or have them changed; if not, in heaven they will be taken for foreigners! S. J. G.

THE MISSION AND AUTHORITY OF CHRIST. A Discourse delivered at the Dedication of the Universalist Meeting House in Beverly, June 18, 1846. By Sylvanus Cobb. Christian Freeman Office, Boston.—pp. 20.

By the politeness of the author we have been favored with a copy of the above pamphlet, which we have read with great satisfaction. It is a sound and consistent discourse on the text Luke xxiv: 29—'Abide with us,' and is designed we judge, not only as a frank and ingenious exposition of the views of Universalists on the authority and great objects of the mission, teachings, death and resurrection of Christ, but as a timely rebuke of that insidious foe to all religion, skepticism, that in certain quarters, has lately been aiming to subvert the authority of Christ, and overthrow Christianity, under pretence of freedom of thought and philanthropic efforts to free religion from corruptions and the trammels of human authority, as for instance, Parkerism, et id genus omnes. We are glad to see this bold and decided stand taken by all our strong and leading men throughout our denomination.

AN ORATION, Delivered before the Niagara Division, No. 109, of the Sons of Temperance, at a public celebration in Lockport, N. Y., July 4th, 1846. By Rev. U. Clark.

This is an eloquent plea for the Sons of Temperance, an Order lately organized in this country for the purpose of promoting the cause of Temperance, with certain rules of discipline and conduct, and certain signs known only to the initiated, by which to recognize each other, keep out the unworthy, &c. They go upon the true Washingtonian principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, brotherly kindness and the power of moral suasion in reclaiming the dissolute and keeping them right after they are reclaimed. Patriotism, philanthropy, and temperance are the distinguishing topics of the pamphlet before us. It is well worth a perusal.

RULES FOR PULPIT SPEAKING.

The Western Evangelist of the 8th inst., gives some very good remarks on the subject of public speaking; but we do not know as it would have preachers speak by rule in giving their sermons to the people. Now though we would not wish to set ourself up as dictator in this matter, yet we think that ministers should speak in accordance with fixed rules, and we have seen none with which we are so well pleased as the following, which are respectfully dedicated to all whom they may concern.

I. Preach the Gospel—Christ and him crucified.

After the minister has complied with this rule, then, if the members of the congregation wish to hear a lecture on Fourierism, or Mesmerism, or some other humbugism of the day, they can find enough to supply them from the fragments of some shattered 'Association,' or from the host of travelling 'Dr.'s by which community is being gulled of a fortune.

II. Be sure to make the hearers understand what is said.

This rule being followed, if the hearers go from church praising the minister's pearly teeth, glossy hair, dandy coat, admirable gestures, and some other like qualities; then the worst is upon their own heads, for so did not those who heard Jesus and the Apostles preach.

III. Don't steal over half, or at the outside, three quarters of the sermon.

Half, or even three quarters, will do; but this taking the whole, is cutting it decidedly too fat; beside the Unitarians may suppose that the preacher is, or at least has been, 'approximating' them.

IV. The preacher should not speak over an hour after he has no more to say.

This preaching an hour or two after having gone through with the subject; twisting it this way, and turning it that way, to show how many different shapes it may have, is shockingly superfluous.

Brethren what think ye of the above rules? Pass them round, and let us know. S. J. G.

REMOVALS.—Br. T. J. Whitcomb of Hightstown, N. J., has received and accepted an invitation to take the pastoral charge of the Universalist society in Newport and Middleville, Herkimer county, N. Y., and will commence his labors with them on the fourth Sunday inst. He wishes all communications designed for him hereafter to be sent to Newport. Br. Whitcomb is an excellent man and a good pastor, and we hope and trust the connection will be mutually pleasant and profitable.

Br. Stebbins has taken up his residence in Detroit, and wishes all letters and papers for him to be directed accordingly.

We learn from the Trumpet that the Universalist society in Charlestown, has engaged Br. THOMAS S. KING as its Pastor, in place of Br. E. H. Chapin, who has removed to Boston. This is right. Br. King's beloved and lamented father was Pastor of that society when he died, and now seven years' time has provided a qualified son to stand in the same office. He is one of our most promising young men.—[Banner.]

DEATHS.

In Cobleskill, Schoharie county, May 14th, Mrs. MARY A. SHULTS, wife of Henry Shults, and daughter of John and Phila Rooks, (Niles,) in the 27th year of her age. Her sickness was long, painful, and of the most aggravating nature—yet she bore it without giving utterance to a complaint or bitter murmur. She conversed relative to her death and burial with the most perfect composure; and even longed for the hour of her dissolution to arrive, that her spirit might fly away to that 'better land,' where pain, sickness and death can never come; but where the weary find rest, and all that die in Adam a home of un fading bliss and glory.—She was a Universalist—lived and died such. May this holy Gospel faith cheer the mourning friends, and point them to that spirit clime where friends meet no more to part. J. M. PEEBLES.

In Oxford, on the 4th of March last, Mrs. MATILDA BROWN, mother of David Brown, Esq., in the 87th year of her age. Her funeral was attended on the 6th, in the Universalist meeting house, where a discourse was delivered by the writer, aided in the services by Br. Gibson, and her remains were followed by a large procession to the town of Norwich and there interred. J. T. G.

In Oxford, July 23d, Mrs. MARY TYRRELL, wife of Capt. James Tyrrell, aged 25 years.

In 1838, the deceased, the aged person whose death is above recorded, our late promising Br. Griswold, Br. H. B. Soule, myself, and five others, composed the family of our benevolent friend, D. Brown, Esq., in this village. The departure of three of the number forcibly reminds us that we 'are strangers and pilgrims on the earth.'

By the untimely exit of Mrs. T., community has lost one of pure morals, correct deportment and amiable disposition. As a companion, mother, daughter, sister, friend and neighbor, she was faithful in the discharge of all her duties. She practiced those virtues which were effectually developed in her youthful mind, by those to whose care she was committed in childhood, and who ever felt a deep interest in her welfare. Modest, diffident and unassuming, her worth was fully appreciated only by her most intimate acquaintances, to whom she was ardently endeared. Her patience and reconciliation throughout her last illness, which was at times exceedingly severe and painful, though not evidence of the truth, yet speaks favorably of the influence of that faith she strongly favored, of the final blessedness of all our race, which comforted her in life and supported her in death. She has left the church she uniformly attended and the choir she graced, to sing the song of Moses and the Lamb in the general assembly around the throne of God.

Farewell, dear sister, thou art gone,
From pain and sorrow now released,
Thy woes are o'er, thy race is run;
Then sister rest in perfect peace.

Our tears now flow, but not for thee,
For well we know thy rest is sweet—
And faith and love bid us to hope,
With thee a ransomed world to meet.

A numerous concourse attended her funeral in the Universalist meeting house, July 24th, and the extremely painful duty of addressing them devolved upon the writer.

J. T. G.

In Hartwick, July 27, REBECCA, aged 3 years; July 31, LEVERETT, aged 7 years; August 4, EMILY JOHANNA, aged 4 years—children of Horace and Mary Chase. Thus in the brief period of eight days these parents have been called to part with three lovely and interesting children!

'So fades the lovely blooming flower,
Frail, smiling solace of an hour;
So soon our transient comforts fly,
And pleasures only bloom to die.'

Though it may seem hard, and sorely afflicting for those parents to part thus suddenly with those dear idols of their hearts, yet I trust they mourn not without a hope; without the blessed consolation that they pass away ere they had ceased to be an emblem of our Saviour's kingdom, and that they are now safe in the tranquil bosom of endless love. A sermon was delivered to a large circle of mourning friends after the death of the first two, from Matt. vi: 9, 10, by the writer.

A THOUGHT OF DEATH.

A pale blue sea of light
Was stretching far away
In endless blue tranquility,
Upon the close of day.
One soft and fleecy cloud
Was lingering brightly there,
Painted with gold and purple,
A thing unearthly fair.
And as it calmly sank
Below the verge of day.
Methought of those we love
That pass in death away:
With human love behind them
And heavenly love before,
They linger like you cloud,
Then fade forever more.
And as the golden sunlight
Upon the cloud doth lie,
Bequeathing holy beauty
Ere it sink within the sky;—
Even so doth the loved spirit,
Strange, calm beauty shed
Upon the pale still features
Of the young and cherished dead.

A something that we know not—
A hope to mortals given,
Too fair to call it earthly,
Too faint to call it heaven,
Then whispers to the soul
And warm emotions rise
Till it almost spread its wing
And soar beyond the skies.

MR. EDITOR—A few evenings past, as I sat viewing the starry heavens, the following thoughts occurred to my mind, and remembering to have read in your paper, some weeks past, of a seeming remissness in your poets, and also remembering that some fifty years ago I had thought myself something of one, I have ventured to brighten up the old muse once more. I therefore send you the following scraps, such as they are, and if you think them worthy of a place in your columns, you will please an old man, and one, too, who is a well wisher to the cause of Universalism.

Groton, July, 1845.

AN OLD MAN.

Shall I attempt a God to scan?—
A finite creature here below—
Attempt it not, presumptive man;
'Tis not for sons of earth to know
How worlds are governed by his laws,
Or how he framed the blue arched sky.
Rest thou assured he's the first cause
Of all we see, both far and nigh.
In nature's book we plainly read—
And Scripture tells us of the same—
His purpose in the promised seed;
Then let the world his praise proclaim.
O, rest my soul, his promise stands:
Trust thou in his almighty word;
Receive salvation from his hands,
And bow in reverence to your God.
Let not the awful thought intrude
That there's a world of endless wo,
Where devils dwell, where's nothing good,
Where spirits, formed of God, shall go.
But let the world in love proclaim
His goodness, merry, truth and love;
Give honor to the Almighty name,
And soar from earth to worlds above.
He purposed in himself to do
His own good will and pleasure, when
He framed all worlds, the Scriptures show;
And nature shouts the loud amen.

MEMORY.

'Thy pleasures most we feel when most alone,
The only pleasure we can call our own.'

Memory dispels the gloom of many an hour, and causes the heart to beat wild with joy, at the thought of former days of happiness. How brightly is every joyous scene painted! We almost live our lives again in our recollections of the past. Where are our friends, whose friendship was the only tie that bound us here to earth? Where are they? Some are lying where the 'ivy creeps,' and where the 'gray stones lean.' Their spirits bid farewell to earth and all its joys and sorrows; they have gone, where all are going; where every knee shall bow to God and every tongue sound his praise.—Yes! they whose hearts were lightest, and they whose spirits were crushed in sorrow, all have gone to the presence of their Maker.

Our surviving friends are scattered here and there. Some have crossed the dark blue wave to visit the stranger's land—but can we ever forget them?—No! Memory has engraved their images on our hearts and they can not be forgotten.

Probably no thoughts are lost, but retained in the mind and some of them will be brought forth by some unexpected event. Sometimes we think of things that we have not thought of before for years and perhaps will not think of them again for years to come.

'Lulled in the countless chambers of the brain,
Our thoughts are linked by many a hidden chain,
Awake but one, and lo, what myriads arise!
Each stamps its image as the other flies.'

THE GOODNESS OF GOD.

'The Lord is good to all; and his tender mercies are over all his works.'

Such is the beautiful language of the shepherd prince, the sweet musician of Israel. His exalted spirit was wont to go forth, and mingle in devotion's holy train, and celebrate the goodness of the Eternal—he struck his mellifluous harp, and chanted the melodious songs of Zion. Indeed, God is good—His wisdom is every where manifest—His mercy is every where displayed. 'I can not go where universal love smiles not around.' And who shall limit the beneficence of the high and holy Sire of the Universe? He is omnipresent, omnipotent.—His whole nature and very essence is Love. We can discern the tokens of His goodness in the ample book of nature—we see them in the splendid beams of the king of day, in the silvery rays of night's majestic queen, in the brilliant gems that deck the diadem of evening, in the lofty mountains and lowly valleys,—the emerald bowers of summer, the fragrant flowers and sparkling streams,—and in every material object around, above and beneath. The Saviour's mission to the world was to acquaint mankind with the true character of God, that therefore those who worshipped might worship him in spirit and in truth. His mission was fraught with benevolence. He came with heaven's best gift—the Gospel of universal peace and impartial goodness to a world. This Gospel is transcendent in excellence. Its delineates in shining letters the Paternity of God, and exhibits his impartial love for his children.—It reveals the glorious intelligence that—'as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive—and the ransom of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads—and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.'

LAURA EGGLESTON.

German, August, 1846.

PRESERVE THAT THOUGHT.—It may have come into your mind, while reading, meditating or conversing. Or while riding along the road, or threading your way through a crowded street. No matter. If it is a good thought, write it down. It flashes and sparkles in your mind as the forerunner of a host of others. Seize it; fasten it upon paper at once, or it may fly away as an eagle towards heaven, and carry the whole train along with it. One good thought secured, may be as a fountain of sweet water in a desert, refreshing every thought that comes to its margin, and sending streams of pure and healthful influence, through every ramification of thought and feeling.

That thought may never come again. Its coruscations, that thrilled while they enlightened you, may perish from your memory.—Presently you may recall it in vain. It will have passed away and left no clue, by which to trace it, behind. Good thoughts are like flowers,—beautiful, but perishing. Yet the fragrance of flowers may be preserved. So may good thoughts, that come like angels upon a dying Christian's vision, be chained and cherished in the mind. But they are only secure on paper.

Make a portfolio of your hat; keep an everpointed pencil about you, and keep it pointed by use; and seize the thought when it comes, and preserve it.

One thought saved a day will make three hundred and sixty-five a year. Thus you may grow rich in good thoughts, as men grow rich in gold—by saving. Write down that thought.

THE MORAL RESULTS OF POTTER'S* EXECUTION.

A LECTURE

Delivered in the Universalist Church, Hartford, Conn., on the afternoon of July 26, 1846.

BY REV. H. B. SOULE.

'There is a way that seemeth right unto man, but the end thereof are the ways of death.'—Prov. xiv: 12.

The tragedy has closed; the terrible scene has ended; the young and guilty man is no more. On Monday of the past week, a life was publicly taken away, which, by an earthly power can never be restored. He, who in the season of youthful and impulsive passion, blinded and misguided by evil companionship, strangely murdered a fellow man—has himself been murdered as the only satisfaction of an offended law, and atonement for society for his awful crime. With the Christian Scriptures in their homes, men have gone forth under the authority of a human law, in the open day, with prayerful Christian ministers around them, and made a public sacrifice of a fellow man, in the most vigorous and hopeful period of mortal life.

The multitude, the pressing, eager, thronging multitude, from city and country, from high life and low life, with anxious faces and busy tread, have come, with the murmur of their thousand voices; have in breathless stillness waited on the awful scene, and have now again returned to their homes and the business of life. The armed bands that were stationed there, with threatening instruments of death to hold the multitudes from deeds of violence, have lain aside their fear-inspiring equipage and gone back to the peaceful pursuits of Christian men. Minute accounts of all this horrid tragedy have been published and read all over the commonwealth. The dead man has been returned to his friends and respectfully buried.

And now that the scene has closed—the sacrifice has been made—the young man has been publicly executed on a machine 'displaying,' as we are gravely told, 'great ingenuity in its contrivance,' and we have all been made familiar with it, let us ask what good is expected to come of it? What has been the object in publicly executing young Potter? Surely such a revolting work has not been done without contemplating some great and good purpose; surely our fellow citizens have not lain violent hands on the life of a young man; without regarding it as the means to some high moral end. But what is the end expected to be gained through such terrible means? I know the customary answer to all questions concerning the infliction of capital punishment; and the same answer would be given in this case. We should be told that the welfare of society demanded it. It was deemed necessary that this tragedy should be acted, in order to throw around the community the most awful and effective restraint. We must quit us of all demands of the law. We are told that in thus maintaining the authority and dignity of the law, we not only command due reverence to the institutions of the State, but we also awaken the public mind to a just sense of its obligation to the higher laws of God and religion. Go ask those who have been concerned in 'bringing to pass' the execution of young Potter, what good they expected to come of it, and they would confidently tell you that it was designed, and peculiarly calculated, to operate as a shield to virtue and to life, by making the law a terror unto evil doers; that it was intended to arouse the sinful and the erring to the danger of their situation, and make them realize how awful may be the end of the course they are pursuing; that it was, in a word, to make the whole community feel that life, and its rights and duties, are the most sacred things, and are to be most sacredly regarded.

Go also and ask the recent legislature, which refused to commute the young man's punishment to imprisonment for life, and they would answer that the well being of society, the security of human life, the dignity and authority of the statute law, indispensably demanded this execution—this terrible sacrifice of life. They would urge most earnestly that they were moral reasons which led them to this awful conclusion; for they believed its tendency would be to fill the community with a deep and just sense of the value of life, and to again throw around it the most salutary and effective protection within the reach of human power.

This claiming for the young man's execution most important and valuable results—results, which if realized, would, in a great measure, atone for the savage inhumanity of the act. But will they be realized? To put forth claims for a course of action is one thing—to make it meet and answer those claims, is quite another and the most important thing. It is impossible then, under the present constitution of things, under the operation of the existing laws of the mind and the moral nature of man, for the moral consequences which are claimed for it, ever to flow from the execution of young Potter? Or, indeed, will any permanent good result from it? Will the moral interests of the State be benefited by it, in any respect whatever? I can not speak for others, but for myself, I greatly fear that the professed objects for which this revolting tragedy has been acted, will never be realized. I can not see how the most deliberate sacrifice of human life, can be a strengthener of public or private virtue—how it can increase, in men's esteem, the sanctity of life, and inspire a cheerful obedience to its duties. Nay, I can not but regard it as calculated, in the very nature of things, to produce results the very opposite of those claimed for it. According to the best idea I can gain of its legitimate influences, I must set it down as having a positive tendency to blunt the moral sensibilities of the community.

We all know the receptive character of the human heart. It readily drinks in the spirit of the scenes it contemplates. Even when the subject is repulsive, it is more or less affected by it—is tinged with its hues—is mysteriously changed in some degree, into its own image.

The savage who worships a cruel and vindictive god, is cruel and vindictive in his own character. The idolators of Moloch soon became the true sons of Moloch, and witnessed the agonies of his sacrificial victims without a relenting look or an emotion of pity. The worshippers of Juggernaut have come to esteem life of such small worth as to be fit only for sacrifice. In the days of the gladiators, from frequently beholding such scenes, the most refined among the citizens of Rome, of both sexes, could take a sort of brutal pleasure in seeing men smile and bleed in the deadly combat. In the French Revolution, scenes of blood were so constantly before the people's vision—the guillotine did, daily, such a horrid work of slaughter and death, that the French heart seemed, at one time, to have almost lost its sensibility, and been converted into bloodless, pulseless, pitiless marble. The more that life was sacrificed, the less valuable and sacred did it become. So also in the early history of our own State, when men and women were executed for a variety of crimes; when such executions were of frequent occurrence, how poorly was life esteemed—what trivial offences were deemed sufficient to forfeit a person's right to live—and with what brutal barbarity were they tortured out of existence! They were often hung in the open field, or some elevated position, where all the community gathered round, and with jeers, and scoffs, and mockings, and insults, exulted over the dying man's agonies. There was pointed out to me, a few days since, a short distance below this city, the house in which an insane man killed his family, and then also himself; for which alleged crime, he was drawn to pieces and dragged about the streets by horses, to gratify the moral sense of the community living around him! "What a horrid and barbarous transaction for Christian men to be engaged in!" And yet it is but the natural fruit of those bloody laws, which, under any pretence, sacrifice human life.

Now, unless the laws of our being have changed, we may expect the same character of results to flow from the New Haven tragedy* of last Monday. It will not be so extensive, nor so deeply, darkly stained with blood, as it was less open to the public gaze, and is separated from its bloody kindred by more distance of time. Still, whatever power it has over the public mind must be a barbarous power—a power to blunt and deaden all the finer feelings of soul—all the humane sympathies of the heart; and in their stead to excite into active life all the revengeful, vindictive, and cruel passions. Besides the lesson which history should teach us—a lesson so positive and decisive that we can not mistake it—our common sense must tell us, that such a transaction as Potter's execution can not produce good moral consequences. We know that legally murdering him can not make us love the law under whose sanction it has been done, because there it nothing amiable or lovely in its spirit or in its operation. We know, also, that it can not make us love and regard our fellow man more deeply and truly, because itself does not regard man as man. We know, moreover, that if we wished to render our child cruel, the successful way would be to make him familiar with scenes of cruelty; if we desired to make him a savage, we should send him to grow up among savages. We know that it is a law of our nature, that we are made cruel by cruelty—harsh by harshness—revengeful by revenge—warlike by war—and murderous by living amidst a murderous people, and witnessing murderous scenes. And this kind of results—sad as the conclusion is—must be expected from the revenging murder of young Potter.

They talk to us about the security of life—about impressing its value and significance upon the general heart; but how can that scene, in which a young life was publicly smitten into the grave—brutally and ignominiously sacrificed—not to secure it from doing harm, but to gratify a spirit of legal revenge—how can that scene make life appear any more sacred and inviolable? Will the fact that the guilty man has been killed and buried, awaken in the community a more lively sense of their relation and duty to man? Can there flow from such a fountain, a stream of pure, holy, saving influences? Can public legal revenge beget private individual mercy? Can love spring from unrelenting, vindictive hatred? Will life become more sacred and dear, from being so easily forfeited—so publicly trifled with? No: we must look to other causes for these desirable effects. The public murder of Potter can never prove a moral benefit to a community of civilized and Christianized men. If it can, then for the moral welfare of this Christian State, it would be better immediately to hang up all the criminals, of every age and sex, within its borders!

But look a moment at its influence on the community in the immediate vicinity of the scene—and what there was its apparent effect? Every one who had read the published accounts of the execution, must have been impressed with its horrid and barbarous character; but have you thought what must have been its effect upon the community in whose midst it occurred? Think you it did not arouse into strange action the lower and brutal passions of human nature? What else could have drawn together around that gallows such a throng of Christian men and women, to witness a transaction so bloody and revolting to every Christian sympathy and sentiment? Was it love, or compassion, or pity, or a noble humanity, that drew them there? Was it not any thing but these? Ah! what a spectacle is that, in a Christian land? How differs it in character from barbarous heathenism? A multitude, from city and country, press on with hurried steps towards the place of execution. Behold them crowd thick and fast upon each other, striving to gain a position as near as possible to the lifted gallows. A strange, bewildering anxiety is fixed on every countenance, and glares from every eye. A wonderful impatience heaves and agitates their bosoms, making them an uneasy and restless mass. Look at them now, and there seems to be about them an air of strangeness, of wildness, that renders them a spectacle painful and fearful to behold. To prevent them from deeds of outrage and open wrong, while gathered round that great fountain of restraining power and moral virtue, placed here and there are companies of strong men, armed with instruments of blood and death! For what, now, have they come, pressing, thronging together there? What has led them forth from their homes of quiet and security, to that labor and exposure? What have they thronged into that impatient, restless, heaving multitude to behold? Is it to witness the exhibition of what shall call into delightful exercise the finer feelings and affections of the soul? Is it to gaze on a scene of beauty—or loveliness—or grandeur, that shall fill the mind with new and blessed images—chastening—expanding—exalting—and making it capable of more refined and intense pleasures? Have they come to cultivate the moral taste—to refine and perfect the moral sense—to quicken the moral perceptions—to receive new incentives to love, beautify and sweeten life, and new strength to fill it with noble deeds and blessed virtues? Are these the high and holy purposes for which they have pressed around that scaffold and prison house? Ah! never—never; but to be present at the cold, studied, revengeful murder of a brother man. Is there not, then, something of depravity in their thus crowding to that revolting scene of execution?—and did not their presence call anew and vigorously into exercise the lower feelings and brutal passions of their hearts? Does not, then, I repeat still again, the witnessing of scenes of cruelty and blood, tend, certainly and powerfully, to blunt and deaden the sensibilities and sympathies of the human soul?

Again, this execution will tend to foster in the community the immoral and unchristian spirit of revenge. This has already been stated, but I wish to make it a little more prominent. It is so low and base a passion as to render every thing bitterly reprehensible that fosters it. To retaliate is just so far to act the brute. It is purely a destructive principle, and is positively opposed to both the spirit and precepts of Jesus Christ. They teach us to forgive and forbear, and labor to amend—to overcome evil with good—to render positive evil to no man; revenge, on the contrary, teaches us to injure, to destroy, to gratify itself, not to bless another. Revenge belongs to that iron theology whose golden rule is an 'eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.' And yet this very principle, injurious and unchristian as it is, is directly and openly taught to the citizens of this commonwealth by this case of Potter. Both the law and the legislature have expressly declared that they sought not the reformation of the criminal, not the moral amendment of the young man, not the securing of him against all further injury to society, but to gratify the spirit of revenge. No matter what change for the better the criminal might experience, they would not rest satisfied until they could look on the young man's dead body. The language of their moral code is murder for murder—like for like—and they can understand no other language. Now what must be the influence that shall go out from such a scene of revenge?—Does it not say to every one to whom it comes, revenge, retaliation is the true moral code of life; if a man injures you, you must through some means injure him as much; and you will not do your duty—you will be guilty of moral defection—if you rest satisfied short of this. This is one of the saddest lessons that this New Haven tragedy will teach the community. It is a bold and fearful stand against Christianity and the highest interests of society. Revenge and blood are indeed strange means to mould man into the likeness of Christ, and fill him with the sweet and forgiving spirit of Heaven. How many such executions would it require, think you, to fill the whole community with the mild and peaceful kingdom of Jesus Christ?

But they talk to us about the majesty of the law—its claims must be respected and its honor maintained. But what must be the character of that law whose claims and honor are maintained by blood and death—which shows its wisdom to govern, by killing its subjects! If to shudder at the barbarous cruelty of a law, is to honor it, the law which takes away, destroys forever from the world, human life, will be sure to be duly honored by all truly enlightened, benevolent, Christian hearts.

And again, we are led to inquire, what is the law that it should be regarded as more sacred than man's life? Law is the imperfect work of frail, erring man—life the sublime creation of God; at the best, law is a means—at life, at the least, is an end.—Hence, it seems to us, that to sacrifice life to the majesty of human law, is to sacrifice the end to the means—the creation of God to the puny work of man. Thus exalting the human law so far above life, depreciates the latter into a very poor and sorry thing—a thing meaner and less valuable than a revenging and bloody law. One of the chief reasons why Potter was executed, was that the law might be maintained in the point of its honor and majesty. The young man's life was of less consideration than a relic of the dark ages, found on the statute book of Connecticut. Now, does not this view again, like every other we can take of it, show that that execution was unchristian in its character, and will be immoral in its actual results upon the general community?

But I shall be told that it was necessary to punish the young man, for he was guilty of murder. To punish him, indeed! but is not to punish him and to kill him, quite different things? What is punishment? The Christian idea is, to chasten the erring and the sinful that they may afterwards be partakers of his holiness. There is nothing of revenge or retaliation in the Christian idea of punishment. Christ would not destroy, but save men's lives. Young Potter might have been punished to the true intent of Christianity, without being murdered. He might have been so dealt with as to have impressed society with the sacred and inviolable character of life, with due reverence and respect for the laws which shield and defend it, and consequently with the awfulness of the crime of murder. And here I would not be misunderstood. Because I have represented the execution of Potter as productive of lamentably immoral results; as tending to blunt and deaden the moral sensibilities of the community; to weaken true and healthful respect to the law; to make life, the work and gift of God, a mean and worthless thing, that may be violated and sacrificed to sustain the majesty of heathenish and bloody law; to destroy from the public heart the Christian spirits of justice, forgiveness, mercy, forbearance, and duty to the erring; to cultivate in their stead, the malignant spirits of revenge, retaliation, vindictiveness; as having in a word a direct tendency to deprave and brutalize the common heart; I would not be understood as inculcating the doctrine that the guilty man should be turned out upon society, with his feet unloosed and his hands free to do deeds of violence again. No; I would have him punished; not, however, with the manifestation of any cruelty or revenge, but with the awful pungency which should make the soul feel its terrible guilt and tremble with the agony of a condign remorse. A retribution—not heartless and hopeless, but teaching the value of life and the magnitude of the offence of violating it—should lay its weighty and awful hand upon him, and keep him firmly and securely in its resistless and friendly hold. Yes, I would have him so dealt with, as not only make him feel his guilt and lead him to repent in dust and ashes, but also to make every young man who should look upon him, tremble at the thoughts of sin, and look upon licentiousness as the gateway to hell. It is a fearful thing to punish a fellow man; to deprive him of home, and friends, and all social joys; to imprison him in solitude; to enclose him within cold, damp walls and iron bars; shut away even from the cheer of God's blessed sunshine and the free airs of heaven; suffering pains in the body and torture in the mind—oh, it is a fearful thing thus to deal retribution upon the guilty. With what wisdom and care, with what pure hearts and clean hands, should such a work be done—not rashly and vindictively, but deliberately and kindly, with strong faith in, and deep love for man as a moral and immortal being. But when you carry the exercise of human power still farther, when you are not satisfied with securing him where all things, even the deep stillness of night, speak terrible and retributive thoughts to him; where the fatal blood is forever dripping in his scared and guilty vision; when you lead him forth and smite him till he die—what tremendous responsibilities do you assume! To take away life, to destroy that which can never be restored, to seal the temporal destiny of a kindred soul, to cast that soul, in the delirium of guilt and terror, into the unseen and untried eternity,—this is to step out beyond the region of the authority of man, upon the province and prerogative that belong alone to God, the creator and only legitimate disposer of human life. O ye, who lay your sinful hands, still reeking perhaps with the blood of the last victim, upon that subtle thing we call life, to crush it out of its clayey tenement, to dash it into the dark future—pause, I beseech you, in your awful work, and ask yourselves what are ye doing—upon what are ye operating—against what are ye warring—and what will be the result, the real and abiding result of all this bloody inhumanity to man. When will ye learn to temper your spirit with Christian mercy, and receive into your heart the Christian forgiveness? When will ye learn to punish, to reform and bring the poor criminal into the love and likeness of Christ—and not to make him a demon, fit only to be murdered by a halter? When will ye learn to appreciate that sublime moral power, which is above revenge and overcomes evil with good—redeeming and blessing the world, instead of depraving and cursing it? But if ye must have justice and power, as ye call them, may ye learn to use that which is tempered with the mercy described by the poet:

'The quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath; it is twice blessed;
It blesseth him that giveth and him that takes;
'Tis mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown;
His scepter shows the force of temporal power,
The attribute to awe and majesty,
Wherein doth sit the dread and fear of kings;
But mercy is above the sceptered sway;
It is enthroned in the heart of kings;
It is an attribute of God himself;—
And earthly power doth show likest God's,
When mercy seasons justice.'

'OUR COUNTRY—RIGHT OR WRONG.'

Br. WALKER.—In the Magazine of the 7th Aug., I find an article, headed as above, written by Br. Gibson, taking strong ground against the administration, and denouncing its ministers in unmeasured terms on account of the war with Mexico. I regret very much, that our brother should manifest such a spirit towards the men whom, if he can not love (as commanded) he at least ought not to abuse,—and I also regret, that he should select the Magazine as the medium through which to communicate his bitterness. I am surprised, too, that he should not have found an earlier opportunity to express his extreme sympathy for Mexico, or, if his object be of a political character, that he did not wait until the Presidential campaign had fairly commenced, and the candidates were in the field. But, as Br. G. declares himself responsible for the article in question, and claims the right to denounce the officers of the government under which he lives in the full enjoyment of every blessing that can be secured to citizens by any earthly institution of civil government, in such terms as 'WHOLESALE MURDERERS, ROBBERS,' &c.—I also take the responsibility, and ask the privilege of saying, that although such sentiments may be endorsed by the good people in the vicinity of Utica, yet they sound harsh to us, who have yet to learn how the true patriot can place himself in the front rank of his country's enemies, and pierce his friends to the heart, because forsooth, his individual opinion is, that the war is an unjust one. And it matters not, whether that man fights with the rifle, the broadsword, the knife, or the goose quill, or burns blue lights to guide the enemy to our homes; the spirit which would dictate in either case is the same,—and I should consider the man who would be thus engaged destitute of every principle of American patriotism and well qualified to lead our country's enemies.

The charges made against the administration by Br. G., can be met, we think successfully, and the course our government has taken fully sustained,—yet we do not propose to reply to any of them in this place, for the reason, that there are political papers enough at the present day, through which we may discuss questions of that character, and what is decidedly to their credit as such, they do not mix with them, religious matters.

We have before witnessed these excessive outpourings of sympathy for the enemies of our country, and have read of being plunged in an expensive, ruinous and most unrighteous war, and in the same connection have been told that it was unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice at the success of our arms. This is all very well, and in keeping with the doctrine laid down by Br. G. That the citizen is at perfect liberty to fight according to his own fancy—either to join our brother, and storm the capitol of the Union at once—or join Gen. Taylor and fight him upon the Rio Grande. And again, Br. G. says, 'This war we consider to be a most unrighteous one, and no man by the laws of God or the principles of justice is bound to support his country in it.' And we have not a comment to make, upon the above treasonable paragraph, but will leave Br. G. to enjoy the honor of having given to the world, a reprint of doctrines first published here some twenty years ago, with a view then, as now, to embarrass and cripple the government, and if possible to render our enemies successful.

But what means this wonderful outburst of sympathy for an 'injured nation'? Why has war become odious and intolerable in the eyes of our Br.? There was a time when we could look on and see our fellows butchered without a tear, because (as it was said) Mexico had a right to butcher them, and we had no right to complain. At that time, the fountains of pity which now inundate these benevolent hearts, were dried up, or at least confined within certain territorial limits—and when our friends were bleeding upon the plains of Texas previous to annexation, and the crimson current mingled with the tears of widows and orphans, flowed dark and deep, the dying and the bereaved could find no balm for their sufferings in the sympathies of these same philanthropists. And although thousands were made to bite the dust, and the thunders of San Jacinto told that many of our friends had gone to their final account,—that the semi-savages with whom they contended for their liberty (such as we now enjoy and to which they were justly entitled) knew no mercy, and gave no quarter,—we were quiet spectators of their heartless butcheries, because we could not sympathise with them according to law. And yet, I firmly believe the same law alluded to by Br. G. required us to extend to them a helping hand, long before. The humble suppliant had prostrated herself fainting and bleeding at our feet.

But poor, poor, Mexico! how heartless must be our government to deprive you of the very innocent amusement of murdering our people, after you have rendered such amusement indispensably necessary by the practice of murdering your own citizens—and yet how fortunate to find an able advocate of your rights, who will stand up in the midst of your enemies, and charge them with all your sins. And now, in conclusion, permit me to entreat Br. G. to look more closely into the present difficulties with Mexico—examine the arguments upon either side, and when the matter is fully and fairly investigated, and we are found guilty of murder and robbery, be pleased to inform us what portion of Mexican territory you have seen fit to seize upon in advance of our government, as the plunder belonging to the United States,—also, what officers in that service, receive fat pay, and do nothing?—Who is it that avoids danger, and dislikes the smell of gunpowder among our officers there? I know of none—but on the contrary believe that their deeds of noble daring, their bravery and their skill, have already stamped upon their brows the impress of heroes, which neither envy nor malice can obliterate, and established for them, fame upon which none but green eyes can find a spot.

W. G. BRANCH.

Hillsdale, Mich., 11th August, 1846.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We admit the above article into our columns in justice to the writer and those of his particular views, as we did that of Br. Gibson on the opposite side of the question. But both writers, and our readers generally, must perceive by this time that the subject is an improper one for our paper, excepting so far as the general principles of war and peace are concerned, or involve the great moral principles of Christianity and of moral and religious duties. This is a religious, and not a political paper; and party politicians must discuss their differences and contentions about the present war with Mexico, in political papers, if at all, and not in our columns.

Although the first part of Br. G.'s article, relating to the principles of right and wrong was unobjectionable; yet we seriously hesitated about admitting the last part of it, so decidedly and by wholesale condemning our Government for its course in the matter. But as we do not like to mutilate or alter articles sent for publication, and as Br. G. avowed himself, and not us, alone responsible for the views advanced, we concluded to let him speak out freely in our columns. He did so, and Br. Branch has now been allowed an equal freedom on the opposite side. This must suffice.

Br. B. we think is rather severe upon Br. G. It does not necessarily follow, because Br. G. thinks the present war against Mexico unjust and wicked, that he is therefore an enemy to his country, nor that he would have agreed with those who denounced our former wars with England. A man may honestly view our revolutionary and subsequent war with England as unavoidable and perfectly just on our part, and yet believe the present war on Mexico to be unnecessary and unjust on our part. Because, by England we were oppressed, enslaved, invaded. Not so by Mexico: nor had we any fears of either.

Nor did Br. G. mean to intimate (we presume) that any of the American officers now in the army of service against Mexico receive fat pay and do no service. His meaning, doubtless was that members of Congress, getting fat pay, would vote for war, run no risk themselves, and make others fight it out for 25-cents per day. So of several other similar allusions: we do not think he has done full justice to Br. G.'s motives. But enough. We are willing the subject of War and Peace, should be discussed to a moderate extent in our columns, on general principles, as to the compatibility of War with Christianity, whether it may or may not always be avoided, &c. &c. But if Brs. G. and B. have any more lances to break about the Mexican war, we beg them to take some political journal, and there fight it out to their heart's content.

D. S.

Since the above was in type we have received another well written article in reply to Br. Gibson, from Br. H. Bowen, of Lowville, which we should have published in preference to the above had we received it in season, as it is less of a personal and partizan character. He objects to Br. G.'s article because, instead of endeavoring to show that all wars are wrong, he seems to take it for granted that wars are right—that Mexico is right in making war upon us, or our army, and the U. S. is alone wrong. Br. B. takes the ground that the Rio Grande is the ancient and proper boundary of Texas on the Southeast—that it was the former boundary of Louisiana when ceded to this country by France—that the territory thus far has always been represented in the Texan Congress; and for this boundary, cites the authority of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Pinckney, J. Q. Adams, Henry Clay, Col. Benton, &c. In conclusion, he thinks if any national wars are justifiable, our nation is justified in going to war with Mexico.

But as the subject is exciting and liable, if continued, to assume more and more a political and partizan character, our correspondents, one and all, will see the necessity of dropping it entirely. Ed.

TO THE MEMORY OF REV. GEORGE ROGERS.

Ye minstrels of Zion, in strains deep and holy,
A beautiful requiem chant o'er the dead;
Our brother is sleeping, so dreamless and lowly,
His mission is over, his spirit is fled.

A bright star has faded away from our vision,
Our moral horizon no more to illumine,
Resplendent 'tis shining in yon high Elysium,
Where Love's scintillations dispel every gloom.

Oh! Rogers, dear brother! we mourn thy departure!
Our loss is thy great and unspeakable gain;
For glories unfading in bliss, thou didst barter
This fleeting existence of trial and pain.

We miss thee—a herald in Christ's holy orders,
Whose beautiful mission was spreading the truth;
Success crowned thy toils in enlarging our borders,
And strength'ning the minds of the aged and youth.

Oft, oft hast thou faced opposition, undaunted,
And stem'd the dark waters of Bigotry cold;
When Error assailed and frowningly vaunted,
Thy weapons were strong to demolish her hold.

My soul hath been charmed with thy message of gladness,
With rapture I listened thy rich chants to hear;
When error was mantling my spirit in sadness,
Thy song of 'Redemption,' dispelled all my fear.

In Zion's fair temple, before the high altar,
No more wilt thou stand the glad tidings to tell;
Thy Master hath call'd, and thy heart did not falter,
But entered his presence, triumphant to dwell.

Thy love for the cause of Immanuel inspired thee,
With ardent devotion and holiest faith;
Truth's beautiful vestments in meekness attired thee,
And peace, like a river, rolled on in thy path.

Farewell, sainted brother! thy warfare is over—
The plaudit, 'well done, faithful servant,' is thine;—
The emerald turf now thy relics doth cover—
Thy spirit is resting with spirits divine.

The sighs of thy consort and 'reft children weeping,
Elicit from sympathy's key a sad strain;—
May peace crown their spirits, in God's holy keeping,
We hope for a happy reunion again.

We mourn, when the worthy and useful are taken,
Away from our bowers of friendship below;
But God is our Father,—we are not forsaken;
Submissive at His dispensation we bow.

Farewell! holy angels shall watch o'er thy slumber,
Till thou shalt awake in Eternity's spring;—
All hearts shall be tuned to Love's golden numbers;
And heaven with paeans angelic shall ring.

German, July 30, 1846. LAURA EGGLESTON.

THE NEIGHBOR-IN-LAW.

BY L. MARIA CHILD.

Who blesses others in his daily deeds,
Will find the healing that his spirit needs;
For every flower in others' pathway strewn,
Confers a fragrant beauty on its own.

'So you are going to live in the same building with Hetty Turnpenny,' said Mrs. Lane to Mrs. Fairweather. 'You will find no body to envy you. If her temper does not prove too much even for your good nature, it will surprise all who know her. We lived there a year, and that is as long as any body ever tried it.'

'Poor Hetty!' replied Mrs. Fairweather, 'she has had much to harden her. Her mother died too early for her to remember; her father was very severe with her; and the only lover she ever had, borrowed the savings of her years of toil, and spent them in dissipation. But Hetty, notwithstanding her sharp features, and sharper words, certainly has a kind heart. In the midst of her greatest poverty many were the stockings she knit, and the warm waistcoats she made, for the poor drunken lover, whom she had too much good sense to marry. Then you know she feeds and clothes her brother's orphan child.'

'If you call it feeding and clothing,' replied Mrs. Lane. 'The poor child looks cold, and pinched, and frightened all the time, as if she were chased by an east wind. I used to tell Miss Turnpenny she ought to be ashamed of herself, to keep the poor little thing at work all the time, without one minute to play. If she does but look at the cat, as it runs by the window, Aunt Hetty gives her a rap over the knuckles. I used to tell her she would make the girl just such another sour old crab as herself.'

'That must have been very improving to her disposition,' replied Mrs. Fairweather, with a good humored smile. 'But in justice to poor Aunt Hetty, you ought to remember that she had just such a cheerless childhood herself. Flowers grow where there is sunshine.'

'I know you think everybody ought to live in the sunshine,' rejoined Mrs. Lane; 'and it must be confessed that you carry it with you wherever you go. If Miss Turnpenny has a heart, I dare say you will find it out, though I never could, and I never heard of any one else that could. All the families within hearing of her tongue, call her the neighbor-in-law.'

Certainly the prospect was not very encouraging; for the house Mrs. Fairweather proposed to occupy, was not only under the same roof with Mrs. Turnpenny, but the buildings had one common yard in the rear, and one common space for a garden in front. The very first day she took possession of her new habitation, she called on the neighbor-in-law. Aunt Hetty had taken the precaution to extinguish the fire, lest the new neighbor should want hot water, before her own wood and coal arrived. Her first salutation was, 'If you want any cold water, there's a pump across the street; I don't like to have my house slopped all over.'

'I am glad you are so tidy, neighbor Turnpenny,' replied Mrs. Fairweather; 'it is extremely pleasant to have neat neighbors. I will try to keep every thing as bright as a new five cent piece, for I see that will please you. I came in merely to say good morning, and ask if you could spare little Peggy to run up and down stairs for me, while I am getting my furniture in order. I will pay her six pence an hour.'

Aunt Hetty had begun to purse up her mouth for a refusal; but the promise of six pence an hour relaxed her features at once. Little Peggy sat knitting a stocking very diligently, with a rod lying on the table beside her. She looked up with timid wistfulness, as if the prospect of any change was like a release from prison. When she heard consent given, a bright color flushed her cheeks.—She was evidently of an impressive temperament, for good or evil. 'Now mind and behave yourself,' said Aunt Hetty; 'and see that you keep at work the whole time. If I hear one word of complaint, you know what you will get when you come home.' The rose color subsided from Peggy's pale face, and she answered, 'Yes ma'am; very meekly.'

In the neighbor's house all went quiet otherwise. No switch laid on the table, and instead of 'mind how you do that, if you don't, I'll punish you,' she heard the gentle words, 'There, dear, see how carefully you can carry that up stairs. Why, what a nice handy little girl you are!' Under this enlivening influence, Peggy worked like a bee, and soon began to hum much more agreeably than a bee. Aunt Hetty was always in the habit of saying, 'Stop your noise, and mind your work.' But the new friend patted her on the head, and said, 'What a pleasant voice the little girl has. It is like the birds in the fields. By and by, you shall hear my music-box.' This opened wide the windows of the poor little shut-up heart, so that the sunshine could stream in, and the birds fly in and out carolling. The happy child tuned up like a lark, as she tripped lightly up and down stairs, on various household errands. But though she took heed to observe all the directions given her, her head was all the time filled with conjectures what sort of a thing a music-box might be.—She was a little afraid the kind lady would forget to show it to her. She kept at work, however, and asked no questions; she only looked very curiously at every thing that resembled a box. At last Mrs. Fairweather said, 'I think your little feet must be tired by this time. We will rest awhile, and eat some gingerbread.' The child took the offered cake with a humble little courtesy, and carefully held out her apron to prevent any crumbs from falling on the floor. But suddenly the apron dropped, and the crumbs were all strewed about. 'Is that a little bird?' she exclaimed eagerly. 'Where is he? Is he in this room?' The new friend smiled, and told her that was the music-box; and after a while she opened it, and explained what made the sounds. Then she took out a pile of books from one of the baskets of goods, and told Peggy she might look at the pictures, till she called her. The little girl stepped forward eagerly to take them, and then drew back, as if afraid. 'What is the matter,' asked Mrs. Fairweather; 'I am very willing to trust you with the books. I keep them on purpose to amuse children.' Peggy looked down with her finger on her lip, and answered, in a constrained voice, 'Aunt Turnpenny won't like it if I play.' 'Don't trouble yourself about that. I will make it all right with Aunt Hetty,' replied the friendly one. Thus assured, she gave herself up to the full enjoyment of the picture books; and when she was summoned to her work, she obeyed with a cheerful alacrity that would have astonished her stern relative. When the labors of the day were concluded, Mrs. Fairweather accompanied her home, paid for all the hours she had been absent, and warmly praised her docility and diligence.—'It is lucky for her that she behaved so well,' replied Aunt Hetty; 'if I had heard any complaint, I should have given her a whipping, and sent her to bed without her supper.'

Poor little Peggy went to sleep that night with a lighter heart than she had ever felt, since she had been an orphan. Her first thought in the morning was whether the new neighbor would want her service again during the day. Her desire that it should be so soon became obvious to Aunt Hetty, and excited an undefined jealousy and dislike to a person who so easily made herself beloved.—Without exactly acknowledging to herself what were her own motives, she ordered Peggy to gather all the sweepings of the kitchen and court into a small pile, and leave it on the frontier line of her neighbor's premises. Peggy ventured to ask timidly whether the wind would not blow it about, and she received a box on the ear for her impertinence. It chanced that Mrs. Fairweather, quite unintentionally, heard the words and the blow. She gave Aunt Hetty's anger time enough to cool, then stepped out into the court, and after arranging divers little matters, she called aloud to her domestic, 'Sally, how came you to leave this pile of dirt here? Didn't I tell you Miss Turnpenny was very neat? Pray make haste and sweep it up. I would'n't have her see it on any account. I told her I would try and keep every thing nice about the premises. She is so particular herself, and it is a comfort to have tidy neighbors.' The girl, who had been previously instructed, smiled as she came out with brush and dust-pan, and swept quietly away the pile, that was intended as a declaration of frontier war. But another source of annoyance presented itself, which could not be quite so easily disposed of. Aunt Hetty had a cat, a lean scraggy animal, that looked as if she were often kicked and seldom fed; and Mrs. Fairweather had a fat, frisky little dog, always ready for a caper. He took a distaste to poor poverty-stricken Tab the first time he saw her, and no coaxing could induce him to alter his opinion.—His name was Pink, but he was any thing but a pink of behavior in his neighborly relations. Poor Tab could never set foot out of doors without being saluted with a growl, and a short sharp bark, that frightened her out of her senses, and made her run into the house, with her fur all on end. If she even ventured to doze a little on her own door step, the enemy was on the watch, and the moment her eyes closed, he would wake her with a bark and a box on the ear, and off he would run. Aunt Hetty vowed she would scald him. It was a burning shame, she said, for folks to keep dogs to worry neighbor's cats. Mrs. Fairweather invited Tabby to dine, and made much of her, and patiently endeavored to teach her dog to eat from the same plate. But Pink sturdily resolved he would be scalded first, that he would. He could not have been more firm in his opposition, if he and Tab had belonged to different sects in Christianity. While his mistress was patting Tab on the head and reasoning the point with him, he would at times manifest a degree of indifference, amounting to toleration; but the moment he was left to his own free will, he would give the invited guest a hearty cuff with his paw, and send her home spitting like a small steam engine. Aunt Hetty considered it her own peculiar privilege to cuff the poor animal, and it was too much for her patience to see Pink undertake to assist in making Tab unhappy. On one of these occasions, she rushed into her neighbor's apartments, and faced Mrs. Fairweather, with one hand resting on her hip, and the forefinger of the other making very wrathful gesticulations. 'I tell you what, madam, I won't put up with such treatment much longer,' said she; 'I'll poison that dog; you'll see if I don't; and I shan't wait long, either, I can tell you. What you keep such an impudent little beast for, I don't know, without you do it on purpose to plague your neighbors.'

'I am really sorry he behaves so,' replied Mrs. F. kindly. 'Poor Tab!'

'Poor Tab!' screamed Miss Turnpenny. 'What do you mean by calling her poor? Do you mean to fling it up to me that my cat don't have enough to eat?'

'I did not think of such a thing,' replied Mrs. F. 'I called her poor Tab, because Pink plagues her so that she has no peace of her life. I agree with you, neighbor Turnpenny, it is not right to keep a dog that disturbs the neighborhood. I am attached to poor little Pink, because he belongs to my son, who has gone to sea. I was in hopes he would soon leave off quarrelling with the cat, but if he won't be neighborly, I will send him out into the country to board. Sally, will you bring me one of the pies we baked this morning? I should like to have Miss Turnpenny taste of them.'

The crabbed neighbor was helped abundantly, and while she was eating the pie, the friendly matron edged in many a kind word concerning Peggy, whom she praised as a remarkably capable, industrious child.

'I am glad you find her so,' rejoined Aunt Hetty, 'I should get precious little work out of her, if I didn't keep a switch in sight.'

'I manage children pretty much as the man did the donkey,' replied Mrs. F. 'Not an inch would the poor beast stir for all his beating and thumping. But a neighbor tied some fresh turnips to a stick, and fastened them so they swung directly before the donkey's nose, and off he set on a brisk trot, in hopes of overtaking them.'

Aunt Hetty, without observing how very closely the comparison applied to her own management of Peggy, said 'that will do for folks that have plenty of turnips to spare.'

'For the matter of that,' answered Mrs. F., 'whips costs something as well as turnips; and since one makes the donkey stand still, and the other makes him trot, it is easy to decide which is the most economical. But, neighbor Turnpenny, since you like my pies so well, pray take one home with you. I am afraid they will mould before we can eat them up.'

Aunt Hetty had come in for a quarrel, and she was astonished to find herself going out with a pie. 'Well, Mrs. Fairweather,' said she, 'you are a neighbor. I thank you a thousand times.' When she reached her own door, she hesitated for an instant, then turned back, pie in hand, to say, 'Neighbor Fairweather, you needn't trouble yourself about sending Pink away. It's natural you should like the little creature, seeing he belongs to your son. I'll try to keep Tab in doors, and perhaps after a while, they will agree better.'

'I hope they will,' replied the friendly matron. 'We will try them awhile longer, and if they persist in quarrelling, I will send the dog into the country.' Pink, who was sleeping in a chair, stretched himself and gaped. His kind mistress patted him on the head. 'Ah, you foolish little beast,' said she, 'what's the use of plaguing poor Tab?'

'Well, I do say,' observed Sally, smiling, 'you are the master woman for stopping a quarrel.'

'I learned a good lesson when I was a little girl,' rejoined Mrs. Fairweather. 'One frosty morning, I was looking out of the window into my father's barnyard, where stood many cows, oxen and horses, waiting to drink. It was one of those cold snapping mornings, when a slight thing irritates both man and beast. The cattle all stood very still and meek, till one of the cows attempted to turn round. In making the attempt, she happened to hit her next neighbor: whereupon the neighbor kicked and hit another. In five minutes, the whole herd were kicking and hooking each other with all fury. My mother laughed, and said, 'See what comes of kicking when you're hit. Just so I've seen one cross one word set a whole family by the ears, some frosty morning.' Afterwards, if my brothers or myself were a little irritable, she would say take care children. Remember how the fight in the barn-yard began. Never give a kick for a hit, and you will save yourself and others a deal of trouble.'

That same afternoon, the sunshine dame stepped into Aunt Hetty's rooms, where she found Peggy sewing, as usual, with the eternal switch on the table beside her. 'I am obliged to go to Harlem on business,' said she. 'I feel rather lonely without company, and I always like to have a child with me. If you will oblige me by letting Peggy go, I will pay her fare in the omnibus.'

'She has her spelling lesson to get before night,' replied Aunt Hetty. 'I don't approve of young folks going a pleasuring, and neglecting their education.'

'Neither do I,' rejoined her neighbor; 'but I think there is a great deal of education that is not found in books. The fresh air will make Peggy grow stout and active. I prophecy she will do much credit to your bringing up.'—The sugared words, and the remembrance of the sugared pie, touched the soft place in Miss Turnpenny's heart, she told the astonished Peggy that she might go and put on her best gown and bonnet. The poor child began to think that this new neighbor was certainly one of the good fairies she read about in the picture books. The excursion was enjoyed as only a city child can enjoy the country. The world seems such a pleasant place when the fetters are off, and nature folds the young heart lovingly on her bosom! A flock of real birds, and two living butterflies, put the little orphan in a perfect ecstasy. She ran and skipped. One could see that she might be graceful, if she were only free. She pointed to the fields covered with dandelions, and said, 'See, how pretty! It looks as if the stars had come down to lie on the grass.' Ah, our little stunted Peggy has poetry in her, though Aunt Hetty never found it out. Every human soul has the germ of some flowers within, and they would open, if they could only find sunshine and free air to expand in.

Mrs. F. was a practical philosopher in her own small way. She observed that Miss Turnpenny really liked a pleasant tune; and when winter came, she tried to persuade her that singing would be excellent for Peggy's lungs, and would perhaps keep her from going into consumption.

'My nephew, James Fairweather, keeps a singing school,' said she, 'and he says he will teach her gratis. You need not feel under great obligation; for her voice will lead the whole school, and her ear is so quick, it will be no trouble at all to teach her. Perhaps you would go with us sometimes, neighbor Turnpenny? It is very pleasant to hear the children's voices.'

The cordage of Aunt Hetty's mouth relaxed into a smile. She accepted the invitation, and was so much pleased, that she went every Sunday evening. The simple tunes, and the sweet young voices, fell like dew upon her dried up heart, and greatly aided the genial influence of her neighbor's example. The rod silently disappeared from the table. If Peggy was disposed to be idle, it was only necessary to say, 'When you have finished your work, you may go and ask whether Mrs. Fairweather wants any errands done.'—Bless me how the fingers flew! Aunt Hetty had learned to use turnips instead of the cudgel.

When spring came, Mrs. Fairweather busied herself with planting roses and vines. Miss Turnpenny readily consented that Peggy should help her, and even refused to take any pay from such a good neighbor. But she maintained her own opinion that it was a mere waste of time to cultivate flowers. The cheerful philosopher never disputed the point; but she would sometimes say, 'I have no room to plant this rose bush. Neighbor Turnpenny, would you be willing to let me set it on your side of the yard? It will take very little room and need no care.' At another time she would say, 'Well, really, my ground is too full. Here is a root of Lady's delight. How bright and pert it looks. It seems a pity to throw it away. If you are willing, I will let Peggy plant it in what she calls her garden. It will grow of itself, without any care, and scatter seeds, that will come up and blossom in all the chinks of the bricks. I love it—it is such a bright, good-natured little thing.' Thus by degrees, the crabbed maiden found herself surrounded by flowers; and she even declared of her own accord, that they did look pretty.

One day, when Mrs. Lane called upon Mrs. Fairweather, she found the old weed-grown yard bright and blooming. Tab, quite fat and sleek, was asleep in the sunshine, with her paw on Pink's neck, and little Peggy was singing at her work as blithe as a bird.

'How cheerful you look here,' said Mrs. Lane. 'And so you have really taken the house for another year. Pray, how do you manage to get on with the neighbor-in-law.'

'I find her a very kind, obliging neighbor,' replied Mrs. F.

'Well, this is a miracle,' exclaimed Mrs. Lane. 'Nobody but you would have undertaken to thaw out Aunt Hetty's heart.'

'That is probably the reason why it was never thawed,' rejoined her friend. 'I always told you that not having enough sunshine was what ailed all the world. Make people happy, and there will not be half the quarrelling, or a tenth part of the wickedness there is.'

From this gospel of joy, preached and practised, nobody derived so much benefit as little Peggy. Her nature, which was fast growing crooked and knotty, under the malign influence of constraint and fear, straightened up, budded and blossomed, in the genial atmosphere of cheerful kindness.

Her affections and faculties were kept in such pleasant exercise, that constant lightness of heart made her almost handsome. The young music teacher thought her more than handsome, for her affectionate soul shone more beamingly on him than others, and love makes all things beautiful.

When the orphan removed to her pleasant little cottage on her wedding-day, she threw her arms round the blessed missionary of sunshine, and said, 'Ah, thou, dear, good Aunt, it is thou who hast made my life FAIR-WEATHER.'—[Columbian Magazine for June.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS IN ENGLAND.

It is gratifying to witness the progress which a reform on the subject of capital punishments is making in England. Every new arrival, almost, brings us additional intelligence of the growing feeling of repugnance in the public mind against these punishments.

From the items of foreign intelligence by the last arrival, we clip the following paragraphs:—[Ch. Messenger.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—Mr. Ewart, the Member for Dumfries, is making an effort to abolish punishment by death, and the enlightened feeling of the country seems to be in favor of the experiment. When the criminal code was softened a few years back, and offences which were previously capital were commuted to transportation, it was found that the experiment was successful, if not in decreasing crime, in inducing juries to convict. The spirit of the age is opposed to the sacrifice of life—to desecrating, needlessly, the living temple of the Divinity. If the object of punishment is to deter, as it ought to be, from the commission of crime, public executions do not certainly answer the end. To hang a man like a dog draws thousands of people round the gallows in 'merrie England,' who seem to gloat upon the agonies of the dying wretch. It is an exhibition, a kind of gala, which is sure at all times to attract the canaille. But the ribald jests of the bystanders at the extinction of a fellow creature's life form the best commentary on the morale of the affair.

At the Exeter meeting against Capital Punishment, a single hand was held up against each resolution. At length some one cried out 'Its Jack Ketch,' and the dissident hand appeared no more.

EXECUTION OF WYATT.

The deed is done! The death-blow is struck! Another victim has been offered upon the bloody altar of the demon of Revenge. The monster has been gorged for the moment, by the flesh and blood of a human being, created in the image of God, possessing all the feelings and sympathies of our common nature, and bound to us by the ties of a common brotherhood. But this abhorrent repast, will only make his appetite for blood the more keen, and cause him to whet his talons for new victims, which he sees in preparation before him.

Henry Wyatt was killed in the jail at Auburn, on the 17th inst., at 3 o'clock P. M., by means of a rope which was placed around his neck, and attached to an 'infernal machine,' ingeniously and deliberately constructed for the express purpose of destroying the lives of human beings. I can not go into the details of the awful scene which concluded with this man's death. Let those who would read them, seek for them in the papers of the day. Suffice it to say, that on Friday evening previous, driven to desperation by his terrible condition, he attempted to commit suicide, by opening a vein in his arm with the point of a broken penknife blade. But he failed in his object. After a great loss of blood, he fainted, which caused it to ceased flowing; and the officers of the prison learning his situation, restored him to animation. He continued in a feeble state until the day of execution.—As the last preparations were being made for the gallows, he swooned, from exhaustion and excitement. Thus insensible and apparently lifeless, he was borne in the arms of the officers, from his cell to the fatal spot, in the hall of the jail, and placed and supported on a chair. Efforts were made to resuscitate him, that he might be the more effectually killed, in due course of law! He revived—the rope was placed around his neck—he raised his tearful eyes to the spectators around—rebuked some whom he believed had injured him—cordially thanked others who had been his friends—forgave his enemies, and implored divine forgiveness on himself—and bade them all adieu! He was then raised on his feet by two men—the signal was given, and he was launched into Eternity!!

A large concourse of people filled the jail yard and the neighboring streets, drawn hither, God knows by what instincts, who stood and gazed on the naked walls and grated windows of the jail. They saw nothing of the execution, and probably did not expect to witness it. And yet some came a long distance to look on that prison house, while the fearful tragedy was being enacted within! I rejoice that but few ladies were present. And it is greatly to the credit of this community, to say that the assembled multitude behaved with the utmost decorum during the solemn hour of death! A deep feeling of sadness and gloom, with few exceptions, was painted on every countenance.

As to Wyatt's religious opinions, it can hardly be said he had any. Some of our over pious neighbors—kind, charitable souls!—made a faint effort to vindicate that he was a Universalist! But they did not succeed in making any capital. He was ignorant of the doctrines and influences of the Gospel of impartial grace; and repeatedly informed me, and others, that he was not a Universalist. Would to God he had been under the benign influences of that restraining faith! He would never have died upon the gallows. He informed me that his parents were members of the Presbyterian church, and that he always attended that meeting while at home. It is probable all the religious influences to which he has ever been subjected, have been drawn from that source. Still, it is but just to say, that he did not end his days a Presbyterian. He rejected the Messiahship of Christ, and the inspiration of the Scriptures! As near as could be learned, he was a confirmed Deist; and had for a long time, cast off all religious influence and all moral restraint.

And now the appetite for blood having been satiated, for the time being, and a season of reflection having come, I beg to ask a solemn question of the serious and thoughtful portion of society—What good has been accomplished by the killing of this man?—what evil has been remedied?—what rule of right has been fulfilled?—in what respect are men happier, better or safer, than before Wyatt was deprived of his life? Is it said, he was hung in compliance with the law of God—'Thou shalt not kill'? Nay—was he not killed in violation, rather than accordance with that law? But his death was in accordance with the Bible rule—'Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.' If this rule is held as binding, then the sacrifice is but just commenced. It requires that the blood of Wyatt's executioners should be shed—and that those who destroy their lives, shall in like manner be slaughtered,—and thus the bloody drama must go on ad infinitum! Is this act justified on the ground that death is the highest penalty in the power of man, and should be inflicted for the highest of crimes! A mistake. There is a penalty more dreaded than death—perpetual imprisonment. Wyatt repeatedly and solemnly asserted, but a few hours before his death, that he would prefer being hung, to confinement in the State Prison, even for five years! But his execution furnished a salutary and restraining example, to deter others from murder. How vain and groundless is this supposition—how entirely in the face of the history of all past ages! A good man needs no such restraint as this. And a vicious man with a murderous determination, will not be held back an instant, by all the executions of past time—by the millions of headless trunks, and broken necks that have been strewed over the earth! Why this murderer Wyatt informed me that he had witnessed the execution of a large number of criminals, both by hanging and shooting. And what effect did it have on him and his vicious companions? They turned from the gallows and immediately imbrued their hands in the blood of their fellow beings!! Yet this man started back with shuddering and horror from the very thought of perpetual imprisonment! Again I ask, who was benefited by the killing of Wyatt?

I do not—I can not—blame the officers of the law who put the sentence of death into execution on Wyatt. They were as greatly pained in being compelled to do it, I have no doubt, as any could be that it was done. But they felt it to be a solemn and binding duty, from which there was no honorable escape. No—let not the horror and disgust of the spilling of human blood, rest on them, but on the odious, disgraceful, sanguinary law, which compelled them to take the life of a fellow man in cool blood! A law growing out of, and filled with, the very spirit of revenge and retaliation—and yet one to which a certain class cling with a deathless pertinacity, as though it was the last prop of civil liberty and public safety, instead of being, as it is, the last and most odious relic of barbarism still lingering in our midst, a foul blot alike on our humanity and Christianity!

Did those professing Christians who are clamorous in support of this inhuman law, and who fly to the Old Testament to find authority in its behalf, ever hear of a New Testament? Did they ever obtain any information of a Gospel, which was designed to abrogate and take the place of the old Mosaic dispensation, with its institutions and laws? Did they ever read the words of a certain Teacher sent of God—'The law and the prophets were until John; since that time the kingdom of God is preached.' Have they ever been taught that the Gospel of Christ forbid the principle of retaliation in dealing with the guilty—that it declares that men shall not require an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, blood for blood—but directs them to love their enemies, not to kill them—to return good for evil—to forgive injuries and overcome evil with good! If they have any remembrance of such a Gospel with such divine precepts, I pray them to have sufficient confidence in its influences, and sufficient respect for its Divine Author, not turn their backs on both, and take refuge in an old, worn out, laid aside dispensation, in defence of the most inhuman law that has ever disgraced the statute books of man! If the gallows is to be supported by the Scriptures, let it be done from the New Testament—from the Gospel under which Christians profess to live, and by whose precepts they are bound, instead of the old law dispensation, which ceased with John the Baptist.

J. M. A.

ELDER LYMAN PERRY.

Our readers will recollect that in this paper of June 19th we published a letter from Br. A. M. Worden, giving an account of the conversion of the above named individual (of the Christian connection) from a belief in the doctrine of endless misery to the faith of the 'Restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.' Br. Perry's former connections, the Christians, for a while affected to doubt the account of his conversion. But that being satisfactorily and fully proved, as we expected, they now undertake to deprecate his moral worth and affect to speak very lightly and disdainfully of him, although it is sufficiently evident from their own statements that they feel not a little chagrined and mortified at the idea of losing him from their ranks.

Elder John Ross, one of the Editors of the 'Christian Palladium,' in a late number of that paper, copies Br. Worden's letter, on the subject, from this paper, and appends the following disingenuous and uncandid remarks:

'We suppose this short note, contains a statement of two truths, accompanied with two other strong assertions which it would be no sin to doubt.'

First. It is undoubtedly true that the brother named by the writer, 'Lyman Perry,' has left the Christian connection, and 'FALLEN' into the Universalist 'ranks.'

Second. We suppose the sentiment embraced in this sentence, 'But Br. Perry is just such a man as we want,' is perfectly correct. At least, we can say, in all frankness, that, from the knowledge we possess of the parties now, apparently, so happily united, we know of no other minister, of any denomination, that we should judge better suited to the wants of Universalists than this new convert. We believe it will be found that his 'bumps' of self-esteem, and combativeness, are so developed as to fit him, eminently, for the wants of Universalists.

But there are two other statements of Mr. Worden for the truth of which we can not vouch. First. He says this Br. Perry was 'formerly one of the most substantial pillars in the Christian denomination.' Astonishing!—What! ONE OF THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL PILLARS in the whole 'Christian denomination' fallen clear down into the 'ranks' of Universalism? If so, it is lamentable indeed. But we will wait a little before we become too much alarmed at the 'fall' of this supposed 'most substantial pillar,' and see how the building stands without it. Probably when the dust, raised by the 'fall' of this 'pillar,' is a little blown off from the range of Mr. Worden's vision, he will see, himself, that such a 'pillar' as he describes, could never have had any thing more than a nominal connection with the Christian denomination; and its fall, therefore, will not in the least jeopardize the building.—We will therefore wait patiently for time to determine the quality of this pillar, and the amount of dependence of the denomination upon it. But we will say, if the Christian denomination rests upon such a foundation as he describes this Br. Perry, the sooner the whole falls the better.

Again, Mr. Worden speaking of this new convert says, he 'has, (as I am credibly informed,) renounced the horrid dogma of endless damnation, and become a believer in the Bible.' Now we certainly know not what credit to attach to the statements here made, taken as a whole.—We can believe that 'Br. Perry' has renounced the doctrine of endless damnation and fallen into the ranks of Universalists. But to believe that he, at the same time, 'become a believer in the Bible,' is too great a stretch for our faith. We might as easily believe with the Romanist, that 'Mary is the mother of God.' To renounce the doctrine of endless damnation, and believe the Bible, involves a contradiction. For Jesus Christ, Mark iii: 29, plainly describes a character as in danger of ETERNAL DAMNATION. And we can not conceive how one can be in danger of that which never did, and never will exist. There is another trouble in the way of our believing Mr. Worden's statements. We have so much charity for both the parties that it is hard to believe that this new convert to Universalism is, also, just now, 'become a believer in the Bible.' He has long since solemnly professed to believe the Bible; and pledged himself, before high heavens, to take it as his rule of religious faith and practice. Hence, if he has just now, at his 'fall' into the ranks of Universalists, become a believer in it, it follows, that, previously, he must have been a NOTORIOUS HYPOCRITE. And then to believe that such a character—one who could thus trifle with holy things, is 'just such a man as Universalists want,' seems a hard case. But perhaps they know their wants better than we do. At any rate, if this Br. Perry, was not, while with us, a full and hearty believer in the Bible—the whole Bible—as we always esteemed him to be, he was 'just such a man as' the Christian denomination do NOT WANT. And in this case he will probably, be more happy, and equally useful in his new relation.—And if he even now believes the Bible we have some ground to hope that under the influence of its saving truth, he may yet 'renounce the horrid dogma' of Universalism, and believe that the wicked will 'go away into everlasting punishment.' J. Ross.

The reader can hardly fail of detecting the disingenuousness and low quibbling of Elder Ross' remarks above copied. His capitalizing and emphasising particular words in Br. Worden's letter not emphasized by him; his capitalizing and punning upon the word 'fallen,' &c., shows that he was disposed to make something out of nothing, and reduce something to nothing if possible. He now speaks sneeringly of Br. Perry's worth, though previous to his embracing Universalism, 'his praise was in all their churches.' Elder Ross affects to wonder much at the expression of Br. W. that Elder Perry 'has renounced the horrid dogma of endless damnation and become a believer in the Bible;' and says the expression involves a contradiction: for Jesus Christ, Mark iii: 29, plainly describes a character as in danger of ETERNAL DAMNATION. Not quite so fast, Elder R. Now we presume that even this professed Christian Elder R. will admit that, if the Bible does not teach endless damnation, and does teach universal salvation, Br. Perry, though he meant to believe the Bible and thought he did believe it, yet in reality did not—i. e. he did not [till now] believe the doctrine which the Bible teaches, and he did believe in doctrines which the Bible does not teach. This was undoubtedly all that Br. Worden meant by the expression quoted.

Now then for the question at issue—Does the Bible teach endless misery? or does it teach universal salvation? To the first question we answer no; to the second, yea: and now for the proof. The Bible declares 'The Lord will not cast off forever'—that he 'will not contend forever, nor be always wroth; for the spirits should fail before him and the souls which he has made.' Now those who contradict this testimony, and declare that God will contend forever and be always wroth—that he will cast off forever, &c., it seems to us, ought to give as good a reason why he will as he has given why he will not. But our Christian Elder relies much on the phrase eternal damnation, Mark iii: 29, which he quotes with great gusto. But if he knows any thing of the original language in which the New Testament was written, he knows this text furnishes no proof of endless damnation. Why, if Jesus meant to teach this awful doctrine, did he not use the word endless, or one in the Greek equivalent thereto? For there are a number of such words in the Greek. But Jesus chose the word aiônios: and the phrase here would be more appropriately rendered age-lasting judgment, or condemnation, than eternal damnation, as our English version has it. But the error in translation can not alter the sense of the original, nor establish a doctrine as true which is at war with reason, common sense, the general teachings of Christ and his apostles, and the testimony of 'all God's holy prophets since the world began.' Now then the Bible positively affirms, that God 'is the Saviour of all men'—that he 'will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth,' and that he 'worketh all things after the counsel of his own will'—that 'every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father'—that Christ must reign till all enemies are subdued and God shall become 'all in all'—that the time shall come when 'there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither any more pain; for the former things are past away'—that death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed—swallowed up in victory, and tears wiped from off all faces—that where sin abounded grace shall much more abound that, as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness and eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord—and scores upon scores of other similar declarations does the Bible contain, that can never be reconciled with the doctrine of endless damnation, and can be rationally explained only on the ground of universal salvation.

But Elder Ross shudders at the idea of Universalism, and calls it a 'horrid dogma!' How horrid, how shocking, how awful to him is the thought that all of God's offspring shall become humble, pure, holy and happy! Horrible, horrible indeed!! But endless damnation—O, how sweet to his heart is the thought! 'Tis music to his ears and pleasure to his soul! He can dwell on it with rapture, and pray that Br. Perry may be reconverted to its most comfortable belief! The very thought of it seems to make 'His soul's calm sunshine and his heart-felt joy!'

He can triumphantly sing

'Damnation! O, the joyful sound!

'Tis pleasure in my ears,

A sovereign balm for every wound,

A cordial for my fears!'

But seriously, what worse than brutes; what demons incarnate, does the doctrine of a vindictive and infinitely cruel God and endless damnation make of poor weak humanity! It would seem that Br. Perry expected the bitter outpourings of his former brethren's wrath on his openly avowing the honest convictions of his heart in favor of the great Bible doctrine of impartial grace and the salvation of the whole world through Jesus Christ our Lord. Writing to a friend at the East, July 14th, he uses the following language which we copy from the Trumpet:

'The change of my views has occasioned quite a concussion among my old friends. They are generally very much grieved, and wish I had kept dark on those points, even if I did believe differently from what I had. But it is not in me to act the hypocrite, or stand non-committal on so prominent a part of the Gospel as this. If I preach I can not equivocate, but must take a position. I expect that I shall either withdraw, or be expelled from the Black River Christian Conference at its next session, which will be in September next.'

'Did the Christians live up to their principles, there would be no necessity of a separation, but their prejudices predominate to that degree, that I expect it will be unavoidable. They will not generally support, or hear me preach, since I have become a believer in the restitution.'

Such is the unsectarian and Christian spirit of our Christian brethren. Well, Br. Perry is not alone in receiving such kind of treatment from them. Br. John E. Palmer of Vt., and some more of our preachers, came from the same quarter, and experienced similar treatment.—But 'if God be for us, who can be against us?' D. S.

CONFERENCE AT EDEN CORNERS.—A general Conference of the Universalists in Erie Co. and the region round about, will be held, by appointment of the Buffalo Association, at Eden Corners, on the first Tuesday and Wednesday in September next. It is confidently expected that there will be a large and interesting meeting on the occasion. All who can attend are earnestly requested to do so.

A Conference of the Black River Association will be attended at Mexico, Oswego county, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in September. As the subject of Missionary labors within our bounds will be under consideration, a general attendance of ministers and people is specially requested.

P. MORSE, Standing Clerk.

GENERAL SUNDAY SCHOOL MEETING.

According to adjournment, a general meeting of Universalists will be held on Tuesday, September 15th, [the day previous to the General Convention,] in the City of Troy, N. Y., to confer respecting the cause of Sunday Schools in our denomination. All Universalist Clergymen and Laymen, are cordially invited to attend the meeting and to take such part therein as may seem to them suitable.—Interesting addresses and a pleasant occasion may be expected. The meeting will be organized at 10 o'clock in the morning of the day appointed.

U. S. CONVENTION OF UNIVERSALISTS.

The General Convention of Universalists in the United States, will hold its next Annual Session in the city of Troy, N. Y., on the third Wednesday and following Thursday (16th and 17th) in September, 1846. Occasional Sermon by Rev. Asher Moore of Philadelphia.

J. M. AUSTIN, Standing Clerk.

'The Country Pastor's Defence' (Rev. Mr. Dyer's) is received, but too late for this week's paper. It will appear in our next. So let Br. Goodrich prepare himself for decapitation without 'benefit of clergy.'

Br. D. H. Strickland who removed from Genoa to Homer, N. Y., some time since, informs us that communications and papers are still directed to him at the former place and he wishes all who may wish to communicate with him to be particular and address him at Homer, Cortland county, N. Y.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 17th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. LUTHER W. MCFARLAND, merchant of New York, to Miss ELIZABETH T. BROADWAY, of this city.

In Deerfield, on the 18th, by the same, Mr. GILBERT F. UNDERWOOD of Utica, to Miss ELIZA ANN THURSTIN, of Frankfort.

In the Unitarian church, Trenton, on Tuesday morning 11th inst., by Rev. Mr. Pierce, Rev. PERRY PHILLEO, of Russia, Herkimer county, to Miss JULIA, daughter of Rev. Isaac B. Pierce of the former place.

In Richfield, by Rev. J. H. Tuttle, Mr. GEORGE FOLLET, of Otsego, to Miss SALINDA ROBERTS, of Exeter.

In Otsego, by the same, Mr. GEORGE HINDS to Miss JANE BAIRD, both of Otsego.

At Richfield Springs, by the same, Mr. JAMES CHAMBERLAIN to Miss HARRIET OSBORN, both of Richfield.

In Oakville, by the same, Mr. HUGH SEATON to Miss MARIA PLUMB, both of Oakville.

In Exeter, by the same, Mr. WESTLEY HOLMES to Miss LUCY STREETER, both of Exeter.

In Otsego, by the same, Mr. JAMES BIRD PERKINS to Miss ELIZABETH NORTON, both of Otsego.

DEATHS.

In Whitesboro', on the 8th inst., after a lingering sickness since April last, MARY VESTALINE, daughter of William and Sophronia Martin, of Lima, Lagrange county, Indiana, aged 17 years. She had left her parents and come to spend a year with her aunt, Miss Minerva Faxon, to attend school. But she never lived to return to her fond father, sister and brothers at the West. No relatives were with her, save her mother, (who arrived a few weeks before her death,) and her aunt. Her reason remained to the last. She died firm in the faith, in which she had been early instructed, of a happy immortality beyond the grave. She betrayed no excitement or agitation in the dying moment, but fell sweetly and calmly asleep without a struggle or a groan. The flower thus early cut down by the frost of death, has fallen to the earth; but its fragrance has ascended to heaven.

In Cortland, on the 15th inst., Mrs. RACHEL CROWFOOT, aged 51 years.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. J. H. HARTER will preach in Cedarville the first Sunday in September, and at Columbia Centre at 5 o'clock, P. M. of said day.

Br. L. C. BROWNE will preach in Cooperstown the second Sunday in September.

The EDITOR will preach at Little Falls next Sunday, in the Grove, should the weather be pleasant; but if unpleasant, in the large new brick school house, and at Ilion the first Sunday in September.

Brs. D. C. TOMLINSON will preach at Oriskany Falls on the first Sunday in September, and at Bridgewater the second Sunday.

ON THE DEATH OF REV. GEORGE ROGERS.

'When he died a smile lit up his face; and after he was dead continued for some time.'—[Repository.]

Another star which shone high in the heavens
Of truth, and gazed with tenderness upon
This sin-polluted earth, which threw its clear
And mellow beams o'er dark benighted lands,—
Which lighted off the midnight mariner,
While, on his way o'er life's deep troubled sea,
Hath disappeared. And, though it's left behind
A constellation of bright, shining lights,
Like that, which went from Cassiopeia,
It's made a void.

Another of Christ's true
And faithful followers—who travelled from place
To place, and who, like Paul, did preach the word
Of life, to friend and foe, to small and great,
Who, fearing not to speak the all of God's Great truth, made many callous souls grow soft,
And many doubting hearts believe and hope—
Hath gone to heaven.

Yes, brother, thou art gone!
Thy heart, once warmed by Heaven's pure love, hath ceased
To beat; stern death hath laid his icy hand Upon thy lips, and they are silent. On Thy brow hath mystery set her seal; and like
A child in its dear mother's arms, thou art
Asleep. Thou wilt in this sad world, ne'er wake Again; nor preach to us that faith we love
As dearly as we love our own heart's blood.
To see thee, face to face, to meet thy smile,
And grasp thy hand, was pleasure never mine;
And yet, mine eyes have looked upon the page
Thy pen hath travelled o'er, until I wept,
In tears of joy—to see the truth so plain—
And felt, within my soul's deep fount, the charm
Of those dear words, so sweetly comforting.
There's much that thou hast penned, our hearts for aye
Will treasure up; and though thy life, for aught
I know, hath been one chain of love with truth's
Bright virtues hanging round, yet in thy death
Is seen, what crowns them all. It hath been said
That, in life's sunny hours, when death is far Away, and the bright rose of health is on
The cheek, 'twill do to think and preach that God
Us all will save, and make us happy in
A world to come; but when the brow is pale,
And death comes near and bids us look within
The tomb, we need a brighter faith. O God!
Could all have stood beside the dying bed,
And heard the last faint words, that told of lands
So clear and bright beyond death's valley dark,
And seen the angel smile that gathered round
The lips, as the last breath departed out,—
Could one have said that 'twill not do to die,
And think that all will meet again, where pain
And death and sin will never come?

And now,

As thou art gone, and thy pure soul is up
Star high, and soaring on, from orb to orb,
And angels gather round thee, thick as stars
In 'Milky Way,' canst thou not pluck one quill
From out their snowy wings—write o'er one page, Telling of what thou seest there,—and drop
It down to earth, that we may read and know
What heaven is? Or with a star's bright beam,
Canst thou not write it on the moon's fair face?
Or when the sea is still, upon its brow?
O grant but this request, and then our thoughts
Will heavenward turn; and by that cord, which God Around each heart hath wound, and which breaks not
In death, but like the ship's long anchor rope
Unwinds, to give the time-worn spirit space,
We'll cling to thy immortal soul, which now
On love's light wing its flight hath made, and when Life's shadowed day is o'er we'll come to thee.

SIGMA.

[The following article we copy from a late number of the Christian Messenger, and bespeak for it a considerate reading. The subject ought to be kept before the public, and rung in the ears of all Universalists till they shall feel, and not only feel, but act, as if they meant to do something effectually.]

THE CLINTON FUND—AND STILL THEY COME!

Week before last we had the gratification of presenting Br. A. B. Grosch's response to Br. Kingsbury's plan of endowing Clinton Liberal Institute. Last week we recorded another hearty response from Br. Clark. This week we are enabled, through generous action of an anonymous friend, to give another impetus to the ball. Friends! keep it in motion!

On Wednesday of last week (too late for the last paper) we received through the post office the following note, post marked at some distance from the city:

Mr. Editor—Away from home, and seeing for the first, at this moment, the Messenger of the 18th July, I am forcibly struck with the suggestion favorable to the endowment of the Clinton Liberal Institute; and think, with you, that $50,000 should be raised at once, by the Universalist denomination in this State, for that object. I submit the following practical proposition—Do you, in conclave with some of the leading, influential Universalists, select the name of some person of known probity of character, integrity and worth—or some Bank in New York City—to whom each person, so disposed, might remit his Dollar, more or less, for the purpose of this endowment.

In New York City, each well disposed individual has nothing more to do than to enclose the amount in an envelope, properly directed, and throw it into the post office, if he can't deliver it. Name the Bank, or individual, in your next paper, and with similar remarks to those in your leader of the 18th July—a large sum will be raised at once. I enclose $5 as a beginning—if my views are well seconded, I'll increase my contribution. Yours truly,

STEBENHEATH.

August 1st, 1846.

We know not positively the source of the above, but have an inkling that we have seen the hand writing. If correct in our conjecture, we are well satisfied the contribution will be liberally increased. But these considerations entirely aside, the contribution is now liberal.

Brethren of the Universalist Faith in New York! just look at the subject one moment—only a moment! How many should there be in this great State able and willing to contribute their Five Dollars? Then add the tens, twenties, thirties, and so on, up to the hundreds and thousands! How long think ye, would it take to make up the $50,000, if every man, woman and child would put their hand to this work?

And then the mites are not to be forgotten. The poor widow's contribution was equal to that of the largest donations from those who gave of their abundance. Not that we would appeal in this case for the widow's mite, for there is really no necessity for it. But there are thousands who can give their dollar without injury to themselves. And these dollars, insignificant as they may seem separately, count up rapidly as a whole. And beside, they accomplish another important work. They are as valuable, or more so, than much larger sums from those possessing abundance. They are actually the key which unlocks the purses of the rich. They bring thousands of dollars, where otherwise there would only be hundreds. Do you ask a reason for this? You have it in the plain, undeniable fact, that the wealthy will always contribute much more liberally to any object of common interest, when they see every one who should participate in it, and who is to be equally benefited, actively engaged therein, according to his ability, whether that ability is quite limited, or more extended. The very effort of those in moderate, or limited circumstances, to help on a common good, is to the wealthy, as the sun to the flower and the field.—It warms their hearts, expands their feelings, and adds immeasurably to their zeal. Think of this view, brethren—think seriously, and promptly. You will find it no idle speculation. Put it in practice—test it thoroughly, and in less than one year, probably in six months, you will enjoy the supreme pleasure of seeing the Clinton Institute established upon as favorable footing as any Collegiate Institution in our State. Is not the object worthy an effort? I will not insult the good sense and perceptive powers of my brethren in the faith in this State, by presuming upon a negative answer. I hear only one universal, overwhelming YEA!

But to the note of our generous correspondent. We like his suggestion, because it can be acted upon without the least interference with any other. We say put every available measure into operation that shall not interfere with existing ones. There are hundreds, and thousands, perhaps, in similar situations with our good brother Clark, who have not the pleasure of belonging to Societies, and who would be accommodated with some point to which to direct their contributions. We have acted, therefore, on the suggestion of our correspondent, and have consulted with a sterling friend of our cause in this city, and one every way responsible, on the subject of his being a receiver of the Funds that may be contributed in this way. He has consented to the announcement of his name. And that name, we take great pleasure in saying, is ABNER CHICHESTER, the worthy Treasurer of the Universalist Relief Fund. Mr. Chichester is so well known through the denomination in this State, at least, that we hardly need repeat what has before been stated, that he is in every respect responsible. Whatever is remitted to him will be held sacred to its object, or for refunding to the donors, should the object fail. But who talks of failure? We will not. No one should. It will—it must succeed.—The ball is in motion! Keep it moving, and every revolution shall give it increased momentum!

Donations, therefore, of any amount, may be inclosed to ABNER CHICHESTER, Esq., 4 Market st., New York. Or when communicating with this office they may be remitted here, and they will be faithfully handed over to him. Acknowledgements of the receipt of the same will be made from time to time through the columns of this paper, and we hope others in the State. Brethren, will you act at once upon the hint of 'Stebenheath'!

MALT LIQUORS.—Professor Brande, in an article on malt liquors, describes the manner in which they are adulterated, in the beer shops and public houses, and some of the breweries of London. The English are remarkably fond of malt liquor; it serves many of them for meat and drink, and lodging also. It must be a racy, piquant and nutritive article of diet, if what the Professor says, is true. He tells us that green vitriol is used to make the beer frothy, treacle to sweeten it, cocculus indicus to intoxicate, pepper to sharpen it, grains of paradise to warm it, and salt to prevent its quenching thirst. One of the most common, and at the same time most pernicious narcotic additions is tobacco, which, being licensed at the publican's, is not, like the other articles, tangible by the officers. This is not, it is said, an exaggerated account of the composition of the trash which, under various seductive names, is pumped up from underground laboratories, and retailed at the bar and tap; and that it is which the laborer, because perchance, it is stimulating and stupifying, considers strengthening and comforting.—English paper.

THE COUNTRY PASTOR'S DEFENSE.

Having read an article, or rather articles, published by Rev. J. T. Goodrich in the Advocate of July 3d and 10th, in which the writer, not only declares that 'If in any respect in error, it is unintentional, and shall be publicly corrected;' but also CHALLENGES the individuals implicated, to disprove the allegations made against them if false or exaggerated, the undersigned would call his attention to some of the many mistakes into which he appears to have fallen.

1. He represents a certain 'Country Pastor,' whose 'cognomen' he says 'is the Rev. (?) Mr. Dyer,' as standing at the head, and being the 'instigator,' or chief mover in the various plans and efforts set forth, as pursued by sundry individuals in Preston towards their fellow citizens of other persuasions. In relation to the Meeting House occupied by the Presbyterian congregation; the subscription was circulated, and the house erected before Mr. D. ever visited Chenango county, or saw the face of an individual in the town of Preston. It must therefore be evident to all, that whatever dishonorable measures may have been taken in obtaining funds for that object, he could not have been the instigator. Nor did he ever recommend, or in any way instigate or encourage, any individual whatever, to oppose the holding of religious or other meetings in the school house of District No. 4.— Though he felt it to be unreasonable and oppressive, that individuals of other denominations should be heavily taxed with express reference to the accommodation of the Universalists in respect to a place of worship, his advice would have been, had he been consulted on the subject, not to oppose: but insist on the right of each religious denomination in the district, to occupy the house its due proportion of the time. That he was not so consulted, may be accounted for by the fact, that in addition to his residing some miles distant, the leaders in the opposition were not members of his congregation; nor men who will readily acknowledge themselves the mere 'tools' of Mr. Dyer, or any other Pastor. Only two, of the fifteen signers of the protest alluded to by Mr. G., belong to the Presbyterian church; and but one, or at most two of the other signers, is often, if ever seen in their congregation. As to that 'practical' and staunch 'follower of John Calvin,' whom Mr. G. represents as entering with such zeal upon the 'very creditable work of obtaining signatures to a remonstrance,' he is not a member of any religious denomination whatever; nor is there probably the man in Chenango co., more generally and extensively known as the decided and uncompromising opponent of the doctrines held by John Calvin, than he.

Another mistake into which Mr. G. has fallen, relates to the authorship and responsibility of the memorial addressed by sundry individuals of said district to the State Superintendent. Mr. G. asserts, in broad capitals, that Mr. Dyer was its AUTHOR; and that HE HAS ACKNOWLEDGED IT. In what way he obtained his information, or on what he relies for proof to sustain him in so unwarrantable an assertion, I know not; but nothing can be further from the truth than what he asserts respecting it. Mr. Dyer never advised to, nor in any way encouraged the signers of that memorial to make an appeal to the State Superintendent. At the particular request of one of them, he did commit the statements and facts presented him to paper, in the form of a memorial, and deliver it into the hands of another individual, who is also said to have signed it; at the same time distinctly remarking, that, both in regard to the facts in the case, and the expediency of the measure, he was to be considered in no way whatever responsible; having rendered the assistance as an act of favor, or kindness, without so much as forming an opinion whether the course were advisable or not.— Whether the memorial thus drawn, appeared in the office of the State Superintendent in its original form, or in 'his hand writing,' is a matter about which the writer feels very little concern. But if the Rev. Mr. Goodrich can review the articles he has published without feeling not only a readiness, but a desire to retract, there will be at least some reason to question whether his love and benevolence are yet sufficient to embrace the universe.

Another mistake into which Mr. G. appears to have fallen, relates to the design of its erection, the size, and occupancy of the new school house in Dist. No. 4. He represents the memorialists, as intimating that it was 'only professedly,' that the building was intended as a school house. Now the memorial represents no such thing. The word only, is of Mr. G.'s own substituting; and he doubtless well understood the necessity of doing so, to make out even the appearance of a falsehood. Let Mr. G. show that the erection of a school house was not ostensibly the object of the tax levied, and it is admitted the memorial misrepresented the matter. He admits the Universalists 'expected to use the new house as they had done the old one;' and from what he informs us of the wonderful success with which he was preaching the blessed doctrine in Preston, it would be a little remarkable if they should not have foreseen and endeavored to provide for the wants of so rapidly increasing a congregation.

Mr. G. denies that the house is any larger than necessary to the present accommodation of the school: If rightly informed, its dimensions, either in length or breadth, fall only four feet short of the spacious and commodious edifice now erecting in the district for the use of that rapidly increasing denomination. Besides this; there are, as reported, 43 scholars in the district betwixt the ages of 5 and 15, entitled to draw public money: and of course, justly entitled to the privileges of the district school; and in the estimation of good judges, at least 145 adult persons can be comfortably accommodated in the seats already constructed, aside from the unoccupied area, which can be supplied with additional seats whenever occasion requires.

Mr. G. states, that the subject of erecting the house, 'was considered at the regular annual school meeting'—the plan presented by one who signed the memorial, and 'almost unanimously adopted'—not more than one or two, if any objecting to it; and that 'little or no opposition was manifested until some time subsequent.' Now, it so happens, that the resolution was at first carried by the majority of a single vote; and within a few days subsequent, not less than twelve of the principal tax-payers,—more than had voted for the erection of the house, did insist on the calling of a special meeting for the purpose of rescinding that resolution, but were denied lest the favorite project should be defeated.— And the expense did exceed what was at first contemplated and provided for, to an amount which required the assessment and collection of an additional tax to meet it.

Mr. G. denies that any thing like one-half the legal voters of the district, were opposed to occupying the house for other than school purposes; and declares that they did not 'pay near two-thirds the expense of its erection.' Of the 33 taxable polls, 15 had voluntarily signed a written protest to that effect; while some three or four others declared themselves opposed, though declining to sign said protest: and it was a question which even the Hon. State Superintendent preferred to dodge, whether persons not subject to taxation, had a legal, any more than a moral right, first to vote away the property of others professedly to build a school house, and then appropriate that house to an entirely different object. And if Mr. G., after footing the amount of tax paid by the signers of that protest, can look his fellow men in the face, and declare as he has done, that it does not amount to 'near two-thirds of the expense of its erection,' he must either possess a peculiar knack at making figures lie, or a more brazen front than I had supposed.

Mr. G. not only represents it as a gross falsehood; but deems it such a breach of charity as should spread 'the crimson glow of shame upon their cheeks,' that the memorialists should have expressed an opinion respecting the tendency of the meetings held in the school house of Dist. No. 4. But have not Partialists, as well as Universalists, a right to form and express an opinion respecting the character and tendency of the sentiments held by others? Mr. G. does not hesitate to denounce the doctrines of a 'Country Pastor,' as of a most 'malignant tendency,' and in addition to representing them as 'callous to all sense of justice, with consciences seared with a hot iron,' &c., he declares that even forgery could scarcely be more bare, than some of the measures to which those memorialists have resorted. From the abhorrence with which he looks upon such an exhibition of illiberality, as appears in the modest expression of the memorialists, respecting the tendency of the meetings held in said school house, one would suppose that in addition to the habit of always demanding respect to themselves, while refusing to pay respect to the rights of others, Universalists really possessed as exclusive a right, (secured by patent or otherwise,) of dealing out anathemas against others, as that granted them by the State Superintendent, of propagating their peculiar sentiments through the channel of the school district library! Or did the memorialists misjudge in the case? If Mr. G.'s expose of a 'Country Pastor' present a fair specimen of his labors, does it not look a little as though such might be the tendency? And surely, that state of society which will uphold and encourage such a course, goes far to prove that such has been the result. Beside this, that 'individual of undoubted veracity,' who 'saw the memorial in the office of the State Superintendent, and knew it to be in the hand writing of Mr. Dyer,'—whose bar-room stands in the very centre of Mr. G.'s field of labor, and who joins most heartily with him in his liberal efforts to blacken the character of that hated 'Country Pastor,' has often averred; that though once one of the most peaceful neighborhoods in the State, it has at length become a perfect hell upon earth. And since men must have a hell somewhere; and the blessed doctrine taught by Mr. G. annihilates it in the future, it follows of course, it must be here!

Another mistake has reference to certain books, set forth as having been expelled from, or retained in the library of said district. The memorialists state, that 'certain publications of the A. T. Society, such as Abbott's Young Christian, are said to have been expelled, while 'Austin's Voice to Youth,' and 'Combe on Man' are retained.' Mr. G. denies that the works alluded to, had ever been even threatened to be expelled; and intimates that the statement was made knowing its falsity, to unjustly excite the prejudice of the State Superintendent for the purpose of inducing him to remove the books afterwards mentioned. He further declares, that 'the author of this declaration must have been guilty of wilful falsehood.' The memorialists stand ready to prove, that at least one of the trustees of said district, had repeatedly declared respecting Abbott's Young Christian, that it 'was a sectarian book, &c., and must be expelled from the library.' They are also prepared to show, that said book, in connexion with others, was selected out, and laid aside from the books belonging to the library. That when called for at the library, it was denied on the ground of its having been condemned as a sectarian book, 'calculated to bias the mind,' &c., and that 'it was to be sold.' Now is it surprising that under such circumstances, an impression should have prevailed that the books alluded to were expelled? And it will be recollected that all the memorialists declare is, that they were 'said to have been expelled.'

Mr. G. denies that 'Austin's Voice to Youth' was published with the design of propagating Universalism, or that such is its tendency. If he mean the expurgated edition, an expedient evidently resorted to, to continue its circulation in a library, after a 'Country Pastor' had called attention to the work in his 'More Snakes in the Grass,' I attempt not to contradict him. But if remarks relate to either of the editions published prior to that memorial, an intelligent community are left to decide in accordance with Mr. G.'s own inquiry, 'Who but an idiot, or at least a dolt, a maniac, or a wilful liar, can carefully and attentively peruse the work, and so represent.'

He also denies 'Combe's work on Man' to be of infidel tendency; and declares with an air of great triumph, that, 'Unfortunately for a 'Country Pastor' and his little body guard of signers, IT WAS NOT NOR NEVER HAD BEEN IN THE LIBRARY REFERRED TO, WHEN THE MEMORIAL WAS WRITTEN.' All the memorialists say respecting the infidelity of the work is, that infidels themselves so regard and recommend it; and the proof of that Mr. G. has abundantly furnished in a June number of the Advocate. As to the works ever having been in the library of said district, the signers of the memorial stand ready to show, that it had been obtained from the library; and circulated and read in the district under the full persuasion of its belonging to and composing part of the library. It may have been the private property of the librarian, or some other individual, circulated as a decoy, in connexion with the books of the library, which Mr. G. or his informants may explain as best they can; but that the work was taken from, and circulated and read as belong to the library, is in vain for him to deny.

As to the part taken by the Town Superintendent: however he may since have been cast out of their synagogue by the friends of Mr. G. for opposing rum selling, no one in Preston will pretend to deny, but that at the time alluded to, he did, not only sympathise with, but act, so far as action was had, in all the measures of which the memorialists complain. Nor was it from a fear 'to trust the County Superintendent,' or an apprehension 'their reckless falsehoods would be detected,' as Mr. G. so very charitably represents, that the memorialists carried their appeal direct to the State Superintendent. Although the County Superintendent do not, as Mr. G. asserts; nor ever did, belong to a 'self-styled evangelical church,' or any other, save that of being a son of a Friend Quaker, the memorialists would have had no fear from the closest investigation of all the complaints preferred by them to the State Superintendent. They did nothing clandestinely; however they may have decided that the 'interior,' rather than the 'exterior' of a letter determined to whom it properly belonged. Nor was the letter alluded to, 'addressed upon the interior to the inhabitants of the district,' as Mr. G. asserts; but to 'Wm. Parker, Jr., and others,' the signers of the memorial: who were recognised as being 'inhabitants of District No. 4.'

Another mistake into which Mr. G. has fallen, relates to the proportion of Presbyterians to others, who opposed the Universalists in their occupancy of the house. Instead of their being the only sinners; or sinners above all others in the measure, as he would have his readers to suppose, it so happens, that of the names appended to that protest, the individuals belonging to the Baptist churches are to those of the Presbyterian, more than three to one. Two only belonging to the Presbyterian; seven to the Baptist, and the remainder to the world's people.

Mr. G. has also fallen into a similar mistake, respecting its being at the request of some of these very signers, that the Rev. Mr. Richards delivered the first lecture in said school house. Not one of them ever made application to him on the subject, as Mr. R. himself stands ready to testify; nor was the lecture of a religious, but literary character; designed as a kind of dedication of the house to the pursuit of science, arranged and brought about by those sympathising with Mr. G. in Preston.

It thus appears, beyond all dispute, that the Rev. Mr. Goodrich must have labored under a most important mistake, respecting the transactions and occurrences in District No. 4, upon which he animadverts with so much pious indignation. And if possessed of a charity and love sufficiently liberal and extensive to embrace any where near all the human race, it must afford him no small degree of satisfaction to learn that his neighbor of the 'little Presbyterian church in Preston,' has not so richly merited, (however he may have experienced it,) that liberal exhibition of the unbounded benevolence of his soul, which Mr. G. has so profusely poured upon him through the columns of the Advocate.—He must also be gratified at seeing all the gross and malignant falsehoods of that black 'lying memorial, fairly wiped out without an exception, it having been so explained in regard to the circulation of 'Combe on Man,' as to show there must have been foul play somewhere, whereby the inhabitants of the district have been so deceived respecting its connexion with the library. And since his Presbyterian neighbors have been regarded as such a peculiar annoyance, on account of the blackness of those deeds at which he avers, 'Sodom itself would stand aghast, and fear and tremble!' it must serve greatly to quiet his apprehensions relative to the future, to learn, that as it respects the past, they have not, after all, been such sinners above all others as he had imagined.

Nor does Mr. G. appear to have been any less unfortunate in his statements relative to the affairs of the society, than in his representations respecting those of the school district. He seems to have imbibed the impression that the funds made use of in erecting the meeting house occupied by Mr. Dyer's congregation, were, in a great measure obtained by a species of 'pious fraud or swindling;' and that the property of other denominations is, to a large amount, retained by said society, contrary to agreement and against the consent of its rightful owners. He tells his readers; the 'Presbyterians promised their house should be open to all denominations; and that his friends aided liberally in furnishing means, intending to use it once in four weeks. Now Mr. G. would confer a favor on the Trustees, by naming to them the individual who furnished a dollar towards the erection of the house under the encouragement Universalists were to occupy it on any occasion whatever. Hundreds of dollars were offered on condition they would build a free house, where not a cent was obtained, for the express reason that the design (as specified in the subscription) was so exclusively sectarian. Mr. G. is challenged to name the individual, with a solitary exception, acknowledging himself at the time to be a Universalist, or supposed to be such, who ever paid a farthing towards its erection. He tells us one individual very justly concluded to sue the trustees for the $50 he had paid them; and that knowing they should be beaten, his money was refunded. 'Others also,' he says, 'might have brought these pious swindlers to justice.' One individual, who had paid, not $50 as he represents but $20 only, did receive back his money; not, however, under the apprehension of being beaten in a suit at law, but from a desire to avoid even the appearance of wrong; as he claimed to have signed the subscription without reading it, under an impression that it was to be a union house. And if any other individual, whether Universalist or otherwise, will make it satisfactorily appear, that he has funds vested in the Presbyterian meeting house in Preston, dishonestly, or unfairly obtained, the word of a trustee for it, who is no 'pious swindler' neither, he shall have his money back again with interest, though it may have become outlaid twice over.

Mr. G. seems also to have imbibed the impression, that Mr. Dyer is not only a 'malignant hater of Phrenology;' but a bitter opposer of the study of the higher branches of science, lest it lead to infidelity. I am happy in being able to assure the gentleman, that though he did once so far yield to the pressing opportunity of a certain lecturer by the name of Morrison, as to take the negative in a slight debate upon the subject; that 'Country Pastor,' is not so lavish of his 'malignity' as to waste it upon so harmless a thing as Phrenology; especially when divested of its infidelity. And as to his discovery concerning the infidel tendency of the higher branches of science;—as is well known in Preston, it pertains to an old calumny, got up some four years ago; but soon suffered an inglorious death; since which it has lain rotting in the grave, along with certain infamous conduct of that strolling lecturer; but is now dug up, as it seems, for the exquisite purpose of adding spice and perfumery to the columns of the Advocate! But if Mr. G. or his associates, desire to immortalise themselves by their efforts to resuscitate so puerile a carcass, they are entirely welcome to all the laurels they may reap.

Another mistake into which Mr. G. has fallen, in common with many of his brethren of like liberal sentiment, relates to the motives of a 'Country Pastor' and others, in opposing the circulation of Universalist and infidel works through the school district library. It is not, as so very charitably represented, for the purpose of supplying their place with the publications of the A. T. Society; but of guarding their own rights, and securing equal privileges to all. If Universalist are, as they claim to be, a religious sect, where is the propriety or justice of their demanding or enjoying privileges which are denied to other sects? For them, after joining with Catholics in expelling from the district library all evangelical works, to clamor so loud and earnest for the continuance of such works as the Voice to Youth, savors not a little of the policy of the pick-pocket, who after robbing his comrade of his purse, immediately joined in hot pursuit; himself loudest in the cry of: stop thief! stop thief!

As to the spite manifested by Mr. G. and his brethren toward a 'Country Pastor's' 'More Snakes in the Grass'; it seems not a little remarkable, that so 'ridiculous' and 'contemptible' an article as that has been represented, should have occasioned so many hisses, and so much spitting of venom. Who would have thought that an obscure 'Country Pastor,' residing in some dark corner 'where the sun never shines, destitute 'of any soul,' and with nothing but a 'gizzard' to guide his pen, (as J. M. Day represents,) should, by an hour's scribbling about some snakes in the grass, have convulsed the Empire State to its very centre! It must indeed have been a fire-brand, dropped into the midst of a cocatrices' den, to have produced such effects!—How fortunate for the liberals, that when furnished with a 'sixpence to buy himself a soul with,' he was dunced enough to take up with a 'three-penny gizzard' in its stead! else, who knows, but what even the darkness, emitted from the pen of that 'blue,' 'bigoted' 'Country Pastor,' might have shown the boasted light of modern liberalism, to be but the sulphurous flashings of its own murky atmosphere!

Another mistake fallen into by Mr. G., relates to the connexion betwixt the 'Country Pastor,' as he often calls him, and the Rev. Mr. Bush of the Baptist church, of Weedsport, Cayuga county notoriety; whom he represents as 'co-laborers;' and as exerting an 'undivided influence' in opposing him of course. As is well known in Preston, those men, in whatever way they may have worked, or whatever influence they may have exerted, were far enough from being 'co-workers,' as they never worked together at all; or so much as exchanged a word of conversation, during the stay of that immoral man in that 'moral town.' If the Rev. gentleman designed by the association, to cast a slur upon the character of a 'Country Pastor,' 'tis such an act of meanness as would be beneath the dignity of any man of common decency to deign a reply; or if it were merely to gratify a relish for moral putrefaction, one would suppose he might have found enough of that in his 'Orthodoxy as it is,' to fully satiate the most greedy carrion worm that every crawled, without such an effort to drag it into the Advocate.

Not having time to point out all the mistakes into which Mr. G. has fallen, in what he has published concerning the 'sayings and doings of a 'Country Pastor,' and his co-laborers in the cause of bigotry,' the few already presented, must suffice as a specimen of the rest. And the reader will perceive on an attentive examination of the article, that in holding Mr. Dyer responsible as the author of the memorial to the State Superintendent, the mistake is repeated little if any less than fifty times. The ten or twelve cases of falsehood to one truth, charged upon him and others, as contained in the memorial, have also been shown to be mistakes; in addition to what he has said about the meeting-house, the lecture of the Rev. Mr. Richards, the religious standing of the County Superintendent, the co-partnership betwixt the 'Country Pastor' and the Rev. Mr. Bush, his malignant hate against Phrenology, and the reasons for his opposition to the circulation of infidel and Universalist works in the district library. It will thus be perceived, that exclusive of all those which have been suffered to pass unnoticed, the mistakes alluded to, amount to several score. Unless some evil genius presided over him, or at least sat at his elbow, it must therefore appear a little singular, that so honest and conscientious a man as Mr. G. would fain be thought; and one too, influenced by such liberal views, and actuated by such unbounded charity and benevolence, should be quite so strict in marking the faults of others, while so inclined to err himself! Unless Universalists have secured a patent for manufacturing such mistakes by the wholesale: and regard the least infringement of the right, as sacrilege, how could the man become so horrified at the few pretended falsehoods charged upon a 'Country Pastor,' while himself engaged in grinding out, and palming off upon others, those of a far more malignant and flagrant character, by fifties at a grist! Surely, he must have a monstrous conscience, of purely India Rubber texture, to strain thus horribly at so small a gate, while swallowing down whole, so big a corn-mill!

I have called the misstatements of Mr. G., MISTAKES; not wilful falsehoods, nor intentional misrepresentations. For, if the opprobrious epithets so lavishly dealt out by him, appear no more lovely in one of such liberal views and unbounded benevolence, they must appear odious indeed, proceeding from so illiberal and bigoted a Partialist, as a 'Country Pastor.' And I would inquire, whether the articles he has furnished for the Advocate, present a fair specimen of what Universalism really is; and of the measures necessary in the estimation of its advocates to its support and propagation in the world? And if so; I would also inquire of such as may be suspending their unending destiny upon its teachings, whether if it be subject to so many mistakes in relation to things seen and temporal; and which wilful have been so easily guarded against, it may not also have fallen into a far more important mistake, respecting those which are unseen and eternal? It may have been ignorantly and undesignedly: but, if for that love and benevolence, which would embrace a universe of guilty creatures, there have been mistaken a spirit of an opposite character, which in addition to depopulating heaven, would involve earth also in the bitterest broils and contentions; however liberal may be its exercise, or remarkable its results, but little advantage can be gained even in respect to this present world; and in eternity—where—ah where, must its portion be!

In conclusion, I would suggest the query for Mr. G.'s future consideration, whether he may not also have fallen into a mistake in relation to the character of that immortality he is likely to secure by his attack upon a 'Country Pastor.' True he may have built himself a PILLAR, whereby to perpetuate his own glorious achievements in 'castigating' a poor 'bigoted 'Country Pastor' and his half dozen tools;' but may there not be some danger, lest while that sooty column remain among the files of the Advocate to render a 'Country Pastor' the hissing and execration of the 'present and all future generations,' his own dear self should also be constrained to appear there in an attitude scarce more desirable than that of a toad endeavoring to spit venom in his face because forsooth, he was the supposed author of a certain article entitled 'More Snakes in the Grass!'

N. B. Though the individuals whose character Mr. G. has made such efforts to malign, may never again turn aside to reply to his calumnies through the columns of the Advocate, they stand ready to meet him before the tribunal of an intelligent public, where witnesses can be confronted face to face, and there test the truth or falsity of each of the several charges and insinuations contained in the articles he has published. Of course, unless possessed of the chivalry of the Dutchman who from the summit of his hay-loft would cast abusive missiles upon a peaceful animal below, and then with all the valor of a Knight errant challenge him to a combat, he will be expected to attempt no further attacks through the press.

CONVENTION AT TROY.

Br. Price—We are beginning to make arrangements for the reception of our friends from the different parts of the country, who may attend the 'United States Convention of Universalists,' which is to hold its annual session in this city next month. We anticipate a large meeting of brethren, besides the delegates to the Convention; and shall be ready to do all we can to make their visit to our city agreeable. We have friends in the vicinity of Troy, who will be ready to accommodate those who may be disposed to visit them for entertainment, if the Society here can not entertain all who come; or, if any prefer remaining in the city, there are plenty of good public houses.

The members of the Convention and others who may attend, are requested, on their arrival in the city, to call at the 'American Hotel,' River street, where they will be directed to places of entertainment.—[Chris. Messenger. Troy, August 24.

JOHN MOORE.

NORTH BRANCH ASSOCIATION.

The North Branch Association of Universalists will hold its annual meeting in Springfield, Bradford county, Penn., on the third Wednesday and following Thursday in September (16th and 17th.) Ministerial brethren, and friends generally, are cordially invited to attend.

HENRY GIBBS, Standing Clerk.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street, Buffalo.

Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn, keeps a general assortment of Universalist Books for sale. He is also agent for the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist publications generally.

MARRIAGES.

In Van Buren, July 1st, by Rev. N. Brown, Mr. HORACE BARNES to Miss PHEBE HIGGINS, both of Van Buren.

DEATHS.

In the town of Norwich, June 16th, after a lingering and painful illness, Mr. JOSHUA WINSON, in the 82d year of his age. Mr. W. was industrious, honest, worthy and useful. In his last sickness he manifested unusual calmness and reconciliation. He had no desire to live. He cancelled all his debts, and provided for the distribution of his remaining estate. He made arrangements to procure and pay for all the necessary articles for his burial, the preacher to officiate, and the stones to mark the spot where his earthly tabernacle lies mouldering back to dust, and with full confidence in God, and in peace with all men, he was 'gathered into the garner, like a shock of corn fully ripe.' In accordance with his request, the writer attended his funeral, and a sermon was delivered in the meeting house at the White Store, June 19th, to a large circle of relatives, and a great congregation of friends and neighbors. J. T. G.

In Preston, July 29th, Mr. JOB STAFFORD, aged 81 years. He has left highly respectable children and other relatives to mourn their loss. May they realize it is his gain. His funeral was attended July 31st, by a numerous assembly, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered by

J. T. G.

At Rome, Aug. 14th, Mr. ICHAROD G. BROWN, of Herkimer, on a return from a visit to his daughter in Illinois.—His remains were taken to his friends in Herkimer, and buried on Sunday 16th inst. He has left a widow and a number of children to deplore his untimely death. May they be comforted in their afflictions by the hope of meeting him with a ransomed world in the mansions of eternal glory.

In East Henrietta, Monroe county, at her father's residence, August 18th, Mrs. CHARITY M., wife of Geo. Ransom of Rochester, and eldest sister of Br. N. Brown, aged 30 years. Her illness was short but severe, and which, in her conscious moments, she bore with resignation. She was formerly a member of the Baptist Communion, but for ten or more years past she had been a devoted and consistent Universalist, respected by her neighbors of other sects, and beloved by her friends. May the Gospel in its fulness comfort the heart of her bereaved companion—her parents and mourning relatives. Her funeral was attended in Henrietta. Br. G. W. Montgomery officiated on the solemn occasion.—[COW.]

A TWILIGHT RAMBLE.

Day hath departed!
The last flickering sunbeam, hath cast its Golden lustre o'er the calm, unruffled
Surface of the deep; and gathering a Brighter beauty as it passed away,
Stepp'd brightly o'er the forest trees, and vanish'd
Mid the dimness of the evening shades.

Still'd is the war of words!

Hush'd is the sound
Of morning labor—and gone—the weariness
Of noon-tide care.

Mortality hath put
Off its work-day garment; and the green earth
Hath folded, o'er its quiet bosom, the Gentle beauty of the twilight hour.
And here, amid this solitude of death—
This wilderness of graves—I come, to meditate.
Here—just at the head of this low, grassy Mound, and 'neath the spreading branches of this Lilac tree, whose root Affection's tear hath Water'd, and whose white blossoms the summer Breeze, hath scatter'd o'er the cold, damp locks of
The almost idolized departed—Here
Where stand within the reach of my frail arm,
So many marble orators, around
Whose feet the green grass clusters, and from whose Cold, pale lips there issues forth a gentle
Voice, whispering to life's way-worn pilgrim,
To come up unto the threshold of that
Low home, where he may cast aside his dusty
Sandals, and closing his weary eye lids
For their last repose, and folding his trembling
Arms above his silent heart, sink quietly
And gently to his rest—like as an infant
Babe, unto its pleasant slumbers.

Silence—bright, meek-eyed sister of the hour,
Sitting in queen-like majesty, upon
Her throne, hath stretched o'er earth and sea, her Gentle wing. No sound breaks in upon the Ear—save a low, melodious sigh, which Seems the echo of an angel's whisper.
The stars have come again, unto their nightly
Watch, and the pale moon-beams quiver 'mong the Dark, green maples, and play delicately,
And gently, with the dewy violets
That grow with such a winning loveliness
Upon this little grave.

A child—sleeps here!
The idol of a few fond hearts—whose hopes
And fears, and joys and griefs—hung, all alike, Around her; and in whose soft, dark eye they Read the light and shadow of their future's Destiny.
Her smile could make each page of life's dark book,
All brightness; and the light dropping of her
Footstep,—the low, bird-like music of her Laughter, could gild each leaf, and tree, and Flower with a more holy beauty. And Finally, her very presence made up
The sunshine of the hearts that loved her.

And now—she sleeps! But yesterday—and hand
In hand, we clambered o'er the mountain
Top, to chase the wild-bird from her cozy Nest, or watch the dew-drops fall upon the Hill-side stream.

And yet—she sleeps!
Strange—that Nature, in her onward course, can Bring no breath of life unto the coffin'd
Dead, at rest within her daughter's arms!
My heart grows weak, and with a bird-like Fluttering of its feeble wings, my mind
Draws back, within its prison-cell; as I Remember, that the foot of time, sweeps on Unceasingly. Leaving but here and there,
A dash of its familiar tread. The sun
Will laugh as brightly in his dewy home;
Pale moons, will come and go, and star-beams thicken
On the grassy plain. Day will abide with Man—and night come to us in its turn, till Morning chase its clouds away. Spring showers Will fall, and summer winds make music. And These old branches, mindful of their sacred
Charge, will with a mother-hand, take off

Their flowery garments, and spread them gently
Over stone and sod.

And here—within the Corner of our still church-yard, this little Brook will murmur on—forever. While we Perhaps, shall sink away into oblivion.
Mysterious working of a mighty
Mind! that each bright thing in Nature, should come Back again, save Man. And he must die away,
Like mist-wreaths from the shining sea.

I shudder, and grow
Weary at the thought of human nothingness!
And then—my trembling spirit reaches out
Her hand, and leaning on the Arm of God,
Gathers a stronger hope, and confidence,
And trust, to walk the yet untrodden
Pathway of this lower world.

TRUST IN GOD.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

When reliance in our heavenly Father, and faith in His promises are spoken of, we immediately attribute them to the Christian, and feel that these are ever his portion; and it is true they ever should be. 'Trust thou in God,' should be engraven on the heart of every Christian, and being engraven there, its spirit should be as an earnest of what He had promised, and a guerdon for obedience to its injunction.

But is it always thus? Ah, no. Have you not seen those who are ever ready to bind up the broken hearted, to pour the oil of consolation into wounded bosoms, and to minister lessons of condolence and comfort to those who were in affliction, bow for a season like a seed before the blast, when a loved one was snatched from them, and hurried from the home of the living to the mansions of the dead? Sincere and devout Christians they no doubt really were, and still believers in the promises which they have so often urged upon others; yet incapable of bringing home to themselves, in this their greatest hour of need, the balm which a living faith could yield, and the life it could in inspire.

And are there not seasons in the life of nearly all, moments in the almost daily occurrence of life's perplexities and fears, when distressing doubts—nay we will not call them doubts—when bewildering mists obscure the brightness of their sun of Hope, and make them to feel that in their obscurity and insignificance they may be overlooked and forgotten? Oh! in such moments alone, can we duly appreciate the continued darkness and rayless night of the unbeliever's mind—in such moments only, can we truly and deeply feel the intense earnestness of the prayer, 'Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief.'

It may be asked—and is it necessary that such clouds of darkness should hover around the Christian soul? and is it possible for him at all times and under all circumstances to be buoyed up and supported by the enlivening influences of confidence and faith? We can not speak of the necessity of our sometimes wavering confidence, and perhaps with as little certainty of the possibility of continued trustfulness and unshaken reliance on Heaven, during all the changes and vicissitudes of life; but that these can be cultivated and improved there can be no doubt. And if so, how necessary that all, even those who have drank most deeply of the waters of life, should attend to that which pertains so largely to their welfare in their hour of need.

But how is this improvement to be wrought, and our faith strengthened? By treasuring up in our minds the tokens of His goodness as evidences of His ever-loving and watchful care—by searching out, and this can be done in almost every trial and light affliction of earth, the object of divine chastisement, and by teaching our hearts to acknowledge with gratitude the wise and benignant government thus shown to be exercised over the children of men. But above all, though not to the exclusion of other means, by satisfying ourselves of the authenticity of the Scriptures—of the divine inspiration of the promises therein proclaimed, and by remembering how Christ who was wise above all men, in the knowledge of his Father's goodness and purposes, even bowed in submission and glorified Him, though conscious of the many trials and afflictions which it was ordained for him to pass through.

And how eminently worthy of the labor thus bestowed, is the object to be secured? Ask of those who have felt the need and been healed by the power, what would purchase their confidence in God, and reliance in His care and protection; and from the answer you receive, form an estimate of their value.

Ask of her who is an object of the cold patronizing charity of this world, without parents, friends, or home—a toiler, ay, a slave for the earnings, which as a bounty are grudgingly bestowed; ask of her, and she will say that when fully conscious of her lonely condition, she is about to sink in despondency, the sudden thought that in Heaven she shall have an immortal home—that there friends will surround her, and there she shall forever bask in the sunshine of a Parent's smile—of a Father who has declared that even in this world He will never leave or forsake those who put their trust in Him—that this thought, has inspired her with new life, and put a song of joy and gladness in her mouth! The riches of this world, could not purchase the calm content and peaceful serenity which this faith bestows.

Ask of him too, who, toil-worn, pale and emaciated, and standing as it were, at death's door, thinks not so much of self, as of the wife and little ones, dependent on his labor, and who, when he shall have been taken from their midst will be deprived of their only earthly protector —ask of him, and he will tell you that when thoughts of his loved one's, sorrowing and desolate lot, have deprived him of that needful rest, which cessation from pain possibly might yield; the reflection that there is One who closeth the lilies of the field and careth for the sparrows; and that He, even He has promised (and the promise is not regarded as mere idle words) to be much more mindful of earth's needy and suffering children—that this reflection has given him a peace of mind and cheerful resignation which nothing in this world could give or take away.

But we need not enumerate—wherever affliction, bereavement, or sorrowing is found, there will be found need for the healing waters of life. Then learn to 'trust thou in God; yea, trust thou in Him; though the storm and whirlwind rage around thee, and the darkened heavens shall seem to have hidden forever from thee the sunshine of His smile—trust thou in Him, though misfortunes and calamities attend thee, and danger and death seem lurking in thy pathway; though friends be estranged, and loved ones be snatched from thee; and though the world may deride, and the skeptic sneer, yet trust thou in Him, and peace, and calm delight, and blessedness such as nought else can yield, shall be thine through life, and thy death be as 'the sun at its setting.'

WESTERN N. Y. UNIVERSALIST S. S. ASSOCIATION.

New York, August 21, 1846.

Br. SKINNER,—In reply to Br. S. R. S.'s article on the above subject in your paper of this date, I remark:

1. My statement in the Magazine of August 7, in relation to the session of the State Association for 1845, is strictly correct, notwithstanding Br. S.'s unworthy attempt to cast suspicion upon it. No one present at that meeting will contradict my assertion. As to the corrected statistics of June 28, 1845, referred to, I have no hesitation in saying that they were, in part, drawn from the published report of the Western Association; which report, however, was not presented either in detail or otherwise at the meeting of the State Association, was not published until at or after the time of publishing the minutes of that body, and therefore could not be introduced therein.

2. Every body knows that in the preparation of the minutes of our public bodies, the greatest brevity consists

tent with a full account of the business actually done, is desirable. That the minutes of the Sunday School session at Newark does present a full statement of the business actually done, is not and will not be denied. It is true, all conversation, inquiries, and suggestions which gave rise to, and the names of the persons who made, the various motions are omitted, not merely in relation to the matter in dispute, but to all the other subjects before the body. In all this, your readers can judge whether any injustice was done to the Western Association, and I am willing to leave the matter with them.

Very respectfully, your brother,

G. L. DEMAREST.

WESTERN N. Y. UNIVERSALIST S. S. ASSOCIATION.

I exceedingly regret that circumstances seem to require a few words from me, touching the communication of Br. Demarest.

It is true, as Br. Smith affirms in his letter, published in the Magazine the 27th inst., that I was present at the session of the State S. S. Association, held in Cortland, May, 1845, and without a formal report of the doings of the Western N. Y. Universalist S. S. Association. It is also true, that I stated to Br. D. in private conversation, the doings of the body, which I was there to represent, and that, in consequence of the exceedingly limited period of time, between the holding of the first meeting of the Western Association, and that of the State Association, I was obliged to leave before the statistics were made out; and that the Secretary of that body promised to send them by mail, in season for use; but that they had not arrived. I also took my seat in the council, and, during a discussion relative to the best means of advancing the S. S. cause, stated that, at the first meeting of our Association, (I was then a member of the W. N. Y. U. S. S. A.) it was recommended that every minister within our limits should as early as practicable, preach upon the importance of organizing a S. School in connection with his society. This matter, it is very probable Br. Demarest has forgotten. It is also my firm belief that I presented to Br. Demarest, a certificate of my election to represent the new Association in the old, drawn up and signed by Br. U. Clark, Secretary of the Western N. Y. Universalist S. S. Association. But, lest it should be asked, why I did not apply for the fellowship of the State Association, I will say, because I had no authority to do so.

Homer, August 24th, 1846. D. H. STRICKLAND.

FEARS OF THE WAVE.

We copied last week a part of one of the letters of the Editor of the U. S. Gazette, J. R. Chandler, Esq., written to his Chair from Cape Island, a retreat on the Jersey shore. It was beautiful for the purity of its sentiments and the chasteness of the language in which those sentiments were expressed. In a later letter, we notice, he makes improvement of the circumstance of a little child, by the sea-side, encouraged by the retreating wave to run down the sandy beach in pursuit of pebbles and shells, but as often terrified and made to retreat in turn before the wave that chased her tiny feet to the shore. He has a happy faculty to deduce a good moral from all such circumstances:

'I was amused this morning, while sitting in the arbor that overlooks the shore, and affords a view for miles along the beach, and outward, till the ocean and the sky blend their various beautiful blues. A little girl had accompanied her mother in a stroll along the shore, and as the wave receded, the little child chased its retiring edge to gather tiny, brilliant pebbles, chafed into shape and polish by the constant attrition of the agitating waters on the shore. Yet scarcely would she bend down to pick up her valueless treasures, when the wave, gathering new forces, and in increased quantity, would be impelled back toward the shore again, and the little one, holding up her tiny garments, would spring away from the threatening water that seemed anxious to embrace such innocence, pursuing as if an instinct or appetite stimulated the chase. The child would run half terrified from the pursuer, and hide herself in the bosom of her anxious, yet pleased mother: and while the rushing wave would pause at its utmost height, spend its strength upon the sand, and retire back to its appointed bounds, the timid child would lift its head from her mother's breast, and look with half established confidence upon the retreating waters, ready again to undertake her perilous adventure, for the profits which it seemed to promise in accessions to the wealth of her toy box.

I leave it to you, my dear friend, to moralise on this scene. I have no time, else what a pretty thought does the retreating fear of the child suggest! How much are we perilling for that which avails but a little in the end, but which is nevertheless good, because it has its present value? And how do we hasten, with sudden apprehension, from impending evils, and hide ourselves away from the danger in some covert that earth has provided, when a look back will show that Heaven itself has set limits to its own inflictions, and our earthly hiding places are only attained when the danger has long since past. Nestling in the bosom of our mother, we look back, and find that our Heavenly Parent himself has been our shield, by setting bounds to the pursuing evil. But earthly affection, earthly confidence, and earthly comforting, how like those of Heaven, and of heavenly origin! The most lovely and comforting of our heavenly anticipations, are nothing but a desired fulfilment of what we had promised ourselves on earth.'

Yes—that is a glorious thought;—that to all the waves of sorrow which God brings upon the tenants on the shores of time, before whom the boundless ocean of eternity is spread out, He has set bounds that even afflictions can not pass. 'Heaven itself has set limits to its own inflictions.' A man who can utter such a thought can have no place in his great soul for so ignoble an idea as that of God's making any of his children miserable to all eternity. Soon, retreating before the surges of death, we shall, but looking back upon 'yesterday's sorrow much on earth. Heavenly Parent has himself been our shield, by setting bounds to the pursuing evil.' Death can not pass the barriers of the grave. Beyond that, Eternal Life is the gift of God for man.—[Gospel Banner.]

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1846.

ARGUMENT OF WILLIAM H. SEWARD

In defence of Wm. Freeman on his trial for murder, at Auburn, July 21st and 22d, 1846.

We are indebted to Br. J. M. Austin for a copy of this Argument. It is contained in a pamphlet of 30 pages, double columns, of closely printed matter. We have given it an attentive perusal, and have arisen therefrom with greatly increased admiration both of the talents and philanthropy of Ex-Governor Seward. His argument is clear, connected, forcible and consistent throughout. It is a plea, not for fee or reward, for its author received none; not for wealth, aristocracy, popularity or favor, but for a poor, friendless, blood-stained, demented negro, who could neither appreciate his services nor reward them, and in the midst of a community excited, enraged, crying for blood, blood, blood, and who could, at the time of Freeman's arrest, hardly be restrained from taking the law into their own hands and immolating him at once upon the altar of their vengeance, and at the time of his trial, had prejudged his case and determined on his death.

Our readers will recollect the tragic scene, the slaughter of four innocent persons, of the Van Nest family, near Auburn, by this negro, who had a few months before been discharged from the State Prison, where he had been confined at hard labor for five years for horse stealing; and of which crime it now appears he was entirely innocent. While in prison (and innocent) he was cruelly treated, whipt, pounded on the head with a cudgel, or board, till he was deaf and his mental faculties impaired to that degree that he was nearly or quite an idiot, as is abundantly proved, before and after he was discharged. But the poor, demented monomaniac, knowing his innocence of the crime for which he suffered, and idiot though he was, felt himself deeply wronged, and got this one idea fixed in his mind that he must be paid for his five years labor. Upon all other subjects he was stupid and careless, but upon this intensely and perpetually dwelling, he applied to several Justices of the peace for warrants to be issued against those who had procured his imprisonment; but unable to procure warrants, he at length prepared himself for what he called his work, (killing,) and on the fatal night, proceeded with his sharpened butcher's knife, about three miles out of the village, to the house of Mr. Van Nest and began his dreadful 'work' by killing four innocent persons, and nearly killing a fifth, with whom he was unacquainted, against whom he entertained no enmity, and for whose destruction he could have had no possible motive; as he sought not plunder, and took nothing from the house nor from person of the murdered man, and very innocently answered when afterwards asked if he killed them to get their money, that he did not know as they had any. In the bloody work of death, he received a wound in one hand that disabled him, and he at once quit the house, proceeded to the barn, took a horse and fled to his friends in Oswego county, where, as he afterwards stated, he intended to remain till his hand got well so that he could again commence 'his work' (i. e. of killing,) for he had but just begun the work of death according to his own account. He made no effort to deny or conceal the fact of having killed the Van Nest family, and manifested neither guilt, remorse or sorrow for what he had done. If there ever was a case of homicide occasioned by dementia, or monomania, or both combined, we believe this is clearly one of that kind. empannelled and the question tried whether Freeman was sane or insane; and in the midst of a community crying for the blood of the murderer, and probably influenced by the general excitement, eleven of that jury pronounced him sane, but the 12th dissented; but they finally compromised the verdict by saying (not in the language of the law that the prisoner was 'not insane,' but) that he was 'sufficiently sane in mind and memory to distinguish between right and wrong,' which in fact implied that he was not fully or entirely sane, either in mind or memory. And upon this verdict, thus obtained, Freeman was put on trial for and convicted of murder. We make the following extract from Mr. Seward's plea, pp. 5, 6.

'The prisoner was obliged, no, his Counsel were obliged by law to accept the plea of not guilty, which the Court directed to be entered in his behalf. That plea denies the homicide. If the law had allowed it, we would gladly have admitted all the murders of which the prisoner was accused, and have admitted them to be as unprovoked as they were cruel, and have gone directly before you on the only defence upon which we have insisted or shall insist or could insist, that he is irresponsible because he was and is insane.

We labor not only under these difficulties, but under the further embarrassment that the plea of Insanity is universally suspected. It is the last subterfuge of the guilty, and so is too often abused. But however obnoxious this defence is to suspicion, there have been cases where it was true; and when true, it is of all pleas the most perfect and complete defence that can be offered in any human tribunal. Our Saviour forgave his Judges because 'they knew not what they did.' The insane man who has committed a crime knew not what he did. If this being, covered with human blood, be insane, you and I and even the children of our affections are not more guiltless than he.

Is there reason for you to indulge a suspicion of fraud here? Look at this stupid senseless fool, almost as inanimate as the clay moulded in the brick yard, and say if you dare, that you are afraid of being deceived by him. Look at me. You all know me. Am I a man to engage in a conspiracy to deceive you and defraud justice? Look on us all, for although I began the defence of this cause alone, thanks to the generosity, to the magnanimity of an enlightened profession, I come out strong in the assistance of Counsel never before attached to me in any relation, but strongly grappled to me now, by these new and endearing ties. Is any one of us a man to be suspected? The testimony is closed. Look through it all. Can suspicion or malice find in it any ground to accuse us of a plot to set up a false and fabricated defence? I will give you, gentlemen, a key to every case where Insanity has been wrongfully, and yet successfully maintained. Gold, influence, popular favor, popular sympathy raise that defence and make it impregnable. But you have never seen a poor, worthless, spiritless, degraded negro like this acquitted wrongfully. I wish this trial may prove that such an one can be acquitted rightfully. The danger lies in this. There is not a white man or white woman who would not have been dismissed long since from the perils of such a prosecution, if it had only been proved that the offender was so ignorant and so brutalized as not to understand that the defence of Insanity had been interposed.

Dr. Spencer, of Geneva, it appears, was one of the most prominent of the physicians who coincided with the opinion of the Jury that Freeman was not insane. But though he had a chart by which (with the organs and faculties all classified and numbered) he professed to be able to determine between sanity and insanity, it seems he got confused and did not know how to explain his chart, and as Mr. Seward says, 'could not tell where he had located the unascertained centre' of the mind! By the by, will not Dr. Spencer wish to interpose the plea of insanity in behalf of his unfortunate relative, (for we believe the Spencer in New Jersey now awaiting his trial for the murder of his wife is a nephew of the Doctor), and whose case in several particulars resembles that of Freeman—the insanity being in some measure hereditary in both? We think there is evidence of insanity in both cases; but far clearer evidence of Freeman's than of Spencer's.—Would the Dr. be willing that his nephew—if we are right in our conjecture of the relationship—should be tried by his chart and his rules, and his sanity or insanity determined thereby? Upon Dr. Spencer's opinion, and that of Mr. Seward makes the following forcible and pertinent remarks:

'The Doctor pronounces the Prisoner sane because he had the chief intellectual faculties, 'Sensation,' 'Conception,' 'Attention,' 'Imagination' and 'Association.'—Now here is a delicate piece of wooden cutlery, fabricated by an inmate of the Lunatic Asylum at Utica, who was acquitted of murder on the ground of Insanity. He who fabricated it evinced in the manufacture, 'Conception,' 'Perception,' 'Memory,' 'Comparison,' 'Attention,' 'Adaptation,' 'Co-ordination,' 'Kindness,' 'Gratitude,' 'Mechanical skill,' 'Invention' and 'Fide.' It is well for him that Dr. Spencer did not testify on his trial.

Opposed to these vague and unsatisfactory opinions is the evidence of Sally Freeman the Prisoner's mother, who knew him better than any other one; John De Puy his brother-in-law and intimate friend; Ethan A. Warden, his employer in early youth; Deborah De Puy, his associate in happier days; Adam Gray, who knew him in childhood and sheltered him on his discharge from the State Prison; Ira Curtis, in whose family he resided seven years ago; David Winner, the friend of his parents; Robert Freeman his ancient fellow servant at the American Hotel; John R. Hopkins an intelligent and practical man who examined him in the Jail; Theron R. Green who discovered his insanity in the State Prison; Rev. John M. Austin, the one good Samaritan who deemed it a pastoral duty to visit even a supposed murderer in Prison; Wm. P. Smith, who has corrected now the error of his judgment when in the State Prison; Philo H. Perry, a candid and enlightened observer and Warren T. Worden, Esq., a Lawyer of great shrewdness and sagacity.

Then there is an overwhelming preponderance of medical testimony. The witnesses are, Dr. Van Epps, who has followed the accused from his cradle to the present hour with the interest of a humane and sincere friend; Dr. Fosgate, who attended him in the jail, for the cure of his disabled limb; Dr. Briggs, equal in public honors to Dr. Bigelow and greatly his superior in candor as well as learning, and who compared the prisoner now with what he was in better days; Dr. McNaughton of Albany, Dr. Hun of the same place, gentlemen known throughout the whole country for eminence in their profession; Dr. McCall of Utica, President of the Medical College of the State of New York; Dr. Coventry, Professor of Medical Jurisprudence in Geneva College and one of the Managers of the State Lunatic Asylum at Utica, and Dr. Brigham the experienced and distinguished Superintendent of that Institution. This last gentleman, after reviewing the whole case, declares that he has no doubt but that the prisoner is now insane, and was so when the crimes were committed; that he should have received him as a patient, then on the evidence given here independently of the crime, and should now receive him upon all the evidence which has been submitted to you.

Dr. Brigham pronounces the Prisoner to be a Monomaniac, laboring under the overwhelming progress of the delusion I have described, which had its paroxysm in the murders of which the prisoner is accused; and declares that since that time he has sunk into a deep and incurable Dementia the counterpart of Idiocy. In these opinions and in the reasons for them so luminously assigned by him, all the other medical gentlemen concur.

Gentlemen, you may be told that Dr. Hun and Dr. McNaughton testified from mere observation of the prisoner without personal examination. Yes! I will thank the Attorney General for saying so. It will recall the strangest passages of all, in this the strangest of all trials. This is a trial for MURDER. A verdict of guilty will draw after it a sentence of DEATH. The only defence is Insanity. Insanity is to be tested by examining the prisoner as he now is, and comparing him with what he was when the crime was committed and during all the intervening period and through all his previous life. Dr. Hun and Dr. McNaughton were served with subpoenas, requiring them to attend here. They came, proceeded to the jail, and examined the prisoner on Wednesday night during the trial. Early on Thursday morning they proceeded again to the jail to resume their examination, and were then denied access to the prisoner. It is proved that the Attorney General instructed the Sheriff to close the doors against them, and the Attorney General admits it. Dr. Hun and Dr. McNaughton are called to testify and are ready to testify that the examination they did make, satisfied them that the prisoner is insane, and that he was insane when he committed the homicide. The Attorney General objects and court overrule the evidence, and decide that these eminent physicians shall testify only from mere external observation of the prisoner, in court, and expressly forget and lay aside their examination of the prisoner made in jail by conversation with him. Nor was the process by which the court effected this exclusion less than a vi et contra vi of the 6th of July. I tremble for the jury that is to respond to the popular clamor under such restraints as these. I pray God that these Judges may never experience the consequences which must follow such an adjudication. But, gentlemen, Dr. Hun and Dr. McNaughton bear the strongest testimony nevertheless, that the prisoner is an idiot as appears by observation, and that the testimony as submitted to them confirms this conviction.

Gentlemen, there is proof stronger than all this. It is silent, yet speaking. It is that idiotic smile which plays continually on the face of the maniac. It took its seat there while he was in the State Prison. In his solitary cell, under the pressure of his severe tasks and trials in the work shop, and in the public chapel during the solemnities of public worship, it appeared, although in vain, to his task masters and his teachers. It is a smile never rising into laughter, without motive or cause—the smile of vacuity. His mother saw it when he came out of Prison, and it broke her heart. John De Puy saw it and knew his brother was demented. Deborah De Puy observed it and knew him for a fool. David Winner read it in the ruin of his friend Sally's son. It has never forsaken him in his later trials. He laughed in the face of Parker, while on confession at Baldwinsville. He laughed involuntarily in the faces of Warden and Curtis, and Worden, and Austin, and Bigelow, and Smith, and Brigham, and Spencer. He laughs perpetually here. Even when Van Arsdale showed the scarred traces of the assassin's knife, and when Helen Holmes related the dreadful story of the murder of her friends and patrons, he laughed. He laughs when I am pleading his griefs. He laughs when the Attorney General's bolts would seem to rive his heart. He will laugh when you declare him guilty. When the Judge shall proceed to the last fatal ceremony, and demand what he has to say why the Sentence of the Law should not be pronounced upon him, although there should not be an unmoistened eye in this vast assembly, and the stern voice addressing him should tremble with emotion, he will even then look up in the face of the court and laugh, from the irresistible emotions of a shattered mind, delighted and lost in the confused memory of absurd and ridiculous associations. Follow him to the scaffold. The executioner can not disturb the calmness of the idiot. He will laugh in the agony of death. Do you not know the significance of this strange and unnatural risibility? It is a proof that God does not forsake even the poor wretch whom we pity or despise. There is in every human memory a well of joys and a fountain of sorrows. Disease opens wide the one and seals up forever the other.

Gentlemen, you have been told that this smile is hereditary and accustomed. Do you think that every ancestor or parent or even the poor idiot himself was in such straits as these. How then can you think that the smile was ever before recognised by the willing witnesses against him. The chaotic smile is the external derangement which signifies that the strings of the Harp are disordered and broken, the superficial mark which God has set upon the tabernacle to signify that the immortal tenant is disturbed by a divine and mysterious commandment. If you can not see it, take heed that the obstruction of your vision be not produced by the mote in your eye which you are commanded to remove before you consider the beam in your brother's eye. If you are bent on rejecting the testimony of those who know by experience and science the deep affliction of the Prisoner, beware how you misinterpret the handwriting of the Almighty.

We should be glad to make farther extracts from this truly able and eloquent plea; but we have not room now to spare. It does honor to the head and heart of Mr. Seward; and its great and philanthropic and humane sentiments and truths, though all unheeded by the court and jury, will yet be felt by the community at large, and by the excited and maddened community of Cayuga county too, hereafter, when the poor, demented, abused, insane and murdered Freeman, shall sleep beneath the peaceful sod and be forever beyond the reach of their cruelties and injustice. How the Jury could convict and the Court sentence to death the poor maniac, scarcely above the brute in intelligence, when that very community had previously done him the cruel injustice to confine him to five years hard labor in the Penitentiary while innocent, and in that time destroyed both his hearing and his understanding, and made him unable to see or understand, unless it be on the principle that 'dead men tell no tales.' But after poor Freeman is hung till he is dead, dead, and the excitement has past away, we believe conscience will tell them some tales that will not be very welcome.

TRUTH—ERROR.

It is often a source of amusement, though upon the second and more sober thought, rather sorrowful to witness the cautiousness which mankind manifest in their reception of truth, while they are ever ready to grasp every thing that bears upon its front the mark of error. The old saying is, that 'truth is mighty and will prevail,' and we have no doubt that it is correct. It is a source of pleasure and joy to the mind to reflect, that when all the great purposes of the Almighty are accomplished, truth will then be triumphant and all error will be driven into the darkness of everlasting night. But unless the progress of truth be onward at a more rapid rate in future than during the last few centuries, it will be a long time yet ere the song of an angel and redeemed man shall celebrate its final and ultimate success.

It is a problem never yet satisfactorily solved, why truth should be less acceptable to the human mind than error and falsehood. That it is less acceptable we believe a question beyond all dispute. We may look back through the long period of the perished time, and in the garden of Eden behold beauty in all of its perfection and man in possession of virtue and innocence. The truth is proclaimed by the voice of God;—'in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die,' and perhaps at the time being it might have made something of an impression upon the minds of our first parents; but that impression was ere long effaced. Soon came its opposite, and it was listened to with attention—'thou shalt not surely die.'—It was seized upon an eager hand and the express command of God disobeyed. And thus has it been throughout all ages from that remote period down even to this present moment. At this day, there is now and then an individual whose researches are for truth, regardless of all other considerations, regardless of former and perhaps long established opinion, and when truth is discovered by him, it is made the basis of all action at a future period. But where there is one such individual beheld, there are many who will lay hold upon error and prize it as a treasure almost beyond value, and act as directed by its injudicious principles.

We look along the line of the Christian Church; view it in its various windings from the days of Him who come to bear the infinite treasures of the Gospel to a dying world, and we find the same disposition within the minds of those who had declared themselves its adherents.—That the immediate followers of Christ received and proclaimed the truth, so far as it was developed to their minds, will not be disputed; and we look in vain for the rod of persecution in their hand. We find no such weapon employed; guided by no evil principles; their moral powers being strengthened by the spirit of pure and undefiled religion, their passions were wholly under their control, and peace and harmony and good will to men, was the consequence of their actions from one to another. But soon, alas! too soon, errors came forward, and one after another were grasped with eagerness and treasured up as prizes of great value, and the consequences resulting from the same were lamentable in the extreme. That mild spirit, which swayed the hand of the religionist in days long passed away and which ever spoke in the words and actions of its possessor, was lost; darkly hidden from the view of mankind, and the disciple instead of ascending upon the scale from man toward angel above, descended from man toward demon below. Tears flowed thick and fast and sorrow weighed heavily upon the soul. But tears were not the only flow. When Error had thrown her gloomy pall over the mind of the followers of the Son of God, then began 'wars and rumors of wars.' Restraint was in a great measure taken away, and passion stalked abroad breathing out upon all who dared to cross the pathway marked by its own footsteps. Man, with murderous heart, strove with his fellow men, and hate, and contention, and animosity, and confusion, destroyed the fair prospects of society and carried grief to the habitations of men. Innocent blood from the ground cried to Heaven for vengeance to rest upon the heads of those who were urged onward to their hellish work by their evil disposed minds. Ah! those indeed were the days of sorrow. Grief filled the bosoms of mankind, and there was no peace or joy or happiness, but far and near the gloom of melancholy was alone beheld, and man wist not where to turn or upon what to rely for support and deliverance.

But God is a merciful being. And though he cause grief, yet we are assured by the inspired penman that he will have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. His purposes having been so far fulfilled, the light of Truth again dawned upon the world, and the dusky clouds of Error were rolled back once more, and we hope, forever. The true spirit of Christianity again took possession of the human heart, and the scourge dropped from the uplifted hand. One error after another has been banished from society, and though there may yet be errors left beclouding the fair prospects and beauties of truth, yet the time shall come when error will be among those things which only exist in a record of the past.

The Saviour, the express image of the living God, has received power from Heaven to fulfil, complete, or accomplish the purposes and plans of God respecting the final destiny of the intelligent creation. That power is sufficient for the final completion of the grand object of his being, and none can stay that power, or place an object in the way that shall finally obstruct it. No; but he shall reign by the spirit and power of his Gospel, until all obstacles are overcome; until all opposing power is destroyed; and until the might of truth prevails, declaring the boundless goodness and unlimited love of God.

Way-worn pilgrim, wherever thou art; look up with gratitude to the throne of the immutable Jehovah. Error shall finally be destroyed, and all the woes and sorrows now resting upon the world because of it, shall be known no more forever. The glorious light of Christianity shall dispel darkness from the human mind, and Christ, ere he deliver up the kingdom, shall receive the grateful homage of the world of mankind. And then, when the Father receiveth the sceptre again, a song by all nations, and kindreds, and tongues, shall fill the celestial arches with its hallowed music.

Harpers Publications.

The Harpers have published Nos. 101-2 and 103-4 of the PICTORIAL SHAKESPEARE, containing 'King Henry IV,' with notes and illustrations. 25 cents per number.

They have also published No. 1 of MARTIN, or the Foundling, by Eugene Sue, price 6 cents per No.

'THE EVILS SUFFERED BY AMERICAN WOMEN AND CHILDREN,'—the causes and remedy. Presented in an address by Miss C. E. Beecher, to meetings of ladies, in all the principal cities, and also an address to the Protestant clergy of the United States, by the same lady, constitutes the title page of a pamphlet of 36 8vo pages. The object of the first address is explained by its title, and the latter seems to be in a measure a continuation of the first, so far as regards religious educational interests, addressed to a different class of persons.

Questions on the first Epistle to the Corinthians, designed for Bible Classes and Sunday Schools, adapted to the authors notes on that Epistle, by Albert Barnes. The above books for sale at Beesley's.

THE GOSPEL MISSIONARY.—We have received the first No. of a new paper of the above title, published at Montrose, Pa., by Br. J. S. Palmer. It is a small weekly sheet devoted to the cause of Universalism, and published at $1 per annum in advance. It is designed to supply the wants of Universalists in that State, there being no other paper of the kind published in that State. Its matter is generally good and its appearance, excepting some typographical errors indicating want of care in proof-reading, respectable. We heartily wish success to every new effort to spread the truth abroad. Whether this new effort to sustain a Universalist paper in Pennsylvania will be so extensively seconded as to insure its continuance we are unable to say. The effort has been several times heretofore made, but has never yet succeeded. Should it fail after a brief space, and after abstracting a few hundred names from the subscription lists of other Universalist papers now circulating in the region, it would rather injure than benefit the cause it advocates. But should it find its way into new regions unvisited by kindred publications, and find a living support sufficient to ensure its continuance, it will be a benefit to the cause and carry light to the benighted and consolation to the afflicted.

The COLUMBIAN for September comes to our table handsomely embellished with one of the best mezzotint engravings of Captain May's charge upon the Mexicans at the battle of 'Resaca de la Palma,' that we have yet seen (we have seen several)—also a well executed view of 'Rogers' Slide, Lake George,' a fashion plate, &c. We observe the names of Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Kirkland, Child, Misses Middleton, Cahoon, Sedgwick, Blackwell, Ames, and Forrester are the female contributors to this number, and Messrs. Paulding, Butler, T. S. Arthur, Porter and West, in the male department. 25 cents, at Beesley's.

GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE is also issued for September.—'Creeks at the Well' is an expressive picture, and a very correct (we write from personal knowledge) 'view from Mt. Holyoke,' and fashion plate are its embellishments. The continuation of two or three interesting tales form a part of the contents, besides original papers from Mrs. Stephens, Sigourney, Frances S. Osgood, and Messrs. H. W. Herbert, Reed, Cooke, Williston and others. A good number. 25 cents at Beesley's.

The General Convention of Universalists of the United States will hold its Annual Session in Troy, on Wednesday and Thursday the 16th and 17th inst. We anticipate a great and glorious meeting. Are all the delegates from the different State Conventions aware of the time and place, and prepared with their statistics, reports, &c.?

On Tuesday, the day preceding the Convention, the Sunday School meeting is to be held at the same place.

Br. Tompkins—Br. J. Potter of Waterville, N. Y. has, not received the first No. of the current volume of the Quarterly, and desires you to forward it to him.

Br. E. W. Reynolds has removed from Java Village to Sherman, Chautauque county, N. Y. Denominational papers please copy.

NOTICE.

The Trustees of the Universalist Theological Seminary at Clinton, Oneida county, are requested to meet for the transaction of business, at Troy, N. Y., on Wednesday the 16th inst. A punctual attendance is earnestly desired.

T. J. SAWYER.

CAYUGA ASSOCIATION.

This body will hold its next annual session, in the Universalist church at Kelloggsville, Cayuga county, on the fourth Wednesday and following Thursday in September next (23d and 24th).

The Standing Clerk of this Association has been making efforts during the last three years, to prepare a correct statistical account, of the number, strength and condition, of all the Universalist societies within the four counties composing the Association. He desires to see this work carried on and completed, and for this purpose he calls upon all the societies within its bounds, to send by their delegates a written statement of the number of members belonging to each, (after deducting those who have died or moved away,) the number of pupils in their Sunday school, (if they have one in operation,) the proportion of time that preaching is supported, average size of the Sabbath congregations, and the general prospects of the cause in the vicinity.

Every agent, who, in the way of realizing the fruition of their hopes, by attending the approaching session of the Cayuga Association at Kelloggsville. Persons from a distance will do well to drive directly to the church, on their arrival, where they will doubtless find our good Br. J. M. Peebles and a Committee of his society in waiting, to direct them to places of entertainment. H. L. HAYWARD, S. Clerk.

Fort Plain, Aug. 23d, 1846.

MISSIONARY MEETING.

The first annual meeting of the 'Missionary Society of the Cayuga Association of Universalists,' will be held at Kelloggsville, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in September. It is expected that all the Trustees of this Society, who feel an interest in the advancement of Gospel truth in our land, will be present and prepared to give such information as will result in a more perfect organization of this body. Does any one inquire, why we have not fully organized? We answer, because the Officers and Trustees, have so many of them staid away from previous meetings, that we have been unable to form a quorum for action.

Now, brother Officers of the Board, and Trustees of the Society; just think of this answer, and come up and assist us at this meeting, and great will be your reward.

D. H. STRICKLAND, Secretary.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be regular preaching at Case Town (Howlet Hill) the second and fourth Sundays in each month until further notice. Let there be a general attendance the second Sunday in September. Br. — (who?) is expected to preach—the Gospel.

Br. T. J. WHITCOMB will preach the Gospel at Rome, on the first Sunday in September, and at Graves' Hollow on the second Sunday.

Br. J. H. HARTER will preach in Cedarville the first Sunday in September, and at Columbia Centre at 5 o'clock, P. M. of said day.

HYMN TO CHARITY.

I'll wreath my harp with vernal flowers,
And bathe it in the dews of Spring,
And enter the mellifluous bowers
Of heavenly Charity and sing.

Had I the lips of angels glowing,
The starry lyre of seraphim,
Celestial numbers should be flowing,
The highest melody to hymn.

Sweet Charity, sublime and holy,
I love to range thy bowers among;
And, though my harp be faint and lowly,
To thee is poured its sweetest song.

Upon thy fragrant gales my numbers,
Shall swell in unison with thine,—
Wake, latent powers, from dreamless slumbers,
And warble harmonies divine.

Thy founts of life, exhaustless sparkle,
And snowy lilies o'er them bloom;
Thy amaranthine wreaths encircle
The couch of death and lowly tomb.

Let every creature tune thy praises,
The art of life the polar star;
The brilliant orb that ever blazes
In yon supernal courts afar.

Forever verdant are thy bowers,
Lit by the glowing sun of love,
And bathed in the refreshing showers
Of pure Religion from above.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

Br. SKINNER—I have noticed with much pleasure several articles in the Universalist papers of this State in relation to this School. I am gratified to see the public attention directing itself towards an institution which has been too long neglected by us, of doing so much for us. That I have not presented myself in your columns before, is certainly not owing to any want of interest on the subject. I hope that my removal from New York to this place, to assume the Principalship of the Institute, may be regarded as a sufficient pledge of my interest in the cause of education and my willingness to cast my lot for the present with a school heretofore, for the most part, suffered to run to waste.

There are several considerations which strongly recommend Clinton as the seat of our Literary and Theological Schools.

1. We have here already a Male and a Female Academy, which under a single charter are called the Clinton Liberal Institute. They are all the schools, except the Southold Academy on the eastern end of Long Island, under the patronage and control of the Universalists in the State of New York.

2. We have in grounds, buildings, library and philosophical apparatus, a property independent of all debts, worth, at a moderate estimate, from $12,000 to $15,000, and entitled to all the benefits and privileges granted by law to Academies under the visitation of the Regents of the University of New York.

3. Clinton is, both for the State of New York and for the denomination of Universalists, very centrally located. Take a map of the U. States and this will readily appear. Universalism can hardly be said to extend southward beyond Pennsylvania and the Ohio river—while it stretches north only a little beyond the St. Lawrence and the lakes. Eastward and westward its range is vastly greater, extending from the extreme part of Maine to the Mississippi. Clinton is nine miles southwest of Utica, and is therefore nine miles from the great passenger and freight thoroughfare between the East and the West, and in point of time and expense of travelling is nearly midway between them. Add to this that it is situated in one of the most beautiful and healthy parts of the State, and it seems to me strongly recommended as the seat of our schools.

That the time has arrived when Universalists must begin, not only to talk, but also to act, on the subject of education, seems to me too clear to demand proof. If we do not wish to be despised by others, and forced to despise ourselves, we must embark earnestly in this great cause. Were there no intrinsic necessity for such action, were education itself a matter of profound indifference, the simple fact that other denominations are so much interested in it, and employing it so much to their advantage, would, I believe, force us to such a course. Our very existence is coming to depend upon it. We must place ourselves on equal footing with our neighbors. If they are learned we must be so too; or give them a perpetual vantage ground.

But we need education,—a higher and better education,—for our own sake. We are in great want of a higher standard of literary and theological attainments in the ministry. The people are daily demanding, not better talents, but a higher culture, a deeper knowledge of books, and a wider acquaintance with men and things. That demand must be answered, or the denomination will inevitably decline. Nothing but a miracle can save it.

If this be so, the question arises whether we shall provide the means of education ourselves, or trust as heretofore, to the generous offices in this important matter, of our Orthodox neighbors. They would educate our sons and daughters no doubt, but the policy of permitting them to do it is just as wise, as it would be for the citizens of this Republic to send their children to Europe for their education. It will not answer our purpose. We must educate our children, after they leave the Public School, ourselves.

But have Universalists the means necessary to provide themselves with literary and theological schools? The question is ridiculous. Who that knows any thing of the denomination in the Empire State alone, can doubt that we have ample means to do whatsoever we could reasonably desire. We have a hundred men in the State of New York who could give a thousand dollars each, for this purpose, without trenching upon any worldly interest. I know some who might give ten times that amount, and yet have more of this world's goods than they or their families can ever enjoy. There are a thousand others who not only could, but I believe would, if properly addressed, give a hundred dollars each. Of that class, poor as I am, I am one, and though it might subject me to inconveniences which my richer brethren would not suffer, I would not hesitate, were it necessary to endow our schools handsomely, to do much more than this.

How much is necessary for our purpose? The answer to this question depends of course on what we propose to do. If we are satisfied with an Academy of the first class merely, $25,000 would make it rich, and even $10,000 would place the Institute in enviable circumstances, for that sum would enable it to liquidate its debts, increase its library and philosophical apparatus, and leave a surplus to yield an annual income of $300 or $400.

If, however, we propose to raise the Institute to the rank of a College or University, short of which we ought not and must not stop, much more is necessary. The Regents of the University of the State require in order to grant a College charter, the clear sum of $130,000. $30,000 to be in college grounds and buildings, &c., and $100,000 in safe investments. Under this order, therefore, we now need about, say $115,000.

But there is another method of obtaining a charter, and that is, after the example of the Baptists in relation to the Hamilton Seminary, to go directly to the Legislature. What amount of property the Baptists have invested in the Hamilton school, I am not informed, but suppose it much less than $130,000. Their institution is now,—thanks to their perseverance and the tardy justice of the Legislature of the last year,—a University. If the Universalists of the State of New York will be true to themselves and the interests of their cause, the next Legislature will do for them what the last did for the Baptists.

I wish merely to remark in conclusion, that several modes have been suggested for raising funds. One proposes that our societies shall contribute moderate sums of 25, 50 or 100 dollars according to the number of its members, and Br. Grosh with his society at Reading, Pa. has already stepped forward and shown us the $50 there. A noble example! I am almost angry that this honor should have been won by a society of a sister State while New York stood listlessly looking on.

Another proposes that contributions of one dollar and upwards according to men's purses and hearts be made, and he, though anonymous, began the work with $5. He suggested that some one should be appointed receiver of such contributions, and I see that Abner Chichester, Esq., of New York city, has consented to act in this capacity. Mr. Chichester is known to the Universalists of the State as the Treasurer of the Relief Fund belonging to our Convention, and his integrity and pecuniary responsibility are a full guaranty for any sum that may be entrusted to his hands.

But I have already said much more than I purposed to say when I began, and having trespassed upon the patience of your readers much further than I ought, I will close by promising to say more at some convenient season. T. J. SAWYER.

THE MIRACULOUS CONCEPTION.

To the Editor of the Magazine and Advocate :

DEAR SIR—An article on the subject of miracles, and the 'miraculous conception of Jesus Christ,' appeared in your paper of the 7th inst., to which, with your leave, I present the following in refutation of the argument therein contained, favoring the doctrine of 'the miraculous conception.'

I beg leave to use the introductory part of the article, believing the positions there stated to be correct. 'Truth is always consistent with itself. One truth never conflicts with another. Facts in natural history must of necessity be in accordance with the truths of natural science. Whatever is true in theology can not contradict what is true in philosophy.'

The miracles recorded in the Bible do not borrow any strength from, or yield beauty to 'the miraculous conception.' It stands isolated and alone, and I prefer to discuss it on its own merits, without blending it in any way with the question of miracles generally. The writer of this article says, 'One of the miracles of the Bible, however is, from the nature of the case, attended with so little of testimony, that many sincere Christians have doubted its truth. I allude to what is usually called the miraculous conception of Jesus Christ. But the labor of Phenologists have established the truth of the doctrine of 'hereditary descent,' which doctrine shows the miraculous conception to be probable in a very high degree, approximating closely to absolute certainty.'

From this it appears that the writer bases this argument on the phenological doctrine of 'hereditary descent.' This doctrine does not depend upon the immediate predecessor of the subject possessing the particular qualities spoken of, neither does it depend upon the male or female branch of ancestry. Peculiar characteristics unfold themselves in a family in one age, and then lie buried, or at least unobserved, unmasked, during several succeeding ages, and then burst forth in a distant successor of the line into a perfect and full personification of the ancient family attributes. So also the noble intellectual qualities of the mother are sometimes imparted to her issue, when the father may have no such traits to communicate. These propositions I regard as cardinal, and will therefore rest their acceptance on their own strength. We are not then left to decide in regard to Christ's lineage by reference to either the male or female ancestry, or to his near parentage, the phenological doctrine of hereditary descent being as extended in its range as above stated. Who then, in glancing along the line of Christ's ancestry, and beholding the rich attire of priestly and kingly character that sparkles there, can say that 'in Christ, the law of hereditary descent, is either suspended or set aside'? Who can say that there is one link in the glorious chain broken, or that, in view of his lineage, any necessity exists to depart from the natural laws of generation, to account for his existence? This writer says, that 'the history of Christ's age does not shew, that he had any prototype in his own nation.' Of what nation was Abraham the faithful? Of what nation was Isaac and Jacob, the wise and frugal? Of what nation was David, Israel's sweet singer, who from bearing the shepherd's crook was called to sway Israel's sceptre? These have in all time past been considered as types of him who was to sit on Judah's throne, and become the father of the faithful in the New Jerusalem. God, through his holy prophets, pointed along this ever brightening chain, this line of ancestral glory, to him of Nazaareth. He was to come of Abraham's seed, of Jesse's root, and are we now to see this chain broken at the very point of connection? shall the issue fail at the very period of its consummation? and shall this breach, this failure, be regarded as better fitted to the fulfilment of prophecy, better sanctioned by the principles of philosophy, and better entitled to the acceptance of an enlightened faith than the belief of the Abrahamic ancestry, and the natural parentage of our Saviour? Regarding Jesus as the son of Joseph and Mary, violates no principle of philosophy, but rather upbears it, as the oak the clinging vine; but rejecting his natural lineage, breaks the chain of prophecy, and sets every principle of philosophy at defiance. The existing laws of procreation were fully equal and legitimately appropriate to the production of 'the man Christ Jesus.' It is not contended that the miraculous conception did more than this. The mental endowments, the high divinity of soul, were gifts directly bestowed on the son of Mary, and that without measure. The gift of the spirit without measure, the possession of the fullness of the Godhead, may sufficiently account for the transcendent traits of character exemplified in Christ, without being compelled to take either one horn or the other of the dilemma spoken of by the author of the article under review.

It has always been considered an axiom in philosophy, not to ascribe to other than natural causes, effects which natural causes sufficiently account for. Natural causes sufficiently account for the birth of Christ.

'One truth never conflicts with another.' The genealogy of Christ is either a meaningless and deceptive thing, otherwise the miraculous conception is untrue. The genealogy is contained in the first chapter of St. Matthew's and the third chapter of St. Luke's Gospels. The one account traces the connection from Abraham to Joseph, and so to Christ, the other from Christ by Joseph to Adam. We have thus a well connected chain of ancestry bringing us to a point in hereditary descent, only to disappoint us. Leading us from Abraham, to shew the truth of prophecy, down to Joseph, only to tell us that he was not the father of Christ. The account of the genealogy in St. Luke, says of Joseph, that he was the supposed father of Jesus. Truth does not deal in suppositions, especially in proving lineage. The account in St. Matthew, to avoid the evident conclusion from the text, introduces Mary, the mother of Jesus, into the line of ancestry. The Jews never admitted females into their genealogical records.

St. Mark writes the history of our Saviour, and he commences his Gospel with these words: 'The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God,' and he begins exactly where the story of the miraculous conception leaves off. The Gospel of St. John commences at the same point. These two apostles must either have been ignorant of this miracle as forming any part of Christ's history, or they must have supposed it too unimportant to commemorate, or they would not have professed to have given the beginning of the Gospel of Christ, this great fact being overlooked.

No other miracle is recorded, without having some present or future use. This, from its nature, could have had no present use; and as Christ never referred to it, to sustain his personal dignity or the divinity of his mission, and as the apostles never referred to it for any purpose whatever, we are led to inquire, for what use this astounding miracle was wrought?

If this be a true narration, and not as many, very many believe, an interpolation from some of the early and enthusiastic fathers of mystery in theology, then it follows, that 'Christ was' not 'the son of Abraham.' He was not 'the Son of Man.' He did not 'partake of our nature.' 'He was' not 'clothed with our infirmities.' 'He could' not 'be tempted.' When 'he rose' it gave no evidence 'to us that we shall rise also.' His connection with humanity is dissolved, repudiated, done away.—But if we consider Jesus as 'the son of Joseph and Mary,' we have one of Israel's seed as our king, one of like nature with ourselves, whom we call Elder brother—who when he rose gave the children a pledge that they should rise also. This opinion fulfils prophecy and justifies philosophy—and removes from the doorway of Christianity a stumbling block, which in my opinion ought to be removed.

JAMES G. McADAM.

REMARK.—The above article expresses views quite different from those generally entertained by Universalists on the subject. Of course, Br. Lewis, the author of the article reviewed, will have the liberty of replying.—Ed.

BR. UPSON'S HINT AT BOOKSELLING.

Connected with the remarks which are appended to the minutes of the Steuben Association, present volume Magazine and Advocate, page 235, we find Br. Upson's 'little hint' (which he says he made by request) at book-selling—during the time of their meeting. Well, when the garment fits, it is best to put it on; and if guilty, it is wisdom to plead so. And, as I felt implicated in that 'hint,' I immediately tried the thing, but could not make it set to my liking any way. I then tried it upon Brs. Clark and Delong, (for they too were implicated,) but with no better success. Consequently, some explanatory remarks are necessary.

As it is proper that people should have books, which they do not always find at hand, it is quite convenient for those who wish to purchase, to be favored with them at their Associations. And I have known many to attend, as much perhaps for that, as any thing else; though they were highly favored otherwise with the meeting. Br. Clark and myself bore each other company to the said Association. As Br. C. is in the practice of distributing many valuable works, (and thereby doing much good,) he took quite a quantity, and myself a few, for disposal. Br. Delong also had a few copies present. Now comes the critical scene. It will be seen in Br. Upson's remarks, that he was willing our books should be sold there, 'in the morning—during intermission—and after service.' But he assures us of having kept up a 'constant sale,' during the time of public service, and thereby defeating the main object of the meeting, by detaining and preventing 'many' from being seated, &c. Too bad! indeed too bad! But, there is a sad mistake somewhere. It is true, Br. Clark's books were spread in the morning before meeting, and remained so until evening;—it being quite a task, to gather them up. If that, simply, will constitute a 'constant sale,' why then, so far, Br. Upson was right; but if not, he must be mistaken. There were but few books sold at all; and from the best of my knowledge, there were none sold during the time of public services. I think I had as good means of knowing as any one, and I do not think there were any thus sold. But supposing I am possibly mistaken, and some one passing into the house had stopped and paid for a book. What harm in that—or whom could it have disturbed? For be it known! that this 'book auction room,' (which has hurt so many feelings,) was not in the church, the place of public worship; but upon a side-board in the vestibule, or entry of the church, and between the two inner doors, unseen by those within. We neither designed, or expected to make sales in time of public service. It was best however, for as much as one of us to remain near by the most of the time, for necessary purposes; but in a position so as to hear the services. If any of the people remained longer in the entry than they should; hindering us, and no profit to any one; why then, give them the scolding, and not us. Learn them to attend to their own business, and in its own proper time. We acted in good faith, meant to disturb no one, our books were out of the way of the sanctuary, and where such business should be done.

Br. Upson says—'We felt hurt about that business during the whole process. And many of our friends were cut to the heart on hearing the sarcastic taunts thrown out by bystanders and opposers.' Astonishingly cruel! We took much pains—travelled a great way in hopes of doing a little good, if in nothing else, by saving people the expense and trouble of sending so far for their books. But instead of doing them good, we were actually hurting them 'during the whole process.'—cutting many even to the heart! And why? Why, 1st, because books were for sale in a room adjoining the church. And, 2d, because 'bystanders and opposers,' felt disposed to throw out 'sarcastic taunts' about books, their owners, or both, which were in sight, between the platform of the church, and the place for meeting! Now, who, in the name of common sense, should be blamed? Ourselves—or those opposers? We leave it for a candid, judicious public to decide.

Br. Upson also says—'One man came in, and after service invited some of our friends to go and sup with him.' 'Well, said he; I thought I was going to a religious meeting to-day, but come to get there, I found I was in a book auction room. I guess some of your folks think more of getting a little money, than they do of the meeting.' (I guess we got none of his money.) Now, taking the piece as it is written and left, no one could think more or less than that we planted ourselves in the midst of the sanctuary of God, and kept up a constant auctioneering cry and clamor, from morning till evening, to the annoyance of every good feeling around. But, in our favor, I am bold to affirm that it was not so! I envy not the good feeling of the 'one man'—his principles, or the organization which must have prompted him for such uncalled for lampoonry. But that in and of itself, it is really worth noticing, but for the principle it inculcates, and the example it encourages among petulant and fault-finding people. It appears, almost, to be coming fashionable with some, to set a higher value upon the flings and taunts of an unprincipled opposer, than they do upon the good feelings and affections of their own friends. Such would do well to remember that others are sensitive, and can feel an injury as well as themselves.

We are unwilling to believe that Br. Upson really meant to injure any one. At the same time we can not conceive how he could have so carelessly penned his own words, and much less how he could have quoted the language of others as he has, without correcting it—when, if he had reflected a little, he must have known that it was incorrect. Perhaps he was a little hasty, as well as 'hurt,' and did not stop to reflect. If so, we will forgive him with all our heart; hoping he will think farther next time.

We stopped in the place with Br. Graves, (I think this was the name,) and was most hospitably received, and kindly and affectionately treated.—We found other warm friends, which are ever to be remembered.

The above I think was the first time of my offering books for sale at an Association, in my life. And should I ever attempt it again, I hope and pray that I may not come in contact with those who either can not, or will not, distinguish the church from its vestibule.

Common courtesy to 'book sellers' loudly calls for these explanations; that we may not hereafter be questioned to know, why we so annoyed the good feelings of our Steuben friends.

We are in perfectly good humor—bear no ill will—and shall say no more about it, unless we find we have made some mistake. L. HYATT.

AFFAIRS IN PRESTON.

One of the first Universalist societies ever organized in Southern New York was in McDonough and Preston. It received the fellowship of the Chenango Association at its organization in 1823. It was small, and losing by death and removal, and the remaining friends being widely scattered, it soon became extinct. The decrease was mostly from the last named town; and in the former, ere long, another society was formed. The same causes continued gradually to reduce the number of believers in Preston; and little had ever been done, and scarcely any thing for a long period, prior to 1841. The summer previous, a worthy citizen residing there, kindly conferred a favor upon me, and drew from me a promise that I would lecture there once, as soon as my health, which was then very feeble would permit. We met at a wedding of one of his relatives, the following January; and an appointment was made for the evening of the 17th of that month. He, and other Universalists, aided liberally in erecting the Calvinistic Baptist meeting house, and in various ways in sustaining their meetings; and, with several of his family who were excellent singers, he then belonged to that choir. Before my lecture at the school house in that place, he requested Mr. Bush, pastor of the Baptist church, to notice it; which he so did, as to insult this friend, myself, our whole denomination, and every respectable and sensible person who heard him. His language was too low to record. He proclaimed at considerable length the doctrine he affirmed I would preach, and invited various vile characters he named, (including those which he afterwards proved that he belonged,) if such there were there, and all disposed to become such, to attend; as I would fully prove that 'their title was clear to glory,' 'that they were going right into heaven in their sins;' &c., &c. The night of my discourse was dark and stormy; but the effort to crush me secured me a full gathering and the strictest attention. At the conclusion of my sermon, that aged and venerable brother in Israel, Solomon Wait, Esq., publicly expressed a strong desire to have me lecture there once in four weeks, for six months. This was seconded, and enough was subscribed that evening to procure my services for a year. A Baptist protracted meeting soon followed, during which, its conductor, the pastor of that church, Mr. B., told the Almighty that four of the most distinguished men in the place, whom he designated by their honorary titles, were exerting a very evil influence; aiding me in 'tinkering and soldering souls for hell and damnation;' and he prayed 'if God could not convert the more aged of them, that he might remove (kill) them; as they had long enough been stumbling blocks over which sinners had tumbled into hell;' etc., etc. His fanaticism has seldom been equalled in richness of vulgarity, ludicrousness of expression, and irreverence, profanity and blasphemy. But it was of little or no avail. With his history in detail, I will not soil your paper. He persisted in his ugly abuse of us, whether there or elsewhere, in his revival operations; and in a brief period, having perpetuated a flagrant crime under the most aggravating and infamous circumstances, to the credit of his brethren, many of whom were not responsible for and did not justify his scandalous assaults upon us, nor in other respects his unchristian course, and are worthy and estimable, he was tried in that very town and deposed from the ministry; and after calling for and obtaining a rehearing in an adjoining State, which confirmed the first decision, he abandoned public life and sneaked into obscurity despised by all, himself included!

The Baptists and Presbyterians, one or both, every few months directed their exertions for the prostration of our cause, and as frequently imparted to it renewed life and prosperity. The interest they at first aided materially in exciting, upon the whole continued to increase from time to time, and during the last two or three years the erection of a meetinghouse has been occasionally broached; but many of our friends thought we did not possess the requisite ability, and no effort was made for its attainment. A society was organized in December, 1843, which then numbered and now numbers about 30 members; the loss by death and removal having nearly balanced the increase. This will probably be much enlarged by others who will join when asked. We had occupied the new school house, for the first time, not long before our last annual meeting; and the Saturday evening previous, we were forbidden to use it again for religious purposes. Reasons already given in the 27th number of the present volume of the Magazine and Advocate, induced us not to heed the mandate of our foes, and the result was then communicated. Our situation caused a general attendance at our yearly meeting; and I there presented the inducements to rear a church, after which, a vote was unanimously passed that one should be erected, if a sum specified could be obtained. Before we separated, a beautiful site, the best in the place, was secured, and a very liberal amount was subscribed. Soon the writer, and a warm hearted brother, better acquainted, called very generally upon the advocates of religious freedom in that and some of the surrounding towns for aid; and our most sanguine expectations were exceeded. If the few who were absent pay in proportion to the others, the society will be free of debt when the house is completed. Nearly all the brethren in McDonough, and a considerable number elsewhere, by their generosity in time of need, proved themselves friends indeed, and have the heartfelt thanks of their co-laborers in Preston.

But two classes of professed Universalists have our sincere pity, if not deep-seated contempt. First, those idolators, a few miles distant whose god is their property, and who bestow little if any devotion to any other; who, with an abundance of this world's goods, had nothing they would give. They advocate the most and practice the least liberal theory on earth; and if they show their faith by their works, the latter gives the lie to the former, and proves their profession to be hollow-hearted and hypocritical. 'The liberal deviseth liberal things; and by liberal things shall he stand.'

And second, those hen-pecked husbands, whose Partialist wives are the heads of their families in matters of religion, and induce them to pay so largely for meetinghouses from which their preachers are forever excluded from addressing them, except at funerals, and perhaps even then, that they feel too poor to aid in erecting one for their own denomination demanded by the strongest considerations; and cause them to impart so bountifully to support the proclamation of their own endless damnation, that they deem themselves unable pecuniarily to assist in advancing the truth of a world's salvation. Were their wives taken from their heads to rule over them; or from their sides to be their equals? Or were they taken from their wives to be trampled upon by them? Is not their religion as good as their wives? and should they not do as much to sustain it? Or have they none? Are not their souls as valuable; and dare they not take the liberty to save them in their own way?—Or, have they nothing but 'gizzards'? But I am digressing and will immediately return.

The church in Preston is to be 30 feet by 40, neat and commodious, with a steeple, a pulpit in front and an elevation for the choir in the rear, and so constructed as to comfortably seat 300 persons. It will be better than a larger one on all ordinary occasions in such a town. It was raised on the 20th of July. The day was fine, the gathering large, every effort successful, and nothing occurred to mar the general joy, but the absence of our friend, the 'Country Pastor.' As Universalism has attracted a large share of his attention for several years, and as he has been most signally instrumental in its promotion, it was a source of deep regret that he and his followers generally should fail to give 'a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether,' to rear a house for its dissemination. May his days be useful in the land in which the Lord has placed him; and may he pass by monument after monument he shall aid in erecting without 'gnashing his teeth;' but in sincerity exclaiming, 'the blessing of the Lord be upon them; we bless them in the name of the Lord;' satisfied that what he in his folly 'meant for evil,' God has overruled for good; and like a celebrated persecutor of old, may he be 'instant in season and out of season,' in proclaiming 'the faith which once he destroyed.'

The choir in Preston is excellent, and the congregation is the largest in the town. A very great proportion of them are young; and, though industrious and prosperous, they have not had time to attain much property, and their pecuniary ability is quite limited. They have sustained a lecture each four weeks, and will undoubtedly do more as soon as their meetinghouse is completed, which will be the ensuing fall. Very many of the members of the other denominations in that town are far advanced in life, and there is no prospect of their extending their sentiments much beyond their own families, or extensively even among them. No small number of their children strongly favor or openly advocate the final holiness and happiness of all men; and it requires not the age of a prophet to perceive, that our strength will naturally wax and theirs wane from year to year, until the inhabitants generally,

However divided once below,
One bliss, one spirit, here shall know.'

The history of affairs in Preston is already verifying the truth, that when 'the devil is come down unto us having great wrath,' it is 'because he knoweth he hath but a short time;' and that 'surely the wrath of man shall praise the Lord; the remainder of wrath he will restrain.'

It also shows, that, by a combination of circumstances, great results often flow from little movements. One lecture, which neither I nor my friends expected would be followed by another, originated a chain of events, for which I claim no credit, but which has diffused the principles of our faith, led to the formation of an intelligent, respectable and flourishing society, and the erection of a convenient house of worship.

The zeal and liberality of our brethren and sisters in that place is greatly to their credit, and entitles them to the warmest esteem of all believers in the eventual salvation of the world. And it clearly proves that where there are but two or three who advocate the restitution, a steady, judicious, patient, persevering and determined effort, at no distant day will be crowned with abundant success. There is scarce a town in the Empire State that does not contain that number, and if they would come forth from their slumbers to the resurrection of life, truth would triumph, God be glorified, and man be blessed.

LETTER FROM BR. SOULE.

We take the liberty—Br. Soule will pardon us if he thinks we have taken too much—of publishing the following extracts from a letter recently received from this brother now located in Hartford, Ct., although we presume it was none of it intended for the public eye. It may explain to some of his friends here the reason of their disappointment in not seeing him as they expected; and it contains some cheering news about Hartford, and good suggestions about the value of the social Conference.—We shall be happy to hear from Br. S. whenever he finds it convenient to write. Ed.

Hartford, August 28th, 1846.

Br. SKINNER.—I really meant to have written you before the lapse of so long a time, and explained to you and the friends in Utica why I did not call, as I gave you and them to understand I would do. Be assured, it was not from any want of regard or unfavorable change in my feelings, that I have passed three times through your city since I saw you, without enjoying the pleasure of seeing any of my friends there. I was, in the first place, detained longer at the West than I intended; and, in the second place, had my plans very greatly disturbed—for a season, indeed, quite disconcerted—by an afflictive providence experienced in the sudden death of my mother-in-law. I trust my friends will see in these unexpected and painful occurrences, a satisfactory apology for what, under ordinary circumstances, would be rude disregard of promises, as well as unpardonable incivility.

Our good cause is evidently though slowly progressing in this good city of Hartford. The society is respectably large, and is setting a worthy example in the regularity of its attendance at the place of worship. We have here an excellent meeting house, which has recently undergone some important repairs; the pulpit has been changed from the front to the rear end of the house, and the pews all turned round, of course, to face to it. Besides this the inside has been very tastefully painted. I do not know anywhere amongst us a more beautiful house, internally, than is this since these repairs. We have a church which celebrates the Lord's Supper monthly, and is, I think, on the increase. We have monthly lectures before the church, which discourse in a friendly and familiar manner on our duties as Christians. Our weekly Conference meeting is held on Thursday evening, and is already almost as numerous attended as our services on the Sabbath. These Conference meetings, when judiciously conducted, are one of the most efficient means of cultivating the social and devotional feelings of a congregation. I never return from one of these familiar services without feeling that I have been made better by the experiences of the evening. They tend to deepen the tone, as well as render active, the moral sentiments. I have a very warm partiality for social Conference meetings, as I have also for Sabbath Schools,—which latter we have here in a tolerably flourishing condition. I hope to be able next year, to furnish Br. Grosh something in the way of statistics.

I see you have copied my 'Lecture on the Moral Results of Potter's Execution,' into the Magazine and Advocate; it is not a very labored production, it is true, but I trust its influence, whatever it may have, will be on the side of truth and virtue. I regret the appearance of several typographical errors in it, in the Magazine and Advocate. * * * * * When I get any news that will be of interest to your readers, I will remember your columns. Yours fraternally, H. B. SOULE.

* We always regret when typographical errors occur—and they sometimes do in our columns. But on remembering Br. S.'s Lecture we do not discover any very great errors, or few but what the intelligent reader would readily correct. Owing to numerous avocations and the distance of our residence from the office, we are unable to attend to the proof reading in person; but the publisher and printer generally do it with care and correctness. But the best will sometimes err.

CONSISTENCY.

If there is any class of men in the world, that above all others should be consistent, it is the professed ministers of the Gospel. Heaven's truth, is always perfectly consistent in all its parts; and hence, the public promulgators of that truth, should always endeavor to preserve a good degree of consistency in their communications to the people.—This is important, because, as truth is always consistent with itself; the statements and propositions of the minister, will not be received as truth by persons of intelligence and discernment, unless they are consistent and harmonize with each other.

And yet, if we listen attentively, to the pulpit efforts of many of the popular divines of the present day, we shall find them made up of the most palpable and gross contradictions imaginable, no two of which could by any possibility be true. It was not so however with Christ and the apostles, during their public ministry. They never taught doctrines so much at variance, that the acknowledged truth of one proposition, would fully establish the falsity of all the rest. Christ not only taught his followers that God was their Father; but assured them, in harmony with this doctrine, that they were all brethren, in consequence of all having the same Father. And the same consistency and harmony, is apparent through all his teachings. In fact, this must be the case, if all he taught is true.

I once attended the funeral of a little child, at which a clergyman of the endless misery school officiated. In the early stage of his remarks, he stated emphatically, that physical death is the natural and legitimate result of sin—that our bodies die, because we sin. Now if this proposition was true, that sin is the cause of physical death; it will follow, that none can die who have not sinned. But how was it with the dead child? In his endeavor to comfort the parents, he stated as his undoubting belief, that it was 'well with the child;' because, as it had not passed the line of accountability, it had never sinned—and yet, it had died. Hence, if his first proposition was true, that sin is the procuring cause of physical death; here was an effect, without its producing cause, for the child died, although it had never sinned.

I do not see how these two propositions can be harmonized, and hence I do not believe that both of them can be true. But if we suppose sin to be the cause of moral or spiritual death, the above difficulty is removed entirely out of the way, and all appears plain, consistent, and rational.

A RESPECTFUL REQUEST.—A communication from the widow of our deceased brother in the faith and ministry, Elisha Smith, has been put into our hands, for the information of those whom it may concern. The purport of the letter is as follows: 'Permit me to ask you to inform the TRUSTEES of the RELIEF FUND, and all who take an interest in my welfare, that a material change in my circumstances has taken place within the past year. My health is better than it was during the cold season. Miss Sawens has had the kindness to learn me to do straw-dressing. The business, with close application, affords me a comfortable living. Besides this, I have received a legacy from my father's estate, which will enable me to purchase a home, as soon as I can find a pleasant location. I know not who petitioned for my relief. The time has been when such a favor would have been received with many thanks. The world again smiles on me, and I am happy in a return of friendship.'

Such is the communication of sister Smith; and the Trustees of the Relief Fund will govern themselves accordingly. While we rejoice, that she is thus comfortably provided for, and in all kindness relinquished her claim, in favor of those who may need it more than she does, we can do no less than pray that she may never want any blessing that can add to the happiness of life, or the consolation of death.—[Evangelist.]

NOTICE.

The Trustees of the Universalist Theological Seminary at Clinton, Oneida county, are requested to meet for the transaction of business, at Troy, N. Y., on Wednesday the 16th inst. A punctual attendance is earnestly desired. T. J. SAWYER.

The General Convention of Universalists of the United States will hold its Annual Session in Troy, on Wednesday and Thursday the 16th and 17th inst. We anticipate a great and glorious meeting. Are all the delegates from the different State Conventions aware of the time and place, and prepared with their statistics, reports, &c.?

On Tuesday, the day preceding the Convention, the Sunday School meeting is to be holden at the same place.

NORTH BRANCH ASSOCIATION.

The North Branch Association of Universalists will hold its annual meeting in Springfield, Bradford county, Penn., on the third Wednesday and following Thursday, in September (16th and 17th.) Ministerial brethren, and friends generally, are cordially invited to attend.

HENRY GIBBS, Standing Clerk.

ENDLESS MISERY.

Dark spirit of anguish, despair, and of pain,
 Parent of anger, of hate and of lust!
 How long shall thy influence with mortals remain?
 How long ere thy slumbers shall be in the dust?

O! when shall the heart of the mourner find rest?
 The heart by thee filled with anguish and grief;
 Say! when shall the wretched and weary be blessed,
 From thy blight and thy mildew, the soul find relief?

Full long hast thou reigned with tyrannical sway,
 In bondage the heart's adoration confided;
 Night's sombre shades, with the sunlight of day,
 Like hope and despair hast together combined.

Then welcome! thrice welcome that glorious day,
 When the knell of thy doom shall proclaim thee as dead;
 When bigotry and error shall vanish away,
 And the tidings of love shall be found in their stead.

Then shall mourning and weeping no longer be heard,
 The heart's pure affections shall have their full sway;
 On pinion of praise they'll ascend up to God,
 And dwell in the presence of love's purest ray.

Thy name shall descend 'neath oblivion's dark wave,
 Unwept and unmourned by the children of men;
 While the psalm of love shall resound o'er thy grave,
 Will mortals rejoice that thou reignest not again.

TIMOTHY TIMPLETON;

OR, THE MAN THAT WAS NOT HIS OWN.

BY PIXLEY PIGGLETRAP, ESQ.

'Timothy Timpleton, was a good man,' observed Uncle Pucker as he took his pipe from his mouth with that peculiar ease which always bespeaks a man of thought. And Uncle Pucker was a man of thought, profound thought and reflection. He was a great observer of mankind, and as he frequently declared, had been long, long years engaged in the study of human nature. In the Pulpit or at the Bar; in the shop or the hall; in the street or the field, it mattered not, but wherever man was found, in the highway or the byway, there he put his eye upon him, and that eye was sure to search the object through. He formed a judgment of the principles by which others were governed, and such an adept in the art had he become, that he would point out the rogue before common minds had formed the first idea. He was a great admirer of Pope, and from him ever had a maxim to apply to every subject which was broached in his presence.—And when he filled up his pipe after commencing a subject, and carefully putting it to his mouth telling you that he would begin again, then a discourse might be expected well worthy of attention. With this subject he was perfectly familiar; with that, he was at home; but his great fete, was Man, and he coincided fully with his favorite poet, that

'The proper study of mankind is man.'

'Timothy Timpleton was a good man, but an unfortunate one,' observed Uncle Pucker, leisurely. 'Now a good man may be unfortunate; an evil one, always is—unfortunate in possessing an evil disposition, which is sure to give one trouble sooner or later. An evil man is ill at ease in the region of the heart, and though he may have a smooth exterior yet his interior is rough enough to overbalance it; so that though he may be fortunate, externally, yet he is surely equally unfortunate internally. And though one may dodge along for awhile without the credit which is justly his due; twisting a little now, and turning a little then; playing a little soft soap here, and a little blarney there; yet eventually, the wheel is sure to turn and spike him through the body—a sad warning to all who think the way of transgression strewn with flowers. A good man too, may be unfortunate; but it is an external misfortune. All within will ever be as calm as the surface of the silvery lake, whose waters are unruffled by the breeze; though all without may be rough and uproarious as the wild and angry whirlwind. But the chief misfortune of a good man, while journeying through this dirty world, arises from being ignorant of trap. The world is full of sharpers. There are sharpers by the wayside, at the corners of the streets, in the alleys and the broadways, in-doors and out-doors, and in truth,

You can not go where schemy sharpers sly not around! And hence, it is highly necessary for any man, and especially for the good man, that he understand trap. He must understand it too before it springs upon him, or his understanding is of but little worth. It is no knack at all to understand it after one is caught, for then he has plenty of time to examine its make, and the principle upon which it acts. The veriest blockhead in the world, can understand it then, but the knowledge is not good for any thing, his fingers are in—click! and he is caught, and his knowledge comes like the doctor's prescription, at the funeral—decidedly too late! In this way a good man may be unfortunate, and in this way Timothy Timpleton was most unfortunate; for he had no idea of trap. But who was Timothy Timpleton? Read on and you'll find out.

Timothy Timpleton, the unfortunate good man of whom Uncle Pucker spoke, was a blacksmith and worked in the little old stone shop at the corner of the street in the pleasant little village of Pixleyville. The occupation had come down to him from former generations, for he was not only the son of a blacksmith, but also, the son of a blacksmith's son, and so backward until it would end—no one knows where. He was a man of no little thought and reflection. Though hour after hour, and day after day, and week upon week, he stood there and hammered away on the anvil, seemingly unthinking of aught but to 'shape to pattern' the iron which he was pounding, yet his mind was at work; and if his hammer battered and fashioned and smoothed the silvery steel, so his mind was laboring upon some principle of nature. The lever of thought was under some truth long buried from the vision of man by the mire of ignorance, and he lifted and tugged and worked until it was turned out and lay full before him in all of its beauty, bright and glittering, polished by the hand of Omnipotence. Thus Timothy had thoughts not discreditably to many a professional gentleman, who as he passed the shop, looked in rather disdainfully upon the humble blacksmith as his ringing hammer fell upon the heated iron. And in another point of view, he had no little advantage above his fellow men, or many of them; he was blessed above many in one, not unimportant particular—he had a soul. There was no mistake about it; he had a soul! Not a wind-dried, shrivelled up, gizzard-toughened apology for one; but a real, genuine, simon-pure soul, and he was, to use a common phrase, 'a whole-souled fellow'; and as with all such fellows, so with him, he had many friends, few enemies, and all spoke well at the mention of his name.

But alas! what man has ever lived, who had not his weak point? History may be ransacked from the dawn of creation downward; the walks of philosophy may be trod; the camp and the forum viewed; the wisest head of antiquity may be examined, the unerring finger of Phrenology may poke 'round among the matted hair and the bump will be found; or rather it will not be found, but a hollow where it should be; and of course, there's the weak point. So with Timothy Timpleton; he had his weak point, and it was surprising—he was a believer in the doctrine of the final salvation of all men. He was not one to hide his faith; to keep it behind the curtain because of popularity or aught else; but while according to all, the privilege of possessing the faith best suited to their own views of religious truth, he freely expressed his own opinion and enjoyed what enjoyment he might from his own peculiar religious faith. But it was a source of no small wonderment to a majority of the Pixleyvillians, how a man of such good sense and so sound judgment, could believe in such a doctrine. Many a matron who had marriageable daughters would look in upon him as he industriously plied the hammer, and in a pious tone exclaim, 'what a pity!—such a nice young man.' But all passed unheeded by him, and he attended church regularly in the neat and humble chapel where Mr. Brown discoursed of the good things of the kingdom. And he was a hearer in truth; such an one as a speaker might well be proud of discoursing to. He did not stretch himself backward upon the railing of the pew, with head falling beyond the centre of gravity, mouth agape, and his nasal functions sounding the trumpet into the shadowy land of Somnus; to the disturbance of the serious, the discomfiture of the speaker, and the no small merriment of the boys. Not he. He had a more laudable object in view, than attending public worship to snore in behalf of Christianity. He heard, and treasured up, and reflected upon the lessons of wisdom during the week following. Thus time went on with him pleasantly, but it is a long lane that never turns; a lasting joy that has no sorrow, and his hour came at last; when the even tenor of his way was to be interrupted. Cupid bent the bow, aimed—twang!—and Timothy Timpleton fell!—shot right through the heart!

Miss Malvina Middleton was in market. She had been in market quite a number of years, and was fast approaching that bourne which an unmarried lady seldom reaches—thirty. The sun stood still on mount Gibeon, and the moon in the valley of Ajalon, as commanded; and so when a maiden lady commands—old Time to rest his weary limbs awhile, obedience is so far given that for years she is, 'just twenty eight—and handsome!' Miss Malvina was just twenty eight, and herself being judge, was handsome. For long years she had bowed, and scraped, and simpered, and sung, and sighed, but it was of no avail. Her cap had been set for years, and would in all probability have remained unto this day, had Timothy Timpleton understood trap. She had long had her eye upon him, and she firmly resolved to assault the citadel and carry the fortress of his heart by storm. But how should it be planned? She was a member of the 'old school' church; but this was no obstacle, for nought is so accommodating to some people as their principles of religious faith; those principles may be suited to all circumstances and adapted to all occasions; and so the parishioners of Mr. Brown were not a little surprised one Sabbath, to behold one among them who had been so strict in the way of (orthodox) church-going as was Miss Malvina Middleton; that she should be found in the assembly of the heretics, as that little band had long been termed, was indeed wonderful. But she was there! and now looked at the preacher and then at Timothy—a smile of joyous satisfaction played upon her features as the speaker discoursed of the riches of God's love—a spirit of devotion seemed to fill her soul—she was evidently charmed, and she glanced at Timothy, wishing no doubt that the charm might be reciprocal. The services closed; and she lingered in the vestibule, and putting on one of her sweetest smiles, bowed gracefully to her acquaintances, and especially to the industrious mechanic. Timothy was overjoyed—bewildered—he did not know what to think of it; one of the strictest sect of the Pharisees condescended to notice heretics!—it was surprising, and the more he thought of it, the more he could not resist the opportunity of calling in the evening at the residence of Mr. Middleton.

Miss Malvina 'was in,' and Timothy, though he was unaware of it, was bound to be. The parlor was thrown open, and he listened to the charming converse of the fair, not dreaming that all was not fair, or that his fare for coming years was thus being shaped; but so it was. Mr. Brown was praised—he was so like the preacher they last had and loved so much—his looks, voice, manner; and the sermon too, it was far different from what she had expected—she was so well pleased, she should go again and often. Alas! for poor Timothy. He was an upright man, and his greatest misfortune was that he judged others by himself, and for this reason he did not make that allowance which one more prudent would have done for the strain of flattery poured forth on that memorable evening. It was even with a reluctant heart that he left the habitation of Mr. Middleton. So pleasant—so agreeable—her voice so sweet, and rung in his ear so musically—and next Sabbath she was there again to hear Mr.

Brown—and—well, never mind, ere long Timothy Timpleton and Miss Malvina Middleton stood before the Hymeneal altar, and the work was done, and Timothy too was done, or rather undone. But Mr. Brown did not officiate—oh, no! The Middletons belonged to another church and it would not have been paying proper respect to their minister.

'Well my love,' said Timothy Timpleton the Sabbath morning preceding their marriage—well my love, where shall we attend church to day?—not doubting that a part of the day would be devoted to Mr. Brown.

'My dear,' answered Mrs. Timpleton so pleasantly—'my dear, you know that I always like to hear Mr. Brown, but then it is communion at our church to-day, and I shall be expected there.'

Timothy was a little surprised, but on the second thought, he beheld nothing wrong in the wish of his better half, or rather, in her decision. He was a meek man, and his occupation was such that it had rather tended to cultivate and strengthen a spirit of submission, for he had been for years at the service of others, ready to obey their call and yield to their wishes; until obedience had become a second nature. It was not to be expected that he would refuse to attend church with his wife; he was in duty bound to go, and so he went, and though his brethren thought it strange, that he was not in his accustomed seat, yet they did not know that—it was communion at the other church.

'Well, love,' said Timothy the next Sabbath morning, 'to-day we shall have the pleasure, I suppose, of listening to a discourse from Mr. Brown?'

'My dear,' said Mrs. Timpleton, and she smiled so very sweetly—'my dear, you know that I would like to hear Mr. Brown to-day; he is so like our minister that we loved so much; but then you know that notice was given out for a stranger to preach in our church to-day, and I do want to hear him.'

It was enough; Timothy was submissive; bowed meekly, and attended at the old church again. His brethren were actually astonished; Mr. Brown noticed it, not in words, but he occasionally looked to that seat which was not wont to be empty; and full half a dozen young ladies had attended on purpose to see the bride and gaze upon that dashing satin hat, and to be thus disappointed was absolutely intolerable; they were vexed, and not a few breathed it aloud, but then they did not know that—a stranger preached at the other church.

'Well love, to-day'—alas! the honeymoon had waned in the heavens; the day had come, or rather, it had gone, and a look, a beck was sufficient, and Timothy was as regular as a clock; every Sabbath snugly seated in the old church, to listen to the words of consolation and hope and joy, or what is the same to many, the words of endless wrath and perdition. His was not a doubtful case; there was no doubt about it; he was in the objective case, not that he was an object to be objected, but an object to be wrought upon. He was 'under' as the saying is—not under par, perhaps; but under authority. There he sat with countenance as solemn as a death-march; and why should it not be? for no doubt he was dwelling with the past, contrasting it with the present, and foreboding the future.

'Mr. Timpleton,' said a neighboring boy one day as he poked his head into the shop—'Mr. Timpleton, father wants to know if he can have your horse to go to mill to-day?'

'Step into the house and ask Mrs. Timpleton'—and Timothy hammered away at the iron.

'Mr. Timpleton, father says as how can you come up and give us a lift on the barn this afternoon?'

'Well, I don't know, I'll see'—and Timothy steps into the house and out again—'Tell your father I'd like to help him, but you see I am badly drove to-day'—'with work,' he added after something of a pause.

And Sam Simpton declared that a stranger rode up before the door one day and inquired of Timothy if he was boss of the shop, and Timothy told him to hold on a minute and he would let him know; he would ask Mrs.

Timpleton about it, he would be back in a twinkling.—And we have no doubt of it; for you see he was not his own man, not the man he used to be. Mrs. Timpleton was not unlike the man mentioned in the Scriptures, under authority, or more properly speaking, of authority. She said to Timothy, 'go,' and he went; 'come,' and he came; 'do this,' and he did it. To express it in short metre, Timothy was as pliable as a chunk of dough; to be moulded, twisted, turned, battered, but not baked—no; he was right as he was, and when a thing is right it is best to let it remain so, for fear of the consequences.—Every Sabbath, constant as a dial, he was in the old church. He would occasionally linger at the gateway, and with his hands thrust into his trousers pockets, look wistfully down toward the little chapel where Mr. Brown was discoursing; but it was of no use, he was fixed, and if he showed the first symptoms of being unfixed, a hysterical fit or two and a cold supper would bring him to the work; there was no help for him; his case was mentioned in the Scriptures—he had married a wife and therefore could not come; he was not his own.

Time went on noiselessly, as time always does, without waiting for any to accomplish their purposes; but though its step is, as it were, 'on the light fantastic toe' yet great and important changes are wrought upon all things from the mote to the mountain, from the woman to man; and not the least important of the changes which took place at that period was the one which metamorphosed Timothy Timpleton. He was in truth, a changed being; a being perfectly passive, carrying an expression upon his countenance, as though he would humbly beg the world's pardon for being in it. He still hammered away at the anvil, but not for himself. His companions, or his companions that once were—he had no companions then—would occasionally come into the shop and crack a joke as in other days, but he did not laugh as he was wont from the bottom of a joyous and merry heart; but a kind of forced grin made its appearance while he cast a side-long glance at the window of his domicile as if fearful that—you see, he was not his own.

He now and then met Mr. Brown in the street—not in the neat little chapel; he had married a wife and therefore could not come—and there was not that cordiality in the grasp of his hand as in days of yore, but a kind of nervous jerk or two; with a foreboding look toward his own habitation, as though—he was not his own.

The spirit enslaved is restless and uneasy, although not beheld by the outward observer, and its longing for liberty not only throws a shadow of melancholy around itself, but by the power of sympathy preys upon the earthly tenement which may for a season constitute its home; and at last, as that ruined habitation falls into the lonely sepulchre, the spirit wings its aerial flight as though disdainful of the things of earth; and hence, ere long it was evident that Timothy Timpleton was on a decline that would, at no far future day, lay him in the grave. It was whispered here, and it was whispered there, by one and another, and they pitied him; but why should they pity him? He was perfectly resigned, and even anxious to depart and be here no more; and when the minister of the old church stood by his bedside and asked him if he dreaded the hour that should usher him into the shadowy land, he answered readily—

'Not at all; not in the least, for there the wicked cease from troubling'—and he cast an eye toward Mrs. Timpleton—'and the weary be at rest,' he said, as his eye fell upon his own bosom.

'There is one passage of Scripture, that gives me great consolation at this time; it is where'—alas! the lamp of life was too faintly glimmering in its socket; the effort wafted the extinguishing breeze, and all was dark! with the passage spoken of not pointed out. But conjecture was immediately on the wing, and one guessed that this was it, and another guessed that that was it. Amid all this surmising, Sam Simpton was sure that he had found it, viz.—'In the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage!' It was possible; you see, he was not his own.

Thus ended the earthly career of him, of whom Uncle Pucker observed, 'he was a good man, but an unfortunate one.' But he was far from being 'alone in his glory,' for there ever have been and are at this day, numbers of Timothy Timpletons, and they may be found within a stone's throw of most anywhere in particular. Meek, modest, quiet, submissive; even breathing as though they had no right to the enjoyment of such a blessing, or at least, until they have asked the Mrs. Timpletons about it; yielding up every thing and thankful at that; dare as well die as to look into a sanctuary which is not reputed orthodox; the most menial slaves in existence; for you see, they are not their own; they are married.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1846.

SUICIDE OF BURKE.

'A few years ago, a man named Burke, living in Hartford, Conn., assaulted his wife, split her shoulder open in a most horrible manner with an axe, then seized her by the hair of her head, drew her across his lap, took out his knife, a common rough jack-knife, and with it cut her throat from ear to ear! The murder was one of the most brutal that ever occurred in this country. The inhuman monster was tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hung, but through the wisdom and humanity of certain worldly philanthropists, and by aid of legislative clemency, he had his sentence commuted to imprisonment for life. A few days since he committed suicide in prison, thus cheating the gallows and human justice of their dues, and sending his soul to the bar of God, with all its crimes unatoned for. Had he been hung, as he should have been, his soul might have been saved, though his poor miserable body would have suffered for the evil deed it had committed.'

The above most singular and unaccountable paragraph we copy from the 'New York Saturday Emporium' of the 15th ult. In what sense the Editor (for the article appears under the editorial head) meant to be understood—whether he was serious or in irony—we are at a loss to determine. But in the absence of any proof to the contrary, we take it for granted he was serious; and if so, we have a few questions to propound which we would like to have him, or some other advocate and apologist for the gallows answer. How, or in what sense, has Burke's suicide 'cheated human justice of its dues'? Did human justice require his death? His death is accomplished by his own hand as effectually as the gallows could have done it: and if his death merely was what human justice required, human justice must be satisfied. But did human justice require vengeance merely—i. e. that human beings should imbue their hands in the blood of the murderer? If so, we are glad that both it and the gallows are cheated of their dues.

But Burke, by his suicide, has sent 'his soul to the bar of God with all its crimes unatoned for. Had he been hung, as he should have been, his soul might have been saved, though his poor miserable body would have suffered for the evil deed it had committed.' And has 'his poor miserable body' suffered less by his years of solitary imprisonment, and by death at last by his own hand, than it would by being suddenly strangled upon the gallows by the hand of a fellow sinner? We think not, but far more. So, as far as suffering in this life is concerned, if suffering be the object of justice, justice must be far better satisfied than it could have been had he been hung at the time.

But alas! his soul is sent thus 'to the bar of God with all its crimes unatoned for!' And were his crimes atoned for at the time he was to have been hung? If so, how? And if they were atoned for then, how are they now unatoned for? If they were then to be atoned for, by his death, are they not now, after years of suffering and death, as really atoned for as they would have been then? 'Had he been hung then—his soul might have been saved.' And is the salvation of souls, then, the great object of hanging? Is this the motive that stimulates the thousands of profane, drunken, licentious and brutal of our race to assemble at the gallows to witness the execution of a poor blood-stained fellow being—that makes them so clamorous for blood—such staunch advocates of the gallows—so enraged when any thing occurs to prevent them from witnessing an execution? Was this the motive that swayed the enraged populace of Auburn and vicinity when the poor demented negro, Freeman, was arrested for the murder of the Van Nest family last Spring—that led them to seek to take the law into their own hands and to cry out for the immediate spilling of his blood, without trial, judges or jury? Was it this that swayed the multitude, and through them the jury to pronounce him 'sufficiently sane to distinguish between right and wrong,' against the sound judgment of Drs. Brigham, Coventry, and many others of the best judges, who pronounced him decidedly insane, in order that they might have him tried and executed for murder? Was it to save his soul, think ye? If so, it is an entirely new feature in that class of mankind, there is really less of depravity, and revenge, and more of the godlike and benevolent in their hearts than we have been accustomed to suppose. This 'hanging men to save their souls' is a new discovery. And the Editor of the Emporium has hasten, forthwith, to take out letters patent for it, before other philanthropists get the start of him.

'OUR COUNTRY RIGHT OR WRONG.'

Public opinion is seldom nearer right, than when it stamps the seal of reprobation and infamy upon those misguided children, who at every turn vent their spleen in reproaching and scandalizing their mother. If she is not very wise or discreet, it is far enough from wisdom in them, to publish her frailties. By so doing they only prove their own weakness, or perverseness. She is their mother, whether good or bad; and as such is entitled to so much consideration as comports with civility—to so much of respect, as that neither her virtues nor follies shall be magnified by their indiscretion.

Happily for most of us, we have a common country, which is most emphatically our political parent—mother if you please. For her institutions, our fathers—or perhaps grand-fathers—struggled, suffered, and bled. And it is not so bad a mother after all, that gives protection to, and patiently bears with, those who repay her with vituperation. She may have her failings—for who is without them; but it may be presumed that those whose business it is 'to right her when wrong,' will attend to that matter without the eternal drivelling and complaints of all the children in the family.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

Br. SKINNER—In the remarks which you made in reference to those articles on the War, although without a doubt wholly unintentional, yet you do me an injustice which you will permit me to correct. From your remarks the reader would suppose me to be a political character, a political partisan, or a party politician. That I am so, is wide of the truth. In my younger days I cast four votes, all of which were decidedly Loco Foco. My feelings are at present with that party, although my mind is not so seared by prejudice as to render me blind to the faults of my friends or the virtues of my enemies. But for a number of years I have neither attended political meetings nor an election poll. I consider it unbecoming the ministerial office to be dabbling in political matters, and surely a political thought was not in my mind when I penned the article in question.

Permit me furthermore to say, that you need not have 'shut down the gate,' for I should not reply to Br. Branch were you to permit me to do so. One who will throw the production aside, and come out with personal invective against the writer, is to be pitied, not condemned. Br. Branch may rest assured that I have no hard feelings toward him, but I can not but think in penning his article he erred in judgment. Had he come out with a manly exposition and shown the principles of the article in question to be wrong, I should have been the first to abandon it; for I make it a rule to abandon all principles and doctrines at the moment of being convinced of their erroneousness. But this pummelling a man on the back to convince him of an error of mind, though it may be the modus operandi in the West, is decidedly unpopular here.

The reading of Br. Branch's production was the first intimation given me that I had commenced a fight; but as he says a man may fight with a quill as well as a sword, I would say, that I was wholly unaware of the fact, and if I have killed any of our solders on the Rio Grande, I humbly beg their pardon. It was unintentional. And furthermore Br. Branch need not be on the lookout of nights, for I will send up no blue light to guide the enemy to his home, for the Scriptures say to me—'Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you. And unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other; and him that taketh away thy cloak forbid not to take thy coat also.' We would suggest to Br. Branch the propriety of taking a coal and drawing a black line around this Scripture and writing on the margin—'Obsolete, on the Rio Grande and in Hillsdale, Mich.'

It is indeed strange that the Saviour should proclaim such doctrines; but then it must be borne in mind that he was one who did not support his country 'right or wrong,' and this was one great reason why his countrymen procured his condemnation to the cross. But Br. Skinner, lest I weary your patience, I will close with two remarks. 1. I have never been put on the 'limits,' in jail, or in a penitentiary. I never sued a man in my life, nor did any one ever sue me; and I never knowingly disobeyed a law of my country. I merely make this remark to show that I am not quite so bad a man as Br. Branch would represent me to be. 2. Though cutting men's throats, and shooting away their under jaws, hands, arms, feet, legs; and aiding, abetting, and supporting our country in wrong doing, may be Christianity on the Rio Grande and in Hillsdale, Mich.; yet we, in this section, have not so learned Jesus. Thine truly,

East Hamilton, Aug. 29th, 1846. S. J. GIBSON.

P. S. Since writing the above, I have been looking at the paper again, and I find that Br. Austin is down on a law of his country, hard and heavy. Br. Soule too, has lifted a warning voice, charging the good people of his State with the crime of murder. What a treasonable race we are getting to be in these benighted regions.

P-L-A-G-I-A-R-I-S-M!!!

Some three weeks since, in No. 34 of this volume, p. 268, (date, Aug. 21st,) we published a poetic article, as original, from the written manuscript of L. D. Johnson, Fulton, Oswego county, N. Y., entitled 'Worship.' A friend happened in our office a few days since, (who by the way is a great reader, as well as lover and composer of poetry,) and on taking up a copy of the Magazine containing the article alluded to, after reading it, suggested that he had seen the same, or something very similar, in print a number of years ago, and knew the name of the author, and could produce the book containing it. At our request he did so, and we give the entire article from which our plagiarist has helped himself so largely, on the last page of this week's paper. It is headed 'The Presence of God,' and was written by Mrs. Amelia B. Welby, was published and went the rounds of the newspapers some years since. It will be seen by comparing Mrs. Welby's and Johnson's articles, that the first eight lines in each of the two stanzas that he sent us are taken almost word for word from the first and fifth of her's.—Whether the remainder of his article is stolen from some other poet we are unable to say, but think it very likely. Now then friend Johnson, a word in your ear. Allow us to say that you are engaged in VERY SMALL business, in thus filching the productions of other and better brains than yours, thus appropriating them and endeavoring to build yourself a reputation. You may gain a reputation, but we trust it will be such a one as you deserve—a most unenviable one. Should you hereafter pen any article for the Magazine, you will have the goodness to put quotation marks against that part which you are inclined to steal, as we do not like to be imposed upon in this way. Moreover, there is a great chance of improvement in your hand writing—but above all, pay your postage. PUA.

ELDER JACOB KNAPP.

This pink of Orthodox Revivalists—this 'unco good' Baptist Evangelist! has of late been the subject of some public notice in the (Hamilton) 'Democratic Reflector' and the 'Albany Argus,' which we think our readers and the public generally entitled to be made acquainted with. Those papers contain the following obituary notice of John C. Payne, the father-in-law of Elder Knapp.

DIED—In this village, on the 7th inst., JOHN C. PAYNE, aged 71 years.

The subject of this notice has been a resident of this town for more than 30 years. And, if he was afflicted with some of the weaknesses and frailties incident to human nature, in all his business transactions he has ever had the reputation of being an honest man. He left several children, all respectable and well settled in life.—Among them is the wife of the Rev. Jacob Knapp, of this village. He died within a mile of the residence of his son-in-law, at the house of a poor widow, who seeing him sick, and destitute of friends, like the good Samaritan, 'took him in,' and administered to him all the care and attention that the warm and sympathetic heart of woman, prompted by the common feelings of humanity, ever will do to a stranger when deserted by his kindred.

His remains were borne to the grave by a numerous and respectable class of our citizens, who had known him for years. But it was remarked that his Reverend son-in-law and family were not of the number. Much has been said of the inhumanity of heathen, who when their parents become old and infirm, cast them out from their dwellings and society and suffer them to die neglected, and perhaps torn to pieces by wild beasts, before the last thread of life is broken. But we, who boast of living in a land of civilization, in a land of Bibles, churches, Christian privileges and blessings—were not prepared to see in our midst, a venerable gray haired citizen linger on the bed of sickness and die thus, and be buried (and this too at the expense of the county) and not a single relation to administer religious consolation and instruction in his last moments,—nor to follow his remains to their last resting place—or even to see that proper arrangements were made to have him decently buried.

The Rev. J. Knapp was here at home during his death and funeral, superintending the gathering in of his abundant crops from a large and well cultivated farm. He is worth his thousands; and is the well known Evangelist—who having accumulated his fortune by professing to preach the Gospel of Christ, together by industry and economy, is now enjoying his abundance of this world's goods, and his venerable father-in-law is suffered to die, neglected by his children and buried as a pauper.

Mr. Knapp is at present pastor of a church in Albany, but is now at home to secure the products of his farm.—We appeal to his church and to the Christian community in general, if such inhumane conduct is in accordance with the principles and practice of our Saviour.

On the above notice, Elder Knapp, (as it is presumed, he was the author of the article bearing the signature,) over the name 'Justice,' comments in the Argus with great severity, accuses the writer of the obituary of being actuated 'by a spirit of bitter and diabolical malignity' to himself, (Elder K.,) and endeavors to exculpate himself from the blame charged upon him, on the ground that his father-in-law, Mr. Payne, had been, many years ago, addicted to great intemperance, abuse of and separation from his wife and family, and other derelictions of duty—that the relationship between him and his family had long been considered both legally and morally dissolved, and had never since been recognised by any of the latter. The article of 'Justice' further states that when Mr. P.'s health entirely failed, 'Elder K. on the principle of charity became responsible to the poor widow, who is represented as taking him in out of pure charity—for his board, at one dollar per week. This he did for the last six or seven weeks of his life.'

Since Elder K.'s article in the Argus appeared, (Aug. 27th,) the publishers of the Hamilton 'Democratic Reflector' have issued an 'Extra' (Sept. 3,) in which they publish the original Obituary, followed by Justice's (alias Elder K.'s) article, and free comments of their own thereon. They show conclusively that 'Justice' has stated a number of palpable untruths, and moreover that the first obituary did not contain or exhibit near all the glaringly unchristian traits in Elder K.'s conduct touching the death of his father-in-law. They show that, however intemperate or otherwise guilty Mr. P. might have been in the earlier part of his life, he had for the last twenty years lived alone and supported himself by daily labor wherever he could find employment, which was in many of the most respectable families in Hamilton; that he was universally regarded as an honest man; that no vice was charged upon him but intemperance; that for the last three years he had belonged to the Washingtonian Temperance Society and wholly abstained from the use of intoxicating drinks, excepting perhaps in a very few instances when out of health. They also further show that for the last twenty years all of Mr. P.'s family residing near him have recognised the relationship he bore to them; that Mrs. Knapp visited him only three or four days before his death, 'took him by the hand, addressed him by the endearing appellation of father, and apologised for having neglected him'; that a daughter of Elder Knapp, visited her grandfather only two days before his death, and was by him requested to tell her father he desired him to come the next day and pray with him. The Elder did not go!—The Editors of the Reflector, moreover show that Elder K. did not become responsible to the widow for taking care of his father-in-law for the last few weeks of his life—that the overseer of the poor did, and paid her therefor; and that the funeral expenses were paid by the county! They show furthermore that some two or three days after the obituary notice was published, and Elder K. found that his reputation would be affected thereby, he called on the widow and offered to give her four dollars as additional compensation provided she would give him a receipt therefor. The motive of this late charity can be judged of without great liability to error.

The above are the facts as we gather them from the Reflector Extra. Comment from us is unnecessary; except one remark, which we can not but make, viz. that, let the character and conduct of Mr. P. have been what they might—even had he been a pirate or a murderer—when on his death-bed, his dying request was that Elder K. should visit and pray with him, it would seem that no professed minister of the Gospel would or could have refused a compliance therewith. That part of the community who best know Eld. K., will not be much surprised at the facts of the case. And were it not for the importance and notoriety which he has attained by other and apparently better men endorsing him as a most worthy man and excellent Evangelist, we should not have deemed him worthy of this notice in our columns. — D. ✠ The NEW YORK ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE of Literature and Art. Edited by Lawrence Labree. New York: Wm. Taylor & Co. No. 2 Astor House. We have received No. 5, Vol. 2, for September. This, and previous numbers which we have seen, proves us correct in the opinion that this is not surpassed in general excellence, and specially in illustrations, by any of our monthlies.—This No. contains 60 double column octavo pages of reading, from the pens of such writers as Henry William Herbert, George Ten Eyck Sheldon, Mrs. M. Shelden, Burkhardt, R. F. Greeley and others. The illustrations, of which there are four, are fine. The first, 'The death struggle,' is an exciting scene of the termination of a running fight on horseback between an Indian and a white trapper, the combatants and horses in the act of plunging down a rocky precipice of three hundred feet in depth. The second is a well executed fancy portrait from Byron's Don Juan, called Haidee, or the heiress of the Eastern Isles. The third is the Swiss Gonthard, an expressive picture of rural simplicity. The fourth is 'Sabbath-day Point,' a most beautiful and majestic view on Lake George. This Magazine is afforded at $3.00 per year or 25 cents per No., and is kept for sale by G. N. Beesley, this city.

✠ In this paper of the 4th inst., page 288, 2d line of the 6th verse, instead of 'The art of life,' read 'Thou art of life,' &c.

The MECHANICS' MIRROR, No. 9, for September, is filled with useful matter as usual, and should be in the hands of every mechanic. Monthly, at one dollar per annum. To be had at Beesley's who has also received Punch, and late English papers by the Britannia.

CAYUGA ASSOCIATION.

This body will hold its next annual session, in the Universalist church at Kelloggsville, Cayuga county, on the fourth Wednesday and following Thursday in September next (23d and 24th).

The Standing Clerk of this Association has been making efforts during the last three years, to prepare a correct statistical account, of the number, strength and condition, of all the Universalist societies within the four counties composing the Association. He desires to see this work carried on and completed, and for this purpose he calls upon all the societies within its bounds, to send by their delegates a written statement of the number of members belonging to each, (after deducting those who have died or moved away,) the number of pupils in their Sunday school, (if they have one in operation,) the proportion of time that preaching is supported, average size of the Sabbath congregations, and the general prospects of the cause in the vicinity.

Those who wish to enjoy a rich Gospel feast, will be in a fair way of realizing the fruition of their hopes, by attending the approaching session of the Cayuga Association at Kelloggsville. Persons from a distance will do well to drive directly to the church, on their arrival, where they will doubtless find our good Br. J. M. Peebles and a Committee of his society in waiting, to direct them to places of entertainment. H. L. HAYWARD, S. Clerk.

Fort Plain, Aug. 23d, 1846.

MISSIONARY MEETING.

The first annual meeting of the 'Missionary Society of the Cayuga Association of Universalists,' will be held at Kelloggsville, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in September. It is expected that all the Trustees of this Society, who feel an interest in the advancement of Gospel truth in our land, will be present and prepared to give such information as will result in a more perfect organization of this body. Does any one inquire, why we have not fully organized? We answer, because the Officers and Trustees, have so many of them staid away from previous meetings, that we have been unable to form a quorum for action.

Now, brother Officers of the Board, and Trustees of the Society; just think of this answer, and come up and assist us at this meeting, and great will be your reward.

D. H. STRICKLAND, Secretary.

NOTICE.

The Susquehanna Association of Universalists will hold its annual session in Brooklyn, Susquehanna county, Pa., on the first Wednesday and following Thursday (7th and 8th) of October next. The Council will meet meet at 8 o'clock on Wednesday morning. Services will commence at half past 10 o'clock. Our clerical and lay friends from a distance are respectfully invited to attend.

J. B. GILMAN, Standing Clerk.

Brooklyn, Aug. 28, 1846.

✠ Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn, keeps a general assortment of Universalist Books for sale. He is also agent for the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist publications generally.

✠ Br. T. J. Sawyer authorises us to receive subscriptions or donations to the Theological Institute. Any one who may wish can therefore remit direct to this office, and the receipt of the money will be acknowledged in the Magazine and Advocate.

DEATHS.

In Norway, on the 21st ult., Mr. JAMES GILES, aged 86 years. The consolations of the Gospel were administered to the mourners, and a large congregation of sympathising friends, in the Universalist church at Newport, on Sunday the 23d. The absent children of the deceased will (we trust) remember that although father and mother have now been taken from them, God, their heavenly Father, has promised to take them up. T. J. W.

In Newport, on the 25th ult., Mrs. MERCER, consort of Mr. Theodore Mercer, aged 65 years. The widowed husband and children mourn and sorrow not as those which have no hope, believing that all who have died in Adam shall live again in Christ. Funeral services by the writer, in the Universalist church at Newport, on the 27th, to a numerous audience of sympathising friends. T. J. W.

On the 31st of July last, at his residence in Hastings, Oswego county, Hon. RUDOLPH DEVENDORF, in the 75th year of his age. He was buried next day and followed to the grave by a large concourse of friends. Judge Devendorf had just returned home from a visit to his friends at the West. He ate his supper, and retired to rest in his usual apparent health. During the night, the family heard a noise in his room, which they immediately entered, and found him struck with death. Before his eldest son, who resided only a short distance from him, could be called to his bedside, he had expired. Judge Devendorf formerly resided in Herkimer county, where he has many connexions now living. He raised a large family of children, some of whom have held stations of honor among their fellow citizens.—He was always a firm believer in the doctrine of God's impartial grace, and died as he had lived, in the full faith and practice of universal love and salvation. He so exemplified by his life and conversation, the doctrine he professed and believed, that most of his numerous descendants cling to the religion of their father as the only true faith delivered to the apostles. I knew him well. He was a good citizen, a kind father and an affectionate friend. He leaves a numerous circle of relatives and friends to mourn his decease.

FRANKFORT.

On the 4th ult., at Oriskany Falls, MARTHA ANN, wife of Jacob Stebbins of Augusta, and daughter of Chatfield Olcott, Esq., of the former place, aged 18 years and 6 months. Her health has been declining for some time, and her days were finally ended by that fatal disease, the consumption. She bore her sickness with Christian patience, and before her death requested that some minister of the Universalist faith should attend her funeral. This was complied with, and the writer officiated on the occasion and addressed a large and sympathizing audience. She had been married but a few months. May the Lord sanctify this bereavement to her husband, her afflicted parents and the large circle of friends to whom her virtues had endeared her. T. J. S.

At Joliet, Will county, Ill., August — ult., Mrs. ESTHER READ, wife of Thomas B. Read, aged 49 years.

Mrs. R. was formerly from Royalton, N. Y., and her short residence in this village was sufficient to secure the esteem of a large circle of acquaintances by whom her decease is deeply regretted. W. W. D.

On Saturday the 8th of August, Mrs. JANE A. TOLER, consort of Mathew Toler, in the 35th year of her age, after a protracted and painful illness, which she bore with fortitude and Christian resignation. She was for near four years past a worthy member of the Universalist church of this city, firm and steadfast in her belief, of the most unexceptionable character and deportment, esteemed and beloved by all who knew her, and died as she lived since her conversion from the Baptist church, a consistent, unwavering Universalist. Death to her had no terrors; she dreaded not its approach, and possessed and expressed her entire confidence in the goodness of God, not only as her Saviour, but as the Saviour of mankind. She was one of those whose translation from earth to heaven is thus drawn by the poet's pen.

'They set as sets the morning star, which goes
Not down behind the darkened west, nor hides
Obscured among the tempests of the sky,
But melts away into the light of heaven.'—[Richmond (Va.) Whig.]

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

✠ There will be regular preaching at Case Town (Howlet Hill) the second and fourth Sundays in each month until further notice. Let there be a general attendance the second Sunday in September. Br. — (who?) is expected to preach—the Gospel.

THE PRESENCE OF GOD.

BY MRS. AMELIA B. WELBY.

O, Thou, who flingst so fair a robe
Of clouds around the hills untrod,—
Those mountain pillars of the globe
Whose peaks sustain thy throne, O God!
All glittering round the sunset skies
Their fleecy wings are lightly furled,
As if to shade from mortal eyes
The glories of yon upper world;
There, while the evening star upholds
In one bright spot, their purple folds,
My spirit lifts its silent prayer,
For thou, O God of love, art there.

The Summer flowers, the fair, the sweet
Upspringing freely from the sod,
In whose soft looks, we seem to meet
At every step, thy smile, O God!
The humblest soul their sweetness shares,
They bloom in palace-hall, or cot—
Give me, O Lord, a heart like theirs,
Contented with my lowly lot;
Within their pure, ambrosial bells
In odors sweet thy spirit dwells,
Their breath may seem to scent the air—
'Tis thine, O God! for Thou art there!

Hark! from the casement, low and dim,
What sounds are those that fill the breeze?
It is the peasant's evening hymn
Arrests the fisher on the seas;
The old man leans his silver hairs
Upon his light suspended oar,
Until those soft delicious airs
Have died like ripples on the shore.
Why do his eyes in softness roll?
What melts the manhood from his soul?
His heart is filled with peace and prayer,
For thou, O God, art with him there.

The birds among the Summer blooms
Pour forth to Thee their hymns of love,
When trembling on uplifted plumes
They leave the earth and soar above;
We hear their sweet familiar airs
Where'er a sunny spot is found;
How lovely is a life like theirs
Diffusing sweetness all around!
From clime to clime, from pole to pole,
Their sweetest anthems softly roll,
Till, melting on the realms of air
They reach thy throne in grateful prayer.

The stars, those floating isles of light
Round which the clouds unfurl their sails,
Pure as a woman's robe of white
That trembles round the form it veils,—
They touch the heart as with a spell,
Yet set the soaring fancy free,
And O! how sweet the tales they tell,
Of faith, of peace, of love, and Thee.
Each raging storm that wildly blows,
Each balmy breeze that lifts the rose,
Sublimely grand, or softly fair—
They speak of Thee for Thou art there.

The spirit, oft oppressed with doubt,
May strive to cast thee from its thought;
But who can shut thy presence out
Thou mighty Guest, that com'st unsought!
In spite of all our cold resolves,
Magnetic-like where'er we be Still, still the thoughtful heart revolves,
And points all trembling up to Thee.
We can not shield a troubled breast
Beneath the confines of the breast,—
Above, below, on earth, in air,
For Thou, the living God art there.

Yet, far beyond the clouds outspread,
Where soaring fancy oft hath been,
There is a land where thou hast said
The pure in heart shall enter in;
There in those realms, so calmly bright,
How many a loved and gentle one
Bathes their soft plumes in living light
That sparkles from thy radiant throne!
There souls once soft and sad as ours,

Look up and sing mid fadeless flowers,
They dream no more of grief and care,
For Thou, the God of peace, art there.

BR. A. C. BARRAY.

We learn from the annexed proceedings of a meeting of the Standing Committee of the First Independent Christian Society of Richmond, Va., that Br. Barry has tendered his resignation of the pastorate, and it has been accepted. Br. Barry has removed to Racine, Wisconsin, and wishes all communications addressed to him at that place. Will our denominational papers please notice?

At a regular meeting of the Standing Committee of the First Independent Christian Society of the city of Richmond, held at the office of Robert T. Wicker, Esq., on the evening of Wednesday, the 12th day of August, 1846.

Present—Caleb R. Newman, Chairman, John W. Hines, Robert T. Wicker, Oliver P. Humber, N. W. Safford, Patrick Lyddane, Thos. H. Wynne, John M. Daniel, Levi Dederer and Augustus A. Bodecker.

The following proceedings were had.

Whereas, The Standing Committee have received the letter of the Rev. A. C. Barry, tendering his resignation as Pastor of the society on account of declining health,

Be it therefore, Resolved, That we regret extremely the necessity which compels him to take this step, and assure him of the kind regard entertained towards him by the committee and the congregation of the society, and wish him sincerely a perfect restoration to health in his expected prairie home, and an early return to his former labors.

Be it further Resolved, That the committee entertain the highest regard for Mr. Barry as a gentleman and a Christian, and recommend him as an able preacher and a good pastor, to the fellowship of all liberal Christians with whom he may associate. Attest:

ROBERT TATE WICKER, Clerk pro tem.

A UNIVERSALIST SENATOR.

We are glad there is one Universalist in the U. S. Senate; we do not know but there are many—it is said Gov. Cass of Michigan is one; but that there is one from New England, we rejoice; and our sister State of New Hampshire has the honor of having placed him there. We have long heard of Col. CILLEY as one of the most energetic and excellent men of the land. All sects and parties agree to do him honor.—Gospel Banner.

We find the following account of Col. C. in the last Trumpet:

'COL. JOSEPH CILLEY. This excellent individual is exciting at the present time no small share of public attention. He has been elected to the Senate of the United States by the legislature of New Hampshire. But we do not speak of him as a party man. His politics will be praised by one party and condemned by the other; but neither praised or condemned by us.—One of the papers says,—

NEW HAMPSHIRE. Col. Joseph Cilley of Nottingham, Rockingham county, was chosen as successor to Mr. Woodbury, for the remainder of his term. Mr. C. is a brother to the Representative from Maine, who was killed in the duel, some years since, by Mr. Graves of Kentucky. He held the rank of Captain in the last war with Great Britain, and was distinguished for his courage and gallant spirit. He lost an eye in one of the warmly contested battles on the Northern frontiers. He is a man of strong mind, great energy of character, and is greatly respected for his moral worth.

The battle referred to was the battle of Lundy's Lane, as it was called by the Americans, and of Niagara, as it was called by the English, for it was not more than a mile from Niagara Falls. Col. Cilley was severely wounded in this action. He not only lost an eye, but received a shot in one of his legs, which has lamed him for life.

The 'True Wesleyan' says, 'We will add to the above that we understand that Col. Cilley is now a true liberty party man.' And to that the 'Trumpet' adds, that Col. Cilley is an avowed Universalist; a man whose house is open to all preachers of the gospel of salvation; for years he was a subscriber to the 'Trumpet'; and we think for ten or twelve years in succession we never missed him from the annual meeting of the Rockingham County Association of Universalists.'

OVERCOMING EVIL.

BY REV. D. H. PLUMB.

The world has long been agitated by the great question:—What are the best means for overcoming the evil of the world, both individual and collective? Reforms are constantly rising up urging forward their respective schemes for the accomplishment of this great result. The various moral enterprises that mark and distinguish the present age are all based on the assumption that more or less evil will be dissipated by their advancement. To some extent this is true. Very many of the various moral schemes for human melioration are founded on the true principle of reform, viz., love to the objects of their efforts. It is cheering moreover to observe, that nearly all of the individual and social efforts made to overcome evil, are based on this principle:—That there is a constant tendency toward the true principles of reform as contained in the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the most superficial observer can not but have seen. In the Temperance movement, more especially we see the illustration of the Gospel principles—and although the efforts of Washingtonianism are mainly directed against one great evil, sufficient evidence is afforded in the success with which they have been every where crowned, to justify us in concluding that they are the only true philosophical as well as true Christian principles of reform. The Gospel says, 'Repent (or reform) for the kingdom of heaven is at hand'—i. e., The kingdom of righteousness, peace and joy is at hand. The great voice of Washingtonianism says—Reform, for the habits of temperance will bring you innumerable blessings. It does not say, reform because you are exposed to an awful calamity.—It does not overwhelm the soul and depress the spirits by depicting the awfully remote consequences of transgression. No! It holds out the olive branch of peace and contentment:—speaks of love and mercy, and unseals the pent up fountains of virtue within. Is it not clear then that the monstrous evil of intemperance is overcome by the principle of love to the guilty? And that the superiority of the present temperance movement over the old, consists mainly in the naturalness of the motives, enforced and brought home by kindness instead of fear.

Evil of all shades, and of every description, of a moral character, can be overcome only by love. 'Overcome evil with good,' says the Saviour.—Goodness, or love, then, is the only efficient agent recognized in the Gospel of Jesus, the only efficient lever of reform. 'The goodness of God,' says the apostle, 'leadeth to repentance.'

In view of the fact, that evil is to be overcome by the power of goodness, or love, and by this alone, let us glance at several of the most prominent ways by which its efficiency can be illustrated and enforced.

First. By a charitable and forgiving disposition towards those who surround us, and with whom we are associated in life. Charity is the most Godlike of all the virtues, and whoever illustrates it, will add to the sum of general happiness and fill up the measure of his own joy. Too many are proud and unforgiving from a false view of human nature, and ignorance of the springs of human action. Such give loose reign to their irritable feelings, and when insulted or injured, study only how to satisfy their revenge. Hence, the earth has been filled, as it were, with strife and bloodshed. Nation has lifted up sword against nation, and brother warred against his own blood. Thus have they exemplified the correctness of the language of Solomon, when he said, 'A soft answer turneth away wrath, but grievous words stir up anger.' Instead of subduing the enemy, and overcoming his evil, the evil passions have been inflamed, and he is ten times more an enemy than before. On the other hand, the exercise of a loving spirit has ever developed a kindred spirit in those who may oppose. Love begets love. The true Christian philosopher will therefore exercise charity, not only towards his friends, but his foes likewise, as this is the only means by which he can possibly achieve his ends—viz., the subjection of his enemy to himself, and to the principle of right.

Second. The principle can be illustrated by our treatment of the young, with moderation and kindness.

First impressions, it has been said, are most lasting. If this be true, how necessary that the young mind should be impressed with right principles—that accord with our nature, and the Gospel of Jesus Christ? The faculties and passions of children, are all waiting to be developed, and their character and dispositions, as men and women, depend mainly upon the influences which have surrounded them in life. Bring up a child in the midst of 'indignation and wrath'—and the same disposition will doubtless be exhibited in future life. 'Bring up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.' When we see an individual of a hasty, passionate disposition, we may take it for granted that the influences by which he was surrounded in early life, were precisely of a kindred character. Parents should be careful therefore how they comport in the presence of their children, and use great care in the selection of their teachers. All chastisement should be administered on the pure principles of love, with the sole view of reform—and not in a hasty and vindictive temper. The very look of the eye and the tone of the voice, are more effective with some, than all the appliances of the rod.

Thirdly. By our compassion for the poor criminal.

The criminal, it begins to be suspected, is yet a man, susceptible to the influences of good. In a late 'Prison Discipline' report, it is asserted that 'the secret of the success of the Prison Discipline Society, is its use of the great principle of the Gospel—love to the guilty.'

Through the instrumentality of this society much good has been done. Many criminals reclaimed, and society vastly benefited. This society winks not at man's misdeeds, but simply strives to reform them, and sustain them after they are reformed, by encouraging, and procuring them labor by which they may earn an honest livelihood. Very many novices in crime have doubtless been confirmed in their wickedness, and plunged deeper into crime, by the heartlessness and cruelty of the world.

It is as much an incumbent duty on the Christian, to aid and encourage the poor struggling criminal, as to exercise charity towards the suffering poor.

It is true, we are naturally indignant at crime; but do we not often expand our wrath upon the frail criminal? Do we not often feel like crushing him to the earth, instead of lifting him up, and Good Samaritan-like, pour oil into his wounds? Too few ask themselves, what benefit will accrue from harsh treatment of the poor criminal? and what good may accrue from a kind and compassionate demeanor toward him?

Instances might be enumerated, wherein poor suffering children of crime have been brought back to paths of virtue by the extension of a kind and encouraging hand.

All other means have been tried without much effect, and now justice and humanity demand the exercise of a more effective, more Christ-like influence.

Let the friends of true religion, and the believers in the omnipotence of love, see to it, that the true principle of overcoming evil with good, is exemplified by them in all the concerns of this struggling life.

MORALITY—RELIGION—&C.

The principal cause of my wishing to make the following remarks in this public manner, is contained in Br. Abbott's letter, and the criticism appended by Br. Skinner—present vol. Magazine and Advocate, pp. 245-6.

I am not about to reprehend, or take sides in particular, with either. I only wish as near as possible to present facts as causes, and let those causes have their legitimate effects, come where they may. I have heard much said, and seen much written upon the subject of morality—its identity with, and its dissimilarity to, religion. Now what better means can we use, (to come to the most correct conclusions,) than those which God has established in the nature of man; the only accountable and moral being on earth? Authors and definers give us their opinions; they may be right, they may be wrong. On subjects of importance, we should study the nature of the thing, consult different authors, and finally come to our own conclusions:—which I shall do on the present occasion. As I wish to be brief as possible, I may come to some conclusions, take some positions as facts, without showing all the whys and wherefores.

1. Man is naturally a moral, as well as an animal and an intellectual being.
2. Man could not be either an animal, an intellectual, or a moral being, without innately possessing the fountain, or qualifications necessary to render him such.
3. Man can not convert the use of one faculty, or organ, to that of another, any more than he can see with the ear or hear with the eye. Each faculty, must of necessity, flow through its own appropriate channel, or not at all. If any faculty be lacking, or too weak to give its proper impulse, the person, as to that faculty, must be idiotic.
4. The intellect contains the only faculties that are capable of knowing, willing, determining, &c. Every other faculty is but a blind impulse; yet, (with certain exceptions,) the will, the intellect, is governed—controlled by those impulses, and man acts accordingly.
5. When the selfish sentiments and propensities are much stronger than the moral faculties, they are sure to direct the will, the determining power, and man shows their effects. He is not then moral, but immoral, bad. He is then acting the old man; he is 'sensual, devilish.' But when the moral impulse is stronger than the propensities, acting upon the enlightened intellect, man will then, by his conduct, prove the nature and qualities of the moral impulse, or fountain; will show to a certainty whether that fountain as a cause can possibly produce some good, and some bad effects;—whether it can produce both 'sweet and bitter waters.'
6. So far as we can comprehend science, there can be no more certainty, that the sun of itself can not produce frost or night, than that man under the moral influence can not produce a bad act, or run counter to the moral precepts of the Gospel. The abuse of the faculties can be no objection to the position, for the reason, that moral impulse with enlightened intellect, can not counteract its own principles. And when there is some moral feeling shrouded in darkness and ignorance, it can not prompt contrary to its own nature, but acts in good faith, and all the desire it produces, is only good. Whenever, or wherever, we discover a wrong act, a bad deed, we may rest assured that its origin was from some other source than that of the morals. 7. Since the reflecting intellect sits as umpire with the two different natures or faculties of man, (the animal and moral,) and directs in accordance with the strength of the one or the other, it is also scientifically and philosophically true, that when he acts from the dictates of the one, (animal,) he acts (with the exception of simply satisfying nature), morally, religiously, and wholly wrong;—is in the gall of bitterness, the bonds of iniquity.* But when under a full influence of the other, (moral,) he acts in accordance with his best principle—the highest dignity of his spiritual or heavenly nature—and in obedience to every requirement of his God. 8. Since man possesses no higher or better faculties than his morals, and as we can not legally subdivide or part with any of them, it necessarily follows, that religion is the effect of moral impulse; is only another name for morality, and is identified with it. It likewise follows, that the only legitimate meaning of moral, morality, or religion, is—the true principle or doctrine of the duties of life; practical virtue. From the above premises, there can be no such thing as bad morality or bad religion, any more than there could be good vice or wicked virtue.

Benevolence, veneration and conscientiousness, form a large portion of the moral impulse, and a person with those faculties strongly developed, with a proper balance of the other organs, will cheerfully practice the religion of the Bible, in doing justice, loving mercy and walking humbly with God.—Those with this combination, are 'a law unto themselves.' Those without it, would certainly prove to be hypocrites, should they claim to be religious.

Again, it follows that those authors (if there be any such) which conflict with the foregoing principles, must be wrong. Yet I must say that I know of no one that does so. Mr. Webster, (as quoted by Br. Skinner,) says—Moral, 1. 'Pertaining to practice or manners in reference to right or wrong.' 2. 'Conformed to rules of right, virtuous.' In the first sentence the meaning is, moral impulse, pertains to practice in reference to right or wrong doing; not wrong morality. The second sentence declares it to be 'conformed to rules of right, virtuous.' Which shows that moral impulse is opposed to wrong, is itself good, virtuous. When Mr. Walker speaks of,—'it may be virtuous or criminal, good or bad,'—he means, that the pronoun it, relates to the practice of men, which may be 'good or bad'; not bad morality. And so of the rest, and all others. A word to the philosopher is sufficient.

I have only given a few brief (perhaps imperfect) hints—have neither time or space for more. I must, however, just say that the atheist which Br. Skinner defines, must be quite a clever fellow, at any rate. If I am wrong, I would like to be corrected.

MORAL DUTY.

BY MRS. M. CHASE.

Among many other wise and excellent sayings, the royal Psalmist declares, 'Trust in the Lord and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed.' And this brief sentence contains matter for deep and joyful contemplation. An abiding trust in the Supreme Ruler of all things, seems to be the main support of the soul of man while journeying through this 'vale of tears,' compelled, as he is, to witness so much of sin, suffering and sorrow. We all need some staff on which to lean; for no person who has attained to years of maturity, has ever done so without meeting with trials and disappointments. Where shall we find succor when death tears away those who are near and dear to us? when friends prove treacherous and forsake us? when riches and honors fly away like the morning mist, and leave us in the vale of obscurity and poverty? When we look around and see the deep depravity that abounds in the world, and when we are compelled to see the baleful power of sin upon ourselves, will the idea that the world is without a Ruler—that all events are but chance occurrences, console us? No, it can not; neither will the thought that the Supreme Governor of the universe is changeable and weak as his creatures, afford us any more solid ground of hope! Nothing but a firm and unwavering reliance upon God, as he is revealed to us, in all his perfections, can calm the tumult of the spirit, as it is tossed to and fro upon the ocean of time, and say to it, 'Peace, be still.' But he who possesses this trust can feel at all times that 'the darkest cloud has a silvery lining,' as well in the moral as in the natural world—that 'Behind a frowning providence God hides a smiling face.' And surrounded as he is by so many things which are calculated to oppress and becloud the mind; still he can say amid them all, 'The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice.'

But the Psalmist seems to imply, that we are not to stand still and see the salvation of the Lord; for he has spoken to us that we go forward in the discharge of our manifold and imperative duties. God works by means always; no reasonable man expects to reap a harvest without tilling the ground and sowing the seed; yet, after all that belongs to him to do, has been accomplished, he is wholly dependent upon the blessing of heaven for success. It is there he must look for the refreshing showers, the gentle dews and the genial influence of the sun. So in a moral point of view; we should perform with alacrity the duties which are pointed out to us, and at the same time, feel that our best efforts, without the crowning blessings of heaven, are unavailing.

But we sometimes hear the question asked, 'If all mankind are to be saved, of what use is it to do any thing to promote the more elevated condition of the world?' We can but smile at this idea; it seems so ridiculous. Let us take heed that we do not sanction it by neglecting to do good as we have opportunity and ability. Think of the perfect pattern which our Saviour has set for our imitation, in regard to the performance of the duties of life. See him at an early age engaged in the work which his Father had given him to do; and as he advanced in years, he was ever ready, under all circumstances to relieve the sufferings of humanity, both morally and physically. He never shrank from duty, let the sacrifice to himself be what it might. When he was suffering the torture of the cross, he refused the proffered draught which would have rendered him insensible to his extreme agonies. Thus did he persevere, to the last moment of his life on earth, in doing and suffering all that infinite Wisdom had seen fit to impose upon him. His example in this, as in many other respects, was perfect. O, that we might all imbibe this spirit, that we might follow in the footsteps of the Captain of our salvation, in trusting in the Lord and doing good! Then, indeed, should we be fed with that spiritual food which alone can satisfy the cravings of the soul which hungers and thirsts after righteousness!

WHAT IS TRUE, SCRIPTURAL REPENTANCE?

The spirit of unfeigned repentance is aptly expressed in Joel ii: 12, 13; 'Therefore also now, saith the Lord, turn ye even to me with ALL YOUR HEART, and with fasting and with weeping, and with mourning; and rend your HEART, and not your garments; and turn unto the Lord your God: for He is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repenteth him of the evil.' If the HEART be rightly exercised,—whether or not our temperament, or feelings, or circumstances incline us to fast, or weep, or mourn—rending our hearts in the humility and contrition of a melting affectionate gratitude toward God, we are penitent of our sins, and are thus turning unto the Lord our God, who is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and (speaking in adaptation to human conceptions,) repenteth Him of the evil,—the unvarying operation of His immutable Law of Love and Truth, turning from our path of repentance 'the evil,' which, in the analogy of effect following cause, is immovably affixed to the way of transgression, according to that scriptural philosophy—'Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished'!

The true penitent, in view of his grievous offences against so lovely a Being, possesses the humility, which would incline him to cry out with Job—'I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes'!

'God commandeth all men every where to repent,' and the sincere penitent, no longer 'despising the riches of His goodness, and forbearance and long suffering,' approaches in humility—in prayer—in affectionate contrition, 'the throne of the heavenly grace,' and, with a spirit breathing resignation and trust, commends himself, in dedication of soul, body, and spirit, to the Paternal Hand. To such an one so devoutly exercised, doth God grant repentance unto life.

'John did baptise in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance, for the remission of sins; * *—baptised with water'; but he who baptised with the Holy Ghost—even Jesus the true Messiah—whose baptism is into the spirit of Truth and Love, preached the GOSPEL of the kingdom of God, the burden of which preaching was, and is—'Repent ye, and believe the Gospel;' (Mark i:) from which only and truly EVANGELICAL PREACHING, the inference is obvious and irresistible, that a belief of the Gospel, [NOT of endless wo, but] of 'good tidings of great joy to all people,' is necessarily antecedent to true, Scriptural Repentance!!

In full accordance with our Lord's spiritual baptism of the mind into the Holy Spirit of Love and Truth, we hear Peter at the Pentecostal refreshing by means of that Holy Ghost, exclaiming to the men of Judea, and those then dwelling at Jerusalem: 'REPENT, AND BE BAPTISED, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for [or into] the remission of sins; and we shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost,' &c., &c. Acts ii. Again; says this same Peter, whose heart the Holy Spirit of Truth and Grace, was preparing to receive an increasingly bright manifestation of the true doctrine and ministry of 'the common [or universal] salvation,' by means of the 'vessel descending unto him, as it had been a great sheet, knit at the four corners,'—the object of which presentation was to teach Peter that he 'should not call any man common or unclean'; and that 'God is no respecter of persons'—we hear this same Peter most earnestly exhorting his brethren, the men of Israel, in these words of evangelical doctrine concerning repentance, conversion and salvation: 'REPENT ye therefore, and BE CONVERTED, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and He shall send Jesus Christ, who before was preached unto you, whom the heaven must receive until the times of RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets, since the world began'!

This is the true, even the scriptural repentance, consequent of which is the baptism of the HEART into the spirit of truth, the comforter. We see how intimately associated with the Gospel, or the 'restitution of all things,' is this very doctrine of repentance. Can it, then, ever be said with truth that Universalists, whose doctrine is indissolubly connected with 'repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ,' preach not repentance? Indeed, may it not with justice be said that such is the intimate relation of the universal Gospel and the doctrine of repentance, that (to be consistent) the Universalist preacher must insist more earnestly upon repentance, than the advocate of any opposing theory can be expected to do? The case is briefly this: Universalists base their 'creed' on the apostolic affirmation that 'God is Love,'—from which sublime premise the conclusion is immediate, that His GOODNESS leadeth to repentance —(another apostolic testimony.) The foundation principle, SCRIPTURAL idea of the Divine character; then faith and love, consequent on so inspiring a view; then obedience to his commandments, who has FIRST loved us. Thus we have repentance, conversion, sanctification, all the virtues, graces, and fruits of the spirit, eliminated out of the fundamental element of Universalism. J. L. C. G.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the Chenango Association of Universalists for 1846.

Met according to adjournment at North Norwich, Wednesday, Sept. 2d. Chose Br. Lora Gross, Moderator, and Br. E. E. Guild, Clerk. United in prayer with Br. J. C. Sawyer. Read and approved the minutes of last session. Received credentials of delegates. Accepted and adopted the following report—Of the committee on discipline; no complaint. The committee on fellowship and ordination reported that Br. J. C. Sawyer made application for a letter of fellowship at the last session of this body, and that they know of no reason why fellowship should not be granted him. Voted, that a letter of fellowship be granted to him. The committee also reported in favor of publishing Br. B. S. Hobbs of Walton, Delaware county, as a candidate for the fellowship of this body. Adopted. Committee on Conferences reported that only one Conference (at Pitcher) was held during the past year.

Appointed Brs. J. S. Sherburne, A. O. Warren and Solomon Wait a committee of discipline for the ensuing year. Brs. W. M. De Long, C. L. Shipman and Wm. Perry were appointed a committee on fellowship and ordination. Appointed J. T. Goodrich, E. E. Guild, (ministerial,) and Samuel E. Lewis and Lora Gross, (laymen,) delegates to the State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes. J. T. Goodrich to receive applications for Conferences, and to preach the next occasional sermon, with power to appoint a substitute. E. E. Guild to prepare the minutes for publication.

Adjourned to meet at Binghamton, Broome co., on the first Wednesday and following Thursday of Sept., 1847. LORA GROSS, Moderator.

E. E. GUILD, Clerk.

Lay delegates present.—John Murray, Lora Gross, Upper Lisle—Amos Hall, C. L. Beebe, Pitcher—E. W. Corbin, E. E. Guild, South Bainbridge—J. H. Reynolds, Thomas Downing, Columbus—Calvin Cole, John Shattuck, Oxford—Augustus Ross, Lyman Smith, Preston—R. B. Beedle, L. Tyrel, Smithville Flats—E. S. Lyman, Russel Case, North Norwich.

Ministers present.—A. G. Clark, J. B. Gilman, J. T. Goodrich, B. S. Hobbs, W. Perry, J. Potter, J. C. Sawyer, J. S. Sherburne, C. L. Shipman, J. S. Palmer, E. E. Guild, N. M. Byington.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Perry, Gilman, Palmer, Clark, Guild and Potter.

In most places throughout the bounds of this Association where we have stated preaching, our cause is prosperous. To God be all the glory. Amen. E. E. GUILD.

AN ATTEMPT TO CHEAT A DEAD MAN OUT OF SIX DOLLARS.

Br. SKINNER—Permit me through the medium of the Magazine and Advocate, to offer a few remarks upon the charity, and Christian liberality of our pious Methodist brethren. In the town of Louisville, where there is a small but growing village, a meeting house was built a few years since, by the inhabitants of the town generally. As this was before our brethren began to support Gospel preaching in that place, the house was built under the control of the Methodists. It was however agreed on their part, that all other denominations should occupy it when they did not wish to do so. And especially on funeral occasions, it was to be free for all. This church is situated on a hill, so that the lower story forms a convenient town house, and was built for that purpose. Among the subscribers for this house was John Bennet, a poor man, able to pay nothing excepting what he could pay with his own labor. But he had the liberality to subscribe six dollars, which he paid in his own labor. On the fifteenth of August, instant, Mr. Bennet was summoned to his everlasting home above. He was in the 67th year of his age.

Application was made, by our friends, to the Methodist clergymen (as there were two in the place) for the privilege of occupying the meeting house, in which the writer was to address the friends of the deceased. They readily granted consent, until they were informed that a Universalist was to preach, when they refused to let us occupy either the meeting house, or the town house. As we were aware that there would be a great collection of people on that occasion, the only alternative was to preach in the street, if the weather remained pleasant. But a tremendous shower compelled us to seek shelter in the town house. Considering that it belonged to the town, our friends concluded in this case of necessity to occupy it. This drew away the few from the upper part of the house, so that only four remained to listen to the pious Methodist divine; and consent was then given for us to occupy the church! We concluded to do so. The house was large and well filled; and in the midst sat the two saintly Methodist preachers.

A sermon was preached from the following words. 'And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me.' John ii: 32.

Perhaps many of those pious people would gladly have absented themselves; but the rain prevented. Those pious divines refused to let us occupy the house, at 9 o'clock in the morning, or any time during the day; and after the service was closed, they both arose before a large congregation, and denied saying that which the best members of their own denomination are ready to testify they did say.—Their excuse was, they were afraid to let us occupy the house, for they should have it to answer for in the day of judgment!

But one of them could tell a falsehood, and the other confirm it, without the thought of judgment entering their minds. The use of the house was the last act of kindness which could be bestowed upon the remains and memory of the deceased man. He owned six dollars in the house; this was the last time he could ever occupy it; and these pious saints desired to cheat him out of that! It is bad enough to cheat the living; but it is still worse to cheat and rob the dead! But they fear that Universalism is gaining ground in that place; and they resort to all means to put it down.

It was even remarked by one of the trustees of the Methodist society, he feared their seats would be more vacant hereafter, than they had been heretofore.

There is Gospel preaching in Louisville one quarter of the time, and good attendance. The truth is gaining ground, in spite of all the hair brained fanatics that may rise up to oppose.

In Litchfield, the 14th inst., by Rev. S. Davis, Mr. NELSON CATLIN to Miss ELIZA ANN RIDER, both of Litchfield.

DEATHS.

In Palermo, Oswego county, July 20th, of consumption, MARY A., youngest daughter of Marquis M. and Almada S. Crooks, aged 15 months. 'Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.' Funeral on the 22d. Sermon by the writer.

W. D. B.

In Oswego, August 8th, Miss ELIZABETH D. LAMB, aged 15 years and 7 months. Amiable in life, resigned and happy in death, she lived respected and esteemed, and died lamented by all who knew her. For some time previous to her death, she became convinced of her approaching dissolution, yet believing in the illimitable grace of God and the final triumph of holiness and happiness universal, over sin and misery, death to her had no terrors, and she died believing in the faith of a world's salvation. Her mother and relatives, though deeply afflicted, yet they mourn not as those without hope. The funeral services were attended at Mexico, and the consolations of the Gospel administered to the mourners and a very respectable assembly of sympathising friends, by the writer.

W. D. B.

At Fayetteville, Onondaga county, N. Y., on the 9th inst., of pulmonary consumption, after a lingering sickness of many months, Mrs. PRISCILLA, consort of Hicks Worden, Esq., aged 41 years. The deceased was highly respected and deeply beloved by all who knew her; and most by those who knew her best. For her great benevolence and her tender sympathies for the poor and the needy, the distressed and afflicted, of every class, she will long be gratefully and affectionately remembered. She was a Universalist both theoretically and practically, in the best sense of that honorable appellation. She endured her last illness with exemplary patience and resignation, being anxious to live only for the sake of her young and growing family, and calmly fell asleep (like the expiring lamp when its oil is exhausted) full of the hope of the blessed immortality for herself and all of Adam's race, notwithstanding the oft repeated efforts of Partialists to convert her to their faith on her death bed. She has left a devoted husband, four daughters and a son, an aged father and mother, two brothers and a sister, and a numerous circle of relatives and friends, to mourn her early exit. By her request, made several weeks before her death, the editor of this paper attended her funeral and ministered the consolations of the Gospel to the afflicted family. The Baptist church was kindly opened for the occasion, the resident pastor taking a part in the service, and a discourse delivered to a numerous auditory from the words, 'Surely the bitterness of death is past.' May God comfort the mourning family, and all who mourn, with the richest consolations of the Gospel of Christ.

In Genoa, Aug. 27th, after a short illness, ELLEN P., the only child of Abram W. and Lorana Stevens, aged 18 mos. In this dispensation of Divine Providence, our bereaved brother and sister have been called to mourn the loss of their first born and only child. Yet they are not of that number who mourn without hope. For they are true believers in the doctrine of 'the restitution of all things.' They feel that the spirit of their loved one has fled from the afflictions of earth to the bright mansions of bliss, to feast forever on the rich stores of God's love, and dwell with Him, who while on earth took such in his arms and blessed them, saying, 'Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.' Services were attended in the Universalist church by the writer, assisted by Br. J. H. Harter of Clinton. J. M. P.

WHAT I LOVE.

I love to hear the tempest's roar,
When thunders roll and lightnings flash;
I love to stand on Ocean's shore,
And see the mighty billows dash
Against the rocks that long have stood,
And stayed the progress of the flood.

I love the whirlwind and the storm,
The swift tornado and the gale;
I love to see the black'ning form
Of clouds that bring the rain and hail;
For these speak out with one accord—
There is a God—obey his word!

I love the mountain and the rock,
The sandy desert and the plain,
The purling rill, the crystal brook,
The forest woodland and the glen,
And all the islands of the sea—
For all things have a charm for me.

I love the hill, the verdant vale,
The darksome grotto, and the cave,
I love to see the pure white sail,
That skims along the briny wave,
And urges on the light canoe,
Or ship, that plows the ocean through.

I love the garden, and the fields,
And every plant, and shrub, and flower,
The orchard, and the fruit it yields,
The shady grove, the vine-clad bower,
The falling dew, the gentle breeze,
And zephyrs whispering in the trees.

I love the flaming orb of day,
That shines resplendant from afar,
The moon's serene and silver ray,
The twinkling beam of every star,
And every orb that wheels its round,
Throughout creation's mighty bound.

I love all beings great and small,
That fill the air, the earth, the sea—
Creative Wisdom made them all,
Why should they not be loved by me?
Behold the power and love displayed,
In every creature He has made!

I love the volume of His word,
Which to His children He has given;
What joy and peace those lines afford,
That point the pathway up to heaven,
Dispel the darkest gloom of night,
And bring immortal joy to light.

I love the Gospel of the Lord,
That brings glad tidings to our race,
I join the chant with sweet accord,
And sing to his redeeming grace.
And when his love's proclaimed abroad,
I humbly bow and worship God.

I love the hope the Gospel brings,
That points far off to distant years—
How close around my soul it clings,
Dispels my doubts, allays my fears,
The hope of immortality,
When 'all in all' our God shall be.

THE CHRISTIAN MOTHER.

In the year of '38 a scene came before me that I can not soon forget. I had been to the town of R. to spend the Sabbath, and on my way home, I called at the house of Mr. C. Wearied with the labors of the preceding day, and catching as I journeyed, the spirit of surrounding objects, my thoughts moved on in 'measured tread.'

The season of the year was peculiar for gloomy musings. The autumnal sun was fast hastening toward the winter solstice—the trees were stripped of their covering, and the landscape witnessed forth the work of decay.—

The flowers had long since faded, and 'chill November's surly blast' 'Made field and forest bare.' These things had tuned my feelings to chime in with their loneliness. Friendship prompted the call. Mr. C. was absent on urgent business. I was soon ushered into the room, where sat the mother with a few female friends—holding to her bosom her infant and suffering child. Disease had laid a heavy hand upon that lovely infant; and every motion of its little frame evidenced a struggle of its nature, to shake off the grasp of its foe. I had seen that child before, when the crimson glow of health was on its cheeks. Then the mother's countenance was lit up with joy at its sweet and playful smile.

It was the youngest of four lovely cherubs, and warmly did the parent's affection centre upon it. She had already learned the mutability of things earthly—the brevity of human life. For ere this two of her children had been snatched from her fond embrace, in the very morning of life, like the flower nipped by an untimely frost, in its early bloom. She now sat calmly with the little sufferer, around which affection seemed more strongly to entwine from a fearfulness of its brief stay.

I inquired the nature of its disease—the time it had been afflicted—and the hopes entertained of its recovery? The mother replied: 'We flatter ourselves that the symptoms are much more favorable, and fondly hope the disease is removed.' Having often been beside the bed of the sick and dying, I had watched its every symptom, and thought I plainly saw the premonitory signs of speedy dissolution. But who has a heart abruptly to announce the decision of their judgment on such a subject? A mother was before me, whose every being seemed bound up in the life of her child, and that child struggling with disease which must soon consign it to the icy arms of Death. What could I do? What could I say?

I alluded to the flattery of disease—a hint was enough. She spoke. 'Nature fondly clings to its own, and a parent in the ardor of love may be led to hope, when the foundations of all hope are broken up. My affection may lead me to look upon the most unfavorable features in the disease as the best. But be the issue what it may I feel prepared to meet it. I feel that this child is not my own, but my Father's, and if its Father and my Father sees fit to take it to himself, I feel to say, 'Not my will, but thine, O God, be done.''

I marked her countenance while she spoke, and read the deep thoughts of her bosom in the few words she had uttered. There was a calm resignation to the will of her Maker depicted on her brow—a feeling at her heart too deep for words to utter, it was that of love. She warmly, tenderly loved her child, yet this love pure and holy as it was, moved back, for love supprime for her Maker.

I took my leave.—A short time elapsed, and I was summoned to officiate at the funeral of that child. I spoke of the brevity of life—of the cares—the pains—the trials and sorrows that attend us in our pilgrimage to the grave: I spoke of that brighter and better world, where this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal be clothed upon with immortality, and we become like the angels of God in heaven.

A few tears only moistened her eyes, and these were the offerings of gratitude, rather than a tribute to grief. She was prepared.

Her hope of immortality stayed her grief, and she meekly bowed, and kissed the rod that smote her.

Such, kind reader, were the blessings of that Christian mother. S.

DEATH OF REV. THOMAS JONES.

Another father in our Israel has gone to his rest. From the Trumpet of the 27th ult., we copy the following account of the death of this venerable servant of Christ.

DEATH OF REV. THOMAS JONES.—We informed our readers, last week, that our long respected and well known father in the ministry, Rev. THOMAS JONES, of Gloucester, Mass., was probably in the last hours of his life. It now becomes our duty to announce the termination of his earthly existence. That solemn event took place on Thursday evening, the 20th inst. He was 83 years old on the 5th of April last; and had been in the Gospel ministry upwards of sixty years. He was always peculiarly averse to giving any account of himself for publication; so that we have no means of preparing a biography, except the few detached letters of his which have been published within the last twenty or thirty years, and a recollection of conversations we have had with him at different times.

Rev. THOMAS JONES was born at Narbath, Pembroke-shire, South Wales, on April 5th, 1763. He is said to have possessed in early life a studious, considerate and persevering mind, and a mild and peaceful disposition.—He was always remarkable for great integrity and conscientiousness, which notwithstanding the blandness and suavity of his disposition, gave to his conversation, a striking directness and sometimes abruptness.

At nineteen, young Mr. Jones entered Lady Huntington's College, to prepare for the ministry under her patronage, as a Calvinistic Methodist. This lady, as is well known, was the patron of Whitfield; and by means of her immense income, she built churches in various parts of Great Britain, and founded a College at Trevecca, South Wales. The terms of admission to the College were, 'that the students should be truly converted to God and resolved to dedicate themselves to his service.'—During three years, they were boarded and instructed gratuitously at her ladyship's cost, and supplied with raiment. At the end of this time they might join her connexion, or any other in which Christ was preached.—These qualifications were found in young Jones. He had embraced religion devoutly and sincerely, and felt the effects of it on his soul; and he availed himself of the very liberal charity of this distinguished patroness of needy but pious young men. In sentiment, he was a follower of Whitfield. He believed with all his heart. What he believed, he professed openly, before the world; he never had the power to disguise his faith, after it became settled.

He continued in Lady Huntington's College from 1782 to 1785, when he was ordained at the age of 22 as a member of her connexion, and afterward went to preach at Reading, Berks. Notwithstanding she favored an itinerant ministry, yet in cases where a society was deeply attached to its preacher, and believed that his removal from them would be a serious detriment, he was allowed to remain. That the society in Reading were thus attached to their young pastor will subsequently appear.—He was of a generous and liberal turn of mind; and it was stated by Rev. Robt. Aspland, in 1824, 'Mr. Jones is still remembered in Reading with respect and gratitude, as an asserter of free inquiry, and the divine benevolence.*'

Let us now notice the manner in which he became a Universalist. He got his first preparation from reading the Bible. Lady Huntington's connexion was distinguished for its attachment to the doctrines of grace, in opposition to Wesley's followers, who taught men to depend on works for their salvation. Grace! grace! was the theme of her ladyship's preachers. Salvation, in their view, could come from nothing else.

'Grace first contrived the way,
To save rebellious man;
And all the steps that grace display
Which drew the wondrous plan.'

In such a state, Mr. Jones was reconciled to the doctrine of endless reprobation to wrath on the ground of God's sovereignty; but still at times the inquiry would break upon the mind, 'Is not the Lord good to all?'—'Has his grace any bounds?' About the time of his leaving College, or just before that event, he fell in, accidentally, [or providentially, as he would say,] with a professed Universalist preacher, by the name of Thomas Sheen. In a letter to the writer, dated Nov. 5, 1824, Mr. Jones said,—

'Mr. Sheen had been a travelling preacher in the Welsh connexion of Calvinistic Methodists; but when I saw him he belonged to no connexion, but preached as a free independent man at different places in the neighborhood where he lived, and in some of the adjacent counties. There were persons who adhered to him and believed his doctrines.

* Christian Reformer, xiii: 179.

'I think Mr. Sheen was a native of Brecknockshire; he appeared to be about 68 years old; but in good health and all animation.

'He spake fluently in Welsh and English; he conversed with me in English. He was the first Universalist I ever heard on the subject. He preached publicly the salvation of all men. He was called an Antinomian by the tongue of slander, and was greatly calumniated by his former friends, both ministers and people. He had also domestic trials. I have heard from his friends that he was a very patient man, and bore all things that befel him as a permission of Providence for some good design. I was told by one of his friends, in 1790, that he died in triumph. He was allowed even by his religious enemies to be a man of great talents and reasoning. I can say no more of him, for I saw him but twice after the first interview. But I can tell you, Br. Whittemore, that what Mr. Sheen said to me, (when I was only 19 years old, when I first saw him,) was never forgotten by me; and though I did not believe it, I often thought of it. It occurred frequently to me with force. I was afraid it was error. I shut the door of voluntary thought against it for years. But in the year 1788, from the force it had upon me, I received as the truth of God—the Gospel of his grace by his Son. I never read on the subject, till after I became a believer.†

After his conversion to the faith of Universalism, Mr. Jones continued to preach in Wales for a number of years, and was highly esteemed for his piety and worth, till the year 1796, when, on receiving a pressing invitation from the venerable John Murray of Boston, he embarked with his family for America.

Mr. Jones arrived in Philadelphia in the year 1796, and became the pastor of the Lombard street Universalist congregation. In the fall of this year he had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the celebrated Elhanan Winchester, then on a visit to that place; and on the death of that distinguished man, at Hartford, Ct., in April following, he showed his respect for his memory, by delivering a funeral discourse in the church at Philadelphia. His text was Rev. xiv. 13, 'That they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them.' He showed how the works of the dead follow them; not into the future world; but they followed them by succession; they succeeded them here on the earth, as one filling up the place of a predecessor. These supply the place of their personal existence, and personate them though dead, to the living. So Abel, being dead, yet speaketh. So Winchester still lives, in his works, in his writings, in his highly favored theme of the Restitution. Mr. Jones proceeded to speak of the greatness and excellency of this doctrine; paid a merited compliment to Mr. W.'s talents and character; and closed by such reflections as the Gospel furnishes wherewith to comfort man in the midst of his bereavements.

Mr. Jones continued the pastor of the Universalist society in Philadelphia for several years, and was beloved and respected by all who knew him. Even those who disagreed with him most widely in faith, were obliged to acknowledge the rectitude of his life. So true is it that 'an honest man's the noblest work of God'; and that even the most censorious and bigoted are obliged to do homage to virtue. In September, 1804, he removed to Gloucester, Mass., whither he had been introduced by his early friend, Mr. Murray, who had several years before, removed from that town and settled in Boston.

It is now forty-two years since he took the pastoral charge of the society in Gloucester; so that it will be perceived just half his life has been spent in that town.—He has been very deeply beloved and respected; and in this place, as in all others where he has lived, even the opponents of his doctrine have been obliged to bear testimony to the rectitude of his life.

About the same time that Mr. Jones removed to Gloucester, Rev. Ezra Leonard, a Congregationalist clergyman, was settled as the pastor of the Third Parish in the same town (usually called Annisquam). Mr. Leonard was entirely free from bigotry, and was naturally a man of as sterling integrity as Mr. Jones himself. Although of different sects, how could it be otherwise than that two such men should respect each other? They had both enjoyed the advantages of a liberal education, Mr. Leonard having graduated at Brown University. Mr. Jones' standing, the high respectability of his society, the power of his discourses to which Mr. L. sometimes listened, all conspired to lead him to inquire into the truth of Universalism. After studying the Scriptures, he made application for the loan of 'Ballou on Atonement.' When placing it in his hand, Mr. Jones remarked, 'Young man, if you mean to read that book, take care of your heart.'—Mr. Leonard did read it; and then he read his Bible anew, and prayed to God for divine assistance; and the result was HE BECAME A UNIVERSALIST. It is not a little remarkable, that so deeply was he respected by his parish, that they would not give him up, notwithstanding his change of opinion, and he remained their pastor until his death, in April, 1832. Mr. Jones preached his funeral sermon. He died in full fellowship with the Universalist denomination; and the society at this present day still retains the fellowship into which they were led by their deceased pastor.

No man was more deeply respected in the denomination to which he belonged, than Mr. Jones. Until age rendered journeying painful to him, he was generally present, by invitation, at dedications, ordinations, and other public occasions. In numerous instances of these kinds, he preached the sermon, and if he did not perform that part, the Charge, or the Ordaining or Dedicatory Prayer, was assigned to him. There are many who still remember with what lofty sentiments, with what divine ardor, with what a glow of enthusiasm, with what an apparent and striking intercourse with God, he would perform these services. Who that was present at the General Convention of Universalists at Winchester, N. H., in 1813, can have forgotten his sermon on that occasion? It was afterwards published by request, in a pamphlet. The text was Ps. ii. 7-9. It was a sound and weighty discourse, radiant with the doctrine of immortality; and when, in one of his happiest passages, he enunciated, in his peculiar manner, 'These are the true politics of God,* he is said to have almost brought the congregation unconsciously upon their feet. * * * *

He has left a widow and two daughters. The former was the companion of his youth, and forsook all the endearments of her native land, to follow her husband to America.

May the long expected decease of this aged servant of God, be sanctified to his widow, his children, his society, his ministering brethren, and all who have known and loved him. He has been gathered to his fathers in a good old age. He was a contemporary with Winchester, Murray, Richards, Barnes, and many others, who long since entered into their heavenly rest. Since he came into America, what vast changes have taken place in that class of Christians with whom he was connected. Seventy-eight of all the Universalist societies in Massachusetts have sprung into existence since he removed to Gloucester. He lived to see the wilderness rejoice and blossom as the rose. He fulfilled his duty well, and his memory will be blessed.

His funeral took place at Gloucester on Saturday the 22d ult. The sermon on the occasion from the text Ps. xxxvii. 37, was preached by Br. A. D. Mayo, pastor of the society to which father Jones had for so many years ministered the Gospel. Brs. Streeter, Leonard, Chapin, Bartlett, and Fay were present and participated in the solemnities of the occasion.

* Sept. 1813 was a time of great political excitement.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

'Honor to whom honor is due.'

In the Magazine and Advocate of 4th of Sept., there is an article from Br. T. J. Sawyer, in relation to the Clinton Liberal Institute. Near the close I find the following sentence, respecting different suggestions which have been made as to the best plan of raising funds for the Institute:

'One proposes that our societies shall contribute moderate sums of 25, 50 or 100 dollars, according to the number of its members—and Br. Grosh with his society at Reading, Pa., has already stepped forward and shown us the $50 there. A noble example! I am almost angry that this honor should have been won by a society of a sister State, while New York stood listlessly looking on.'

I am extremely gratified that Br. S. did not so far lose his usual well known placidity of temperament, as to become quite angry; because his anger would have been entirely groundless. Br. Grosh and the Reading society, have assuredly set 'a noble example,' and one worthy of all praise, for the promptitude with which they have proffered their assistance to the Clinton Liberal Institute.—But I think they have not 'won' the honor of first 'stepping forward' to the aid of the Institute, in the efforts now being made in its behalf—and I am confident Br. Sawyer will be rejoiced to learn that New York (or at least one portion of this State) has not 'stood listlessly looking on.' While the brethren in other sections have been proposing and offering, the society in Auburn have been doing.—Within a few months past, they have silently put their hands into their pockets, and raised and paid over, nearly two hundred dollars to the Clinton Liberal Institute.—And this too, at a time when they are expending $12,000 or $13,000 for their new church now erecting, meeting the heavy annual expenses of the society, and contributing to minor benevolent movements, almost 'too numerous to mention.' I think this a worthy example!—and could it be generally imitated throughout the State, the Institute would soon be where all want to see it—based on a permanent foundation.

I trust it will be believed these statements have not been made in a boasting spirit—but simply to 'render honor to whom honor is due,' and to give a specimen of what can be done in our own State. J. M. A.

THE MOHAWK RIVER UNIVERSALIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The following Circular and form of subscription, was printed soon after its date, and sent to various individuals within the bounds of this Association for them to circulate and raise funds for the object therein specified. It will sufficiently explain itself to the reader. We insert it now in the Magazine and Advocate to call special attention to it, both of those who received the Circular and of the public generally. We would remind those receiving the Circular, of the importance of speedily, energetically and widely circulating the subscription—as the time is short—so as to make an encouraging return on the 1st day of October; and be sure not to forget, every one of you, to be at Herkimer on that day.

If those who received the Circular wish for more to put into the hands of others for circulation, let them notify us and we will send them. If any others wish for subscription papers to circulate in their region, let them also send for them to this office, or copy the one below, and make returns to Herkimer, Oct. 1. The design is not to interfere with, nor supersede, the stated and regular ministrations of the word where it is now enjoyed; but to raise means to send it to the destitute, and into neighborhoods where only one or a few Universalists reside—where no society is organized, and thus prepare the way for establishing societies and supporting the ministrations of the Gospel in every town and neighborhood where practicable. Brethren, be up and doing while the day lasts.

CIRCULAR.

DEAR SIR:—At the last session of the Mohawk River Association of Universalists, in Newport, in June last, the undersigned were appointed a committee to take into consideration the propriety of organizing a Missionary Society, for the support of a Missionary and the propagation of the Gospel of impartial grace, in destitute portions of this Association. We reported during the session, in favor of such organization, and were directed to adopt immediate measures for maturing and carrying out the plan, for completing the organization, raising funds, and employing a Missionary, should the prospect warrant it. Accordingly, we have this day met (the earliest time convenient for us to do so,) and appointed a number of individuals, of which you are one, in different parts of the Association, to act as Trustees, to circulate subscriptions, raise funds to as great an extent and at as early a day as practicable, and to meet in the village of Herkimer, on Thursday, October 1st, at 10 o'clock, A. M., for the purpose of completing the organization, adopting a Constitution, appointing officers, such as President, Directors, Secretary, Treasurer, etc., and if the funds raised will warrant, employing a Missionary for a part, or all the time, for the coming year.

Will you therefore, Dear Sir, have the goodness to circulate the following subscription, and get as much subscribed as possible previous to the 1st of October, and be sure to attend the meeting in Herkimer on that day, prepared to act in the business herein specified?

SUBSCRIPTION TO A MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

We whose names are hereunto subscribed, promise to pay to the Trustees, or either of them, of Mohawk River Universalist Missionary Society, the sums set opposite to our respective names, for the purpose of supporting a Missionary to labor in the Gospel ministry, within the bounds of this Association. All subscriptions not exceeding one dollar, to be paid at, or within three months of, the time when the Missionary commences his labors, and all sums over one dollar to be paid, the one half as above, and the other in six months from said time: and all persons subscribing one dollar to be entitled to membership, and to vote in the election of officers, and the transactions of the business of the Society.

'VOICE TO YOUTH.'—A CORRECTION.

Rev. Mr. Dyer, in his article in this paper, of the 4th inst., makes the following statement:—

'Mr. G. denies that 'Austin's Voice to Youth' was published with the design of propagating Universalism, or that such is its tendency. If he mean the expurgated edition, an expedient evidently resorted to, to continue its circulation in a library, after a 'Country Pastor' had called attention to the work in his 'More Snakes in the Grass,' I attempt not to contradict him.

By the 'expurgated' edition of the 'Voice to Youth,' I suppose this gentleman means the revised edition. The reader will perceive he asserts that the revised edition was not prepared until after the appearance of his article in the N. Y. Observer, entitled 'More Snakes in the Grass.' He would thus intimate that the publishers of the 'Voice to Youth,' were driven by his article to get out an 'expurgated' edition, as an 'expedient' to deceive the public, and prevent its utter condemnation.

Nothing can be more false than these declarations and insinuations. I received the request from the publishers, to make the revision of which so much has been said, in August 1844—long before 'More Snakes in the Grass,' or its author was ever heard of by myself, or, I presume, the publishers. The request was complied with, and the alteration made, but the edition did not appear until some months afterwards. The reasons for issuing this revised edition, I have fully stated in the Mag. and Adv. of the 22d of May last, to which those readers having an interest in the matter, are respectfully referred.

The time of the making of this revision, could not by any possibility, have been known to Mr. Dyer. Hence his assertion, that it was 'after' the appearance of his article in the Observer, was reckless, in the extreme, to say the least. And if it is a specimen of the general character of his assertions, it must detract much from their weight in the estimation of the candid. The appearance of his 'More Snakes in the Grass' article, had no more to do with the issuing of the revised edition of the 'Voice to Youth,' than the proclamations of the Emperor of China!

J. M. AUSTIN.

THE EVILS SUFFERED BY AMERICAN WOMEN AND AMERICAN CHILDREN: The causes and remedy. Presented in an Address, by Miss C. E. Beecher, to meetings of Ladies in Cincinnati, Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and other cities. Also an Address to the Protestant Clergy of the United States. Harper & Brothers, Publishers, New York.

Such is the title of a pamphlet of 36 pages just received from the press of the Harpers. Miss Beecher we believe, is a daughter of the celebrated Dr. Lyman Beecher, and enters with great earnestness into the subject of her addresses. She portrays graphically and deplores deeply the many evils and miseries among American women and children, for want of the right kind of education, employment and economical habits, and especially those arising from caste and the dishonor supposed to be connected with useful and necessary employment. Most people are ready to acknowledge these evils, especially the latter, but comparatively few to co-operate in remedying and removing them.

Miss Beecher speaks of the evils of so many females at the East being gathered together and employed in Factories, and the great necessity and call for their labors in the New and Western States as teachers of children, which she considers the proper sphere of woman's labor. We think she somewhat exaggerates the evils of the large manufacturing towns, and overlooks some of the advantages the unmarried females there enjoy. But that more, many more, female teachers are wanted at the West, there can be no doubt. She dwells at great length and earnestness on the forecast and (worldly) wise policy of the Catholic Priests and Jesuits, in seizing at once upon all the institutions of learning, and moulding the young minds of youth to their own taste—in endowing numerous Seminaries of learning, Academies for young ladies, &c., and employing the Sisters of Charity so numerously as to monopolize the education of the rising generation, especially of the future mothers of our country, and thus give the ascendancy and future power of our country to Catholics, while Protestants are doing comparatively nothing to establish and endow academies and schools of their own, and many of their wealthiest families are giving liberally to establish, and sending their own daughters to, the Catholic schools. She says in Kentucky there are but two Protestant high schools for young ladies; while there are not less than ten well sustained and extensively patronized Catholic schools in that State alone, conducted mostly by Sisters of Charity.

We believe there is too much truth in these statements. The Catholics are crafty and warily awake and alive to their own interests, while Protestants are asleep, or so actively engaged in money making and speculation as to be unmindful of the influences that are being exerted around them and even in their own families. The Sisters of Charity, who have taken vows of perpetual celibacy, anxious to do good and promote the interests of their church, and instructed and exhorted by their priests in the part they are to act, perform their work most assiduously, faithfully and successfully. It requires not the ken of prophecy to tell the result of these things in a few generations more, unless Protestants awake to the necessity of educating their own children.

To accomplish this object, to secure a sufficient number of competent female teachers from the East, fit them for their calling, and locate and establish them in that calling, is the grand object of Miss B.'s mission. A Central Committee has been appointed for promoting National Education, and Governor Slade of Vermont is soon to remove to Cincinnati to act as Secretary and General Agent for carrying out the plan. We hope, as Miss B. proposes, that the plan will be kept free from sectarianism; (albeit we discover now and then a little leaning towards it;) and if it is, it ought to and we think will succeed in doing much good, and permanently promoting the great vital interests and future prosperity of our country. LETTER FROM L. D. JOHNSON.

We have just received the following letter from L. D. Johnson exculpating himself from the charge of 'Plagiarism,' for which we arraigned him in last week's Magazine. We have appended a few remarks to his letter in their proper places.

Eulton, September 10.

Dear Sir—I have just received your paper, and am astonished to find myself so cruelly abused therein. The piece which I sent you was enclosed in a half sheet of 'French paper,' with a note, an exact copy of which I have before me, as follows:

Mr. Editor—You will think it strange, perhaps, that so much of my article is selected; but in giving a form to my idea, I found the words of another so much better than I could produce, that I place them there with my own. I hope the fair authoress will pardon my giving them such a doctrinal turn. [1]

Now, Sir, whether the note was lost, or overlooked, or read and forgotten by you, I know not, but I do know I am not guilty of the charge so ingenuously inserted at the head of your article. If I neglected to place the marks of quotation, it was an unpardonable mistake of my own, which the note would remedy in a measure. [2]

Now, Rev. Sir, was it fair and honest to make such charges when you were aware that only a part was not original, [3] and a neglect to give credit for the same might be an unintentional mistake? [4] Was it fair to pour out the whole contents of your wrath and abuse on my humble head before you sought some explanation of the affair? [5] As regards the originality of sixteen of the lines I challenge the world to prove the contrary, notwithstanding you 'believe I stole them.'

You who have been often slandered and misrepresented ought to know how such venomous shafts pierce the heart's core! and ought to hesitate in making such an unwarrantable attack on a reputation dearer than life. I trust you will find the note and give me justice.

Yours in haste, L. D. JOHNSON.

[1] We do not recollect seeing any note of the kind, or whether the sheet on which his article was written was enclosed in an envelope. A letter envelope is a very improper place to write a note of that kind, as it has many chances of being thrown aside without examination.

[2] Yes, a serious mistake and a very uncertain remedy.

[3] It was fair and honest, for we were not aware that only a part was not original—we found after the article was published that a part was not original with L. D. J., and had no means of knowing that any part of the article was composed by him.

[4] It was fair to infer that the neglect to give credit was not an unintentional mistake from the fact that that portion taken from Mrs. Welby's article was not copied verbatim. We will give two or three instances. The two first lines of Mrs. W.'s read thus:

'O, Thou, who fling'st so fair a robe,
Of clouds around the hills untrod—'

L. D. J.'s read thus:

Great God! who flung so fair a robe
Of clouds around yon hills of blue—

Again the 4th and 5th lines. Mrs. W.

Whose peaks sustain thy throne, O God!
All glittering round the sunset skies.

L. D. J.

That deck thy throne of azure hue?
Now glittering round the brow of night.

The reader will find some other alterations by comparing the two articles.

[5] We sought, and found the book containing Mrs. Welby's article before 'pouring out our wrath,' and thought that a sufficient explanation under the circumstances. And we leave our readers to judge whether we could reasonably come to any other conclusion.

We readily accept the statement of L. D. J. and exonerate him from any intention to impose the writings of other authors upon us as his own productions. And at the same time we entirely disavow the disposition to injure his reputation, and should be the last one to do any thing of the kind. We made our remarks because we honestly thought the case and circumstances justified that course. We have made diligent search but can not find the envelope with the note alluded to. PUBLISHER.

THOMPSON'S BANK NOTE REPORTER.

We take pleasure in calling the attention of that portion of our readers to whom such a paper as a counterfeit note detector is useful, to the excellent publication named above. We have received it regularly for some two years past, and a better guide to the detection of bad money we are sure is not published. It is far preferable to Day's. The publisher does not hesitate to expose in the most fearless manner, any and every unstable or doubtful monied institution or issue. It contains much concise and valuable information of a commercial nature—a table of gold and silver coins, both foreign and domestic—stock quotations and wholesale prices current of all kinds of grain and produce. It has lately been improved in size and appearance, and is afforded at $2.00 weekly—$1.00 semi-monthly—50 cents monthly, in advance. Address J. Thompson, 64 Wall street, N. Y.

NEW MEETING-HOUSES.—The frame of a spacious and beautiful new Universalist meeting-house was recently erected in Brunswick, Me. It stands in the heart of that beautiful village, and is to be completed and dedicated as soon as possible.

Br. Wm. Barnsdill, of Titusville, Crawford county, Pa., as we learn by the Star in the West, has succeeded by his own exertions (with a very little assistance from a few others) in erecting a meeting-house in that place. It is not yet completed, but he says it shall be if he has to bear the whole expense himself. He has been a Universalist but a short time; and this is the fruit of his first love. May it never grow cold.

Br. H. GIFFORD.—It is with peculiar pleasure that we learn from the Western Evangelist that this long silent and speechless but excellent brother, again begins to speak. He speaks as yet only in a whisper. "But this is more than he has been able to do for many months. Strong hopes are expressed that he will soon be able to speak with his accustomed and once vigorous voice. God grant it may be so. We would however by all means advise him not to attempt public speaking yet for a long time, even should he feel able, or certainly not until he is confident of a thorough recovery, as it might occasion a relapse of the difficulty and the utter and hopeless loss of his voice.

ANOTHER DISCUSSION.—Br. E. M. Pingree, of Louisville, Ky., who some months since held a long and able debate on Universalism with Rev. Dr. Rice, (Presbyterian,) of Cincinnati, has more recently held another discussion on the subject at Warsaw, Ky., with Rev. John L. Walker, M. A. pastor of the Glen's Creek Baptist church in Woodford county, Ky. His last discussion has been published in a book and is spoken of as an interesting and able work. We have not yet seen it.

OUTRAGE AT HALIFAX, N. S.—A late number of the Trumpet copies from the 'Acadian Recorder, a paper printed at the above place, an account of an outrage which is disgraceful to the age in which we live. The Universalist meeting-house was broken into, a splendid and valuable flute, a Bible, &c., stolen, and other articles not stolen were maliciously injured. If avarice or acquisitiveness prompted the theft, malice alone could have prompted the other damage done. It was by some enemy of Universalism. If he will faithfully read the Bible he took, it will say to him, 'Thou shalt not steal,' and furthermore, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' May he read and profit by these precepts.

Br. John Moore has become associate Editor with Br. Bell of the 'Gospel Fountain' at Lowell. A good accession. Success to the twain.

We intended to have mentioned, if we did not, several weeks since, that the 'Ohio Universalist,' formerly published at Cleveland, Ohio, has been merged in the 'Western Evangelist,' they being 'no more twain, but one' paper. This is a good arrangement; for in union there is strength. Go ahead, brethren, with these unions. Two or three more similar ones are needed at the West. Do you hear, Br. Senior Warden?

The GAVEL for September, is at last received, and is filled with good matter as usual.

The MISCELLANY for September is received. This is a good No. and the third of the current volume. We believe we omitted to notice that the new volume commenced in July. This is a thing that we seldom or never do, and we hope that we may be more careful in future, and that 'better late than never' will not be entirely useless. The Miscellany is one dollar a year in advance, published monthly, by Alfred Mudge, at Boston, Mass. Edited by Revs. O. A. Skinner and Sebastian Streeter.

CORRESPONDENTS must exercise patience. We can not publish the communications of all, either 'on the week' in which they are received, nor with absolute certainty in 'the next week,' when many others have been on hand waiting for many weeks. We will do the best we can, and 'angels could no more.'

Br. J. J. A.—Your letter and remittance came safe to hand.

ONTARIO ASSOCIATION.

Notice is hereby given that the Ontario Association will meet at the Universalist meeting-house in Lima, N. Y., on the second Wednesday and Thursday in October next, agreeably to adjournment. The delegates composing the Council at its session in June last, together with such as may be elected from societies not then represented, we trust will bear in mind the importance of being in attendance at the opening of the Council, at 7 o'clock, on Wednesday morning. A cordial invitation is extended by the North Bloomfield society, to all the brethren and sisters who may wish to enjoy the meeting, and they will find a Universalist welcome during their stay.

C. HAMMOND, Standing Clerk.

CAYUGA ASSOCIATION.

This body will hold its next annual session, in the Universalist church at Kelloggsville, Cayuga county, on the fourth Wednesday and following Thursday in September next (23d and 24th).

The Standing Clerk of this Association has been making efforts during the last three years, to prepare a correct statistical account, of the number, strength and condition, of all the Universalist societies within the four counties composing the Association. He desires to see this work carried on and completed, and for this purpose he calls upon all the societies within its bounds, to send by their delegates a written statement of the number of members belonging to each, (after deducting those who have died or moved away,) the number of pupils in their Sunday school, (if they have one in operation,) the proportion of time that preaching is supported, average size of the Sabbath congregations, and the general prospects of the cause in the vicinity.

Those who wish to enjoy a rich Gospel feast, will be in a fair way of realizing the fruition of their hopes, by attending the approaching session of the Cayuga Association at Kelloggsville. Persons from a distance will do well to drive directly to the church, on their arrival, where they will doubtless find our good Br. J. M. Peebles and a Committee of his society in waiting, to direct them to places of entertainment. H. L. HAYWARD, S. Clerk.

Fort Plain, Aug. 23d, 1846.

MISSIONARY MEETING.

The first annual meeting of the 'Missionary Society of the Cayuga Association of Universalists,' will be held at Kelloggsville, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in September. It is expected that all the Trustees of this Society, who feel an interest in the advancement of Gospel truth in our land, will be present and prepared to give such information as will result in a more perfect organization of this body. Does any one inquire, why we have not fully organized? We answer, because the Officers and Trustees, have so many of them staid away from previous meetings, that we have been unable to form a quorum for action.

Now, brother Officers of the Board, and Trustees of the Society; just think of this answer, and come up and assist us at this meeting, and great will be your reward.

FORTY SECOND PSALM.

As the hart panteth after the water brooks,
So panteth my soul for thee,—
For thee, O God, the living God—
When shall I thy glory see?

My tears have been my meat by day,
And at night my bitter food;
While the wicked continually say to me,
'Where now is thy comfort and God?'

When I remember their scornful words,
I pour out my spirit in me;
For I had gone with the multitude
That chanted sweet hymns to thee.

I went with them to the house of God,
With the voice of joy and praise,—
With the people that kept glad holy-day,
Singing their sweetest lays.

O why art thou cast down, my soul?
Hope thou in God from hence;
For I shall yet praise him with delight,
For the help of his countenance.

My soul is sad: I'll remember thee
Therefore from Mizar's heights,—
From the land of Jordan, and from the hills
Of the ancient Hermonites.

At the rushing of thy water-spouts,
Deep calleth unto deep;
Thy billows are all gone over me,
My soul in sorrow doth weep.

Yet, in the day time, will the Lord
His loving-kindness send;
And, in the night, my song and my prayer
To the God of my life shall ascend.

I will say unto God who is my rock,
'Why hast thou forgotten me?
Why go I mourning and oppressed,
Because of the enemy?'

As with a sword within my bones,
By my foes I am sorely withstood,
While they say unto me reproachingly
And daily, 'Where is thy God?'

Why art thou cast down, O my soul?
Hope thou in the Lord from hence,
For I shall yet praise him who's my God
And the health of my countenance.

REFLECTIONS.

Man's stay upon the earth is short,
Then why not be all love and kindness here;
Our friends are spared us but a little while,
Then die and leave us, like the fleeting year.

Reader, is there not much truth contained in the above simple lines? There is, indeed—yet few seem to realize it. Where love and kindness should exist, there we find envy and hatred; where peace and harmony should dwell, we see strife and discord. Many indulge themselves in the use of careless, harsh expressions, and unkind looks, towards those who happen to disagree with them in some of their opinions. It may pass unheeded at the time; but there are left unfavorable impressions not soon to be effaced from the memory. There are those who look on all but a few chosen ones with indifference and contempt,—their hearts grow cold and estranged, and they meet as strangers.—Why not bestow on each one a kind smile and a friendly glance? Why let the cares of the world so harden the heart as to be indifferent to the welfare of our fellow men? We are to tarry but a short time here; 'this life is but a pleasant visit to earth.' Let us not be so engrossed with the pleasures and vanities of this world as to be regardless of that which is to come. All are seeking for happiness—some imagine it is to be found in the gay circles of fashion—others in honor and fame. Happiness derived from these will soon fade; but there is a pleasure in the contemplation of God's goodness, and in the enjoyment of the blessings bestowed upon us, by the benevolent hand of our heavenly Father. Religion, pure, holy religion, is alone capable of affording us real enjoyment; its light will never wane—its brilliancy sheds a lustre on every thing around it; not like the pleasures of earth, will it vanish and leave us; but it will remain—to comfort us in the hour of affliction—and to whisper a sweet consolation in the hope of heaven. Gentle reader, may the happiness which may be derived from religion be thine on-earth, and the joy and bliss of heaven, thine hereafter:

MAINE TEMPERANCE LAW.

Really, we begin to feel proud of Maine as setting some examples in fearless legislation, on the side of Humanity and Good Order, which, it is to be hoped, other States will be induced to follow. She was the first, virtually, to abolish Capital Punishment; the first to forbid her Judges proscribing Universalists as incompetent witnesses in Court; the first to abolish Military Musters and Trainings—those schools of folly and bad association. This season she has passed a law to protect families from the deceptions of foreign peddlers—allowing no one to peddle who has not been in the country five years, and not even then without being licensed and paying a high price for his license, and being confined in his travels to the County in which he resides and is known. She has also passed a law making it punishable for any person to sell quack medicines and nostrums, without having the ingredients and the proportions used in the composition printed and pasted on the bottle or package—so that the purchaser may know just what he is buying, and whether it is safe and worth the price or not. This is a new, but an excellent law against deception.

She has also passed a law in aid of Temperance, more fundamental than any other State has yet dared to enact. This goes to the root of the evil—even to the money motive, which is 'the root of all evil.' How it will operate, we cannot yet say, but hope it will work well. At any rate, the Legislature is entitled to credit for its high Temperance notions—a circumstance highly favorable to the moral notions of the State which the Legislature is supposed to represent.

A correspondent of the Christian Mirror, writing from Augusta, gives the following account of the Law, in which all the people are interested:

Before the Legislature assembled, Judge Redington who has had ample opportunity of seeing the many defects of the old law had drafted a bill which is the basis of the new law. Its main features are these:

1. No domestic liquors of an intoxicating nature shall be sold directly or indirectly at wholesale or retail, except for medicinal and mechanical purposes. Foreign liquors to be sold only in such quantities as U. S. laws admit, and then the seller must prove the fact of importation which makes no easy matter. 2. The officers of the several towns may license from one to three persons under bonds of $500 each for one year to sell as above specified. All others who sell are fined from one to twenty dollars for first offence, from $5 to $20 for 2d, with a bond of $50 to abate the nuisance for six months, and forfeiting all money received for liquor thus sold.

3. Penalty recoverable on complaint before Justice of the peace, action brought in name of complainant or town, the half of penalty accruing to prosecutor, other half to town, complainant is a witness in the case, and if two of licensing board endorsed the writ, defendant recovers no costs. If defendant appeals, he gives a bond of fifty dollars obligating him to pay all costs, &c. recovered against him. 4. All property received for liquors not sold, is recoverable, any time within six years after reception, by guardian, executor, administrator, purchaser or creditor, and is applied by first three to relieve family or relations of purchaser—by creditor to payment of his own debt and costs. Seller forfeits not more than $100 over his receipts.

The reader will observe from the above abstract, that 'the axe is laid at the root,' of this evil as of all other evils, namely 'love of money.' It now devolves upon sober citizens to wield the axe vigorously, and should it need a keener edge or new setting the Legislature will again doubtless lend their aid. This bill is decidedly in advance of all previous legislation on the subject, either in this State, or it is thought, in any other State, and enables Maine to say to her sister States, 'DIRIGO' is the contest.

It is well known that Maine led in the reformation of the militia system—abolishing trainings and musters, those delectable schools of vice, and although sundry attempts have been made to revive them, they have proved wretchedly abortive, as instanced the present session, when a bill—emanating from some major-generals whose titles are growing rusty—which was introduced, quartering a little squad of 5000 volunteers upon the treasury received but two votes in the House. This looks charmingly pacific, and shows that Maine has 'put away some of her childish things' and 'holds fast to that which is good.'—[Banner.]

[Original.] THE BIBLE CLASS.

Searching the Scriptures, each one for himself, is a most noble work. The Bible furnishes a fund of instruction, which can be drawn from no other source. Works of science and art are profitable, for the sparkling and piercing intellect; but this is the book for the heart, freighted with Heaven's own love. The truths and duties of the Bible will live forever. The skeptic may assault it, with the malice of the mightiest human arm; yet his effort is nothing more than the nibbling of the worm upon the foundation rock of the universe. God is its author; and it shall live while God endures, or man shall need its aid.

The work of searching the Scriptures in concert, is that which the Bible Class contemplates. Our Bible Class interest is as yet feeble; because, as I apprehend, its worth is not fully known. A good degree of interest pervades it, considering that its life is but just begun. And I have a question to ask you soon reader, which we wish to have answered in a practical way. Before asking that question, let us look, briefly, at some of the benefits of a concerted study of the Bible.

First, we wish to know what the Bible teaches. Our aim should be, not to search out passages in the Bible to prove a particular doctrine, but to see what doctrines the Bible teaches; and then, if we accept the Bible, we will of course believe these doctrines—and believe them because we found them there, and no where else. Now, is it not clear, that if several minds study the same passage, with reference to the rule that the Bible should be its own interpreter, and then each present his own view, with the reasons therefor, that all will be likely to come at the safest conclusion concerning it, and that the labor of study will be lightened by the social features of the plan. Such is the view I entertain; and the Bible Class plan seems well adapted to secure this highly important end.

Second, we wish to be able to give a reason for the faith we profess. We ought not to study the Bible for the sole purpose of defending our views; but we should study it that we may get correct views, for our own especial satisfaction and benefit. Still, we are frequently asked to give our reasons for our belief; and not unfrequently might we secure converts to the truth, if only we are prepared to present our proofs in a clear and forcible manner. Thus, the Bible Class may serve to prepare us all, as teachers of the word of God.

Third, we ought not only to know, and to promulgate the truths and duties of the Bible, but we should also be prepared to live, in accordance with them. This is one of the highest objects of Christian instruction; for what avails it, to know of the truths and duties of revelation, if our hearts are not made better by mutual confidence in them? The more we make use of the means of improvement, the faster will be our progress in the Christian life. And the Bible Class gives a blessed influence, like that of which we speak.

Fourth, the office of monitor is attended with peculiar benefits, by passing around the class, in that it renders available the knowledge of the whole class. Many people think they know a great deal, and really do, if they could only tell what it is; but there seems to be the trouble—they can not find their knowledge when wanted. Now, this inability to communicate, is for the want of proper mental discipline. Such people may read much, and think soundly; but they have never been in the habit of imparting their knowledge to others; and of course, they find it difficult to do so when they would. This difficulty is removed in a great measure, by the practice which the office of monitor gives us. The habit of communication there gained, may be applied to any other department of life. And my firmest conviction is, that the Bible Class furnishes one of the best fields of inquiry and improvement in the whole range of human life.

And now for that question, which we ask in all seriousness and candor. Will you not come forward and join us in the great work of searching the Scriptures? Our appeal is to all—to young men and maidens—to the middle aged and aged—to those who think with us, and those who do not. Oh, come to the fountain of living waters, and drink and live forever! Let the example of the ancient Bereans be before you, who searched the Scriptures 'daily,' for the richness contained therein! Can you not devote a pittance of your time each week to this work? How can you answer the deep questionings of your own soul, if you go not to the great Teacher himself for instruction? Oh, neglect it not! If there be any thing more sacred than time and sense can afford—any thing superior to the wealth, or fame, or follies of earth—any thing holy as God, and truth, and duty, and destiny—oh, neglect it not! Search for it with the nobleness and fidelity of the true follower of Christ! And when you have found it, as you surely will, treasured up in the Book of God, believe it, and love it, and live it forever.

BR. PERRY AND THE CHRISTIANS.

Nicholville, August 30, 1846.

BR. SKINNER—In the last Magazine, I saw an article with reference to my remarks concerning Br. Perry. As that article was copied from the Christian Palladium, and was first noticed by yourself, I have only to return you my thanks, for having saved me from the labor of a reply.

I am aware that you have successfully exploded the unchristian remarks of the Christian Mr. Ross. But you will permit me to make a few more remarks with reference to Br. Perry and the Christian denomination.

And first, with reference to Br. Perry. He formerly resided in this county, and as I am informed, he received a share of his education at the St. Lawrence Academy. He was one of the most promising young men that attended that school.—His acquaintance is extensive in this county, and he is much respected by all who know him. And with reference to his standing in the Christian denomination, if he was a "nominal" Christian, (as Mr. Ross would have it,) what shall we say of the rest of that denomination? I do not mean to speak disrespectfully of our Christian brethren. But from the words of their own mouths let us judge them. I have a brother who is unfortunately a minister of the Christian order. I have often heard him speak of Br. Perry, as one of their smartest and best men; which is as much as to say, he was one of the most substantial pillars, in the whole Christian denomination. And since Br. Perry's conversion, I have heard some of the members of that denomination say, that they did not know what they should do without him. And with regard to Br. Perry's combativeness, it is true, that he fought nearly all the battles for the Christian denomination. But from what we have seen and heard of others, it was generally believed in this vicinity; that he was the only man among them competent for the task. One of the most substantial pillars. But Mr. Ross says, "We will wait a little before we become too much alarmed at the fall of this supposed most substantial pillar, and see how the building stands without it." As many of the most numerous societies, in this region, belonging to the Christian order, have become extinct, and their Conference, formerly held in this vicinity, had dwindled down to almost nothing, even before Br. Perry left them, we conclude that the "old building," reeling on the few slender props that still support it, having the most substantial pillar removed, must soon fall to the ground, and fall to rise no more. Again, with reference to Br. Perry's "self-esteem," of which Mr. Ross speaks, we would remark, that it really appears, that Br. Perry had "self-esteem" enough to think too much of himself, to remain in the Christian denomination. He also, had too much conscientiousness to continue slandering the character of our heavenly Father, by proclaiming to the world that he was the author of endless damnation. Hence, we remark again, if he continues in the faith, he is just such a man as we want. Mr. Ross dwells at great length upon Br. Perry's "fall." If it is falling to renounce the doctrine of endless misery, and embrace the truth, it is only falling from the modern tower of Babel, or the walls of spiritual Babylon; into the golden streets of the New Jerusalem; and God grant that all partialists may fall in like manner. TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS.

Errors of the press being not easily avoidable, an author should bear with them as patiently as he can. He should also consider that a good deal of originality, if not in ideas, at least in modes of expression, is frequently let off by typographical blunders. If therefore they do not make the sense materially different from what he intended, or if the nonsense produced be not of such a grade as that it will be likely to be attributed to him instead of the printer, an author would better be silent respecting them, especially if writing for a periodical, inasmuch as in such case, the correction is somewhat similar to evidence of a man's innocence after he is legally hanged.

A word to readers also. If in reading a piece, you discover any very unusual collocation of words, producing strange sense, if not nonsense, or any perfectly original mode of spelling words, or the like, do not always give the author the whole credit therefor. Part may belong to the printer. The author indeed may write a bad hand, so that something more than mere manual dexterity may be required in order to set up his piece correctly. Or he may write a very plain hand, just the thing for the boys in their first attempts to set up manuscript. But in either case he may not have intended all the unusualities that may appear in his piece.—Credit to whom credit is due, as the printers say in another case.

I am led to these remarks by the occurrence of certain typographical errors in an article from my pen, in number 32, current volume, page 250.—Thus in the first column, about midway of it, I am made to say, that by means of a magnet "a piece of iron, with no solid substance under it, may not only fall, but it may even rise to meet the magnet." It should read, "may not only not fall, but it may even rise," etc.

So in the middle column, about one third of the way from the top, a whole line of manuscript, as I judge, is left out, not only reversing what little sense is left to the sentence, and producing a direct contradiction, but also nonsensifying the whole most effectually, yet affording nothing for the sense of the ludicrous to laugh at. Thus I am made to say, that "children must necessarily form and possess exactly the same kind and measure of characters as their progenitors," a statement manifestly untrue; and I am then made to attempt proving this by a statement manifestly true, and just as manifestly adverse to the first; namely, "for their tendencies may be restrained, directed, and in a great measure, controlled by education," etc. The whole sentence should read as follows, omitting the brackets used to designate the omitted words: "So also, if the progenitors of a family of children are imbecile, or covetous, or dishonest, or intellectual, or benevolent, or conscientious, the children [manifest the same tendencies. Not that children] must necessarily form and possess exactly the same kind and measure of characters as their progenitors, for their tendencies may be restrained, directed, and in a great measure controlled, by education and other extraneous influences, acting upon, and calling into action, the faculties, and feelings, and sentiments, of the individuals themselves."

And now, reader of this article, will you please read the other, some time, in the light of these emendations? If so, please observe also, what I should by no means have written an article about, that in the title of the piece and elsewhere, "conceptions" should be "conception;" in the middle of the second paragraph, line after that in which "higher law" is mentioned, "higher body" should be "heavy body;" in the middle column, for "yet doubtless the subject is not yet perfectly understood," read "yea, doubtless," etc.; and in the last column, instead of "either the miracle or that," read "either this miracle or that." WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS.

Sharon, Schoharie county, Sept. 5, 1846.

TO MY BELOVED CHARGE IN ST. LAWRENCE COUNTY.—Having by your kindness had my request granted, for leave of absence for a specified time, so that I might enjoy a respite from my arduous labors, and visit relatives and friends afar off; I have at length arrived, at these justly celebrated waters, where I am spending a little time to the benefit of my health. Although the season is drawing to a close, yet I still find many visitors here. This is truly a delightful place; and I wonder not when they tell me that several thousands have visited it this season. I know of no place where so much of what we ardently desire—health and happiness, is to be found. A single day, nay, a few hours only, passed at the White Sulphur Springs, refreshing and invigorating the physical system, and imparting cheerfulness and buoyancy to the spirits, is a luxury upon which no adequate value can be placed. It is soberly believed by many, that these waters are the "Matchless Sanative" for almost any and every disease that "human flesh is heir to." Their medicinal properties have attracted the attention of the best science, and are indeed wonderful. And the cures which they effect, at least many of them, border nearly on the miraculous. The pool at Siloam, of which we read in the New Testament, probably effected no more desirable cures than are witnessed here.

I find on the table upon which I write, an analysis of these waters by Dr. J. R. Chilton, as follows:

One gallon contains,
Sulphate of Magnesia,	grains,	42.40
Sulphate of lime,	"	111.62
Chloride of Magnesium,	"	2.40
Chloride of Sodium,	"	2.24
Hydro-Sulphuret of Sodium and
Hydro-Sulphuret of Calcium,	"	2.28

Solid contents, 160.94
Sulphuretted Hydrogen Gas, inches, 16.

There is also another spring here, called Magnesia Spring, the analysis of which I have not time to give, but which I find in a treatise by Dr. Salisbury, of Avon Springs, Livingston county, which also lies before me.

It is a most wise and beneficent arrangement of a kind Providence—a most propitious circumstance to the multitude of invalids, that carbonic acid, saline springs, and sulphur springs, are found in their highest excellence within an hundred and fifty, and even less, miles of each other, and in the centre of the Empire State. The white sulphur water is used more exclusively for baths; and if its regenerating effects on the inner man is as great as it generally is on the outer man, its worth is inestimable. Upon the mode of using it in bathing, I find abundant instructions among residents and visitors.

The Hotels here I should judge were all kept in the best style, especially the Pavilion. This is an immense establishment, and is under the charge of Messrs. Landon and Gardner, from the city of Albany. It is located upon elevated ground, a short but pleasant walk from the Springs, and will accommodate nearly 300 visitors. The walks around it are beautiful, and the equestrian grounds ample and splendid. The prospect on the North and East is vast and rich—the lover of the rural and romantic, may here regale his soul, and admire and adore, till he finds himself an inhabitant, imaginary though it may be, of a purer and happier region.

You will remember that I left home Wednesday morn, August 26th. My ride to Eatonville, Herkimer county, was not very agreeable, for the weather was warm to oppression and the roads filled with dust. A very great want of rain was perceptible the entire route, especially so in Lewis county. A landlord near West Martinsburgh told me it had not rained sufficiently in that vicinity for seven weeks past, to wet the soil for two inches. A great drought indeed! and quite a subject for reflection perhaps for ultra temperance folks—who forget that volition is the sine qua non of virtue; and who maintain there is morality in machines.

My meeting at Eatonville was large, and I was much pleased to meet my old and tried friends there. The sojourn at this place I shall ever remember with the warmest Christian love; for in the infancy of my professional life did they receive me into their embrace, and encourage me in the work of the Lord. They have ever been kind to me, and for their tangible favor of last Sabbath, I render them my unfeigned gratitude.

I preach in the Universalist church in this place to-morrow. Having quite a number of relatives and old acquaintances in the vicinity, and the society not having enjoyed the preached word of late, a goodly attendance is expected. Our friends in this section have a fine house of worship, but no minister; arrangements however I believe are being made to have a missionary pass through here occasionally. I hope this may at once occur; for Sharon, instead of blossoming as a rose, is yet quite a wilderness, religiously speaking. The people, very many of them, are sour and bigoted; and they seem determined not to come to Christ, that they may have life and light.

The U. S. Convention of Universalists meets in Troy, week after next—a great and happy brotherhood will gather there. Expecting to be one of the number, and intending to address you, or some of you from thence, I bid you adieu for the present.

Affectionately your humble servant,

W. H. WAGGONER.

GOD OUR FATHER.

Of all the relationships sustained by God to the children of humanity, I know of none better calculated to win the heart, fill it with love, and elevate it to God, than the consideration that he has permitted them to call him Father—to call upon him as our Father—to come to him as we would to an earthly parent, when in trouble or distress, with the full assurance that he will listen to our complaints—that whenever we ask of him, he will not turn us away empty, being more willing to give good gifts unto men than earthly parents are to their children. 'God is love.' This is his very name and nature. He is the great fountain of love, from which emanates every principle of love that is to be found in the universe. The feeling of love that arises in the bosom of man, for his fellow man, is but a manifestation that God is there. Love is natural to man. As he was created in the image of God, so are love and goodness his nature. Hatred, anger, and the other evil passions are all foreign to his nature; and were they not cultivated by his education, and by every thing that surrounds him, they would soon perish like exotics left unattended in the open air. The evil passions may indeed for a while, seem to smother and entirely destroy every principle of goodness in the human heart. Yet, though they may slumber deep in the heart, they still exist; and there are hours when they are awakened and assert for a while their influence over the evil that has so long reigned. Though he may be so far sunk in sin as to deny even the existence of a God, yet, should the appeal be made in those moments, and be made too, in the right spirit, he might be reclaimed and brought back to the paths of innocence.—But this appeal is too often wrongly made. Instead of telling him that God is his Father, that his love for him is unbounded—exceeding all love that can be felt or known by man, that he designed but to bless and to make him happy, he is told that God is angry with him, ready to plunge him into the pit of wo, where tortures unendurable and indescribable await him. That his anger is enkindled against him to such a degree, that eternity itself shall be too short for its full manifestation. 'Man,' (says the Rev. Mr. Gorie, Methodist,) 'before he can become a child of God, must learn that he is a child of the devil—before he can love God with his full heart, he must be taught that, was God strict in justice, he would, long ere this, have consigned him to interminable wo.' 'It will not do,' (says the same writer,) 'to tell him of the matchless love of Jesus.' That love which alone can awaken feelings of sympathy in the human heart, and fill it with love to God and man. A sympathy with that meek, that forgiving spirit, which actuated the dying Nazarene, causing him to pray for his murderers, 'Father forgive them, for they know not what they do.' In my opinion, it is this, and this alone, that should be preached to the sinner, with any expectation of awakening any feelings in his bosom save those of disgust; for the object we are called upon to love must possess some principles that are lovely, or we can not love it. This the Partialist's triune God does not possess. Was the character given to him, that of a human being, we should feel called upon by every principle of justice and goodness, to abhor it with a perfect abhorrence. It may through fear restrain some; but it is the love and the goodness of God that will cause them to exclaim, with true feeling, in the language of Paul to the Romans, 'O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God, how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out.'

HAPPINESS.

'In vain we seek a heaven below the sky;
The world has false but flattering charms,
Its distant joys show big in our esteem;
But less still as they draw near the eye:
In our embrace the visions die,
And when we grasp the airy forms,
We lose the pleasing dream.'

How true it is, that our benign Creator has wisely implanted in the bosom of all humanity a desire for happiness. Men, however, differ vastly in their views of the constituents of this good, as well as in relation to the most efficient mode of obtaining it. In the opinion of the military chieftain, military renown constitutes the summum bonum; and to acquire it, he readily encounters the most formidable difficulties, and jeopardizes even life itself in the field of mortal strife. The miser regards gold and silver as the only idols worthy of his devoutest homage, and therefore labors with unwearied diligence to fill his coffers with his glittering gods. The politician contemplates 'an office of honor and profit' as the object of permanent solicitude, and makes all his movements and efforts subservient to its attainment. The statesman anticipates popular applause and pre-eminent distinction as the panacea for all his ills, and leaves no exertions unemployed to reach his goal. The philosopher, astonished that any one should dissent from his convictions, surveys the progressive development of intellect, and the gradual accumulation of varied knowledge, as the ne plus ultra of human enjoyment, and cheerfully trims the midnight lamp in the patient prosecution of literary and scientific research. We might yet farther advert to the artist, the antiquary, the votary of foreign travels, and various others, and exhibit them all as entertaining a contrariety of ideas of what constitutes happiness, and therefore striking out diverging paths in pursuit of the same object. But we pass them by, to introduce for a moment the gay, the fashionable, and romance-loving young lady. She is too prone, in framing her sentiments on this subject, to extend them beyond the sober limits of real life, and building up a fanciful theory, to anticipate its realization in the clouds, or among the stars, or among green meads and flowery vales, verdant landscapes and purling streams, crystal fountains and craggy rocks, all rendered vocal by the mellifluous strains of the 'minstrels of nature,' with ambitious Philomela, eclipsing all her winged compeers. Or, if my fair lady descend to the common place objects of this too material, this gross world, a magnificent domicile, gorgeously furnished, a splendid phaeton or chariot, drawn by proud and champing steeds, richly caparisoned, an elegant and courtly husband, offering incense only at the shrine of her own angelic charms, a routine of display of her person and graceful and stately gait in the drawing room, or at the banqueting house, or the most fashionably frequented watering places, and a few other similar trifles, constitute in her estimation, the highest earthly felicity; and are coveted with a fervor such as ardent and enthusiastic woman alone can feel. From all these conflicting views we are forced to differ. Experience and observation, gathered from reading and reflection, from travels at home and abroad, from unrestrained commingling in the ranks of the elevated as well as in the walks of the most lowly society, as also, and more especially, obtained from still more exalted and unerring sources, have sometime since convinced me that religion is the best occupation that mankind can be engaged in here below; that 'her ways,' and her's alone, 'are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.'

'Tis this, my friend, that makes our morning bright,
'Tis this that gilds the horrors of the night,
When wealth forsakes us, and when friends are few,
When friends are faithless, and when foes pursue;
'Tis this that wards the blow, or stills the smart,
Disarms affliction, or repels the dart;
Within the breast bids purest rapture rise,
Bids smiling conscience spread her cloudless skies.'

THE DISCIPLES—UNBELIEVERS.

'He that believeth not, shall be damned.' ST. MARK, xvi: 16.

The above text, with its connexion is often quoted to prove that a portion of mankind will be miserable in the future state. Now let us inquire in the first place, what subject the writer was speaking of in this chapter?

He was speaking of the resurrection of Christ. But it may be asked who believed in his resurrection? Did the disciples? No. They were all unbelievers. What! the disciples unbelievers? Yes. Then they will be damned. Well, they were condemned, for they left their Lord and Master in the most trying hour of his life.

Whom did the Saviour address, when he said, 'Go ye into all the world' etc. They were his immediate disciples—they were the eleven unbelieving disciples who sat at meat with him. When the two Mary's and Salome went to see Jesus, that they might anoint his body, they found that he was gone. It was not there.

But they were told to go and tell his disciples and Peter that he had gone into Galilee, and that there they should see him. 'And they went out quickly,' etc. Now when he appeared, it was first to Mary Magdalene. She then went and told them that had been with him. And they, when they had heard that he was alive and had been seen of her, believed not.

Now after this, he appeared in another form unto two of them! 'And they went and told it unto the residue.' 'Neither believed they them.'

'Afterward he appeared unto the eleven, as they sat at meat, and upbraided them with (or in) their unbelief, and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen.'

Here then, we learn that the disciples were hard hearted and unbelieving. Jesus then, in his kind and affectionate manner, said unto his disciples, whom he had instructed while in the flesh, 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature.' Preach Jesus and the resurrection—preach Christ and him crucified—tell the whole world that he is alive—that he is the resurrection and the life.

'He that believeth' (this truth,) 'and is baptized,' (with the holy spirit) 'shall be saved;' (saved from the fate of a Judas—saved from the approaching calamity—saved from doubt and unbelief, and their evil effects. 'But he that believeth not, (that Christ is risen from the dead,) 'shall be damned.' He shall be condemned, as Judas was when he sold me, and Peter when he denied me. 'And these signs shall follow them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues,' etc.

This language then, was addressed to the disciples, they believed on him, and went forth without fear, and preached a crucified and risen Saviour. They, and they only were able to do the signs that he told them would follow their believing. If we wish to know what the Gospel is, we have only to learn 'what is truth?' See Rom. viii: 16–23. Acts iii: 19–26. Eph. i: 9, 10. Rev. v: 12–14. Phil. ii: 9–11. Col. i: 19–21. Yea, the Gospel is the good news of the salvation of all that were and are lost. It is the truth, that 'As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.'—Believe, and be saved—'For we which believe, do enter into rest.' Amen. N. C. H.

THE HOPES OF CHILDHOOD.—Childhood looks forward to coming years, with high anticipations. It pictures before itself scenes of felicity and of honor, which it dreams shall be the portion of its riper age. Also, how many of these expectations are blasted!

First, perhaps, comes the scythe of death, and mows down trusted and loving friends. Then come in to fill their place, strangers, who knew them not, and care not for their little ones. Poverty, perhaps, lays its cold hand upon half their hopes, and blasts them even in the bud. Their own follies usually are their great destroyers. For all, if they would be wise, might lead happy and peaceful lives.

Childhood needs counsel. Its instructions should be imparted, too, in such a manner that they will be heeded. Childhood knows not how to claim the heights of life alone. If its young hopes would be realized, they must be instructed and guarded by age and experience.

Happy, then, are those children, who have always proper guides. And woful the condition of such as are compelled to grow up untaught.

Hence we see some of the claims of the orphan. Shall he perish for want of a protector and teacher? Shall the child of vicious parents be left to grow up uncared for by the good and virtuous? Shall not chill poverty be warded off from the young heart of the cheerful little one? In short, shall not childhood universally, be so cherished, protected, and nourished, that its innocent young hopes, which spring up as by inspiration in the infant bosom, and bear their proper fruit?

A GENUINE PHILANTHROPIST.—The Island of Rona is a small and very rocky spot of land, lying between the isle of Sky and the mainland of Applecross, and is well known to mariners for the rugged and dangerous nature of its coast. There is a famous place of refuge at its north-western extremity, called the 'Muckel Harbor,' of very difficult access, however, which, strange to say, is easier entered at night than during the day. At the extremity of this hyperborean solitude is the residence of a poor old widow, whose lonely cottage is called 'the lighthouse,' from the fact that she uniformly keeps a light burning in her little window at night. By keeping this light and the entrance of the harbor open, a strange vessel may enter with the greatest safety. During the silent watches of the night the widow may be seen, like Nornato the Fitful Head, trimming her little lamp with oil, fearful that some frail bark may perish through her neglect; and for this she receives no manner of remuneration—it is pure and unmingled philanthropy. The poor woman's kindness does not rest even here, for she is unhappy until the benumbed and shivering mariner comes ashore to share her little board, and recruit himself at her glowing and cheerful fire, and she can seldom be prevailed upon to accept of any reward. She has saved more lives than Day's belt, and thousands of pounds to the underwriters. This poor creature, in her younger days, witnessed her husband struggling with the waves, and swallowed up by the remorseless billows—

'In sight of home and friends that longed to save.'

This circumstance seems to have prompted her present devoted and solitary life, in which her enjoyment is doing good.—Inverness Courier.

There is no contending with the orders and decrees of Providence. He that made us, knows what is fitted for us; and every man's own lot (well understood and managed) is undoubtedly the best.

THE EARLY DEFENDERS OF UNIVERSALISM IN AMERICA.

BY REV. E. W. REYNOLDS.

Bold men they were, who knew no fear
When braving Persecution's shock;
Their faith called not for sword or spear,
For it was grounded in the Rock.
Their hoary faces, furrowed o'er
By Time's relentless plough-share, still
A calm and trusting surface wore,
As though they never strove with ill!

I see them, strong in spirit, staid,
Unawed by Hate's malicious frown,
Upon the shore of pilgrim-land,
And bear their proud oppressor's down!
Two angel-spirits, Truth and Right,
Obedient to a holy nod,
Clothed with the panoply of might
These servants of their Master, God!

The storm of Bigotry arose;
Old Superstition's trumpet blew;
But from the fury of their foes
God saved these dauntless men and few.
Like mighty rocks that oceans lave,
When strive together sea and sky,
So did these fearless champions brave
Pride's stormy billows, rolling high.

Unyielding as the mountain brow,
When tempests stern around it roar,
These men of God made foemen bow.
That ne'er an equal knew before!
Great was the wrath the Bigot felt
When his black flag, deserted, fell;
And the lone cell, where fear oft knelt,
But echoed back his dying knell!

As patriot fathers drew the steel,
And vowed the tyrant's chain to part;
As Freedom's sons made Britain feel
The fire that glow'd in freemen's heart,
So these took up the word of God—
All-powerful in its native might;
Hurled from his grasp the Bigot's rod,
And on the mind poured Heav'n's pure light.

In vain Reproach went forth and spread
Her blood-red banner on the gale;
In vain went by with haughty tread,
The miscreant worshipper of Baal!
What cared those champions of Right
For curling lip and scornful mien?
Enough that they might nobly fight
The battles of the Great Unseen.

Enough that God's approving voice
Might whisper to their souls anon,
And bid them, mid the strife, rejoice
That his own spirit led them on:
Enough that they might here endure
The Saviour's light and peaceful yoke—
Enough that spirits just and pure,
In heaven for them a plaudit spoke!

Hail, servants of the living God!
Ye who have gone to your long rest,
Pure be the pathway ye have trod,
Tranquil your pleasures mid the blest.
And ye who still abide in time,
Like sunbeams on the dying day,
Sweet be the song in angel-clime,
That bids you come from earth away.

THE DYING CHRISTIAN.

It has been my lot to see many die. I have followed six sisters, two grand parents and a father down to the grave, beside whose dying beds I stood, and witnessed the last struggles of life. I have buried four of my own children,—cut down in the morning of life, and prompted by that love, which parents only know, I fanned their brows to the verge of life, and kissed them in the arms of death.

I have wept as a brother—I have mourned as a son—

I have grieved as a father. In early youth sorrow was my companion—in middle age I have been acquainted with grief.

I have seen the aged die,—and like a shock of corn when fully ripe, death gathered them into his garner.

I have seen the middle aged in the vigor of life, pass away to the land of shadows.

I have seen the youth cut down like a blooming flower with all its beauty and fragrance upon it.

I have seen the infant droop and die in the arms of its mother. Maternal affection was strong around it, but death, relentless in his grasp, bore away his victim.

I have seen the disbeliever struggle with the fell destroyer, and with a trembling heart turn back from the valley of shadows.

I have seen the despairing die. His sun went down in dark clouds of gloom. I have seen, too, the believer patiently await for the summons, to call him home to his Father.

I have been no stranger to the scenes of Death. I have mourned over my own kindred, and have stood up with those that mourned, to comfort them.

In the ordinary scenes of affliction have I mingled, and over the ashes of the suicide have I stood.

Dim years have left their furrows upon my brow, and as memory recalls the scenes of departed time, 'My heart grows sad, to weeping.'

Yet amid the scenes of affliction and death, there are some hallowed spots around which memory delights to linger. Let me dwell upon them with a brother's affection—let me describe them with a truthful pen. Dates I can not give—names I must withhold.

In the Fall of '44, I was summoned to the dying couch of Charles S——. He lived with a friend in the town of Avon. Some 22 years had he been blessed with life, which was now fast ebbing away. I had known him for a few years only. He had been a member of the Methodist church, but he outgrew his creed. He came to my meetings. His faith laid hold of the promises of God in their fulness. Clearly before his mental vision was the 'restitution of all things' revealed, and he 'rejoiced in the hope set before him.' He had been ailing for years, and for months had been quite feeble. A mutual friend went with me on this sad visit. We entered his room, and he bade us welcome with a smile. But how great the change of a few weeks! There was indeed the same beaming eye—the same placid brow—the same mild, clear voice—the same fervent grasp of the hand; but all else, alas! how changed! His attenuated form, seemed a lingering shadow on the shores of Time.

His blood, in feeble tide, still kept in motion—his lungs struggled for their accustomed freedom, but the fire of life was slowly going out—its fuel was consumed—a few embers only threw up their glimmering light. His race was run—the goal was reached, and he lingered upon it, conscious that 'life's poor play was over.'

Yet his voice was distinct—his mind calm, and his hope indeed like an anchor, sure and steadfast. Not a cloud dimmed his faith. He spoke of his situation, and rejoiced that the time of his deliverance drew nigh. Death had no terrors—the grave no gloom. The Saviour had thrown a heavenly radiance over them, and he longed to go to him, and be at rest. His Father's countenance beamed upon him, and a Saviour's love warmed his heart. I conversed with him—prayed with him while his friends wept aloud. His gaze was heavenward, while he spoke of his resignation, and the bright joys that awaited him. 'I see my Father smile—my Saviour invites me to come. I go to his embrace. We part for a little time only, to meet again where death is unknown, and parting can never come.' I bade him farewell, invoking God's blessing upon him. * * * * *

His funeral was appointed on Thanksgiving day. Many were the youth assembled, and I stood up in their midst—to point the way to truth—to duty—and to heaven.

Two females alone occupied the mourner's seat—the one a sister, the other the affianced of his youth. Alone they could not weep, while hundreds around mingled their tears over the ashes of the Christian youth.

AUTUMN.

Autumn, yellow Autumn, is upon us! The labors of the husbandman have been blest. The earth teems with goodness to satisfy the wants of man. The grass has been cut down by the scythe of the mower, and the rich ripe fields of golden grain have yielded to the sickle of the reaper, and been gathered into barns—so that we may truly say, that 'our barns are filled with plenty, and our presses burst out with new wine!' The corn is ripening for the latter harvest, and will soon be yellow, 'to cheer the hearts of men, and new wine the maidens!' O, how great is the goodness and the beauty of our God, as seen in the rich profusion of his liberal bounty, around and about us!

Man, sinful man! if thou art still unmindful of, and ungrateful to, thy God, who is blessing thee thus 'in thy basket and thy store'—if thou dost not consecrate a portion of his liberal bounty to the support and worship of his great and holy name: thou art indeed ungrateful, and unworthy of thy great blessings and privileges. 'Thou hast denied the faith, and art worse than an infidel.'

THE PRAYER OF THE AFFLICTED.

'Give us help from trouble: for vain is the help of man.'

When our spirits are depressed by sorrow and deep affliction, we should seek God, and our prayer should be, 'Give us help from trouble: for vain is the help of man.' What prayer could be more appropriate in the hour of trial—or, in the hour of death, when disease mocks the power of man!

A ship with passengers and crew, is plowing the watery deep. The waves roll mountain high. One flash of lightning follows another, in such rapid succession, that the heavens seem one mass of liquid fire. Loud roars the thunder and 'the winds are all abroad.' Despair is depicted on every countenance. Every thing has been done to save the ship, but all human effort has failed. Listen! What is their prayer? It is this—'Give us help from trouble: for vain is the help of man.'

Lying ill, on a couch, is a beautiful boy. All medical aid has failed. Death has marked him for his next victim. His mother bends over him with agonizing woe; her only child, that she regarded with a mother's love, is soon to forsake this world. He seems too pure for earth. Near him stands his fond father with a pale calm brow—but who can describe the mighty workings of his soul within? In mutual anguish and distress, they breathe this prayer to Heaven, 'Give us help from trouble: for vain is the help of man.'

When we are in trouble, the sympathy of man may soothe our grief, but it can not heal a wounded spirit. If we would be happy, we must not only pray, but we must strive to walk in the path of righteousness and truth.—We must seek to find our duty and then endeavor to perform it; remembering the words of the Psalmist, that 'Unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy: for thou renderest to every man according to his works.' GERTRUDE.

DUTY OF JOINING CHURCHES.

We have had in mind for some time to write an article on the above subject, but the 'Gospel Banner' of a late date contains one which so well corresponds in the main, with our own notions, that we here copy it in place of one of our own.

'We believe it is the duty of every man to join a Christian Church—one of his own denomination, if possible; otherwise, one whose general views are nearest to his own. We say it is the duty of every man,—not because, we suppose, every man already is a Christian; but because it is his duty to be a Christian; and as a means of this, he should come to the resolution to live according to the requirements of the Gospel and join with that company of believers (called a Church) which are aiming at the same thing. The Church is a school of Christ. No child should refuse to go to school because he is ignorant and undisciplined. He should go, rather, for this very reason. If a person enters the school of Christ, the very fact implies his desire of Christian instruction, and his determination to respect the great Teacher and comply with his rules. It is the duty of all to do this; therefore, we repeat, it is the duty of all to join some Christian Church. We mean a visible Church. There is a Church Universal. All men belong to that. Christ is its Head, as 'he is the Head of every man, the first born of every creature.' 'He gave himself for the Church that he might sanctify and cleanse it.' 'He gave himself a ransom for all.' So that all—even all sinners who need to be 'sanctified and cleansed,' are 'the Church,' for which he gave himself. The word Church signifies the body, the congregation, the assembly, the multitude for whom Christ died. And this, we all know, is every son and daughter of Adam. Now, if all are not His by the right of Redemption, all would not be under obligation to embrace his religion and join his visible Church; for, surely he requires obedience from none who are not His own. Has the King of France the right to exact obedience from the subjects of the British crown? Certainly not. Why? Because they are not his subjects. But all men are Christ's; therefore he has a right to require them to obey him, and they sin if they do not obey him, because he is their rightful owner and King. Being such, they belong to his invisible Church, and should make that relation visible by joining some one of his visible churches.

'The Catholic Church of Rome, the Episcopal Church of England, and others, are right in their doctrine that all men properly belong to the Church, and therefore are rightfully the subjects of its discipline and should obey its laws. When they claim to be the only true Church, they greatly err; but when they stand upon the principle that every child born into the world is Christ's should be baptized in his name, and taken by His Church for its spiritual education, we believe they are right. Protestants and Dissenters, in their hatred of Catholicity and Episcopacy, may have gone too far, perhaps, and really unchurched nine-tenths of the inheritance of Christ. It belongs to the Universal [ist] Church, on true Protestant principles, to restore the original order and true significance of Christ's relation to the world.'

'To the above we will add, that we have the plain example of the Apostles and first Christians for connecting ourselves with a visible Church. They gathered churches wherever they could, judging from the number formed. Those who believed were carefully associated together as citizens of the Kingdom, of the household of faith; and in this capacity they could act with more efficiency than if scattered abroad without any concert of action as well as purpose.

If churches are good for the few they are for the many. If in them are found religious privileges which are not enjoyed out of them, we maintain that every believer should connect himself with one. That they are means of improvement, and serve to restrain men in the exercise of their evil propensities I think no Christian can doubt. Why then not urge all who sincerely believe in Christ as the Messiah and Saviour of the world—all who desire to live Godly in this present world, to join the band of the faithful? Have not Universalists been quite remiss in this matter? Have they not allowed the 'children of this world' (the Orthodox leaders) to be wiser than themselves?—[Star.]

'SELF-EXAMINATION.—If you conclude that there is nobody worse, and nobody better than yourself, you will generally hit pretty near the truth. One generation may be better than another; but the individuals who comprise a generation do not differ widely, as the errors and follies of and age, like the great Maelstrom, generally suck in all who are in their vicinity.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1846.

THE MISSIONARY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

To the Friends of Universalism in the Eastern portion of Pennsylvania.

Brethren and Friends—By the proceedings of the 'Union Association of Universalists,' held in Reading, Pa., in August last, you will perceive that the first step has been taken to establish an itinerant ministry of our denomination, in that section of our State lying between, and bounded by, the principal waters of the Susquehanna and Delaware river. By glancing your eyes over a map of our State, you will perceive that the field of missionary labor thus marked out for a commencement, embraces the greater portion of our societies in the northern counties of the State, and all our societies in the southern counties; and includes also, nearly one-third part of the State. You will also perceive that there is included in the portion selected, a large extent of territory, between the societies north and south, in which there are few or no societies of our most holy faith, and but a few believers. This is the portion which we wish most especially to 'evangelize,' in order that a full and living chain of societies may be formed; extending from the north to the south, and thus a free and frequent intercourse be established between sister churches, who now, by a great intervening distance, seldom hear from each other, and never become intimately acquainted.

I need not dwell at great length on the immense benefits to our common cause, which must flow from success in this attempt to establish a travelling 'evangelist' in that region, alone. Several societies that now are unable to procure a pastor, (or unable to support stated preaching, could a minister be procured,) will, by this measure, be supplied with occasional preaching at least; and they may thus be nourished and sustained by the frequent ministrations of the word of truth, until they shall increase in numbers and gain ability sufficient to sustain a settled minister. In many places, where our friends have ever been so few in number that they had not courage to attempt any organization, and have therefore remained unknown to the great body of believers, (if not to each other,) and unvisited by our preachers,—in many such places the voice of the evangelical preacher will be heard proclaiming the glad tidings of final, endless, and universal salvation from sin and death. And we hope that after he shall have visited them but a few times, knowledge will be increased, books and periodicals be freely circulated, and stated preaching be established. And thus posts of organized believers being formed, light will go out from them into adjacent places where the full joys of the kingdom are now utterly unknown, and by an increased demand for the labors of our missionary, light will finally spring up to those who now are sitting in the shades of a theology of endless sin and death. Indeed, we think we are moderate in our anticipations, when we confidently hope that in two years we may thus make Universalism pretty well known throughout every county in the region selected; and that in each county there will be regular congregations, and in many, legally organized churches of Universalists, where now there are few or no believers of that faith. Nor do we think ourselves too sanguine in expecting that, in two years, under this experiment, some of the societies now unable to sustain preaching steadily, (and probably some of the societies that will be organized,) will have pastors of their own, and be ready to aid in sending to others that aid which they received from us.

But the labors of the evangelist whom we intend sending forth, will not be confined to preaching alone. He will go forth, ever ready to act as an agent in procuring subscribers to our numerous excellent periodicals—and especially to our own paper, already commenced at Montrose, by Br. J. S. Palmer. He will also carry with him the various books, pamphlets and tracts published by Universalists; and by their sale and the gratuitous distribution of the latter, he will spread abroad the light of truth to many whose cars are closed, by 'fear of the Jews,' against the 'preached word.' Courage will come, when truth makes free, indeed.

Nor will the selected evangelist be the only one who will go forth and preach the word. When the high way is opened by him, and the rough places made smooth, and posts are established, other evangelical preachers, who now withhold their steps from the unknown region, will also go through it, proclaiming the same Gospel of peace. And those ministers of reconciliation, who now in their isolated labors with their societies, are unable to procure exchanges except at great expense, will gladly give the missionary a few weeks of their irksome confinement, which he needs for rest, and assume his equal wearisome travel, which they need for relief. And thus will be secured more frequent preaching to the destitute region—frequent agreeable exchanges to societies—and frequent social intercourse between brethren who now are strangers to each other.

The beneficial effects of all these measures, and of their immediate results, I need not pause to recount, even could I foresee them all. Some of them will be as apparent to your minds, as to my own; and all of them can be as well imagined by you as by myself. I have briefly sketched the plan, and pointed out its most immediate and probable aims and results. It is for you to say whether it will be carried out or not.

Its perfect practicability can not be doubted for one moment—and will, in due time, be demonstrated. But we need immediate information, and aid. The committee appointed will soon have a Circular ready for distribution—to whom shall it be sent?

Brethren in each society, congregation, or neighborhood here addressed—talk this matter over (immediately) among yourselves, and select one or more of your number to be your organ or agent, with whom we may communicate and co-operate—and send us his name, post-office, and county, as early as possible, and free of postage. You may address any of the committee named in the proceedings, or Hon. John Ritter, Reading; or Rev. Samuel Ashton, Philadelphia; or the writer. A. B. G.

P. S.—I have another article on the subject which will appear soon. Will the Editors of the 'Union' and 'Messenger,' 'Trumpet,' and 'Gospel Missionary' please copy the above, and thus aid in the good work. A. B. G.

FRAGMENTS.

Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.—BIBLE.

'It is fashionable,' said the dandy, as he strapped his pants from shoulder to heel. 'It is fashionable,' said the belle, as she screwed her lungs into half their original dimensions. 'It is fashionable,' said the hypocrite as he read prayers in church and responded to that which he did not believe. 'Sense and honesty are two invaluable blessings,' said uncle Toby—but they are not fashionable!

'Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works.' The stranger, on the road to Jericho, fell among thieves and was left by the way-side, wounded and half dead. The Priest and the Levite, on the road to Jericho, left him still by the way-side. The Samaritan on the road to Jericho, picked up the stranger, carried him to the inn, and provided for his comforts. Which was on the road to heaven?

An apology for slander is like scraping the mud off one's coat with a chip, after we have knocked him down in the streets.

A Sunday face, a Sunday coat, and a Sunday conscience, form a kind of trinity with some people, or at least they always travel in company and may be observed on the way to church on the Sabbath, but during the week, they remain retired to private life.

Religion is an angel, but it is a shocking pity that she is poor. Could she be arrayed in purple robes and occupy a seat in the hall of wealth, how greatly would she be admired.

Though we have different opinions upon different or the same subjects; yet we are not to beat out one's brains because he does not believe as we do.

Should we observe vengeance lying at a man's door, we should be careful about aiding it into his house.

While speaking of the Romans, Dr. Johnson observed; 'that when poor, they robbed others; when rich, themselves.' Of the Americans individually if not nationally the reverse is near the truth—when poor, they rob themselves; when rich, others.

The fool and the accomplished rogue are two, and entirely different beings; yet, which is the greater fool?

It is truly amusing to hear a bigoted zealot reason and declaim upon the ways of God to man. The man's wisdom is but little short of infinite. He is far in advance of the age, and can as easily expound those portions of Revelation which have puzzled grave and philosophic divines for ages, as a great mathematician can explain the primary principles upon which all mathematical calculations are based. But in their frequent quotations from the Scriptures, one is reminded of those of the two sons of the Emerald Isle. It appears that in the instance mentioned, one had sold another a horse, and by 'crook,' if not by 'hook,' got the better part of the bargain. The buyer of course came back for satisfaction, and his friend being a pious man, he commenced operations by quoting Scripture:—'An' fath, doth not the Scripture say, thou shalt not chate thy neighbor?' 'St. Patrick an' it does too,' was the reply, 'an' does not the Scripture also say, if ye buy the devil ye must sell him again?'

We will drop the subject, by saying that the devil is frequently bought and sold, but whether in agreement with the scripture, the reader is left to determine.

U. S. UNIVERSALIST CONVENTION.

'The General Assembly and Church of the first born, whose names are written in heaven,' as Br. Thomas termed the General Convention of Universalists, held its annual session at Troy, N. Y., on Wednesday and Thursday of last week; and a happy and glorious meeting it was. We believe there were over one hundred ministering brethren present, and lay brethren and sisters, almost without number, from the East and the West, the North and the South, who sat down with Abraham, and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, and partook of the feast of fat things prepared for all nations. The occasional sermon—an excellent one too, was preached on Wednesday morning by Br. Asher Moore, of Philadelphia. We presume it will soon be given to the public. Br. Pingree, of Kentucky preached in the afternoon of Wednesday, Br. E. H. Chapin in the evening, the Editor of this paper, Thursday morning, and Br. Henry Bacon in the afternoon preceding the communion. A Conference was holden on Thursday morning before the service, and another on Thursday evening, which we were unable to attend, but we understand an interesting and refreshing time was enjoyed. Br. O. A. Skinner preached in Albany, Wednesday evening, and Br. Chapin Thursday evening. The Sunday School Association met on Tuesday. This meeting we did not reach Troy in season to attend, excepting to hear the last part of the address in the evening.

The Universalist Theological Society held a brief session during the assembling; but being occupied at the same time in the Council of the Convention, we found it impossible to attend any of its doings. The minutes will soon be published, as will also the minutes of the Convention; and as we have now but a brief space to occupy, and brief time to write before our paper goes to press, we must defer further remarks for the present, and refer to the minutes and fuller account of the doings of this large gathering of brethren, when they appear, which will probably be next week.

THE PHILANTHROPIST.—We have received two or three numbers of a small semi-monthly paper, in quarto form, with the above title, published by Br. C. E. Hewes, at Pittsfield, Mass., at 50 cents per annum. In addition to Br. H. there are attached to it the names of six corresponding editors, viz., Revs. A. Peck, G. Smith, R. K. Brush, A. B. Manley, E. Guilford, and G. W. T. Bush. (The last name we think must have got their by mistake.) With most of these brethren we are personally unacquainted. We know Br. Peck, he is a good man and good writer. The paper contains a good variety of matter for so small a paper, and exhibits a respectable share of talent. It is devoted to Universalism mainly, and we hope will obtain a good support and aid in the spread and upbuilding of the cause of truth in the region where it circulates. Whether the interest felt in its prosperity will be sufficient to sustain a periodical of the kind in Pittsfield or not, time must determine.

TRUTH'S TELEGRAPH AND PHILOSOPHY OF THE UNIVERSE.—Such is the title of another new publication just commenced in Rochester, N. Y., Milo D. Coddington, Editor and proprietor. It is to be published monthly in octavo form, of 32 pages per number, at $1 per annum. One reason assigned by the publisher for commencing it, is, that there are already too many publications in the country, and therefore there is a necessity of another—that "the reading portion of our community are getting in the habit of reading too much," and therefore ought by all means to read his publication! Or, to be more precise and specific, he thinks party prejudice possesses the minds of the community quite too much, and the publications of the day minister too much to that prejudice, either confining themselves entirely to politics, or religion, or whatever their party theme may be, or else on the other hand entirely excluding them, and filling the mind with vanity, love tales, romance, etc., and leaving the useful of all branches untouched. His work he intends to make useful and interesting, excluding no subject of real interest or utility to man; somewhat scientific, but as free from the technicalities of science as possible; to give a treatise on the 'Philosophy of the Universe,' the design of which will be to exhibit the harmonious connection and mutual dependence of all the existencies of which it is composed. If he carries out the plan proposed, we think he will make the work both interesting and useful. We are unacquainted with the Editor or his principles, otherwise than from what appears in 'his first number.'

Dr. Joshua L. Wilson, of Cincinnati, died on the 14th ult., in the 72d year of his age. He was the senior pastor of the first Presbyterian church in Cincinnati, over which he had been settled thirty-nine years. He was a rigid Calvinist of the old school, and stuck to his integrity to the last. He had no notion of mixing up new schoolism with the old, or Arminianism with Calvinism, thinking they could no more be united than oil and water. He called Dr. Lyman Beecher to account, and had him tried for heresy, soon after his removal to that city, which produced great excitement at the time. There are few such men now living in the country.

GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE, for October is received at Beesley's. 'The Bride,' a very pretty engraving, and a well executed engraved likeness of Dr. Reynell Coates, with a colored fashion plate prefaces this number. Its contents are varied and interesting.

NEW BOOKS.

We have just received the 'ROSE OF SHARON' for 1847. It is got up in the usual beautiful style, and embellished with seven fine engravings on steel, including the vignette title page. The contents are varied and excellent, and of which a more extended notice will hereafter be given. Price $2.00. Call soon, as we have received but a limited supply.

'BALLOU ON FUTURE RETRIBUTION.'—This is a neat 12mo. volume of 212 pages, from the pen of that well known and excellent writer, Hosea Ballou. To be had at this office for 50 cents.

REGISTER AND ALMANAC FOR 1847.—We have received a supply of the Register for next year, and shall be happy to supply cash orders at the earliest notice. The Register and Almanac is got up in style similar to that for the current year, but contains 12 more pages, and is sold for the same price. Six dollars and a half per hundred, one dollar per dozen, and twelve and a half cents, single. Send in your cash orders early.

Removals.

Br. J. H. Harter, lately of the Theological Seminary in Clinton, Oneida county, has removed to Kelloggsville, Cayuga county, and wishes to be addressed accordingly.

Br. J. A. Coolidge, from Petersham to Shirley Village, Mass.

Br. R. K. Brush, late of Salisbury, Conn., has removed to Town Hill, Luzerne county, Pa., and wishes all communications designed for him to be addressed accordingly.

Dear Br. SKINNER:—May I be allowed a small space in your truly Evangelical Magazine to record the decease of my sister-in-law, Miss Sarah Elizabeth, daughter of the late Thomas Denning, Esq., and Mrs. M. F. Denning. She died in Manchester, Va., at her widowed mother's residence, on Friday the 28th August, 1846. In a letter addressed to the writer by his companion, a sister of the deceased, the following language is used: 'Never did I see such meek and patient suffering: from the beginning to the end of her long illness, she uttered not one word of complaint.' The beloved deceased had been an attendant on the preaching of Brs. J. H. Gihon and A. C. Barry; and bigoted partialists who so idly prate in the inelegant style of 'Universalism will not do to die by,' may rest assured that the ministry of Universalism [the Gospel] exerted no pernicious influence on the character and conduct of this truly excellent young lady; hear her last words to her mother; you 'must not grieve, all is for the best; and to her sisters, I am 'perfectly willing to die.' Here is the very spirit of Universalism, and who ever died, in possession of a better spirit? She made no profession of Universalism or Christianity, but her life and death were in harmony with that sublime teaching. Leaving an affectionate mother, two sisters, and a brother, to lament her death, she has gone into the benevolent hands of One, whose love is greater than that of the dearest earthly friends. May the comforts and peace of the everlasting Gospel superabound to the surviving family, beyond all their griefs and distresses. 'Not damnation, nor destruction, but SALVATION belongs to our God! 'Let heaven and earth rejoice—creation is safe.' J. L. C. G.

MINUTES OF THE HUDSON RIVER ASSOCIATION FOR 1846.

Met in Albany Sept. 2d. Brs. S. VAN SCHAACK was chosen Moderator, and J. A. ASPINWALL, Clerk. Received credentials of delegates. Br. Brittan and the Albany delegation were chosen to arrange the public services. After considerable discussion as to the propriety of the measure, by a vote of 8 to 5, all visiting ministers and laymen were invited to participate in our deliberations. The committee on fellowship and ordination reported, 'no application'—accepted. Committee of discipline reported that a complaint had been made against a ministering brother; but as the parties do not reside in this Association, it was concluded that it is a subject not within their jurisdiction—accepted. Appointed the following committees: on fellowship and ordination, Brs. Brittan, Aspinwall and Van Schaack; discipline, Brs. J. M. Hughes, Roderick Frisbee and Otis Bently; Conferences, Brs. Aspinwall, Gardner and Huling; adjournment and preacher of occasional sermon, Brs. J. P. Clute, B. Huling and N. J. Herrick—the last reported Schenectady as the place, and Br. A. A. Davis the preacher—accepted. Appointed Brs. S. B. Brittan and J. A. Aspinwall, clerical, and J. M. Hughes and B. Huling, lay delegates to the next State Convention.

A committee, consisting of J. A. Aspinwall, S. B. Brittan and J. Moore, was appointed to take into consideration the subject of continuing fellowship, as ministers, to persons in health, who do not make the ministerial profession their principal business, who reported the following preamble and resolutions, which, after much animated yet amicable discussion, were adopted.

Whereas, It is highly important and indispensable to the honor of our ministry and prosperity of our cause, that every individual having the fellowship of the denomination as a minister of universal reconciliation, should devote his time and talents to the promotion of our most holy and happy faith, and make the ministry his chief and primary business, therefore,

Resolved, That every person in health, who thus holds fellowship, and yet neglects the duties of his profession, and makes the ministry a secondary object, has virtually and practically resigned his letter of fellowship; therefore, further

Resolved, That all such persons within the bounds of this Association, who shall persist, for twelve months from the date of their letters of fellowship, or that length of time at any period during their ministry, thus to neglect the duties of the ministerial profession, shall no longer be considered ministers of our denomination.

Resolved, That a copy of the above preamble and resolutions be sent by the Standing Clerk, to every Universalist clergyman in our Association.

The following preamble and resolutions were offered by Br. J. Moore, and adopted by the council.

Whereas, experience and observation demonstrate that weekly meetings for public worship are important to the upbuilding of the cause of truth and pure religion, therefore,

Resolved, That our friends are earnestly advised, where it is practicable, to adopt the plan of holding meetings for worship on each Sunday, though they may be able to have but one service; fully believing that such plan would be far more useful than the usual practice of holding occasional meetings with even two or three services. And that our ministering brethren are respectfully requested so to divide their time among the different places in their vicinity, as to favor the above plan.

Whereas, it is important that our Associations and Conventions should be fully attended by delegates appointed for that purpose; and whereas the expenses of attending said meetings should be mutually borne, therefore,

Resolved, That some plan should be adopted which shall secure this object.

Gave a vote of thanks to Br. Harris for his Occasional Sermon, and requested that he publish the same. Voted that the Clerk prepare the minutes for publication, accompanied with such remarks as he may deem proper. Voted to adjourn to the city of Schenectady, the 1st Wednesday and following Thursday in September, 1847.

S. VAN SCHAACK, Moderator.

J. A. ASPINWALL, Clerk.

Delegates were present from only five societies, viz: J. M. Hughes, S. Van Schaack, Albany; N. T. Davis, Hiram Seely, Troy; Roderick Frisbee, N. J. Herrick, Duaneburgh; J. P. Clute, D. M. Moore, Schenectady; B. Huling, Otis Bently, Saratoga Springs. Nine ministers were present, viz: C. M. Patterson, T. L. Harris, D. H. Plumb, C. H. Gardner, C. E. Hewes, J. Whitney, J. Moore, S. B. Brittan and J. A. Aspinwall, the first five of whom delivered sermons during the meeting to good acceptance, and we trust, profit to the hearers.—[Chris. Messenger.

J. A. ASPINWALL.

ORDINATION OF BR. THOMAS STARR KING.—This young and talented brother, whose opening prospects in life are of the more cheering character, was ordained as pastor of the Universalist society in Charlestown, Mass., on Sunday evening, 6th inst. This is the field long occupied by his highly esteemed and much lamented father. May the mantle of the father overshadow the son, that no darkening cloud may ever affect his bright career?—[Messenger.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street Buffalo.

'OUR GOD IS NOT THEIR GOD.'

Written on listening to a discourse by Mr. Gardner, who introduced himself with the above expression.

'Our God is not their God!'

How true the exclamation,
As in the sacred desk, he stood,
The herald of damnation!

The God to whom he offered praise,
Was not the God of love;
Revenge and anger marked his ways;
A tyrant reigned above.

He spoke of endless wrathfulness,
Of burning souls in hell;
Of souls bereft of happiness,
In misery doomed to dwell.

In this, said he, by God's revealed
In his most holy Word;

That our damnation, Jesus sealed
On Calvary, with his blood!

Then feelingly he bade us seek
For mercy from above,

Or God, in hell, would plunge us deep,
'For God,' said he, 'is love!'

OUR CAUSE IN VIRGINIA.

Williamsburgh, Va., Sept. 7, 1846.

DEAR BR. SKINNER.—The glorious cause of universal grace and truth may not be said to prosper in this city, and the region round about. It is to be apprehended that anti-orthodoxy, rather than Universalism opposes itself here, for the most part, to the errors and traditions of men. There is in this town, one congregation of Episcopalians, one of Methodists, and one of Baptists, under the pastoral charge respectively, of Revs. William Hodges, — Rohr, and Scervant Jones. Although the believers here, in the common salvation, have no congregation and no stated preaching, they have been favored with the testimonies of a goodly number of the heralds of salvation. The following Universalist preachers have preached in this city: Brs. Dods, Pitkin, O. A. Skinner, S. P. Skinner, J. H. Gihon, George C. McCune, L. F. W. Andrews, D. J. Mandel, Levi Chace, and W. J. Goss. Our excellent Br. Barry can give you every thing of interest in relation to the Universalist congregation of Richmond, of which he has [had] the pastoral charge. A brother of that city wrote me, that in the temporary absence in your region, of Br. B., a preacher converted from the Baptist "leaven" to the truth of God, was to preach in his place, commencing on the first Sabbath in last month, and I have since heard that Br. B. would be with his people on the first Sabbath (yesterday) of this month.* Every success and blessing attend both of these brethren, and all others who in FAITH "pray for the prosperity of Jerusalem." In York county, about 6 miles below York Town, there is a congregation of ["Campbellite Baptist"] Disciples, of whom the Rev. William Tabb, of Yorktown, is the pastor; in their meeting house, Br. J. H. Gihon, having been invited by the then pastor, (the late Rev. John Curtis,) preached in the Fall of 1844, the first and probably the last FULLY EVANGELICAL, or Gospel sermon, that ever will be proclaimed within the walls of that church!

A noble band of Gospel believers have formed a church at Belle Haven, (Eastern shore of Virginia,) in Accomack county. Br. Geo. L. Lumsden is their pastor, or was, when I last heard from them. Every blessing both spiritual and temporal rest upon these good brethren.

One of our Virginia ministering brethren—Br. J. C. Burruss—has removed to North Carolina, where he is co-operating with Br. Freize, formerly one of the Editors of the Christian Warrior. I am pleased, however, to find that Br. Burruss is still zealous in the cause of Gospel truth—manifesting that zeal not only by preaching the Word, but by contributing to the columns of that excellent "Star of Salvation"—Br. Gurley's "Star in the West."

Our periodical publications are not slighted in this place; your own most deserving "Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate," the "Trumpet and Universalist Magazine," the (N. Y.) "Universalist Union," and the "Star in the West," are received here. Most heartily do I pray for every conceivable blessing upon both preachers and editors (whether lay or clerical,) and all brethren, whose hearts and lives are engaged in the sublime, scriptural, and sanctifying cause of universal divine love.

Yours, most truly and affectionately,
J. L. C. G.

WOMAN.

There is so much good sense and truth, in the following brief extract, that we may read, and study it with pleasure and profit.

'The prevailing manners of an age depend, more than we are aware of, or are willing to allow, on the conduct of the women; this is one of the principle things on which the great machine of human society turns. Those who allow the influence which female graces have in contributing to polish the manners of men, would do well to reflect how great an influence female morals must also have on their conduct.—How much, then, is it to be regretted that woman should sit down contented to polish, where they are able to reform—to entertain, where they might instruct. Nothing delights men more than the strength of their understanding, where true gentleness of manners is its associate; united, they become irresistible orators, blessed with the power of persuasion, fraught with the sweetness of instruction, making woman the brightest ornament of human nature!—Dr. Blair.

We seldom meet with so much important truth in so short a sentence. The fact, that in all the civilized and Christian nations, the women exert a very great influence in the formation or the character and manners and consequently the honor and happiness of society, can not be overlooked by any one of much discernment; and will not be denied by any who are ingenious enough to own the truth. There are a few men in the world, just enough perhaps, to form an exception to the general rule, who seem to pride themselves on the practice of speaking disparagingly of the intelligence, worth, and influence of woman. This class however, is small, and when the facts are known, it will appear, that in most cases of the kind, a false estimate of the natural ability and true sphere of woman, or disappointment in their attempts to secure her affection and confidence, is the cause.

No man of a good disposition, and a well cultivated mind, will be heard to speak disrespectfully of woman; she was evidently designed, by Him, who created all, as the companion of man, and should be thus regarded, is thus regarded, by all who are prepared to appreciate her society, and her worth. And the fact of her mighty influence in forming the morals, and polishing the manners of man, as expressed in the above quotation from Dr. Blair, should never be lost sight of, by either sex. It is not very difficult to perceive what a vast difference there would be in the morals and manners of any community or country, deprived of the natural action and reaction of the sexes upon the conduct of each other. It may be somewhat difficult to determine which of the two would suffer most if deprived of that natural influence. We are willing to subscribe to the justness of the comparison, that, to deprive society of the influence of either sex, would be like taking away 'half a pair of shears.'

There are some women, and there are quite as many men who are determined to monopolize the influence which heaven seems to have designed should be mutually shared; but such persons, although they may exert an influence in the circle of their own families, are not among the number who exert a commanding influence in the society at large; nor is the influence which they do exert in the small circle at home, of that kind which commands respect, but which rather produces disgust, in the minds of all who perceive the unnatural and unjust movements of such persons. But they who move in the sphere to which the Creator has adapted them, will exert an influence, imperceptible though it may seem, which is not only beneficial to all who come within its reach, but is grateful to the feelings of all good minds. We always suspect the good sense and moral worth of the man who speaks disrespectfully of woman—and we always regret to see or hear a woman attempting to act the man.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

ON FIVE POINTS OF FELLOWSHIP.

BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

In noticing those five cardinal points on which all Universalists agree, we will, as far as possible, adopt the language of inspiration. If we set forth those things only which God himself hath spoken, our testimony will be entitled to the respect and credence of all professing Christians. Real Christians, being governed by wisdom and prudence can not turn away from the testimonies of the Bible.— They must seriously weigh the whole subject and yield to the authority of Jehovah as revealed in his word.

1. Existence of God. The religion of Christ is founded on the existence and infinite perfections of God; and a belief in this item of faith, is but a consistent and rational exercise of wise and virtuous minds. A contemplation of nature produces real impressions of God's existence, and of his infinite power, wisdom, justice, goodness and truth. All serious minds become strong in faith, as they look up to the spreading firmament, embellished with its grand luminaries and its brilliant stars. They contemplate the benign influence of light and heat; the constant and unvarying motion of the heavenly bodies; the beautiful and silent harmony of the universe as it 'hangs on nothing,' and is poised in the air with its own weight, performing its appropriate revolutions and carrying in its onward course its armies of inhabitants, with all things ordained for their service and well being. And as they are thus dictated by enlightened reason, and influenced by true piety, they can feelingly exclaim with the Psalmist, 'The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handy work.' 'The reality of God's adorable existence and character, may always be inferred from his visible handiwork. This class of proofs is ever glorifying the name of God and demonstrating the folly of Atheism and idolatry. The strength of Paul's reasoning is invincible; 'The invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead.'

This mode of reasoning, though consistent and edifying, is not practically admitted by the un-reconciled and sensual, and accordingly it is not adopted for their spiritual benefit. When the understanding is darkened, and the mind alienated from God, the phenomena of nature furnishes but little evidence of the divine existence. 'A brutish man knoweth not, neither doth a fool understand,' but 'the wise in heart will receive commandments,' and to them the earth is full of God's wonderful works. In reflecting on the works of nature and providence, they become conscious of their own weakness, and desire to obtain more knowledge of their Creator and his gracious will.

2. The paternity of God. To us there is but one God the Father, of whom are all things.— While we recognise the existence of a Supreme Being, as Law giver and Judge, we steadily maintain that this Being is the Father of all mankind. He is not our Father in some vague, and indefinite sense, which would leave us in doubt respecting the nature of our duty to him and one another. He is our Father in the most perfect sense of the term, being our Creator, Preserver and Benefactor. This title of Father is the crowning excellence of the divine character, and we, as Universalists, delight to contemplate him as the Father of the spirits of all flesh. It reminds us of man's universal brotherhood and identity of final inheritance. God, as a Father, hath made of one blood, all nations of men to dwell on the face of the earth. He has accordingly placed all under an obligation to love and obey him, from which no circumstances can release them. They are thus related and bound to love him because he has first loved them; and divine justice, which requires the entire dedication of the heart to God, can only be satisfied in the universal reconciliation of man.

In contemplating God as a Father, we find the mother's love for her sucking child presented by Isaiah. 'Can a woman forget her sucking child? 'She may forget,' says the prophet, 'yet will God never forget thee.' If the mother's love is not sufficiently strong to illustrate the parental love of God, then surely divine love is an undying principle that can never be quenched. The strength and unchangeableness of this love, it would seem, must preclude the idea of endless perdition. In the dispensations of his providence and Grace, God can never forget that he is a Father of kind and benevolent disposition, and that he has presented himself through his own word as an example for all earthly parents to imitate. In this endearing relation he gives us an unfailing assurance of his love and our salvation. He has made us to understand that, because he has created us, 'we are his people and the sheep of his pasture.'

God, as a Father, was not without a specific design of mercy in the destiny of man, when he put forth his creative power and called him into existence. This design, will be carried into full execution, for no power can stay the Almighty's hand; no difficulties can arise which were unseen by his wisdom, and no circumstances can place his creatures beyond the reach of his unbounded mercy. In this heavenly thought we rest with comfort and confidence, believing in God the Father, 'who hath saved us and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began.'

From this it appears that salvation is of nothing but God's original purpose of grace touching the final destiny of man. And we dare not reject the oft repeated declaration that the purposes of heaven will be fulfilled through the mediation of his well beloved Son. As believers in the final salvation of our race, we are simply contending for the fulfilment of all God's purposes. Man will be brought to glorify God and enjoy him forever because such a destiny for man is purposed by his Father in heaven, who is infinitely powerful.

3. Rewards and punishments. In following the voice of inspiration, we behold the righteous and the wicked are both to be recompensed in the earth. Good men are rewarded in obtaining and retaining favor with the Lord. They are blest in the recompense of an approving conscience and a spiritually peaceful life. By a patient continuance in well doing, they seek for and obtain glory, honor, immortality and eternal life; but there is tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile.

Nor can the just retributions of God be escaped. 'Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished.' How does the eye of omnipotence mark the murderer! Though no human eye beholds the atrocious deed, the sufferer's blood cries to heaven for vengeance, and the voice is not unheard. The circumstance can not be hid from God. Judgment overtakes the offender and he finds himself a miserable fugitive and a vagabond in the earth. Nature herself pursues the wretch, who has violated the ties of social life. Divine vengeance is awake against the cruel monster, and he is not only an outcast, but a wanderer, with a gnawing conscience, and the worm that never dies. Punishment necessarily follows his guilt, and though he may contrive to evade the penalty of human laws, he can not escape from the fearful severity of his own reflections and the horrors of his affrighted imagination. A thousand enemies will stand before him when no danger is near.

No man can tell the agony of that being who has thus made himself an enemy of God. He carries with him a hell of torment in his own bosom. His burning thoughts are constantly revolving upon the dreadful crime, and when he lies down under the covert of darkness, he finds no cessation from his sufferings. 'His troubled spirit can not be lulled into quiet repose. He starts at the frightful phantoms, which stand ready to take vengeance upon him as he dreams of the guilty scene that is past.

The murderer may take up his abode in the land of Nod, which signifies vagabond, yet he will find himself like Cain, leading a wandering, miserable life, a prey to corroding fears and painful remorse.

This principle on which the murderer is punished, extends to every violation of moral law. 'He that doeth wrong,' we are told, 'shall receive for the wrong that he hath done, and there is no respect of persons with God.' 'There is no peace saith my God to the wicked.' Their way is all darkness, and 'they know not at what they stumble.'

This idea of punishment, as a necessary consequence, resulting from transgression, implies that it has some real utility; and whatever is necessary may be dictated by pure benevolence. God, accordingly, does not punish the sinner in a useless manner, or with useless punishment. A retribution merely for the sake of pain as an end, forms no part of a good administration. If no real good can be the result of punishment, it would be better to let the offender go unpunished. God, who is infinitely good, can never inflict pain except for some wise and benevolent purpose; and hence the language of Solomon, 'Whom the Lord loveth he correcteth, even as a father doth the son in whom he delighteth.' The Psalmist also testifies to this great truth; 'Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept thy word.' * * * 'It is good for me that I have been afflicted, that I might learn thy statutes.'

Punishment, as far as it goes, is reformatory in its tendency; and in confirmation of God's benevolent design, Paul testifies in this wise: 'We have had fathers of the flesh who corrected us and we gave them reverence; shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits and live? For they verily for a few days chastened us after their pleasure, but He for our profit that we might be partakers of his holiness. Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless it afterward yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them who are exercised thereby.' This shows both the nature and tendency of that punishment or chastisement which the wicked suffer as the sad recompense of their folly. It is not an arbitrary penalty, intended to satiate the malignity of a cruel tyrant, but a necessary and useful agent in the government of that great and good Being, who is kind to the unthankful and merciful to all.

In this place, I must not forget to insist that punishment, though corrective, is never sufficient of itself to reform the sinner. A sense of divine goodness, and the idea that we have sinned against a Father's love, constitutes the great softening agent of conversion, after the just punishment of sin has performed its office in bringing us to ourselves.

Punishment is but the first means which God employs to reform his wayward children. There could be no real repentance and faith in the Lord Jesus, without the melting influence of that love which dictated the redemption of the world. All who are not wilfully blind can understand how punishment may be corrective, without performing but a small part of human redemption. Wise parents are never at a loss to know how chastisement improves the disobedient child, when it is but a small item in the family discipline. We place but little dependance on the mere punishment of children, compared with that course of instruction by which we labor to cultivate their minds and regulate their conduct.

4. The character of Christ. Jesus is denominated the Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time. It appears that Christ was the Son of God—not the eternal Father, but anointed of God to redeem the world, and for this purpose was clothed with all power in heaven and earth. He received—not enjoyed from all eternity, the spirit of God without measure, to qualify him for the glorious object of his mission. He was made by the Almighty it seems, a little lower than the angels, for the sufferings of death crowned with glory and honor, that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man. Here then we are brought, not only to the character of Christ, but to the grand object of his mission, the complete salvation of our race. 'We have seen, and do testify, says John, that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world. And the Saviour himself says, I came down from heaven to do the will of him that sent me. These testimonies are sufficient alone to show that the ultimate salvation of the world, being the great burden of Christianity, is sure to be accomplished through the mediation and reign of Christ. The will of God is that all men shall be saved, and Christ is constituted the Saviour of the world to execute this will. It is through the Saviour's reigning influence that God sways the creation as he pleases. He doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, or say unto him what doest thou?

The kingdom of Christ is filled with spiritual blessings for the hearts of men. His kingdom is a dispensation of truth and righteousness, calculated to produce peace on earth and good will to men.—Jesus also is denominated the 'Prince of peace,' for his doctrine comes down upon the heart with its peaceful influence like rain upon the mown grass, and as gentle showers that water the earth. Nothing can be more appropriate than the 'Prince of peace' to express the Saviour's true character. By means of this forgiving and peaceful influence the Son of God is to have dominion from the rivers to the ends of the earth. His name—his peaceful name is to endure forever; all men shall be blessed of him, and all nations shall call him blessed. This Prince of peace is yet to judge among all the nations of the earth, and he will teach men his ways, that they may live peaceable lives and walk in the paths of wisdom. He is to establish his peaceful reign in the hearts of many people, and among the nations afar off, that they may beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning hooks. Nations, submitting to the merciful reign of the Messiah, shall learn war no more, and shall sit every man under his own vine and fig tree, filled with the influence of divine knowledge and love.

The prophecies alone might lead us to anticipate that glorious day when all shall fully understand the character of Christ and the nature of his mission; when all shall be taught of God, and under the peaceful influence of their Master, shall prosecute their high and heavenly duties without the prejudices of education or the bitterness of party spirit. Nothing but the benevolent spirit of the Gospel is to reign in the hearts of men when the Prince of peace shall obtain universal dominion. Christians should not dishonor their sacred profession of a peaceful religion, by favoring a military policy and deeds of blood. It would be well to remember that national enmities, wars and fightings can only prevail in the world according to the measure of Gospel light which men possess, and their destitution of Christian principles.

5. The ultimate design of the Gospel. We regard the ultimate design of the Gospel to be the general promotion of moral perfection and rational happiness. It contemplates the delightful service of God in that immortal state of holiness and happiness, which Christ brought to light by his resurrection from the dead. The Bible teaches us to regard this ultimate design of the Gospel as every way worthy of its great blessed Author; and as admirably calculated to make us wise unto salvation.

In effecting this grand work of redemption and eternal life, the Scriptures constitute the main instrument of the Almighty. They are calculated through the spirit of truth to enlighten, regenerate, and sanctify the hearts of men; thus restoring them to the image and enjoyment of their Creator, and qualifying them for the blest society of angels in the kingdom above.

The most absorbing theme of inspiration is the crucifixion of Christ for the sins of the world, and his resurrection from the dead, as an assurance of his ultimate success. The infinite dignity of the Saviour, and the absolute divinity of his mission; the exceeding riches of God's grace, in elevating our degraded humanity into personal union with heavenly natures, are clearly exhibited by Christ in giving himself a ransom for all and in making intercession for us through the blood of his cross. It is in and through the name of Christ, that pardon of all iniquity, peace of conscience, and justification of life, are offered and promised to the children of men. Immortality and eternal life, in a better and happier state, are vouchsafed to man by the instructions of the Holy spirit, and every form of address is employed to engage the attention and to induce unreconciled men to receive the precious gift of eternal salvation.

The superabounding grace of God over sin and death, is calculated to illustrate this grand design of the Gospel. The idea is forced upon our consideration, that all nations, kindred, tongues and people are included within the plan of redemption, and that they shall ultimately know the Lord from the least to the greatest.

The Gospel then is an inestimable boon from God to man. It is established for manifesting the glorious perfections of God and the highest good of his rational creatures, as displayed through its exceeding great and precious promises. It is suited to our present circumstances in this world, containing information which we can obtain from no other source but the fountain of life and the Father of lights.

SCRIPTURAL WORSHIP.

'Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God.'

Let us consider these words in the sense, which, from the context appears the most natural, viz., with reference to Divine Worship. This wholesome rule is violated wherever and whenever the vain traditions and partial creeds of men are inculcated. No one ever saw in the Scriptures any such expressions as endless misery, or endless wo, or total depravity, or infant damnation, or any of 'the thousand and one' untaught terms, some of which appear to be so absolutely necessary to the very vitality of human systems of error! Take away from Partialism such unscriptural phrases as those which they employ, and no inconsiderable degree of the influence which their assumptions have attained, is forever gone! A certain description of Partialists employ no particularly moderate terms in rebuking 'the sects,' (as they are, perhaps rather self-complacently denominated by Partialists like themselves,) about the employment by 'the sects' of unscriptural words; but with what justice such reproof can be ministered by those who in advocating the heathen fable of endless misery, have not abandoned 'the Babylon' of unscriptural ideas and words, it may be estimated in part, when it is considered that the soul, body and spirit—the whole essence of partialism is utterly baseless, so far as a scriptural foundation is concerned! For, be it known unto those Partialists who clamor for what they call a 'pure speech,' THAT THE DOGMA OF ENDLESS WO CAN NOT BE STATED IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE SCRIPTURES! If the expression 'everlasting,' or any of its cognates be adduced in contradiction of the above remark, let it be understood that its abduction for any of the purposes which our opponents would have such a term to subserve, must necessarily be at the expense, aye, even to the subversion of the principles and rules of all proper construction and interpretation! What are we to do with a dogma which CAN NOT be stated in the language of the Book? Why, reject it; 'to the moles and bats' let such a heathenish error be at once and forever consigned!

I love a scrupulous, but I would have a consistent adherence to the letter and spirit, as far as possible, of the written Word: Give me a 'Thus saith the Lord,'—a pure, scriptural speech, and I will gladly by such means of all-prevailing importance with me, be led into the path of Truth, and, by such procedure

'Still new beauties may I see,
And still increasing light' in the Truth which maketh free indeed! No other teaching than the Truth itself can be stated in scriptural style; and the challenge might most appropriately and most safely be made to all 'errorists' to state in Scripture terms any tenet inconsistent with Universalism! No doctrine in relation to man's destiny—his immortal existence can be stated in Scripture language, BUT UNIVERSALISM; and the latter Divine Truth can be stated even in connection with, and on the affirmation of the Word and Oath of God Himself—That unto [Him] every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear—surely shall say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength! (Isaiah xlv.)

We may be bold to proclaim this, God's great Truth, as we should be most heartily thankful to receive it; but we should not be rash to utter any 'abomination' altogether antipodal to Divine Revelation: Let not our hearts be 'hasty to utter any thing before God,' inconsistent with His lovely character, or contradictory to His word, His promise, and His Oath!! The hope which the Gospel excites, and which CAN NOT conform with any of the peace-destroying inventions of men, MAKETH NOT ASHAMED! Ashamed of Universalism! In the nervous style of Mrs. S. C. Mayo [late Miss Edgerton]—AS SOON MIGHT I THINK OF BEING ASHAMED OF GOD HIMSELF, AS OF GOD'S GREAT TRUTH!

May we 'cease from men,' and, at the feet of Jesus learn the doctrine of God our Saviour, so shall we not be rash with our mouths, nor hasty in uttering any thing inconsistent with the name and attributes of Him who is 'God over all, blessed forevermore'!

The importance of holding, and cherishing a sound scriptural faith, in all our worship of the Supreme Being, must at once be apparent to all; for, all can see that the character of Divine worship, must comport with the doctrinal views, true or otherwise, which are entertained in relation to God, as the Creator, the Preserver, the Saviour and Father of all men. In my humble view, all notions inconsistent with the universal paternity and universal love of God, and with the consequent universal salvation of mankind, His offspring, are utterly opposed to true, spiritual worship.

MORNING.

BY L. D. JOHNSON.

Glorious, beautiful morning! When darkness hung her pall of sable blackness o'er the new-born earth, and shrouded in impenetrable gloom the welkin of heaven; when the moon, dark and solemn, hung poised like a leaden ball, and the stars that gem the glorious galaxy above, shone dimly from their misty thrones, a voice that rung to creation's farthest limits, and echoed in the boundless halls of ether, said, 'Let there be light.' And lo! golden beams shot forth from out the once dark portals of the east; the flaming sun rolled up the sky while 'the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.'

Morning! glorious beautiful morning! When black sullen clouds of doubt and despair hung gloomy o'er thy youthful horizon, when the damp chilling winds of penury and adversity were moaning around, and the bright beamed stars of Faith and Hope that once blazed before thy vision, were extinguished in darkness and night, 'a still small voice,' a scarce audible whisper, breathed, 'let there be light.' And lo! thy bounding heart once more with rapture beat; thy soul, fanned by the gentle breezes of morning, was bathed again in sunshine, and the clouds that hung dark and scowling round thy spirits shrine, yielded to the sunlight of faith and hope.

Morning! glorious, beautiful morning! Emblem of the sunshine and beauty that streams o'er the skies of youth, when the hearts deep gushing fountain is filled with ecstasy and love. The sunlight of the heart's first budding hopes; the sublime rapture of enthusiasm, and the wild enchantments of love, the soul's devotion, are the stars that gleam in the morning of life. And wilt thou never, never dawn again? Shall but once the glow of youth and health, linger upon the cheek and wreath the brow with the smiles of beauty and innocence? Is it mortal's doom to quaff but once the sparkling eddies that flow from the font of youth and leap in childish glee beside its crystal waters?

Morning! glorious, beautiful morning! When the fiat of Jehovah shall rouse the sleeping millions, from Arctic's frozen bay, to the chalky shores of Magellan; when Columbia's painted tribes, the swarthy sons of Ethiopia, and the pale face of Britain's ilse, shall wake from their long deep slumbers, and shake the cold damp sod from their breasts—then shall dawn the morn of the resurrection.—Then 'shall every knee bow,' and pour celestial harmony from lyres tuned to the sweetest numbers; then shall uncreated radiance stream from the throne of Jehovah, and enwrap in a halo of light the redeemed; then shall the golden Dial, standing before the Sun of Righteousness, and robed in eternal sunshine begin to number o'er the mighty cycles of eternity.

Fulton, Oswego county, N. Y.

A TRIFLE.—One kernel is felt in a household,—one drop of water helps to swell the ocean,—a spark of fire helps to give light to the world. You are a small man,—passing amid the crowd you are hardly noticed; but you have a drop or spark within you that may be felt,—felt through the eternity. Do you not believe it? Set that drop in motion,—give wings to that spark, and behold the results! It may renovate the world. None are too small,—too feeble,—too poor to be of service. Think of this and act. Life is no trifle.

'NATURE is truth. She is clothed with it as with a garment. She is true copy every where, and at every moment of time and though all changes. The heavens are true, the earth is true. The green leaf is true, and also, the yellow leaf. The seasons are all true. The plants are all true. The stars and the planets, with their changing moons, are all true. There is truth in the heaving billows, and in the running streams; truth in the valleys and on the mountain tops; truth in the ocean, and in the air, and truth in the myriad forms of animal life with which God has replenished them. And the great God himself, the author of all this nature, and all this truth—HE, above all things, is true.'

Why dread to lay down this frail body in its resting-place, and this weary, aching head on the pillow of its repose? Why tremble at this, that in the long sleep of the tomb the body shall suffer disease no more, and pain no more, and hear no more the cries of want, nor the groans of distress; and far retired from the turmoil of life, that violence and change shall pass lightly over it, and the elements shall beat, and the storms shall howl unheard around its lowly bed?

ONTARIO ASSOCIATION.

Notice is hereby given that the Ontario Association will meet at the Universalist meeting-house in Lima, N. Y., on the second Wednesday and Thursday in October next, agreeably to adjournment. The delegates composing the Council at its session in June last, together with such as may be elected from societies not then represented, we trust will bear in mind the importance of being in attendance at the opening of the Council, at 7 o'clock, on Wednesday morning. A cordial invitation is extended by the North Bloomfield society, to all the brethren and sisters who may wish to enjoy the meeting, and they will find a Universalist welcome during their stay.

Board, including lodging and washing may be had in private families at from $1.50 to $1.75 per week; exclusive of lodging and washing at $7 1-2 to $1 31. Many students board themselves at an expense varying from 37 1-2 to 75 cents per week.

The Winter Term will commence one week after the close of the Fall term.

MARRIAGES.

In this city on the morning of Sept. 22d, by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. DUNCAN McPHERSON to Miss ELIZABETH, youngest daughter of Mr. Samuel Brown of this city.

In Frankfort, on the evening of the same day, by the same, Mr. CHAUNCEY ELWOOD to Miss JANE ELIZABETH BUDLONG, youngest daughter of Doct. Caleb Budlong, both of Frankfort.

In Marcy, by the same, on the 23d of Sept., Mr. ALLEN G. BAKER to Miss ELSEY W. POTTER, eldest daughter of Mr. Clark Potter of Marcy.

In Fultonville, on the morning of the 22d ult., by Rev. J. Whitney, of Rochester, Mr. RUDOLPH W. DYGERT, of Frankfort, and Miss ELIZABETH VOORHEES, of Fultonville. In Perryville; on the 21st inst., by Rev. Mr. Pixley, Mr. O. J. LANSING to Miss L. E. KEELER; both of Lenox, Madison county.

In the Universalist church at Lakeville, July 5th, by Rev. O. Roberts, Mr. NELSON SEWARD, of Richmond, to Miss — BLISS, of Bristol. Also, on the 15th inst., Mr. W. A. REED to Miss MARY A. PACKARD, both of Bristol.

DEATHS.

In Granby, Oswego county, August 26th, Mrs. MARY WILLARD, aged 72 years. In early life, sister Willard embraced the Gospel of universal salvation; in the belief of this Gospel and in the enjoyment of its benign influences she lived and died. By her cheerful and Christian deportment she was doubly endeared to her family and friends; and though her tongue is now locked in silence and her once active limbs are now motionless in death, yet in the virtues she practised and in the salutary influences she exerted, she still speaketh. Her funeral was attended on the 27th, and the consolations of the Gospel of impartial grace and salvation administered to the mourners and a sympathising congregation, by the writer. L. M. HAWES.

In Sterling, Cayuga county, Sept. 11th, MARGARET ALTHEA, daughter of Hiram C. and Mary A. Curtis, aged 2 years, 2 months, and 7 days. Being absent from home, the writer was unable to comply with the request of the afflicted parents, in performing the funeral services of their beloved though departed child. May 'He, who smites to bless and wounds to heal,' comfort and sustain them under their bereavement. L. M. H.

At Conneaut, Ohio, April 22d, 1846, SUSAN F., daughter of Jacob S. and Elizabeth Flagler, aged 12 years and 11 months. The funeral was attended the following Sunday. Sermon by Br. A. Bond, from 1 Thes. v: 16, 17, 18.

'The young, the lovely pass away,
Ne'er to be seen again;
Earth's fairest flowers swift decay,
Its blasted trees remain.

Full oft we see the brightest thing
That lifts its head on high,
Smile in the light, then droop its wing,
And fade away and die.

And kindly is the lesson given;
Then dry the falling tear;
They came to raise our hearts to heaven,
They go to call us there.' J. S. FLAGLER.

THE BETTER HOME.

'Bright and beautiful as the world sometimes appears, it is nevertheless a joyous reflection that our final home is not here. We are now merely 'travelers and sojourners,' as expressed by the divine writer, with no abiding city. I have said that the world is sometimes bright and beautiful; but it is not always so, for if it were, we might then wish to ever dwell therein. But from other considerations, we are made to look forward with anxious hopes for the 'better land.'

When cares press heavily upon us, when the wounded spirit tires and sinks beneath a load of accumulated woes that flesh is ever heir to; when troubles, anxieties, and calamities crush us to the dust,—then it is that we long for, and look forward with sweet satisfaction to the 'house not made with hands.' And O! what heavenly peace does it afford the way-worn traveler of time, to lift up his head from his various woes, and remember that God has prepared for him beyond the dark grave a 'better home.'

Even the best home here upon earth is not free from troubles. In the most favored family circle, bad passions will now and then arise, and angry words be spoken.—And add to this the fact, that one member after another of the cherished circle is called away to be here no more, and we are forcibly reminded, that although we all love our homes, circumstances will arise to mar the general felicity. The tenderest love and kindest care of our fathers and mothers, can not shield us in every period from sorrow, nor can they retain upon earth those on whom their strongest affections are placed. All must fade away and die, like the grass and flower of the field.

Why then should we not oft think of the home of heaven? for saith the word of God, 'Man dieth and goeth to his long home.' Why should we not raise our thoughts to the contemplation of the bright mansion of immortal bliss? Glory to God in the highest! in our Father's house are many mansions, and Jesus has gone to prepare a place for us all. And in that house, not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, the world of mankind shall meet as one great and happy family—meet never more to part—meet never to be disturbed by tears or sorrows—meet to sing the praises of God through the endless ages of eternity! The hope of such a home, and such uninterrupted joy, is the richest treasure man can possess.

I call heaven our home: so the Scripture writers have taught me; and I have denominated this a universal home. And I frankly say, that I know of no home different from this beyond death. I know of no home for a few to the exclusion of the rest. And I desire no home, such as will exclude me from the presence of those I love—such as some proclaim. What! that a home of peace and rest to the parents, where there is no gathering around them of their children? That a home of joy to them, when from the pit below they hear the eternal moans and cries of their beloved offspring! That a home to a brother or sister, when from the gulf of endless despair rise shrieks of another brother or sister! That a peaceful home to the weary traveler of time, when he knows his fellow men are in the prison house of never ending torment! That a home for the children of time? O tell me, is that the home of heaven of which so much is said? Is it peaceful and happy?

Better might you say that home is happy—father and mother, brothers and sisters—all happy, when one of its dearest members is perishing beneath the cold frosts and chills of the winter's blast! or walks the trembling earth beneath which the volcano has ceased to slumber and sleep, and in another moment must bury him in her liquid fires. Or when his cries come home, clear and frightful from the roaring flames of a burning building from which there can be no escape. More reasonable that this should create no anguish, but rather happiness, than the cries and moans ascending from the prison house of eternal wretchedness—for what is momentary suffering to the storm of endless fire beating in upon the naked soul?

Tell me not that this is the home of heaven? Blacken not the character of my God with such libels—for I know of a better home—a home where all shall meet beneath the smiles and blessings of an everlasting Father. Praise, everlasting praise to God for the hope of such a home.—[Star in the West.

THE CROSS OF FLOWERS.

BY MISS JULIA A. FLETCHER.

A few weeks since we stood by the coffin of a dear friend, who was taken from us in the brightness of youth and beauty. The calm smile of triumphant faith had not left her lips, for she died, as she had lived, with a Christian's hope, and a Christian's happiness. We knew all this—we knew that death had been to her the servant of the Lord, that she had turned calmly away from the bright hopes and pure joys of her guiltless life, and laid herself down all smilingly to die,—yet still was our spirit sad.

She had been linked to us by many ties; by gentle smiles, and kindly tones, and loving deeds was the chain woven, and it was stronger than gold or iron. Now she had been taken away. We had heard for the last time that voice of love, we had clasped for the last time that friendly hand, and now we had only the last sad offices of affection to render.

There had been a fearful struggle,—a feeling that we could not give her up, and it had not all passed away, even now that the Lord had spoken, and we knew that it must be so. For how could we lay that bright young head in the grave, with all its clustering curls unfaded by time or sorrow, or see the eye whose sudden radiance was wont to light every line of those loved features at our approach, now veiled and closed forever, and not feel that it was a fearful trial?

It was a fearful trial, and we bowed in anguish over that sleeping form, as if to see if it were really so. It was a sinful feeling, and even there was it rebuked.—There upon the coffin of that loved one was an eloquent preacher of consolation,—a cross of flowers.

Beautiful were the opening buds and delicate white blossoms,—beautiful were the graceful leaves in their first Spring verdure,—and beautifully indeed had they been woven by the hand of affection. The murmuring heart was hushed. The emblem of a greater suffering than ours was before us. We looked again upon the calm brow of the happy dead, and as we thought of the faith that gave that holy life, and crowned it with a joyful death, we felt that our cross was much of flowers.

Earth hath its myriad sorrows. They come upon us in every step of our pilgrimage, thronging the path in which we tread, and looking sternly at us from all the paths around us, some wearing their own fearful visages, and others the masks of fancied joys. Vainly do we gird about us the armour of our own strength; vainly do we draw more closely the veil of indifference and strive to hasten on. We see them still,—their cold glaring eyes are upon us, and their bony hands are clasped in ours. Vainly do we shrink from their fellowship. They are with us in the peopled street, and in the loneliest country vale; at our daily toil, in the places of amusement, and some, yea the most fearful of all, are in our own homes, sitting, familiar guests, by the hearth and at the board.

We can not drive them away, we can not long shut our eyes to their presence, but we can pass calmly on in the midst of them, looking upward ever to the radiant sky, for though they are all around us, thank God they are not above. Then though they cluster closely about us, it shall be but to support our steps, and the most ghastly of them all, even sin shall flee far away from us. The cross shall be our guide as we journey on, and with joy shall we see that it is woven of flowers. Earth has its myriad joys. There are bright flowers springing over the graves of buried hopes, and sunbeams flashing back from the darkest waves of care. Smiling faces are ever mingling with the stern crowd around us, loving eyes are looking in upon our hearts, and gentle fingers are intertwined with ours. Voices, sweet as the tones of happy childhood, are all around us, and the harshest sounds can not keep them from our ears, if we will but listen. This is the great secret. We must listen in the silence of a reverent spirit, if we would hear the songs of the angels; we must look calmly at the cross, if we would see that it is made of flowers.

Mortal, thank God for the cross. Thank God that life is not all garlands, and wreaths, and garden bowers.—Thank him that it is not a place of listless pleasure, and luxurious ease. Thank him for days of toil, and nights of restless pain; for stern-browed want, and hurrying care, and dark relentless death; for these are the gifts which have been to us most truly 'blessings,' and not 'in disguise,' to the eye of faith. These are the messengers who have brought us glad tidings of a holier life,—even of the inner life of the spirit. They are the teachers who have told us how strong we are, even amid our weakness, how happy we may become, even amid our suffering.—Thanks joyful thanks for these, and yet more earnest thanks for Him who wore the crown of thorns, that we might weave the crown of flowers.—[Universalist Miscellany.

IRRESOLUTION.

BY MISS H. J. WOODMAN.

There is no error prevalent in human character which the wise and thoughtful more studiously avoid than instability of purpose. A supposed inability to say no, has betrayed the thoughtless into pitfalls which might otherwise have been easily avoided, and has given the tempter an easy conquest over his well intentioned but irresolute victim. 'I have gained something by the world's rough usage,' said an unfortunate friend, 'I have learned to say no,' and the purchase though costly was worth its price.

One of the most striking examples on record of this unhappy trait of character, is that of the warm hearted, energetic, but vacillating Peter. From his induction into the holy brotherhood of apostles, until the death of his betrayed and insulted Master, whenever he is brought prominently before us, we deplore the weakness so unworthy of his high and holy mission. 'Lord, save, or I perish,' was his distracted prayer, when, forsaken by the faith that first impelled him, he sank beneath the stormy waters of the sea of Galilee. 'Though I die with thee, I will not betray thee,' was the exclamation of his adoring love; and in another hour he met the rebuking glance of the Saviour, and, stung by the reproaches of his sensitive conscience, 'he went out and wept bitterly.'

As if to show how thoroughly the religious principle can annihilate so unworthy a trait of character, we find Peter from the hour of the resurrection, in this respect, certainly an altered being. Where was before irresolution, was thereafter firmness, and never more, throughout his long, eventful life, do we find the remnant of that spirit which once induced him to swear, 'I know not the man.'

Resolution, firmness of thought and action, independence which decide its course, and the unswerving stability which pursues it to the end, have not usually been considered necessary ingredients in the female character.—To be very yielding and submissive has commonly been supposed to be very amiable; and from the manner in which this subject has been treated in light works of fiction, and often in those of graver character, one would suppose that, though at times it may be very useful to possess strength of character, it is in general of very doubtful utility.

This degrading opinion is gradually giving way before the light of revelation and the flood-tide of experience; weakness and instability are fast becoming as contemptible in the feminine as in the masculine mind. The changes which have taken place in society have enlarged the sphere of female action, and it is now common to forsake the homestead for the school room, the store, the work room, and the factory, which open inducements to enterprize and activity.

Thus withdrawn from parental protection, the young go out into the world, while care and perplexity weave around them a strong coil, and the oppressor is but too often ready, with the meanness of cowardice, to wrong those whose retaliation will be pointless. In how many instances the young females of our land thus stand alone upon the theatre of life. If not sustained by lofty purposes, if not hedged in by sound principles, if not firm where firmness is an essential requisite, how utterly unfitted are they for their station and its responsibilities—for a useful and honorable single life, or for the multiplied duties of a wife and mother. We hear a sound judgment spoken of as if it were the gift of Providence, like a genius for painting, poetry, and music. No doubt there are some minds so equally balanced, that their rapid decisions are made with wise discretion; but the quality we so much esteem is far oftener the effect of judicious self-discipline, the slow process of years of patient watchfulness and toil.

The rich fruits of the earth are not the product of a day's sunshine, or a night's refreshing dew, and can the far richer fruits of the spirit be attained without the price of persevering effort? The sunshine of heaven must rest upon the blossoms, the dews of the Spirit must refresh the roots, the hand of the Great Husbandman must prune the branches, and the result will be peace on its broadest foundation—a singleness of heart which is a bulwark of defence and a 'patient continuance in well doing,' which is its own exceeding great reward!

Life is begun with pure desires and lofty aims, but the breath of the world passeth over them and they are gone, and too often, alas! the places which once knew them, know them no more forever. The days when tottering virtue could escape temptation behind the walls of a cloister, thanks to a brighter era, have passed away.—The world must be encountered, its good must be enjoyed, and its evil avoided or subdued.

We are met at every turn by foes, wearing the semblance and clothed in the habiliments of friends. A syren voice allures us with its blandishments, and we are told that forbidden fruit may be eaten, and we shall not surely die. That fortress only, which the resolute spirit builds from its own indestructible materials of faith and firmness, can withstand the constant stealthy attacks by the band of silent tempters. On the outposts of the defence, sleepless watchfulness must hold its vigils. Prudence, resolution, courage, must defend the entrances; and, made easy through habit, the warfare ceases to be painful, and self-control and self-possession 'grow with the meats they feed on,' till the victory is sure, waiting only for death to set its changeless seal upon it.

Firmness is as far removed from stoicism as from imbecility. When Peter, purified through suffering, had lost the spirit that denied his Master, there still remained the indomitable energy which made him worthy to hold the keys of the spiritual kingdom. Saddened by the recollection of his sin, unforgetful of the hour of his bitter anguish, he spent no time in useless regrets, but strove with the earnestness of true repentance, to atone for the weakness that led him so far astray. The wild, reproving glance of the patient sufferer no doubt often recurred to his memory—a sad token of remembrance, and one that must have probed his generous spirit to the core.

Oh! how full of instruction and encouragement is Peter's whole history. The well intentioned but irresolute may fall, and there is a resurrection full of promise awaiting the second putting on of the armor. To the frail apostle was given the charge of feeding the fold. May he never forget us, lest we too, faint and weary, deny honor, truth and virtue, and thus unfit ourselves for the great Supper of the Lamb.—[Ladies' Repository.

DOW, J. R.

There is so much good sense mixed up with the fun in the sermons of this eccentric preacher, that we can not resist giving our readers now and then one of them.—They are written by one of the editors of the 'New-York Sunday Mercury,' who treats his patrons to one of his essays weekly. Below is number 309.

After a good deal of hesitation, I have chosen the following as a text for to-day:

At ten a child, at twenty wild;
At thirty tame; if ever;
At forty wise, at fifty rich,
At sixty good, or never.

My hearers—at ten, or thereabouts, we are gay, giddy, thoughtless, ragged and stacy children. Having outgrown the imbecilities of babyhood; we frisk and skip about, with all the life and enthusiasm of lambskins upon emerald banks and sunny knolls. Unlike babes, just beginning to totter along upon their pegs, with a galvanic uncertainty, towards a chair post or table leg, we bound forward with a step almost as elastic as a grasshopper's, and spirits as lively as pearlash and cider. Then, not a cloud of care, even as big as a bit of rag, is seen to sail across the bright, blue sky of hope—then, the earth is an ever blooming paradise—happy spirits are heard to sing in the balmy morning breeze—fairies and elfins inhabit every grove and bower—joy and gladness are every where; and we can no more keep still for a moment than monkeys in a menagerie. We go out in the morning, revel among the flowers, skip across the fields, chase butterflies, dig in the dirt, launch our mimic ships in the goose-pond, spend a day of delight, and go to bed at hen-roosting, anticipating a still happier to-morrow. Such are we at ten—no care, no sorrow, no money; and as independent as tree-toads, that sing in showers.

My friends—at twenty we are wild, wild as partridges. There is no such thing as taming us; we ride that fierce, fiery, and head strong animal, Passion, over fences, ditches, hedges, and on to the devil—leap the five-barred gate of reason, without touching the curb of discretion, or pulling harder than a tit-mouse upon the strong rein of judgment. O, at twenty, you are perfect locomotives, going it at the rate of sixty miles an hour: your heart is the boiler—love is the steam, which you sometimes blow off in sighs—and hope, fear, anxiety, and jealousy, are the train that you drag. At this season of life, you are filled with the exhilarating gass of romance: every thing to you looks romantic, by spells—even a jackass philosophizing over a barrel of vinegar. You (both girls and boys) now read novels until your gizzards have softened into a sentimental jelly, and settled into the pit of your stomachs. O, I know how you feel—you feel as though you would like to soar from star to star! kick little planets aside—take crazy comets by their blazing hair, and pull them into their right courses—sit upon the highest peak of a thunder cloud and dangle the red lightning between your thumb and fingers, as a watch chain—then dive into the golden sunset sea, and sport with celestial syrens—speed on, pull the nose of the blackguard in the moon—ransack all creation—knock a few pains out of the windows of heaven—and then flutter down as gently as a breeze, and find the darling of your love mending stockings by moonlight! That's how you feel.

My hearers—at thirty you are more tame; the pot of passion still boils, but it doesn't boil over with a fuss and fury. You now love, but more reasonably and rationally—you look upon the matter as being partly a matter of business as well as of pleasure: you are not going to sleep upon a bed of thorns through life for the sake of a few frail roses, no matter how fair they may look, nor how sweet they may smell—not you. Because why?—you begin to think as you go; you see the world more in its real guise, divested of its deceitful ornaments and ideal festoonery. At any rate, you are tame enough at thirty to be caught with the hymenial halter by slow and considerate means, and without being grabbed. I am just as much sure that the women are, as I am that I can catch my old mare, with an empty salt-dish.

My dear friends—at forty you should be considered wise. The leaves then upon the tree of knowledge are as full, fresh and green as they ever will be; and the fruit of wisdom, though still unripe and growing, will never be more abundant. Now you have gathered pretty near all from the fields of the past that can be of valuable service in your pilgrimage through the dreary desert of age. Here experience, the school mistress, gives you no new lessons, nor sets you any new copy to write after —what you had must answer for the future. School's out.

At fifty, generally speaking, you have completed your pile of that dross which delights man's eyes and damns his soul; yet there is now and then one who plods along the path of poverty up to sixty or seventy years, and then stubs his toe against a lump of good luck, and tumbles headlong into a fortune. But these are exceptions to the general rule, as the father said of all the children he had over twenty.

At sixty, my hearers, if you are not good, I wouldn't give a rotten potato for all the piety you might scrape up afterwards. You would stand no more chance of working out a clean and thorough redemption, and of maintaining it, than you would of lifting yourselves over the back of a chair in pulling on a tight pair of boots. So look out for your salvation in season, by doing those things which ought to be done, and leaving undone the things that need no more doing than a raw cucumber.—

So mote it be!

UTICA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1846.

THE MISSIONARY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

To the Friends of Universalism in the Eastern portion of Pennsylvania.

Brethren and Friends—Having laid before you our plan, and measures, and a portion of the expected results, let us see what is to be done, and the encouragements existing for its performance.

The portion of the State staked off as the field of labor for the first evangelist to be employed, is bounded by the principal waters of the Susquehanna and Delaware rivers. In it are included the entire counties of Susquehanna, Pike, Wayne, Northampton, Schuylkill, Dauphin, Lebanon, Berks, Lehigh, Bucks, Montgomery, Philadelphia, (city and county,) Delaware, Chester, and Lancaster; and portions of Bradford, Luzerne, Columbia, and Northumberland. As the work progresses, and if means sufficient can be collected, and suitable laborers employed, the counties lying entirely between the North and West branches of the Susquehanna, can be included—and, indeed, if encouragement permit, it can be extended to the adjoining counties in this State and even in New Jersey. Should the Pennsylvania State Convention deem it expedient, it may be extended over our whole State, provided means and laborers sufficient can be procured; but our present business is with it in its present form and limits as above stated. Let us see the state of our cause in this region.

There are one or more regularly organized societies in each of the counties of Susquehanna, Wayne, Northampton, Schuylkill, Berks, Philadelphia city and county, Bradford, and Luzerne—and settled preachers, it is believed, in each of these, except in Shuylkill and Northampton. But even in these counties there is room for missionary labor, and in some of them considerable encouragement already existing for it. In the counties of Pike, Columbia, Northumberland, Montgomery, Chester, and Lancaster, known friends reside in several sections, sufficient to render some aid in supplying themselves with the labors of the evangelical missionary, and undoubtedly many others can be found after a time spent in successful effort. Though at first the preacher's course will be a pretty direct one from Reading, through Pottsville, Catawissa, Danville, and so up the North Branch, and around through the Northern counties to the Delaware, and down to Easton, and back again to the place of starting—yet after a brief time, he will be able to find places where he may rest, and from whence he may diverge to the right and to the left, and thus widen his course very greatly.

From Reading to Wilkesbarre, he will find no preachers of like faith. But in the vicinity of the latter place, after October, Br. R. K. Brush will be located. From Wilkesbarre to Montrose, there is no settled preacher.—And again on his return by the Delaware border, he will find no preachers of our denomination until he reaches Easton, where our friends are now endeavoring to procure a preacher. They have already raised the funds, and only wait to secure a suitable pastor. Such, then, is the field—such its wants—and such, as far as known to the writer at present, are the aids and encouragements it furnishes for a missionary.

And now comes the great question preliminary to employing the preacher—How much money can be raised? and from what sources? For one year's salary should be secured to the laborer—in the hands of the committee—before he is sent forth on his mission. This we deem requisite; for the laborer should not be required to run any risk whatever—his mind should be unembarrassed by any pecuniary cares—his labors in collecting funds for the mission, should not be clogged with the idea that he is collecting for himself. It is necessary, therefore, that the committee should be able to guarantee to him his salary in quarterly payments, promptly paid as they become due. And in order that the committee may be able to do this without risk on their part, the money should first be raised, and in their possession. That committee is composed of men so well known and respectable, as to command the confidence of our friends; so that no scruple need be raised on that account. Every cent will be well husbanded, judiciously applied to the sole purpose for which it is contributed, and rigidly accounted for.

How, then, and by whom can the money be raised? It is evident, at least to my mind, that much of it must come from societies already supplied, or about to be supplied, with stated preaching. The societies in Philadelphia, Kensington, Reading, Pottsville, Catawissa, Easton, Wilkesbarre, Huntington, Montrose, Brooklyn, Sheshequin, Montroeton, Prompton, Honesdale, etc., must raise nearly the whole amount; and the balance, if any, must be made up by our friends in the various neighborhoods on the first route of the missionary. An average of $25.00 from each of the societies above named, will give us $375.00—and those not named, and the scattered friends in various sections, can surely fill out the remaining $225.00; for about $600.00 will be needed to defray all the expenses of the first year. But as some of these societies will enjoy the benefits of the preaching thus instituted, as Pottsville, Catawissa, etc., they will be able to raise from twice to four times the amount of the average above named, and thus lessen considerably the amount to be raised by some others of the societies named, who will be able to do but little more than sustain their own stated preaching.

There is, then, no difficulty in raising the requisite amount of funds for the mission. Indeed, if necessary, and our friends will but act up to the amount of their ability for such an object, we could raise double the amount. But, with what may be received from various sources not here enumerated, the amount named, will, it is believed, be amply sufficient. A. B. G.

UNITED STATES CONVENTION.

MINUTES OF THE SESSION IN TROY, N. Y., SEPT. 16 AND 17, 1846.

The Convention was organized Wednesday morning, by the choice of Br. Elijah Dallett, Moderator, and Br. Henry Bacon, Clerk.

United in prayer with Br. D. Skinner.

The minutes of the last session were read and approved.

Voted, that an explanatory note be appended to the minutes of the last year, relating to the Theological School at Clinton, it being there stated that this school is a department of the Liberal Institute, which is a mistake, as the Theological School is a distinct institution of itself, and not a department of the other.

The Rules and Regulations of the Convention were then read.

Adjourned to meet after the public service.

Met, and adjourned to meet after the afternoon service. Met according to adjournment; appointed committees on adjournment and next occasional preacher, and on business.

The resolutions of Br. Brimblecome, and the Report of Brs. L. C. Browne and C. H. Fay, both of which have been published, were taken up, and, after discussion, laid on the table.

Suspended rules to permit Br. Woodhouse to introduce a resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Art. 9, of the Constitution of this body be repealed, and the original article 6, as adopted at Stafford, Vt., 1833, be restored to the Constitution.

Adjourned to meet to-morrow morning, at 8 o'clock.

Thursday morning.—Met according to adjournment. United in prayer with Br. Gallagher.

The resolution introduced by Br. Woodhouse was laid on the table.

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to draft and present to this body rules and regulations, governing the subject of Fellowship and Ordination in the Universalist denomination in the United States; and that this committee draft forms of constitution for State Conventions, Associations, societies and churches, to be recommended for adoption, and report at the next Convention.

Brs. T. J. Sawyer, H. Ballou, 2d, K. Haven, E. M. Pingree, and L. C. Browne, were appointed that committee.

Request received from Br. T. Whittemore for the loan of the Records of this body for one year, as he is revising 'The Modern History of Universalism' for a new edition. Request granted.

Request received from the Universalist Association in Canada West, desiring Christian fellowship, yet declining disciplinary subordination to this body. Referred to a committee, who reported as follows, through Br. P. Morse:

The committee appointed in relation to the application from the Universalist Association of Canada West, received through Brs. Daniel Leavitt and Jonathan Striker, their delegates to this body, for the Christian fellowship of this Convention,—at the same time declining any disciplinary subordination to this body, beg leave respectfully to report the following resolutions as the sense of this body:

Resolved, That we have received with much pleasure the request of our brethren in the Canadas, and that we will cordially sympathize with them in all their labors for the furtherance of the Gospel in their midst; and that so far as the laws of our organization will permit, we will interchange with them all counsel and aid in the promotion of the great object for which we mutually labor.

Resolved, That should our brethren in the Canadas, at any time, choose to send delegations to this body, we will cheerfully receive them as honorary members, without the right of voting. Accepted and adopted.

Voted, that the thanks of this Convention be extended to Br. Asher Moore, for the Occasional Sermon this day delivered, and that he be requested to furnish a copy for the press.

Br. T. B. Thayer offered a resolution proposing an alteration in the Constitution, which was passed, and consequently laid over for action at the next session.

Resolved, That the following substitute for Art. 3 of the Constitution be adopted.

Article 3. This Convention shall meet once in two years, at such time and place as shall have been designated at a previous meeting.

The committee on adjournment and the next occasional preacher, reported New York city as the place, and Br. H. Ballou, 2d, as the preacher. Report accepted and adopted.

The Business committee introduced the following resolution, which was, after considerable discussion, laid on the table:

Resolved, That the legitimate sphere of the Christian Pulpit includes the advocacy of Liberty, Peace, Temperance, and all the moral and religious interests of man.

Br. T. J. Sawyer introduced the subject of the 'Clinton Liberal Institute,' and it was Voted, that a committee of five be appointed to digest and present to this body some plan of operations to advance the permanent interests of the 'Clinton Liberal Institute.' Brs. H. Ballou, 2d, T. J. Greenwood, J. Boyden, jr., K. Haven, and C. H. Rogers, were appointed said committee.

Adjourned, to meet at 2 1-2 o'clock.

Met according to adjournment, and in absence of Moderator and Clerk, Br. R. O. Williams was called to the chair, and Br. L. W. Ballou was appointed Clerk, pro tem.

The committee appointed to digest and present a plan of operation in behalf of the 'Clinton Liberal Institute,' made the following report, through Br. H. Ballou, 2d.

The committee on the subject of 'Clinton Liberal Institute,' and the 'Universalist Theological Seminary at Clinton,' beg leave to report the following recommendations, viz:

1. That this Convention express its deep sense of the importance of both of said Institutions to the welfare and success of the Universalist body in this country.

2. That this Convention respectfully request the Trustees of 'Clinton Liberal Institute' forthwith to appoint in every State in the Union, in which there is a Universalist Convention, one or more agents, with proper instructions, to solicit subscriptions from individuals to the funds of said Institution, for the purpose of erecting it into a College or University; which subscriptions shall become due, when sums to the amount of $50,000 shall have been thus subscribed.

3. That this Convention also respectfully request the Trustees of the 'Universalist Theological Seminary at Clinton,' to address, to every Universalist society known to them, a Circular giving such information as they may deem necessary, and earnestly soliciting a public collection, to be appropriated to the aid of said Theological Seminary.

Voted, that the thanks of this Convention be presented to the friends in Troy, N. Y., for the hospitable manner with which they have received and entertained us.

Voted, that Br. Bacon be instructed to prepare the minutes of this Convention for publication, accompanied with such remarks as may seem to him appropriate.

Voted, that any statistical reports which may hereafter be received by the Clerk, be recorded in the usual manner.

United in prayer with Br. T. J. Greenwood, and adjourned to meet in New York city, on the third Wednesday and Thursday in Sept., 1847.

CIRCULAR.

To the scattered 'household of faith,' the United States Convention of Universalists, assembled at Troy, N. Y., Sept. 1846, sendeth Christian salutations of love and peace:—

Again we have met in annual convention, have 'taken sweet counsel together, and walked to the house of God in company.' We have given ourselves to the deliberations of the council, and to the public services of worship and instruction, for the furtherance of the immediate and permanent interests of the cause of Divine Truth, and for the increase of 'patience and comfort of the Scriptures' in our own souls, that we 'might have hope'—the great enlivener of human action, through the grace of God in Jesus Christ our Lord. All our business was conducted in harmony of spirit, and several important steps were taken for the attainment of most desirable objects, especially a uniform system of Fellowship and Ordination, and the endowment of the 'Clinton Liberal Institute' that it may be erected into a College. As a plan of operation in behalf of the latter will soon be submitted to the Universalists in the several States, it is most devoutly to be hoped that the trial may be made to test what can be done, since enough has been said upon the subject. 'The Lord loveth a cheerful giver,' and let each do as he has the ability to do, and not wait for the action or example of another.

The Convention was favored with the agreeable presence of two brethren from Canada West, who bore to us the welcome tidings of the good success of our cause there, and desiring Christian fellowship. The reason of declining any disciplinary subordination to the Convention, as referred to in the minutes, did not arise from any jealousy in reference to the use of power by the Convention, but from a discreet caution to prevent any harm to the Gospel cause by any seeming alliance with an organized body in the United States, while political affairs,—feelings and jealousies,—are as at present in the Canadas. The Convention extended Christian fellowship in the heartiest manner, and expressed its willingness to receive future delegations as honorary members. May the blessing of our God and his Christ rest upon our Canadian brethren, and give success to their labors in promoting the spread of Gospel Truth.

It was a source of deep regret to the Convention that not one out of the many committees appointed by State Conventions to make reports to this body, had sent in, or were ready to present the same. Such similar neglect of duty is disrespectful to the appointing bodies and to the General Convention; and it is also an injury to the cause of our mutual love, by depriving the Universalist public of the intelligence they look for, and the historian of documents which he will need. Careful and accurate reports from the various States would be of great value.

But we were not without some means of estimating the progress of the great cause the past year, inasmuch as from the speech of the brethren we learned the success which has attended well directed labors. Reverses and discouragements have been felt, but yet there are abundant reasons why, in the most reverent manner, we should 'thank God and take courage.' The labors of the departed Jones and Rogers, and others who have wrought for Christ and humanity, and gone to their rest, are with us, and let us see to it that we enter into them with a like earnest and devoted spirit. The mighty forces which are combined against us, require us to awaken all our energies, and to be careful that we waste no strength by disunion. Let us be tolerant among ourselves, remembering that 'there are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit. And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all. But the manifestation of the spirit is given to every man to profit himself,—working that one and the self same spirit.'

Our friends in Troy kindly received and hospitably entertained the ministers, delegates, and visiting friends, as far as it was in their power to do, and many hearts will remember and desire to reciprocate their Christian attentions. May the great Head of the church soon grant to them a faithful minister of the word and pastor of the flock.

And now, ye of 'like precious faith,' to whom this greeting may come, bear the word of exhortation, which we desire to heed with you,—Awake, put on thy strength! with a determination to 'quit yourselves like men,' 'strong in the Lord and in the power of his might.' 'Walk wisely in a perfect way,' with a serene faith, and pure love, a broad charity, and an increasing and harmonious zeal.

'Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. Amen.'

Per order, HENRY BACON.

We copy the following from the semi-weekly Tribune of the 25th ult., by which it appears that our friends who attended the United States Convention, at Troy, thought they could not have too much of a good thing, and so held another meeting on board the steamboat while on their way from the Convention. Among other things the treatment of prisoners was introduced, when opposite Sing Sing Prison, and good speeches made, and a good resolution adopted! But here is the article.

ACTION IN BEHALF OF PRISONERS.

Some three hundred of the persons who had been attending the Universalist Convention at Troy took passage on board the steamboat South America this morning, which with the other passengers, made one of the largest freights of the season. About ten o'clock a meeting was organized on board, which was interspersed with singing and speaking. In the afternoon, when opposite Sing Sing, the subject of the 'Treatment of the Prisoner' was introduced, and a number of good speeches were made by clergymen and laymen, urging the necessity of a greater interest being felt, and manifested in the government and condition of our Penitentiaries, by Christians and society at large. Rev. L. C. Browne of Norwich, Ct. and Rev. T. J. Greenwood of New-London, Ct. spoke at considerable length on this point, and we have no doubt a good influence was sent abroad by the meeting; and in conclusion the following Resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we approve of the efforts now being made in different parts of the country to ameliorate the condition of the prisoner, and in providing the discharged convict with employment and a home on his release.

A vote of thanks was passed to the Captain for his kindness in granting the privilege of holding this meeting, and for his courtesy and attention to the passengers generally.

NEW BOOKS.

We have just received the 'ROSE OF SHARON' for 1847. It is got up in the usual beautiful style, and embellished with seven fine engravings on steel, including the vignette title page. The contents are varied and excellent, and of which a more extended notice will hereafter be given. Price $2.00. Call soon, as we have received but a limited supply.

'BALLOU ON FUTURE RETRIBUTION.'—This is a neat 12mo volume of 212 pages, from the pen of that well known and excellent writer, Hosea Ballou. To be had at this office for 50 cents.

REGISTER AND ALMANAC FOR 1847.—We have received a supply of the Register for next year, and shall be happy to supply cash orders at the earliest notice. The Register and Almanac is got up in style similar to that for the current year, but contains 12 more pages, and is sold for the same price. Six dollars and a half per hundred, one dollar per dozen, and twelve and a half cents, single. Send in your cash orders early.

'The COLUMBIAN MAGAZINE' for October is out with its usual compliment of interesting contributions and engravings. Price 25 cents, at Beesley's.

We have the second number of the 'TALISMAN AND ILLUSTRATED ODD FELLOWS' MAGAZINE' This is the August number, and rather late in the day for that. It is nevertheless handsomely illustrated, and printed on good paper, and altogether neatly got up. A pretty engraving (on steel) of Flora prefaces this number. The Talisman is owned and edited by Theophilus Fisk, and we job-serve that some of the contributions are from the pens of some of the best literateurs of the day. Monthly, at $1 per year. Address T. Fisk, Philadelphia, Pa.

The NEW YORK ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE for October comes to us with the usual (4) number of engravings, and quantity of varied and interesting reading matter. 'The Flight' is the first plate, and an exciting scene. The second is a pretty rural scene on the Hudson. The third is the 'The North Foreland,' a picturesque view on the shores of England. The fourth, 'The Water Carrier.' 25 cents, at Beesley's.

Harpers Publications.

A FIRST BOOK IN LATIN, containing grammar, exercises, and vocabularies, on the method of constant imitation and repetition. By John McClintock, A. M., and George R. Crooks, A. M., Professor of Languages in Dickinson college. This is a copious work containing 400 pages well bound in leather, and is no doubt one of the best works extant for the Latin student.

LECTURES TO WOMEN ON ANATOMY AND PHYSIOLOGY with an appendix on WATER CURE. By Mary S. Gove. Fourteen lectures are contained in this book, upon the study of Anatomy and Physiology. The formation of bone, number and position of the bones, Muscles, Eye, Ear, and Nose, Circulation, respiration and ventilation, Anatomy and Physiology of the Stomach, Diatetics, (3 lectures,) Fluids, Nervous System, 2 lectures, Diseases of the Spine, Education, to which is added Philosophy of Water Cure, on the different modes of applying water, cases, with mode of treatment, etc. 300 pages 12mo, neatly bound in muslin.

ALTOWAN: OR INCIDENTS OF LIFE AND ADVENTURE IN THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS. By an amateur traveler. Edited by J. Watson Webb. In two volumes 12mo, containing 500 pages. This work is got up in neat style on good type and paper, and handsomely bound. From a cursory examination we judge it to be a very interesting book, consisting of sketches of Indian habits, and incidents of chase among the wild beasts of the Western forests, by a British officer on half pay.

Nos. 109-10, and 111-12 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE, concludes King Henry Fifth and begins King Henry Sixth. At Beesley's.

NOTICE.

We are sorry in being obliged to inform the brethren within the bounds of the CAYUGA ASSOCIATION, that Br. A. G. Clark who has recently been engaged in preaching to them as a missionary, has met with a serious accident by the running away of his horse, which will prevent him from fulfilling the duties of his station for several weeks, perhaps months. We are indebted for this information to Br. J. M. Peebles, who writes in behalf of Br. Clark.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street Buffalo.

Br. T. J. Sawyer authorizes us to receive subscriptions or donations to the Theological Institute. Any one who may wish can therefore remit direct to this office, and the receipt of the money will be acknowledged in the Magazine and Advocate.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The EDITOR will preach at Ilion the first Sunday in October.

Br. G. W. VAN VLECK will preach in Sennet on the first Sunday in October.

Br. J. H. TUTTLE will preach in Cedarville on the 2d Sunday in October instead of the first.

Br. T. J. WHITCOMB will preach at Graves Hollow the second Sunday in October, and once in four weeks thereafter the ensuing year.

Br. J. H. HARTER will preach in Mottville, the second Sunday in October, and in Genoa the third Sunday in Oct.

THE PHILANTHROPIST.

BY REV. E. W. REYNOLDS.

The last dim ray

Of heaven's golden sunlight, shining on
Earth's calm and throbless bosom, pierc'd
A solitary lattice, and did streak
With hues transparently beautiful,
The form of one who lay upon
A lowly couch, around which stood
The care-worn, faded forms of Poverty,
Awaiting the last ebb of Life's Slow-dimming streamlet, when his Long-struggling spirit would be free,
To seek unbroken and eternal rest!

He whom Death

Held in his cold and iron-strong embrace,
Had been a bright and beaming star
Amid the earth's far-reaching wastes—
Had been a Light, as of pure Heaven,
Shining into a dark, chaotic gulph;
A beacon on a trackless moral deep,
Where barque on barque goes down amid
The wrathful tempest of man's relentless
Passions; he was—what every creature
Of Heaven's great King should be—
A lover of the Human Race!

And now

Angels laid their golden harps aside,
All listlessly, for period short,
And left the congregation of the blest,
Past countless orbs to speed on anxious wing,
Down to our distant earth, and here,
Hovering around his last abiding place—
On Time's storm-beaten shore—
To see the good man die, and bear
His rapturous spirit up on wings of light—
Meet offering for the Deity!

The dying Benefactor

Had oft gone forth, in steps of Him who died
A willing death, that Man might see and know
The Eternal Truth, and Holy Light of Heaven,
And Grace of God, pour'd free as nightly dew
On sins of men, their blackness to efface.
He had the dark and rayless prison sought,
Where grief bedewed the pallid cheek with tears,
Where voices of the penitent arose,
In supplications calm and low to Heaven;
Where crime was couched in all its direful forms;
And where Malignity's red eye balls glowed
With fires that burned within a villain's heart!

Though dreadful was the place

Where sights were seen that shocked a Christian soul,
And where the very atmosphere one breathed
Was heavy with Iniquity's hot breath;
He shrink not from the imperative command
Of Son, benevolent and just. Those walls
Though dark and uninviting, still Enshel'd full many a human form, in Likeness of the Prince of Heaven created.
Though they had ceased, to Purity's sweet voice,
To 'lend a listening ear,' they still had souls
Destined to bask in the effulgent rays
Of Eternity's pure sun-light, when the Corrupting influences of sinful earth
Should have been swept away, by the strong tide
Of God's eternal and unchanging Love.
Hence he could strive, and toil and suffer for E'en the far-fallen and debased.

And oft,

While bending low within a dungeon cell,
To pour the balm of sympathy and love
Upon some suffering, and an erring man;
While speaking thus soft words that might console,
And bring the deformed one to rise
And stand unshamed in virtue's spotless robe,
Promising respect, once forfeited, of man,
And more, the approbation of his God
And communion—at such times the warm tear
Of gratitude and penitence, springing
From the broken fountains of a melting heart,
Would course the care-worn, crime-worn dimple down,
That sorrow had e'er been wet by tear before!
Then the tear-dimmed eye, falling upon
This follower of Christ, with grateful gaze,

Told more than volumes would have told of that Poor erring man's deep gratitude and love!
And then the good man felt himself repaid
For all his toils and sufferings, far more Than gold; and a great multitude's applause;
Could him have recompensed!

The Orphan and defenceless Widow who,
Steeped in the tears of deep affliction, knew
No help, no comforter, save Him above,
Were welcomed to a home of happiness
By him, who, from sweet experience, knew
It was more blessed thus to give than to Receive.

Oft when he passed a humble cottage by
And heard within, light voices musical
With their own joy—a joy which he had caused,
He wiped a tear from his fast moist'ning eye,
And thanked his Father in a silent pray'r,
That he had given him a heart to feel
For other's woes, and will and means, their deep Heart torturing sorrows to alleviate.

But now,

In ripe old age, in calm and summer hour,
Disease had laid his withering hand upon
The Philanthropist. His labors of good
On earth had reached a period, and 'round
The couch of dying nature stood, weeping
In agony of woe, past utterance,
A multitude, whose lot the dying man
Had rendered blessed. But in his soul,
There raged no storm of grief or of regret.
In springs of sacred Peace his spirit drank,
While angel-whisperings around he heard,
That seemed to call him from his suffering bed,
To fly with them the vale of shadows o'er,
And stand beatified in spirit land!

A light,

As of Eternity, beamed on his face—
A moment before all pale and colorless;
It was the light that Faith shed on the soul
In its last moment of painful travail,
And it burst through material covering,
And e'en lit up, angelic brightness with,
The countenance, as through the parted lips,
Fled the last lingering breath!

LIFE.

How much is embraced in the short space of man's existence. Change during that period works wonders. The whole animal substance passes away and is renewed ten times during the common period of human life. Nations rise and fall. Thousands are born and die. The whole world as it were becomes changed, and yet, how little do we think of life. We look upon it as a vapor, or as a dream of the night so quickly does it pass. Yea we declare with one of old, 'My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle.' But although they are soon told they are long enough. There is a sufficiency of time to form a good character, which is more precious than riches, and also to tarnish that character—time enough to surround ourselves with friends or enemies—time enough for man to do every thing necessary, if he will improve it—time enough to perform every duty and thus fit him to die in peace. But oh, how negligent is man!
How little does he appreciate the value of life!
How great his accountability for time misspent!
and yet we wish for more of life. Let us improve what we have; and sure am I, that we shall be satisfied with it. Shall live in joy and die in peace.

THE SAFE SIDE.

Truly friend, you Universalists seem to be very happy. Your doctrine is pleasing, and to tell the truth, I should really like to believe in it, and be a happy Universalist. But I reckon it is always best to be on the safe side. If you are right, I am safe enough; but if you are wrong, our system makes your case desperate indeed. So I think I will keep my faith and be safe.
Once on a time, as tales usually begin, two men went fishing. A. had a good substantial boat that admitted no water, and B. was in a leaky old canoe, which would hardly sustain its own weight. A. caught fish in abundance, and had before him the prospect of a rich repast; but B. had no time for fishing. It took all his time to bail his crazy boat, and keep it above water.

Truly, said he, neighbor A. you are very happy there. To tell the truth, I should like right well to be in your boat; but I reckon it is best to be on the safe side. If my boat sinks, I can get into yours, and I know you have fish enough for us both. So I will stay where I am. If this boat goes down yours will save me, but if yours sinks your case will be desperate. Your fish and boat are gone —my boat will not hold you, and as for fish, I have none for myself. The last we saw of poor B. he was bailing the old boat, and enduring the pains of hunger for the purpose of being safe. 'Whoso readeth let him understand.'—[Western Univer-

DIVINE AND HUMAN AGENCY.

We are not unmindful of the personages, and of the place, to which the great poet ascribes the first recorded discussion of this topic, nor of the dubious results to which the immortal fathers of metaphysics came, while they

Reasoned high
Of Providence, Foreknowledge, Will and Fate—
Fixed Fate, Free-will, Foreknowledge absolute;
And found no end, in wandering mazes lost.

If it be true, however, that the question had its rise under such dire auspices, we may reflect that, subsequently, the foul reproach of its origin has been happily removed, by the labors of human philosophers and of grave divines, who have transferred the discussion to our world, and naturalized it even in the church. Still, it must be confessed, they have not cleared away the perplexities in which the original disputants are said to have lost themselves. In this one respect, at least, the ill-omen of that first attempt seems to exert its malign influence down to our own day. After some centuries, now, during which the question of Necessity or Free-will has been argued, on both sides, by the most profound and acute thinkers, what is the result, even with the higher order of minds, as well as with the lower? Two opposite conclusions; each of them held by men of deep and patient thought, who have read, and analyzed, and, as they think, fairly solved, or superseded, all that has been brought forward on the other side! The controversy is now as far from an 'end' as ever, and apparently farther than formerly.

We confess, in the outset, that we have no expectation of putting the matter at rest. Indeed, we have no expectation of laying it open to the bottom. If we mistake not, the subject is one that has two sides, both of them running out parallel to each other, as far as the human understanding can trace it. Of course, people, whose minds are differently trained, will see it in different aspects; even the same person will see it differently at different times, accordingly as he fixes his attention more on one side or the other. The most we can hope for, is, to contribute something towards guarding against an exclusively partial view on either hand, and to bring people to look at both sides in their mutual relations. But as to the ultimate point, which terminates and solves the question, it is not to be reached by such powers as we have; much less is it to be explained to any general satisfaction. A glance at the history of argument and opinion on the subject, for the last two centuries, is enough to show how arrogant would be the hope of success in this respect.

We say, for the last two centuries; for, until that period, the metaphysical question between Necessity and Free-will appears to have been but little agitated in the church,—the ancient controversy between Augustinism and Pelagianism, having turned on another point, as did likewise the controversy between Calvinism and Arminianism, in its early stages. It is true, that Calvin himself, and the Supra-lapsarian party, asserted, though in general rather than philosophical terms, the absolute government of the Divine will over the human, in all its exercises, both before and after the Fall. But the followers of Augustine, and most of the advocates of Predestination down to the middle of the seventeenth century, held that the human will was at first free, and that it continued so till the fall of Adam, and indeed that it remains so still, in relation to every thing except moral objects. Generally speaking, they had no thought of its original and universal subjection, in the immutable nature of things; they contended only for its accidental subjection, and this merely to sin, in consequence of the entire moral perversity into which, it was alleged, man had fallen. The great question between them and their opponents was not a philosophical, but a theological, one; namely, Whether the Fall corrupted our nature so completely as to destroy that original freedom, or competency, to choose moral good, as we choose other things,—whether it made us wholly inclined to evil, so as leave within us, no element whatsoever of moral good, and therefore no means of forming a good intention. This was the point at issue; here was the polemical arena. Not but that both parties frequently strayed out around into the wide, dusky, unexplored regions of metaphysics, in order to gather illustrations, and to escape from difficulties. There, however, the light and darkness were to them undivided, and it was commonly the case that they soon returned from their 'wandering mazes,' to the old familiar ground of dispute.

But when philosophical inquiries concerning the will began to enter largely into this theological debate, the ground of contest became essentially changed; though the circumstance was not generally observed. The question no longer was, whether man had lost his original freedom, but whether he ever had any; or, more strictly speaking, whether he ever had a free, purely self-caused volition in respect to anything. Now, it is easy to see, in this change of the question, that the controversy, though still carried on under the same name as formerly, was, in reality, about a very different matter. The term, freedom, was unconsciously shifted, from the old theological idea, back to another that lay wholly behind it. In the old dispute, it was merely relative, and meant freedom to choose good in the same sense only that we are free to choose any thing else, whatsoever that sense might be; in the new, it went back of all this, and meant an independent self-determining power of the will in all matters indifferently. No two things could be more distinct; and yet, deceived by the ambiguous term, people have generally confounded them together, and treated them as if they were the same,—as if disproof of the latter was disproof of the former. It is probably the common impression, even at this day, that if the philosophical question concerning the will be decided in favor of its absolute dependence, that settles the point in controversy between Calvinism and Arminianism with respect to the special impotence of fallen man, in the work of regeneration. True, it may do something, indirectly, towards settling the matter; but to a very different result than is usually supposed. Say, that there is no independent, self-determining power of the will, in any case; it may still be true, that man has the same kind of freedom (or whatsoever we call it,) to choose good, that he has to choose other objects. According to the doctrine of Necessity, it was equally the case before the fall as afterwards, that man could will neither good, nor evil, nor anything else, except as he was made to do so by some efficient causes, some adequate motives, that lay back of his will and determined it. Now, grant that man fell; grant that he became totally corrupt, though we of course, believe nothing of the kind. Yet, how could even such a change materially affect the laws of his will? we mean, with respect to this one power of choosing good or evil. Was not his will just as perfectly under the control of causes, as it had been before? of causes, which were still employed, in the counsel of God, as means to determine his volitions? and which did actually determine them as efficiently as ever? According to the doctrine of Necessity, he was no more dependent, or impotent, in the act of choosing good, than he originally was; no more than he still was, in choosing any thing else. He might still be made to attach himself to good, by the same general law as formerly, that is, by the controlling influence of adequate motives. On this ground, there was nothing peculiar, so far as moral impotence is concerned, in his condition after the fall. Such is the way in which the doctrine of Necessity goes to determine this point in the dispute between Calvinism and Arminianism.

We may be told, however, that, even on this ground, there still is a peculiarity in the case, which we have kept out of sight, namely, that when man had become totally corrupt, destitute of every element of moral right, he could not, of course, turn his will to good. But, in what sense is this pleaded by the advocate of Necessity? Does he mean that God could not still make man's will turn to good, by the power of adequate motives? No; but that man, of himself, could not do so. Very well; could he before? Why, then, effect to limit his inability to the state of total depravity? And, even now, can he, of himself, turn his will to any object whatever? Why then say, to moral good, as if that were an exception to the general rule? If we mistake not, there is no room for any essential peculiarity here, according to the doctrine of Necessity. It may indeed be said, that in order for a motive to act efficiently to good, on man when totally depraved, the motive must be of a different kind than would otherwise be requisite; that is, it must be such as is adapted to the exigency. This is true; but not the whole truth. To express it fully, we must generalize the statement, by adding, that every different condition of man's mind, and every different act to be produced in him, require likewise corresponding differences in the governing motives that are presented. So that, after all, there is, in this respect, nothing peculiar to the case of total corruption, since it only comes under the universal law, of appropriate means to given ends.

It is an essential object, with the believers in total depravity, to make out some peculiar impotence of the will, in that condition. For this purpose, they availed themselves, at length, of the doctrine of Necessity, as demonstrating their side of the question on philosophical grounds. It was a sad mistake. That doctrine overthrows their own favorite position; it destroys the alleged peculiarity, by making it universal. To all practical intents, it establishes the utmost extreme of the Arminian hypothesis on this point, namely that man still has the same freedom to choose good, that he ever had, or that he now has to choose any thing else,—no matter whether he be totally depraved or not.—It will be found, sooner or later, that the Calvinistic party could not have selected a more fatal ally, in their cause, than the theory, on which they have so much relied, of the universal and absolute dependence of the will. Here we have one example, out of many, how the respective doctrines of Necessity and Free-will appear frequently to shift their bearings over to the opposite side, as they are carried out towards their legitimate results.

Enough, however, as to their particular bearing on this theological point. Let us now return to a general view of the case itself. We think it safe to say, that ever since the metaphysical question concerning the will began to be discussed in any thing like a thorough manner, it has been generally felt that the advocates of Necessity had the better of the argument in point of mere logic. And yet, people could not, for the most part, feel satisfied with their reasoning; they would not be convinced by it. There always has been, and there always will be, a repugnance, of a moral kind, against receiving its rigid process as complete, and its iron conclusion as final. The human soul instinctively repels every suggestion that may seem, in any way, to confound it with a machine. We must observe, however, that there is, on the other hand, a similar repugnance, though of the religious kind, against admitting any sharply defined conclusion of an absolute Free-will, such as excludes the superintendence of God. It is a curious fact, that in proportion as either of these points is distinctly presented, and urged in its nakedness, is the revolt of our moral or religious nature, in spite of all that logic can do. The reason why this revolt has been more obviously excited by the doctrine of Necessity, than by the other, is perhaps in the greater acuteness with which this point has been defined, the more precise form it has worn, and the superior vigor with which it has been forced home on the understanding.

At first the objections to it were urged, not so much on the ground of any perceivable defect in the process of its argument, as on the ground of the consequences it involved. It contradicted the testimony of our consciousness—so it was said,—and annihilated virtue and vice, merit and demerit, responsibility, and all moral distinctions. These absurdities, which were deduced from it, were held sufficient to set the doctrine itself aside, though it were proved ever so clearly, and to show that something must have been overlooked in the analysis, whether the oversight could be specifically detected or not. It must be acknowledged that this was rather a blank protest; nevertheless, the moral sense of Christendom sustained it, for want of a better. At length a more complete and far more acute analysis of the question was carried out, particularly by Edwards and Priestly, who fairly met all the common objections, unless we except that which was founded on moral responsibility.—Their reasoning seemed to go to the bottom of the case; it was so thorough, so straight forward, and so closely, so firmly linked, that it had the form and texture of absolute demonstration. For a while the doctrine of Free-will seemed utterly exploded from the fields of philosophical argument; but with how much practical success? The number of believers on the victorious side, has not been very sensibly increased. The minds of men retained the same scruples as ever: people felt the same difficulties in the way of conviction, as before they were solved. They could not refute the argument; but they could not believe. Other metaphysicians, however, soon came forward to point out material errors, as they were deemed, in the boasted analysis of the Necessitarians. The present century, especially, has been characterized by attempts of nearly all the leading philosophers to carry the investigation down under the whole course of demonstration which Edwards and Priestly pursued, and to convict their party of having mistaken the real facts in our consciousness, and of having disregarded the peculiar laws of mind as distinguished from those of matter. It is not for us, here, to assume the right of pronouncing summarily, whether all this has been truly made out. There can be no question, however, that the tide of opinion, among philosophers, as well as among others, is now setting more strongly than heretofore towards the doctrine of Free-will, in face of all that has been demonstrated against it. The movement is very sensibly felt even in the religious world. Many of the divines, whose prejudices, both philosophical and theological, ran in favor of the Necessitarian doctrine, have already been carried over to the opposite side, notwithstanding the struggles of their brethren to retain them. The question will doubtless have to be argued anew, since the old arguments, whether sound, or unsound, do not suffice for the demands of the human soul. The parties have, as yet, found no end, in wandering mazes lost.

What if we should give up the expectation of finding the end, and be content to ascertain what may be known on both sides of the subject, without aiming, for the present, to reconcile the facts with each other, or to complete the circle of ideas into which we run.

There are two ways in which, as Christians, we may consider the subject. We may inquire into the purely scriptural view, which we shall also call the moral and religious view; or, we may enter on the philosophical analysis of the question. It appears to us, however, that these two methods, which have sometimes been coupled and pursued together, ought to be kept distinct and apart, for the following reasons: The Scriptures very seldom, if ever, treat subjects in the philosophical method. On most topics, their language is not to be interpreted as the precise language of science, but rather as that of common life. It is not so in the case now before us? Neither do they commonly enter into abstractions, nor follow their own doctrines out into the metaphysical subtleties in which all speculation at length loses itself. They pass over nice points, as a plain, unsophisticated man passes over them in his ordinary mood of thinking; they deal with great truths under such broad aspects only as may be recognized by the most common minds, and applied to practice. In these circumstances, if we attempt to follow their premises to their philosophical results, we are pretty sure to wander out of the circle of thoughts that belong to the purely scriptural view. We go either beyond, or aside from, the simple intent of the writer, and implicate him in meanings he did not distinctly embrace. They may appear to us legitimate and necessary inferences from his positions; but this is the same as to say that they are not his naked positions themselves, nor what he thought of,—they are only our inferences. We must be careful, therefore, to look through his medium, instead of our own, and to limit ourselves to the circle of ideas he had in his mind.

What view, then, do the Scriptures take of our subject? Obviously, a two-sided view. While it is their habitual practice to speak of man as willing of himself, choosing of himself, changing his mind of himself, &c., in the same way as they speak of his doing any thing else of himself, they also, on all proper occasions, recognize the divine agency, or counsel, as supreme over the human mind and actions. Men are always regarded, as we regard them in the practical relations of life, as free agents, we mean in the common undefined acceptance of this term; and yet God is represented as making them voluntarily disposed to such ends, as he pleases, without infringing the laws of their volition. He sometimes awakens discord in the counsels of men, disheartens them in their purposes, turns them from their course, and make both individuals and communities subservient to his will. He beckons to the nations from afar, and they, unconscious of his agency, come in battle-array to execute his judgments on his people. It is he who sends Joseph into Egypt, hut through the voluntary doing of wicked brethren. Not, however, that he made them wicked, in the view of the sacred historian, since they were already so; but he turns their wickedness to his own ends, and eventually to their good. He superintends and directs those complicated processes, in which thousands of men are the immediate and component actors; as, in the deliverance of the Israelites under Moses, he hardens the heart of the already perverse Pharaoh, gives the Hebrews favor in the eyes of the Egyptians, &c., &c. In the times of the New Testament, he blinds the already rebellious Jews, but chooses a remnant of them according to an election of grace, and effectually calls the Gentiles to believe. His counsel is recognized as underlying, in some sense, the whole mass of transactions, good and bad, by which the 'kingdom of heaven' was established in the hearts of men. Even in the crucifixion of Christ, he but accomplishes his own 'determination,' by means of 'Herod and Pontius Pilate with the people of Israel.' At the same time, all this does not impair men's responsibility to God for their disposition and conduct; in the very cases referred to, they are condemned and punished, or approved and rewarded, according to their own deeds, without respect to the purposes they have unconsciously subverted in the higher economy of God. On the other hand, men rebel against their Maker, refuse to hearken to his voice, disobey his commands, resist his spirit, and walk contrary to his will; and, in all these cases, the act is regarded as their own. They also follow his precepts, receive the truth, put off the old man and put on the new man, or change their characters; and here, likewise, the act is regarded as their own. Again: it is man who is everywhere called upon to repent, and blamed for not repenting; and it is God who gives him repentance. It is man who is required to believe, and condemned for not believing; and it is God who gives him faith. It is man who must 'work out his own salvation with fear and trembling; and it is God who works within him both to will and to do, of his good pleasure.' It is man who is required to cease from evil and to do good, to purify his mind, to conform himself to the divine law, to love God and his neighbor; and it is God who is entreated to give us these dispositions, and who is thanked for the bestowment of them, when they have been attained. But we need not go on with the exemplification of this double view. If the two elements in the case appear more sharply contrasted, here, more antithetically expressed, than they commonly are in the Bible, it is only because we have been obliged to set them in closer juxtaposition, in order to bring our abstract into convenient space. We presume that no one, familiar with the Scriptures will think we have at all heightened the coloring which they give to either side.

Now, make as much abatement as we please for supposed figures of speech, oriental hyperboles, for every thing that respects the mere style of expression, and still two things are clear: The inspired writers did habitually regard man as having an agency, a responsible volition, of his own, in all his conduct, in the same sense that he had a personality of his own; and, again, they did habitually contemplate the divine counsel as lying back of that agency, and affecting it, in some way, to sure results without disturbing its laws, or relieving it of its accountability. Even in the case of sin, if they do not distinctly bring the beginning of it, in a person's mind, under the divine direction, they do the subsequent operation of it, and its eventual results. And here they stop. They do not enter into the philosophy of the matter, at all; they never attempt to define the precise distinction between the divine and human, or to fix the point where these coalesce. Probably, they never thought of that question; it certainly was a long time before their successors, in the Christian church, appear to have thought of it, in any of its nicer metaphysical forms.

Such, then, is the two-fold state of the matter, as it stands out, unsolved, on the face of the inspired page. We must now add, that it stands the same, and equally unsolved, in our moral and religious nature. No man can suppress the consciousness that the himself performs his own acts, whether of body or of mind; that he thinks his own thoughts, wills his own intents, makes his own resolves, as much as he makes his bargains or his fences; that he checks or indulges his own inclinations, and thus far forms his own character; and that he is responsible in all these respects. And if he is a religious man, he must, at the same time, recognize the divine power as supreme over his own, in relation even to these personal exercises. He does not, indeed, regard his sin as the work of God, unless he has come to such a conclusion by some process of reasoning; but he does, at once and instinctively, regard it as subject to the divine control. By the spontaneous impulse of the religious sentiment, he looks to God for 'every good and perfect gift,' of a spiritual as well as of a physical nature. He prays to God for a true heart, for wisdom, for moderation, for courage, for a right choice, for repentance, for moral strength to withstand temptation and to overcome evil desires. He asks the like blessings for others, entreating God to convert sinners, to reform the vicious, to keep the tempted from yielding, to dispose the hearts of men to virtue, to direct the counsels of rulers. He sees the hand of God in all the movements of communities, of nations, and of the world. No matter whether, as a speculatist, he holds the doctrine of necessity, of free-will, or of neither; these are the spontaneous suggestions of his moral and religious nature; and he gives utterance to both trains of thought, without stopping to inquire how they may be reconciled with each other, or how they bear on the metaphysical conclusions he may have adopted.

Doubtless, the metaphysicians, on each side, are now ready to show us how the whole case legitimately resolves itself into their hypotheses respectively; into absolute, uncaused self-determination, at the turning point, according to some; according to others, into the absolute determining of the will, in all its movements, by causes out of itself. Be it either way, then; but each party should remember that the conclusion is their own, not that of the Scriptures. The Bible lays down no such definitions. Never does it pursue the subject out to these attenuated lengths, but leaves it where our moral and religious sense leaves it. Every thing beyond, is matter of mere speculation. Though, when once proposed to us, it will indeed excite our intellectual curiosity; still the decision of it, in either way, would be of no consequence to our hopes, our moral development, or our practice, did we, at the same time, but hold sacred the broader views which the Scriptures present. There is enough, here, to satisfy our religious faith, to afford admonition of our duty on one hand, and assurance of the results of the divine government, on the other. Not, however, that the attempt at a metaphysical analysis of the question is at all objectionable, if it be kept on its own ground; but it is important that the margin, between this and the field of Scripture doctrine, should be distinguished as clearly as possible, that we may know where we stand on the authority of revelation, and where we must take to our own speculations.

Before passing over this margin, we would, with all deference, offer a reflection or two, from what has been shown. It would appear, that any method of instruction, which goes to set aside either of the two grand elements we have pointed out, must be unscriptural in its purpose and general character, whatever partial selection of texts may be urged in its behalf. A course of teaching, which directly or tacitly paralyzes our own agency, and explains away our accountability in the conduct of life, is thus unscriptural; and must it not be injurious in its influence? To say the least, its hold on human nature must be brief; and but partial even while it lasts. For men will, in spite of themselves, reckon on such an agency and responsibility, in all common affairs, though they should deny them in theory; and to suppress the same ever-present ideas, in relation to our higher concerns, costs a perpetual effort, which exhausts us in the end. It is also apparent, on the other hand, that any course of professedly religious teaching, which excludes every thing but human agency in the conduct and destiny of life, or which recognizes no directing power of God over the mind, and even over the will, is equally unscriptural, as well as repugnant to the religious sense. It will always be found, on trial, incapable of sustaining, permanently, an earnest spirit of piety and devotion. If these reflections be true, it becomes all ministers of the Gospel to give both elements of the case free scope. We can not conceive of a greater absurdity, than a Christian doctrine which leaves man and his destiny to his own independent determination; unless it be one which denies that he forms his own determinations, or is responsible for them.

There is also a reflection, that we would here present, with respect to the work of regeneration. It has been seen that the inspired writers habitually recognize the divine power as ordering man's ways. Even in common affairs, 'the preparation of the heart and the answer of the tongue is from the Lord.' Indeed, it is 'in him we live, move, and have our being;' and 'of him, and through him, and to him, are all things.' Now, it is evident that, in ascribing our spiritual regeneration to the agency of God, the Scriptures only apply, to this particular work, the general principle they are accustomed to assert in respect to other operations of our minds, and which they sometimes assert in relation even to Christ himself: 'I can, of mine own self, do nothing,' said he. 'The words that I speak unto you, I speak not, of myself; but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works.' And yet, it was Christ who did these works, in every personal sense in which men do any thing. So, in our conversion, we ourselves are, in the same sense, the actors, though the divine power is to be acknowledged in this operation, as in the whole of our lives. We are as active in that change, as in any other; we work in it, and are moved to work in it, by the same laws that direct our volitions in the ordinary course of our experience. Appeals are made to us, and motives affect us, in the same way as in other enterprises; our own efforts are no less necessary, and are no more impotent, than in all the transactions of life. In these respects, neither the Scriptures nor our consciousness recognizes any essential peculiarity in the process.

EXTRACT OF AN ADDRESS PREPARED FOR A SABBATH SCHOOL.

* *—We who attend a Universalist Sabbath School, should evince by the humility of our hearts, and the veneration of our whole beings, for the universal Father, the improvement we make of the Scripture readings and expositions furnished us, tending, as do such exercises, to the edification and instruction in righteousness, of those who are exercised thereby. It would be mortifying indeed, to any sincere Christian, blessed with 'the fullness of the blessings of the Gospel of Christ,' to know that children in attendance on a UNIVERSALIST Sabbath School, were a whit behind the most exemplary scholars at a partialist school,—and why? Because in the former, the Divine character is displayed in all the loveliness and glory pertaining to Him who is Love; while it can not consistently be said that any other teaching than that of the ultimate universal reconciliation, does inculcate the FULL—TRUE character of God! By as much, then, as Universalism is superior in doctrine and in tendency, to the vain traditions, and unscriptural creeds of men, by so much should scholars at a Universalist Sabbath School, be impressed with REVERENCE for our Father in heaven, even the Father and Friend of all.

We can easily ascertain for ourselves, whether we entertain this reverence for the Blessed One.—Do we read His Word with attention; and in humility and prayer strive to become wise unto salvation? If we do, we have reverence for that Sacred Name, and so, are exemplary scholars, even sincere disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ. If we do not, we are strangers to God by reason of irreverence and faithlessness; 'aliens from the commonwealth of Israel,' it remains for us to forsake the evil of our ways in reliance on Divine Grace, and pray to be conformed to the reasonable and joy-promoting requisitions of the law of God. * * Who will believe the individual who says he is a Universalist, when his heart and life are so far traitors to his or her profession, as that he or she in irreverence uses the Divine Name, thus grossly violating an all-important item in a table of the Decalogue: 'Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain'? It is by bigots and hypocrites slanderously affirmed of Universalism, that its legitimate tendency is not to devotion, and to holiness of heart and life; will not the uninformed credit even so weak and wicked an assertion, and will not the gain-sayer, 'infidel,' or 'partialist,' as the case may be, be encouraged in opposition to the truth, if children in attendance on Sabbath Schools are not REVERENTIAL? * * Never read the Scriptures in a careless or inattentive manner, but remembering that they reveal the glorious Gospel of Universal Redeeming Grace, seek to be conformed IN HEART, to the principles of the kingdom of Heaven. We should be unspeakably thankful to our Father in heaven, that that gracious kingdom has come to us, and we should harken to the admonition which Paul gives to the Hebrews in the 12th chapter of his letter to those brethren: 'Wherefore, we receiving a kingdom which can not be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably, with REVERENCE and GODLY FEAR!' Waiting upon the Father of mercies, in such a frame of 'reverence and godly fear,' we are not likely to fail of being benefited by attendance on a Universalist Sabbath School. J. L. C. G.

'The history of the world, as well as the biography of those who have played a prominent part in its concerns, teach one great lesson, worthy of everlasting remembrance. It assures us that it would matter but little what form of danger may assail a man, if he be true to himself. Poverty may lay his chilling hand upon him, and freeze up the fountain of his brightest hopes—disappointment may meet him at every step—affliction may strike down those who are nearest his heart—the breath of slander may attempt to sully his name, and tarnish his reputation—still let him be true to himself; let him maintain a stout heart and a clear breast, and he will eventually outlive the storm. Let those who are struggling with 'low birth and iron fortune,' remember this truth; and let them remember too that no man can be destroyed by others without fault and weakness in himself.

KILLING THE DEVIL.—At the close of the French and Indian war, between the years 1760 and 1770, the town of Litchfield was, with the exception of a few settlements on the river, where now is the finest interval land that can be found on the banks of the Merrimac, almost entirely covered with a forest principally of pitch pine; which was resorted to in the summer season, from many of the neighboring settlements, for the purpose of procuring turpentine, which was found on the high sandy plains that approach within a mile of the river, in greater abundance than any other place in the vicinity. It was customary for a number of persons to go together on these expeditions, with conveniences for spending some time in the woods, and withal well armed. For the time had not become so settled as to leave no fear of a lurking savage, when at a distance from the settlements.

It was about this time, that a party was thus raised in the town of Dracut, among whom was a son of the minister of the settlement, whose name was P—. Proceeding up the river to their place of destination, they commenced boxing the old pine trees, setting their barrels, &c., and every thing being fairly under way, P. thought he might as well take his gun and look about to see if any game could be found for supper. Leaving his companions, he strolled off into the thick woods, looking carefully for small game, when suddenly casting his eyes upward, he beheld what almost transfixed him with horror. In the lofty limbs of an old tree, there crouched a terrible animal with eyes like live coals, licking his long teeth, and apparently just ready to spring on him. The man saw that his only chance was to fire, and raising his gun he let fly at him, and not waiting to see the effect, took to his heels as fast as possible. His comrades hearing the report of his gun, seized their own, and made towards the spot in a body. They had not proceeded half way, however, before they met P., all out of breath, and nearly exhausted with running. It was some time before he could find breath to answer their hurried inquiries as to what was the matter; but at length gasped out that he believed he had 'shot the devil.'

'Well done, my boy,' said an old veteran of the party; 'your father has been trying to kill the devil with the gospel these forty years, and now you have beat him with an old fuscue.'

They proceeded to the spot to examine his majesty, but instead of the devil, found an enormous catamount as dead, 'as a door nail.'

Good intentions will never justify evil actions—nor will good actions ever justify an ill intention; both must be good, or neither will be acceptable.

AN APPEAL,

To the People in and about Newark, Wayne Co., N. Y.

Our appeal is to the world—but more particularly to the people above designated, in the statements and observations we propose now to make. Hear us, we pray you, with candor, and judge with Christian fidelity, of the matters about to be presented. We entertain unkind feelings toward no one; but we have in our possession facts, concerning which we wish you and the world to judge.

We believe that denominations, as individuals, are responsible to God, and the world, for what they say and do; we believe that God's judgment will be upon that denomination, which does wrong itself, or sanctions it in others, by denying the rights of any other denomination; and we believe also that the good sense and correct feeling of the world, will not sustain a wilful disregard by one denomination of the rights of another. Thus believing, we wish to present for the calm judgment of the world, what has already been subjected to the judgment of God.

Some few weeks since, by vote of the Universalist Sabbath School of Newark, a committee was appointed, for the purpose of conferring with the Methodist Episcopal and Presbyterian churches, on the subject of a joint Sabbath School celebration. Our committee, having learned that the Methodists were intending a celebration, while the Presbyterians were not, proceeded at once to the work assigned them. We succeeded in bringing the matter before the committee of the Methodist Sabbath School—who promised to meet us at a certain time and place, confer with us, and give us their answer. Our committee were at the place appointed, and at the time; but the committee of the other School—where were they? It becometh not us to answer; we only know where they were not—they were not where they had promised to be! We waited a day or two, wondering why we were not met, with gentlemanly promptitude if not Christian fidelity, when a written reply was handed us, declining the proposed union.

Our object in the desired union, and the benefits to be derived therefrom, were previously talked over with minuteness between members of both committees, and were fully understood. We had no desire for compromise in matters of doctrinal faith; we wished not that others should surrender a single point; neither could we. But we wished to extend and deepen among us and others the Christian spirit, which is recognized the same among all professed Christians; we wished that our children and others might be purified of all party feeling, and made to love each other; and we wished to break down the wall of sectarianism between denominations, and cause the hearts of the members to be bound together in love. Was not our object a holy one? We believed that a union of feeling (for such there may be without a union of views,) between Sabbath Schools and sects, would disarm the world around of that jealousy, which naturally enough exists in the minds of many, because of denominational quarrels. We also believed that indifferent parents and children might be enlisted in the Sabbath School cause, for the purpose of spiritual advancement, whenever they should see union and harmony existing between the churches and Sabbath Schools of all denominations. And we did not wish to say nor do a single thing, in our celebration, that could by any possibility cause injury or offence to the most sensitive feeling. Such were the benefits talked over and distinctly understood at the time; and we are happy in being able to state, that no less than two of the three Methodist committee men conversed with, concurred fully with us relative to the benefits, which must have resulted from a union celebration—one of the two being the Superintendent of the Methodist Sabbath School. But there was a power back of the committee, the presiding genius of the church, which must needs be consulted; and with what result, the following letter, handed us a day or two after their failure to meet us as agreed, will show.

'Messrs. Of the committee of Universalist Sabbath School:

Your proposition for the Sabbath School of the M. E. church to unite with yours in a celebration, has been duly considered by the committee of arrangements for said school.

The undersigned, as such committee, after having considered the proposal, and consulted the feelings of those interested, deem ourselves unauthorised to accept your proposition.

HIRAM CLARK,
FENNER PALMER,
JONAS PHILLIPS,
JOHN L. LOTT, } Committee.'

Newark, August 26th, 1846.

Our committee, having the best reason to believe that the above letter was based upon the known difference in sentiment between Universalists and Methodists, which difference led them to regard us as anti-Christian, addressed the following in reply.

'To the committee of the Methodist Sabbath School, Newark, N. Y.

Brethren:—Your written reply to the verbal proposition we made you, with the view of bringing about a union Sabbath School celebration, is before us; and we take the liberty of addressing you a brotherly epistle on the subject.

You say that our proposition 'has been duly considered.' Of that we are happy to know; as you are aware that we view the proposed union of great importance, having for its object the promotion of Christian affection. Its full consideration was desirable, surely, that you might act understandingly, and in full view of the consequences of such action.

You also say that, after having 'consulted the feelings of those interested,' you deem yourselves 'unauthorised' to accept our proposition. The understanding we have of these statements is, that you wished to represent the wishes of 'those interested,' of your people, in the course you should take; and that their direction was, that you do not accept our proposition. Do we understand you as you intended? If so, we see the position you occupy toward us. If not, you will please correct us at your earliest convenience.*

The position your people seem to have assumed is, that they can not unite with us in a matter so laudable as a Sabbath School celebration. You did not assign a reason; but we presume it to be, that we differ with you in points of faith. Such difference does exist, upon some points; upon others, and those more essential, we believe that Universalists and Methodists are fully agreed.

But are you justified in refusing, because of the difference between us? Do you not differ as much with us, as we with you? Can we not manifest Christian feeling toward each other, although we do differ in points of faith, and thus cause the world to believe that we are Christians in spirit?

The ground you take seems to be, that Universalists are not Christians, because they do not cherish what you call the Christian faith. But would we be justified in denouncing you as anti-Christian, assigning the same reason? The Methodists, you know, were once pushed beyond the pale of Christian charity, because of their innovations upon established creeds. Have they learned nothing by their experience? Will they do the same thing they once condemned?

We believe that every denomination of professed Christians is responsible, for the position it takes toward other denominations, to God, and to the world. You are responsible to God, for the position you have taken toward us; and unless you have really done His will, by proscribing and denouncing a professed Christian people, He will surely cast you aside, as He did the ancient Jews. You are also responsible to the world; and the course you have taken needs only to be known, to bring upon you its severest judgment.

Do you not know, that the laws of the land acknow-

* As we have not yet been corrected, although members of both committees have met frequently since, the presumption is that we did not misunderstand them.

ledge us entitled to all the privileges of a Christian denomination? Do you not know, that your position does violence to legal decisions? And have you yet to learn, that intolerance among Christians can not, will not, be sustained by the wise and good of the present age?

But perhaps you will tell us, that you have the right to do as you please in this matter—that you can accept or refuse our proposition—take what position you like toward us, and be answerable to no one—least of all, to us. But you can not escape the judgment of God; for He knows the truth or falsity of your position. Neither can you the judgment of humanity, if your ground be only brought before the world; and you know full well that it can be. And you are, in a certain sense, responsible to us; for the generous candor of the world would dictate, that you give us the reasons for your course—and how much more the kindness of the Christian spirit!

We have no more to say to you at present. Should your people, from a reconsideration of the proposition, be induced to join us, happy will we be to receive you, and extend to you every Christian civility. Believe us, we entertain none but the kindest feeling toward you. Please lay this epistle before those you represent. And may God of His infinite mercy bless you.

DANIEL KENYON,
J. J. AUSTIN,
GEO. ALLEN, } Committee.'

This letter undoubtedly exhibits the real position of the Methodist church toward us. It will be seen, that they have done by proscription the very thing they once condemned. And of the truth or falsity of their position, we leave the world to judge.

Time passed on, and brought about a union of the Methodist and Presbyterian schools, notwithstanding their present differences, and ancient persecutions. Of that we were happy to learn; because it proves that both are susceptible of Christian influences. And we believe that the time will come, when the trammels of partyism will entirely be broken, and scattered on the winds of heaven. A favorable omen may be seen in the fact, that the Methodist Superintendent dismissed his day-school, attended himself, and urged his scholars to attend, the Universalist celebration.

We touch now an unpleasant point, and one that should call the blush of shame to the cheek of every lover of Christian kindness. A respectful notice of our celebration was prepared, and handed in to the several churches to be read before the people. The Methodist clergyman read it, and by so doing did well. The Baptist and Dutch Reform clergy probably read it, though we have not as yet learned. But the Presbyterian clergyman not only refused to read it before the people, but refused to take it even, though handed by one of his own church members! Comment is unnecessary. The naked fact, bearing so plainly the mark of 'the beast,' can meet with no approval, in an enlightened and virtuous community, but must receive a decided condemnation.

A few words more, and we close. It is a matter of common observation now, as it was when the Saviour and his followers were denounced by the Jewish Hierarchy, that Universalists are denied the Christian name, and the Christian fellowship, by other sects; and that now, as then, few of the members of the self-styled evangelical churches, have the temerity to break the fetters of party, that are drawn as closely about them as is possible without awakening suspicion, and hear and think and judge of truth for themselves. There is a deep and settled policy in all this. The clergy are fearful of their influence, and their faith. They dare not trust the people out of their sight, though with the Bible in their hands. Oh, what a bondage is that! It is the parent of proscription; it would ever keep the world in ignorance; it advises the people, with a solemn look, not to hear, lest they be deceived; it has not confidence in the omnipotence of truth; it blindfolds and fetters both mind and heart, and it chills the soul with exclusiveness and illiberality. Look well, ye people, to your own freedom of conscience, and beware, oh, beware, of the dogmatical despotism of the clergy!

We close with a few questions, which we wish to have carefully considered. Is there one of the professed Christian churches, that may justly claim infallibility in faith and practice? If not, where is the church that may justly denounce another as anti-christian, because of a difference in faith and forms? If any one presumes to do so, does it not prove itself wanting in the genuine spirit of Christ? What test of the Christian character may safely be substituted for that which the Saviour gave—'By their fruits ye shall know them'? And who that possesses a free mind and noble heart, is willing to submit to spiritual arrogance in the church of God?

We leave these questions with the people. We are not actuated by ill-will in propounding them; for we entertain none but the kindest feelings toward all. But, as a denomination of professed Christians, we have rights, upon which the genius of our free civil and religious institutions will allow no denomination to trample. Believing those rights to have been virtually invaded, we have spoken out plainly in their defence. And now, relying with confidence upon God, and Truth, we submit these matters to the judgment of a candid world.

GEORGE ALLEN.

THE THREE FRIENDS.

Two sisters, named Amy and Anna, were once sitting together upon a grassy bank, when a large dog came between them, and thrusting his nose familiarly into their hands, snuggled down, as if desirous of making one of the party. The two girls caressed him fondly, and called him 'good Dash' and 'pretty Dash'—and many other titles of affection they bestowed upon him. At length the younger of the girls said, 'Amy, I have heard that Dash once saved my life; will you tell me how it happened?'

'With pleasure,' said Amy; and accordingly she proceeded as follows:

'About five years ago, Anna, when you were not more than two years old, we were living in Vermont, near one of the streams that empty into Connecticut river. The snow was very deep that winter, and when it came to go away in the spring, it made a great freshet. The melted snow came down the hills and mountains, and filled the rivers, which overflowed their banks, and overspread the valleys and swept every thing before them.

'The little river near our house suddenly rose above its borders, and came thundering along, tearing away trees and bridges and mills and houses. At last it seemed to threaten our dwelling, and father and mother began to prepare to leave it and fly to the neighboring hills for security. In the preparation for flight you was put into a large basket with some clothes stuffed around you, and set down upon a little bridge of planks near the house while our parents and myself were gathering together a few things to take with us. As father put you on the bridge, he noticed that Dash seemed to look on with interest and anxiety, for the waters made a terrible roaring all around us; and he observed also, on looking back, that Dash had taken his seat on the bridge by your side.

'You had not been left more than ten minutes, when we heard a frightful noise, and on going to the door, we saw, with terror and amazement, that the water had suddenly risen and surrounded the house. Nothing could save us but instant flight. Father took me in his arms, and mother clinging to him, he started for the bridge where you had been placed; but he soon perceived that the bridge had been carried away by the rush of the waters, and neither you nor Dash was to be seen. It was no time for delay or search, for the waves were rising rapidly, and it was with the utmost difficulty that father was able to take mother and me to the hill. There at length we arrived, and leaving us to take care of ourselves, father went in search of you. He was absent nearly four hours—and I never shall forget the anxiety with which we waited his return. We were without shelter; the earth was damp and the air chill; but we were so absorbed in fear for you that we thought not of our own sufferings. At last we saw father coming, at a considerable distance. He had you in his arms, and Dash was leaping and frolicking at his side. I never was so happy; I shall never, never be so happy again, as I was when I saw father coming, and saw that you was safe!

'At length father reached us; though it was a matter of some difficulty, on account of the water, which had choked up the valley. I need not tell how heartily mother and myself kissed you when we got hold of you. We shed a great many tears, but you only laughed, and seemed to think it all a pleasant frolic. When we could compose our feelings, father told us the story of your escape.

'It seems that the waters rose suddenly while we were in the house, and lifting the planks of the bridge, carried you and Dash and the basket upon them, down the stream. The current was very swift, and you must have sailed along at a terrible rate; but faithful Dash kept his place at your side. You had gone about two miles, when the dog and basket were seen by some people standing on shore. Dash saw them at the moment, and he set up a very piteous howl, but they did not understand him.

'When he saw that there was no relief to be had from them, he leaped into the water, and seizing one end of the planks in his mouth, began to swim with all his might, and push the planks towards the land. He was so powerful and so skilful, that he very soon gave them a direction toward a little island which was not distant, and in a few moments they struck the shore, and were held fast by running between some small trees. The dog again set up a howl, and the people before mentioned, now thinking something was the matter, entered a boat and went to the island, where they found you fast asleep in the basket, and dry as a biscuit!'

When Amy had reached this point of her story, Anna put her arms around the dog's neck, and, with her eyes swimming in tears, kissed him over and over again. She said nothing, however, for her heart was too full.—Star in the West.

HANGING—REPLY TO THE SATURDAY EMPORIUM.

In this paper of the 11th ult., our readers will recollect we copied an article from the N. Y. 'Saturday Emporium' on the suicide of Burke, and added some remarks upon that singular production. The editor of the Emporium subsequently noticed our article, copied the last half of our first paragraph only, leaving all the rest of our remarks out, and unnoticed; (which we hope our readers will re-examine, that they may see how fearful the advocates of the gallows are of grappling with arguments.) On the meagre extract he made from our article, he makes the following comments:

Our view of the hanging principle is, not that it is done from the mere spirit of revenge, but for the sake of making an example of the criminal. We do regret that Burke committed suicide, and so should the editor of the Evangelical Magazine, for he can not have forgotten what the Bible says in relation to suicide. In another portion of his article, he speaks of the wretch Freeman, who murdered a whole family, as a 'poor, demented negro.' Demented, 'fiddlestick!' It has been for years the only plea advanced by murderers of the deepest dye, and many, we regret to say, have escaped through its means. Only a few days since, in this city, a man murdered his wife, (to whom he had been but a short time wedded,) in the most diabolical manner; cutting her throat from ear to ear, and otherwise mutilating her. We suppose he is a 'poor, demented' unfortunate being also! Now our views of the present judiciary system are precisely these: As society is at present constituted, we think that some decisive action is necessary to check the great increase of crime. Mere imprisonment will not do it. There are many who, for the sake of revenge for some insult offered, would commit a murder, if they thought their own lives would not be taken in return. Had Burke not killed himself, he might have ultimately repented, and died in the hope of a blessed hereafter. The editor of the Evangelical Magazine evidently thinks that hanging is practised only out of a spirit of revenge. He must learn to think differently.

And what, Mr. Emporium, does the Bible say 'in relation to suicide?' The word suicide does not occur in that sacred volume; so, instead of having 'forgotten what the Bible says,' we were never informed. Will you please to give us a little light on the subject. It is true, the Bible contains one or two accounts of self destruction, as for instance the case of king Saul, but it is totally silent respecting the future destiny of such individuals, any farther than may be gathered as touching the destiny of all men. And if the editor of the Emporium has any new light to impart on the subject, we shall be duly thankful in receiving it.

His crying out, 'Fiddlestick!' at the mention of the poor demented negro, Freeman, is an indication of any thing but seriousness on his part, or an indication that he is more familiar with fiddlesticks than with the Bible, or the subject under consideration.

We are aware that the plea of insanity may be set up in behalf of murderers when there is no just ground for it. But we nevertheless believe that it should in many cases be interposed where it has not been; and that any unprejudiced man who will read the evidence in the case of Freeman, will be convinced that he is, and was at the time of the slaughter of the Van Nest family, a poor demented being.

But why is the plea of insanity, and other unauthorized means of clearing murderers so often interposed? Obviously because the penalty is so awful, so severe, so unnecessary, so irremediable, that many jurors will not convict, and every means is resorted to to prevent conviction, when the penalty is death; whereas, were it imprisonment for life, or any thing but death, convictions would be far more certain than now. The severity of the law defeats its aims.

But the editor of the Emporium advocates the death penalty because he thinks 'that some decisive action is necessary to check the great increase of crime.' Precisely so: and this is the very reason why we oppose the death penalty. He allows that crime is greatly increasing. Now, as the death penalty is, and always has been in force in this State, and crime increases instead of diminishing under it, we are for trying something else more efficient. Universal experience and observation prove that, wherever the death penalty has been the most frequent; crimes have proportionably increased and been most frequent; and on the other hand, that whenever and wherever the death penalty has been abolished totally, crime has diminished. Let us then try some other method of restraining crime, when it is allowed, even by the advocates of capital punishment, that the death penalty does not produce this effect. The editor of the Emporium says, 'mere imprisonment will not do it.' Try it and see. Imprisonment has more terrors to many minds even than the gallows; and especially imprisonment that is certain for life, than the gallows that is so uncertain, as it ever must be when men sit as jurors who have read and duly considered the solemn command of God, 'Thou shalt not kill!'

ANDREW BERNARD SMOLNIKAR.

The above named individual has several times called on us during the past year. He calls himself the 'Messenger of Peace.' He is a singular individual—an 'Austrian by birth'—educated a Catholic Priest, a man of extensive learning, once at the head of a celebrated Theological Catholic School in Austria—now a plain homespun clad pedestrian in America, living in the plainest, simplest manner; but zealously bent on the promulgation of his new views of reforming the church and the world, and bringing about universal peace. He has published a number of volumes, both in German and English, and has another prepared when he can get funds, or find any one to furnish them, for its publication. He is now in Cincinnati, O. At his request we give place in our columns to the following communication from him, announcing the publication of a pamphlet more fully explaining his views and object.

Ed.

FOR ALL PAPERS ON THE GLOBE.

'The Friend of Truth, or the True Catholic; recommended to a careful perusal of all who are able to make use of their reason. By Andrew Bernard Smolnikar, Messenger of Peace, formerly Catholic Priest, and ordinary public Professor of Biblical Studies. Freely translated from the German by the author himself. (42 pages German, and 24 pages English text, 8vo.

After a careful perusal of this pamphlet you will be convinced, that all things are now providentially prepared, which people need to enable them to shake off in a peaceable manner, the chains by which the Roman Pope and other tyrants and oppressors have fettered them, and to establish as one family of God, universal peace on earth. It contains events very important for every person, and especially facts sufficient to open the eyes of every Catholic who is guided blindly by Priests. Therefore we expect that not only Protestants but also enlightened Catholics, who are desirous to find a suitable remedy for their blind companions, will apply all their diligence to spread copies of it. We have stereotyped both the German and the English text, and are able to furnish copies very cheap: 100 copies for $3, and 1000 copies for $25, at the same price, either all English, or all German, or a number of them English and the remainder German, as may be ordered. Any person may send any sum of money, from six cents to fifty dollars for printed writings, by postmasters; and therefore those who have means, can not excuse themselves, that they could not do somewhat towards disseminating copies of this pamphlet, as they can send money for it without danger. And therefore we exhort most earnestly rich persons to distribute largely copies of it amongst the poor; because we are poor and not able to do so. But if those who are able, will not neglect their duty, they will soon see that they never had applied money in so profitable a manner as this. But on the contrary, when means are providentially prepared to save the oppressed those who will make no use of them, are themselves in fault, if they will be stripped of their property and oppressed. You will easily understand this after the perusal of the Pamphlet.

Since it would be very proper for Publishers of Newspapers to take a lively interest in this matter and collect money for copies of this Pamphlet, those among them who will publish this article without delay and send money for 1,000 copies of the Pamphlet as soon as convenient and a copy of the number containing this article, will receive 1,100 copies. All money for this Pamphlet and an exact direction of the person to whom copies are to be sent, is to be directed to:

A. B. Smolnikar, care of Benjamin Bosinger, Printer, Cincinnati, Ohio.

As we can print in a few days thousands of copies from the stereotyped plates, it will be done as soon as possible after orders will be received. You will get in the Pamphlet information respecting a work of about 600 pages, which the author of the pamphlet is now preparing for print, and after it is printed, a Convention of the true Messengers of Peace will be held. But in this pamphlet of 24 pages as many points have been touched upon as necessary, that every body might perceive what he should know, to be moved for a co-operation to effect universal Peace.

A. B. SMOLNIKAR.

'OUR COUNTRY, RIGHT OR WRONG.'

It is an ancient adage that 'one extreme follows another; nor is the old lady's version of it—'one stream follows another'—any less true; as the numerous articles on the above subject seeking an embouchure through the same channel abundantly prove. We thought the accounts on both sides settled and squared when we admitted Br. Bianchi's article. Shortly after we received a very brief article of about twenty lines, touching the matter, from Br. Smith (which was probably written before he saw Br. B's) and at the same time another of about a column from Br. Gibson, disclaiming it to be a 'reply' to Br. B. but at the same time, as the latter complains, giving him sundry cuts and thrusts, &c. Well, though we did not intend the account should again be opened to 'stand open,' we concluded to put them both in, as about 'even change,' and thus 'square the accounts' a second time on the two sides. But we find neither party is satisfied—both want to speak again, and 'open a new and running account,' to ran, the Lord knows how long. As the two parties are equally dissatisfied we think the account is just about even; and so we choose to let it remain in statu quo. If the brethren will find a new channel for their streams they may let one stream follow another as long as they please.

EGOTISM.

If there is a disposition to be despised by the sensible mind, it is a puffed-up, overbearing, swaggering, and low-lived egotism; and yet how often do we meet with it in wending our way through the world. The age in which we live; the influences which surround the minds of men; the present direction of public opinion; all are productive of, and strengthening to this vicious and vain disposition. Show and noise are the orders of the day. It matters not how much knowledge one may have gathered by many long years of laborious toil. It matters not how worthy he may be in moral conduct and ability. It matters not how persevering and industrious he may be in his calling. No! If there appears in his character, a diffidence becoming a man of sense, he is forthwith thrust aside to make room for the ignorant and egotistical coxcomb, in whose mind there are but two ideas, and one of them a stolen one! Give him 'the gift of gab,' senseless, though it may be, and the multitude are ready to run to and fro to gaze at this wonderful prodigy in the shape of a man; this walking monument of greatness, in their estimation, but in reality, a standing specimen of vanity!—a breathing apology for a man! In his own estimation, all are fools, excepting of course, his honorable self; or if not fools, at least he views them as endowed with far less wisdom than has fallen to his share; they are members of the degraded multitude, while he and a few choice spirits of the same drift, are far in advance of the age!—lights of the world!—redemption offerings to save the intelligent creation from the darkness of ignorance and folly!

But no marvel, for this is the age of inventions.—Steam drives the thundering car in its flight along the valley's bed. Steam speeds the proud vessel in its course over the rolling billows of the mighty deep. And why may not steam be applied to man, urging him forward to the temple of renown? We see no reason why it should not, unless he steams too much and with the wrong kind of material! If this may not be so, at least there are not a few who sail by wind! Instead of the slow and ancient mode of conveying intelligence, now 'down with your dough,' it may be sent in the 'twinkling of an eye, from the Queen of the West to the far-famed city of Bosting! An age of inventions! and why may there not be improvements to facilitate the formation of that character, which may gain the confidence, respect, and esteem of the world? Verily there are.

We may take as huge a piece of corruption as ever graced the sink of pollution; place him in the hands of the tailor and barber, and—jerk! there is a man for you, and 'such a nice young man! That there is an outward man, may well be known, for he may be seen in all places of public and fashionable resort. At the 'watering place,' in the airy saloon, the crowded theatre, and the popular church, arrayed in the most costly and glittering habiliment, and upon his countenance an expression which bespeaks him one of earth's nobility. But of the existence of an 'inner man,' there may be some reasonable doubt; or if such a being exists, he is a slave to him who lords it without. The body first and after that the soul. Dives and Lazarus; the one, faring sumptuously every day; the other getting but a crumb! But this matters not; egotism can make ample amends for all deficiencies in qualities and acquirements of mind, and gain the admiration and applause of the multitude.

Young man, a word for thee. Get a smattering of some dead language—no matter about your knowing any thing of the living—patronize the tailor and the barber; array yourself in broad cloth, and support a pair of gentlemanly whiskers, and then ride right over every body that stands in the way! But remember that there is a God in heaven, from whose all-seeing eye nothing can be veiled; who looks down deep into the human heart, and whose scourging rod shall be upon the follies, the vanities, and the corruptions of men S. J. G.

MINUTES OF THE CAYUGA ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS.

Met in Kelloggsville, Sept. 23d, 1846. Called to order by the Moderator of the last meeting. United in prayer with Br. J. M. Austin.

Chose Brs. A. G. Clark Moderator, and D. H. Strickland Clerk.

Read and approved the minutes of the last session.

Received a letter from Br. H. L. Hayward the Standing Clerk, tendering his resignation of that office; whereupon the council passed a vote of thanks to Br. Hayward, for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office.

Elected Br. J. M. Peebles Standing Clerk of this Association.

Adjourned to Thursday morning, 7 1-2 o'clock.

Met pursuant to adjournment. United in prayer with Br. J. H. Harter.

Voted, that the proceedings of the previous session be approved.

Committee on discipline report, no complaint,—accepted, and committee discharged.

Committee on fellowship and ordination reported as follows:—

Your committee report that they have received no application for fellowship or ordination during the time since our last meeting. Your committee further report, that at the last session of this body, H. A. Goss and W. Y. Bliss, signified their intention or desire, to receive the fellowship of this body; but as they are neither of them present, and as there is a difference of opinion with your committee, whether they ought to report in their cases or not, they therefore request the council to receive this matter, and act upon it as in their wisdom they shall deem best. Your committee further report, that at this meeting they have received application to confer ordination on Br. J. M. Peebles, and would recommend that said application be granted. Also that Br. J. H. Harter has signified his desire to receive the fellowship of this Association at its next session.

Signed

J. M. AUSTIN,

D. H. STRICKLAND,

H. HOLDEN.

Report accepted.

Voted that ordination be conferred on Br. Peebles.

Voted that a Letter of Fellowship be granted to Br. W. Y. Bliss.

Brs. I. Curtis, J. M. Austin and S. B. Gaylord were appointed a nominating committee. After due consultation they reported as follows:—Committee on discipline—Brs. Harvey Holden, James Tibbals, and A. G. Clark. Committee on fellowship and ordination—Brs. D. H. Strickland, C. S. Brown, and Luther Fuller. Br. Strickland declined serving, and Br. S. B. Gaylord, was nominated in his place. Report accepted and the committee discharged.

Brs. I. Curtis, L. Fuller, and J. M. Peebles, were appointed a committee to nominate a preacher of the next Occasional Sermon, and delegates to the next State Convention. Reported Br. J. M. Austin to preach the next Occasional Sermon. Br. Bustin having declined, Br. J. M. Peebles was substituted. Reported as delegates to the next State Convention, Brs. Samuel Lockwood and Heman Holden, lay,—and J. M. Peebles and A. G. Clark, clerical,—with power to appoint substitutes. Report accepted and committee discharged.

Brs. J. M. Austin, S. Larnard, and H. Holden were appointed a committee on adjournment. Reported in favor of adjourning to Howlet Hill. Report accepted and committee discharged.

Br. J. M. Austin introduced the following resolution:—Resolved, That the Constitution of this Association be amended as to provide, that hereafter, its annual ses-tion shall be held on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June.

Voted, that when this Council adjourn, it adjourns to meet at Howlet Hill, Onondaga county.

Voted, that the thanks of this Association be tendered to Br. Strickland, for his occasional sermon, and that he be requested to publish it in the Magazine and Advocate.

Voted, that the thanks of this Council be tendered to the brethren of Kelloggsville, and especially to the friends of other denominations, for their liberal and Christian kindness in administering to our temporal wants during our spiritual feast.

Resolved, That the Standing Clerk of this Association be authorised to appoint Conferences of this body at such times and places during the ensuing year as the friends in different towns within our bounds may desire, and as he shall deem advisable.

Voted, that the Standing Clerk prepare for publication in the Magazine and Advocate the proceedings of this council; and that Br. J. M. Astin accompany the same with such remarks as he deems proper.

Voted, that the minutes of this council be approved.

Adjourned to meet at Howlet Hill, the 1st Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1847.

D. H. STRICKLAND, Clerk.

REMARKS.—The Cayuga Association held a very pleasant, and we trust, profitable session at Kelloggsville.—The weather was delightful—two most lovely days smiled upon us. The societies were quite generally represented in the council, and by able and devoted delegates, whose love for our cause, has long been known and tried. There were not so many clergymen present, as could have been desired; but enough to conduct the exercises of the occasion, and give each one a due proportion of the labor.—The absence of Br. H. L. Hayward, (removed to another Association) who has for some years met with us in annual session, and taken a deep interest in the affairs of our Association, was deeply felt and regretted. But our hearts were cheered with an assurance that his place will soon be occupied by a well known and highly valued brother in the ministry, from a neighboring Association.

During our meeting the Cayuga Missionary Society, held its annual session. Measures were adopted which it is anticipated, will soon result in sending forth an able and faithful Missionary, to labor in the waste places within the bounds of the Cayuga Association. It is greatly to be desired that the brethren in our borders, will observe the movements and measures of the Missionary Society, and be ready to co-operate with it, in such steps as it shall adopt to spread the light and truth of the Gospel in the dark corners of the land.

Sermons were delivered during the session, by Brs. A. G. Clark, D. H. Strickland (the occasional—an excellent one)—H. Slade, of Woodstock, Conn., J. H. Harter, late of Clinton Theological Seminary, C. S. Brown, N. Brown and J. M. Austin. On Wednesday evening, after the sermon, (by Br. Harter) a very pleasant Conference meeting was held, in which several brethren took part. On the afternoon of Thursday, Br. J. M. Peebles was ordained to the work of the Gospel ministry. Introductory prayer by Br. Harter—Sermon by Br. Austin—Ordaining prayer by Br. C. S. Brown—Delivery of the Scriptures and charge by Br. Strickland—Right hand of fellowship by Br. Clark—Address to the Society by Br. Austin.—the labors of Br. Peebles are divided between Kelloggsville and McLean; and it was gratifying to learn that he has been highly successful in both places.

There was a very large gathering of the brethren on the occasion. The church was crowded to excess in every part, by devout listeners to the preached word. All seemed happy—all seemed to enjoy to a high degree, 'the feast of fat things,' which was spread before them, in the rich provisions of the Gospel. Our friends at Kelloggsville, greeted us with a warm and cordial reception, and ministered to all our temporal wants, in that abundance, and with that liberality and generosity, for which they have long been well known. At the close of our meeting, a liberal contribution was taken up, at the suggestion of Br. A. G. Clark, for the benefit of Miss Laura Eggleston, of Western New York, a well known writer in our periodicals, who is reduced by misfortunes to indigent circumstances. May we not hope, that all our Associations in the State will 'go and do likewise'?

Per order,

J. M. AUSTIN.

Harpers Publications.

The Harpers have issued Nos. 4 and 5 of the STATESMEN OF ENGLAND, comprising the life of Oliver Cromwell (with a portrait.) The last number contains an index, and concludes the work. The five numbers (inclusive) contain 642 double column octavo pages of reading matter, and at 25 cents per number is very cheap for such a valuable work. G. N. Beesley, Periodical Agent of this city can furnish the work at the publishers price.

No. 8 of that excellent work the PICTORIAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND is published, and discourses of national industry, literature, science and the fine arts, and the manners and customs of the inhabitants during the period succeeding the Norman conquest. Profusely illustrated with representations of implements of agriculture, architectural decorations for buildings, costumes, games, &c. 25 cents at Beesley's.

Nos. 113-14 of the beautifully illustrated edition of SHAKESPEARE, contains Part I of King Henry VI, with notes. 25 cents.

No. 4 of Sue's tale of MARTIN or the Foundling. 6 cts.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We feel deeply grateful for your kind favors and—if—but—why the long and short of it is, that our copy drawer is getting as dry as a 'contribution box'—hate to beg—but will you fill it for us? 'that's the question.'

ANOTHER NEW PREACHER.—We learn from the Watchman and Repository that Br. Orlando D. Miller, a graduate from Norwich University, and cousin of Br. I. D. Williamson, has lately commenced preaching the great doctrine of a world's salvation in Vermont to good acceptance and with fine promise of success. May he continue to preach successfully and go on prosperously, and especially avoid the errors into which some of his relatives and brethren in the ministry have run, in getting unnecessarily into debt, beyond his means, or beyond his disposition to pay.

CHANGE OF EDITORS.—We learn by the last number of the 'Primitive Expounder,' published at Jackson, Michigan, that Br. J. Billings, late one of the Editors and Publishers of that paper, has retired from his post in that establishment, and Br. J. H. Sanford, late of Detroit, takes his place as joint editor and publisher in connection with Br. R. Thornton. The Expounder is a small but very good and spirited paper, published semi-monthly, at $1 per annum in advance to which 25 cents is added for every three months delay of payment. We wish it abundant success.

The first side of the Magazine goes to press on Saturday, and the last side on Tuesday—therefore, articles of much length, intended for immediate insertion, should reach us at least one week before the day of publication, and short articles, religious notices, marriages, deaths, &c., should be received as early as the Monday previous to publication day. Will our corresponding brethren and friends notice this, so as to prevent disappointment,—especially on their part.

ONTARIO ASSOCIATION.

Notice is hereby given that the Ontario Association will meet at the Universalist meeting-house in Lima, N. Y., on the second Wednesday and Thursday in October next, agreeably to adjournment. The delegates composing the Council at its session in June last, together with such as may be elected from societies not then represented, we trust will bear in mind the importance of being in attendance at the opening of the Council, at 7 o'clock, on Wednesday morning. A cordial invitation is extended by the North Bloomfield society, to all the brethren and sisters who may wish to enjoy the meeting, and they will find a Universalist welcome during their stay.

C. HAMMOND, Standing Clerk.

MARRIAGES.

In Auburn, by J. M. Austin, Mr. ALEXANDER TILDEN, to Miss ELIZABETH HARKNESS. Mr. RALPH V. CORNELL, to Miss ANGELINE KEELER. Mr. GEORGE ABBY, to Miss MIRIAM D. BRINKERHOOF. Mr. MOSES C. HAIGHT, to Miss NANCY A. ANDREWS. Mr. JOSEPH HAND, to Miss CHARITY FLETCHER. Mr. WM. C. RHODES, to Miss NANCY LOVELESS.

In Clarkson, Monroe county, on Sabbath evening August 16th, by Rev. A. B. Copeland, Mr. PHILANDER HOSNER, and Miss ABIGAIL LEACH, of the same place.

In Geneva, on the 28th ult., by Rev. J. J. Austin, Mr. WM. M. CROSBY, B. A., to Miss NANCY C. PRESCOTT, both of Geneva.

DEATHS.

In Victor, N. Y., Sept. 18th, 1846, Mrs. CECILIA DRYER, wife of Truman Dryer, aged 23 years. The deceased was constitutionally feeble, and before her death she was confined to her bed for some three weeks, which affliction she bore without ever uttering a groan or complaining of a pain. Sister Dryer was a very amiable woman—kind hearted and pleasant—and a regular attendant at our house of worship. She was held in high estimation in community, ample proof of which was given on the day of her funeral, by the very large congregation in attendance. Thus, death spares not the young and the good. Our brother has indeed met with an irreparable loss, and our citizens deeply sympathise with him. May the blessings of divine grace cheer his heart, and comfort all her mourning friends, with the hope of again meeting on the shores of a happy immortality.

J. R. JOHNSON.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. M. N. BYINGTON will preach at Frankfort, on the second Sunday, inst.

The editor will preach at Oran, on the 3d Sunday inst., and lecture on the Saturday evening preceding, (i. e., 17th inst.,) in Christ's (Episcopal) church in Pompey, at early candle lighting.

Br. J. H. TUTTLE will preach in Cedarville on the 2d Sunday in October instead of the first.

Br. T. J. WHITCOMB will preach at Graves Hollow the second Sunday in October, and once in four weeks thereafter the ensuing year.

Br. J. H. HARTER will preach in Motville, the second Sunday in October, and in Genoa the third Sunday in Oct.

WAWANOSH.

Superior's waters ceaseless beat
O'er the bleached sands beneath my feet;
I hear as 'twere the mimic roar
Of Ocean on its surf-beat shore;
Far o'er the waves I gaze, as we May gaze upon a Summer's sea;
Yet though no lands distract mine eye,
Or thoughts, from Ocean's majesty,
Still feeble fancy strives in vain
To picture this the boundless main.

Old Ocean's billows onward roll
Unceasingly from pole to pole,
Or, dashing on the rocky shore,
O'er spent, they sink to rise no more:
Though lost to us yet still they flow
And mingle in the depths below;
Still form a portion of the deep,
Where restless waters never sleep.

Turn we from thoughts of ocean's pride
To this small inland mimic sheet,
This Summer lake, extended wide,
Beyond where sky and waters meet,
We'll trace what is, and what has been Reflected in its placid breast,
And call up many a vanished scene
Whose actors now in silence rest.
Beneath yon forest trees, which wave
In solemn grandeur o'er the grave
Of chiefs and warriors buried there,
The fleet in chase, the brave in war,
Their sons still dwell along this shore
But not the hardy race of yore,
Who in its bosom plied the oar;
They long, long since have passed away,
And 'neath yon shade their bones decay.
In every murmur of the wave
And every whisper of the breeze,
A sigh is uttered for the brave,
And echoed by the moaning trees.

For Wawanosh's brave battle cry
No more is heard o'er hill or dale,
And none of his proud race are nigh,
To echo it unto the gale.
But once he ruled, known far and near
By many a deed of death and fear,
Sprung from a race of sires whose fame,
Added fresh honors to his name,
With courage matched by naught beside
A fierce indomitable pride,
His sturdy bow and sinewy arm,
Swift as the wind propelled the dart,
Which drank the flowing life blood warm
From the pierced victim's quivering heart.

But yet the hatchet and the knife,
Were still more fatal in the strife,
And foemen fled before his form
As ships before the tempest's storm.
But now the chief had reached the age,
When warriors sink into the sage,
To younger, sprightlier forms resign,
To guard the eve of their decline.
He dwelt upon a rising ground,
The wigwams of the tribe around.
Before them far as eye could reach
And gently sloping to the beach,
An open space of native green,
Relieved the wildness of the scene.
Behind, and upon either hand,
The monarchs of the forest stand,
Beneath whose wide extended boughs,
Were heard the Indian lover's vows;
Beneath whose leafy canopy
There reigned a sweet tranquility,
And wild flowers in their native bloom
Dispelled the deeper shades of gloom,
The lightning's shock, the tempest's blow
Have failed to lay the old oaks low;
With sturdy front, and unbleached brow,
They've stood for centuries as now,
Long may they stand, fit relics they,
Of former ages passed away.

To grace the chieftain's dwelling rude
And cheer life's evening solitude,

Was one, the fairest, sweetest flower,
That e'er reposed in leafy bower,
A maiden of as graceful mien,
As e'er in palaces was seen.
And cupid with relentless dart
Pierced many a dusky warrior's heart;
Love seldom strives with equal speed;
To cure the wounds that inward bleed;
Yet one of all the many found
A healing balsam for the wound.
She cared not for her father's pride,
But loved, and longed to be a bride—
The bride of one whose youthful name
Had never filled the trump of fame.

Olga, the hunter, well repaid
With love and truth, the trusting maid,
And oft with love lit smiling face
He brought her trophies of the chase,
And many a thrilling tale he told,
Adventures of a huntsman bold.
Oft would he linger by her side
At Summer's pensive eve-tide,
Or near her dwelling list her song,
Borne by the gentle breeze along;
Echoed by spirits of the gale,
It seemed a melancholy wail,
Foretelling sorrows soon to be
Though shadowed in futurity.
Yet in her presence this would seem
As memory of a painful dream,
And every doubt would flee before,
The happy smile the maiden wore.

The aged chieftain sat alone,
A despot, yet without a throne
Or regal state, the chieftain's fare
Was flesh to eat, and skins to wear;
Both furnished by the shaggy bear.
No robe of state enwraps his form
But that may brave the winter's storm.
A pile of furs beneath him spread,
Served him as table chair and bed.
At his right hand his sturdy bow,
Which once struck terror in the foe,
Was ranged with arrows none could wing
Like him with death's unerring sting.
Another sight, which might appal,
The faint of heart, hung by the wall—
The blackened scalps of hundreds slain,
Whose life blood long had dyed the plain,
And the gay plumage which he wore
Upon his head, thus nodding o'er
And mingling with his locks of grey,
Seemed to contrast the sad and gay,
But yet a glance within his eye,
Revealed a pride which could not die.

Olga now met him; trembling spoke,
Chilled at the words which silence broke,
Till warming by the blissful theme
On which he dwelt, his love's pure dream,
He poured forth the wild eloquence,
Impassioned, easy, and intense,
Which doth distinguish their free race;
The dignity and manly grace
Which every action brought to view,
Spoke courage, pride, and virtue too,
The chieftain heard the thrilling tale
Of love he told, he marked the tone
In which 'twas said, the flashing eye,
And lips compressed, and features pale,
And last of all the closing sigh;
It sounded as the hollow moan
Of Autumn winds through leafless tree
As though, like Autumn leaves, had flown
The last fond hope his heart had known
Of virtuous love's felicity.

The great secret of success in life is never to give up. If we were to leave a legacy to our children, and nothing better, we should bequeath to them as their motto, "persevere." More is lost than people suppose by want of well directed energy—we do not mean that energy which comes by fits and starts, but a ceaseless tenacity of purpose, assisted by sound common sense, in the affairs of life. Your weak-minded men who give up at the first rebuff, are good for nothing. Great souls only gain immortality by dint of untiring perseverance. Look at Columbus, he was seventeen years in procuring the fleet which discovered a world. See how Washington toiled year after year amidst constantly recurring disappointment, laboring too, under the want of money, and the suspicions of Congress; but he persevered, and our independence was achieved. John J. Astor says it was more difficult to earn his first thousand dollars, than to amass all the rest of his twenty-four millions. He means, really, that the habits of enterprise, activity and perseverance, which he found necessary to earn his first thousand dollars, remained afterwards with him as a habit; and assisted by capital, easily achieved his enormous fortune. Most of our rich men have been poor like him. Do not despair, therefore, Let your watchword be, "never fail!" Rise superior to your fortunes, and you will be great and rich.

DIVINE AND HUMAN AGENCY.

[Concluded.]

We now approach the task of a philosophic analysis; but we do it with a feeling of our incompetence to give any thing worthy of that name. We shall, therefore, only set down some thoughts on the subject, and perhaps offer some remarks on its treatment by others, without repeating on either side, the arguments which are already familiar to every one who has surveyed the ground.

It should be observed, in the first place, that the two doctrines of Necessity and Free-will agree, when properly stated, to a much greater extent than is commonly supposed. We must confess, however, that when they are developed independently of each other, when each one is argued out straightforward, 'through thick and thin,' without regard to the corresponding facts on the opposite side, they do run far apart, and end in very different results; Necessity in Pantheism, and Free-will in egotistic Atheism. But such a reckless course of argumentation, though it may seem very straight logic, is utterly unphilosophical, and indeed self-destructive. Both doctrines in their philosophical form, may agree so far as this, namely, that man has an agency of his own,—free agency, in the common vague acceptance of this phrase; that he makes his own choice and makes it just as he pleases, never against his will, but always by his will; that he forms his own character; and that he is guilty or approved according to his character; also, that whenever he wills, it is in view of motives, and under influences from within and without. The only point on which they must differ is, barely, whether man does all this under government of the law of causality, or, on the other hand, independently,—whether there are efficient causes behind his will, by which it always acts with certainty, or whether its movements follow from no such causes, but are strictly self-originated. This is the point at issue,—so sharp, so attenuated. The whole is, in a great measure, but an attempt to analyze the common vague notion of Free-agency, and to express it with scientific precision and completeness.

We must add, that in proportion as the two doctrines have been more and more carefully defined, they have always been found less and less to diverge. Is there a point in the yet unexplored depths of the subject where they come together?

It should also be observed, that in tracing them out, their bearings, even within the scope of our vision, often appear to shift sides, so that Free-will seems to turn into the most frightful necessity, and Necessity into the highest rational freedom. Freedom, let it be considered, is never liberation from law. This is anarchy, the worst of all tyrannies; though it is often mistaken for the former. Perhaps this suggestion will be enough to illustrate the principle upon which the two doctrines appear so frequently to counterchange their bearings. It may be well, however, to give some examples.—Now, if the movements of the will are self-originated, in such a way as not to be produced by causes operating upon it, what is the use of commands, appeals, exhortations, inducements, or motives of whatsoever kind? These are always meant to act on a man, as causes, and through him on his will. They are used for the very purpose of moving his will to a certain determination.—Have they legitimately any force on his volitions, or not? For, if he determines his will independently, or if, at the ultimate turning-point, his will decides itself by pure contingency, these motives are an absurdity,—they have nothing to do in the case. And, moreover, the man is not responsible in his act, since it is motives which give moral character to all acts. It would be a strange kind of freedom, in which motives did not govern the choice. No matter if it be said that the man chose his motives, in the case; for the inquiry would still follow, Was his choice of them, in turn, governed by motives—other motives that lay farther back? and so on. Again: the very notion of such a freedom (pardon the misnomer!) as exemption from the law of cause and effect, in man's determinations, involves the idea of mind in a state of perfect chaos; we do not say, of madness, for madness falls far short of the confusion. A distinguished writer has well remarked, 'Ought not, then, this freedom from causation to be termed rather a necessity of the most dire and formidable sort? and he whose prerogative it should be, would become an object of as much pity, as the wretch who lives in the grasp and keeping of a madman. This power or prerogative, of contingency (by the hypothesis,) obeys no motive, adheres to no connection of truth with truth, is not to be calculated upon, or foreknown, is not governed by relationship to any actual existence or abstract principle. But it is manifest that, to an intelligent being whose welfare is committed to himself, and who provides for that welfare by calculating upon the known order of nature, the liability to contingency, whether in the external or internal system, must be a pure curse, by deranging every position and thwarting every purpose. A liability to sudden frenzy would not be at all more fearful than a liability to sudden contingency. The unhappy being, so privileged to live beyond the circle of nature, and so distinguished as an outlaw from the orderly system of causation, would be justified in making for himself such an apology as this: Whenever, and as long as, my conduct is governed by reasons and motives, I cheerfully consent to be treated as a responsible agent, and am willing to receive the due consequences of my actions. But not so, in those dark moments when the fit of contingency (my fatal glory!) comes upon me. Then, and in those portentous moments, I am no longer master of my course, but am hurried hither and thither, by a power in the last degree capricious, whose freakish movements neither men, nor angels, nor the Omniscient himself, can foresee. Fain would I surrender this fatal freedom, and take my place among those who enjoy the benefits of the laws of nature and reason; but it is the unalienable condition of my existence to be governed by a power more stern and inexorable than Fate herself. . . . Now, could we deem it a perfection, in the constitution of a rational agent, that his power should operate like a vague and brutal violence, taking its course this way and that, with the blind vehemence of a hurricane? Or, is not rather the idea of rational perfection filled up by the supposition of power related on the one hand to its subject, by the bond of uniform and unfailing efficiency; and on the other to the knowledge and emotions of the agent by the tie of infallible determination or direction? Whatever is deducted from the constancy or invariable sequence of these connections, makes a proportionate deduction from the excellence and true freedom of the agent. The agent whose power is not thus necessitated, in the most absolute sense, is, to the whole extent of the want of necessity, not free. A deficiency of necessity, in the higher sense of the word, is an increase of necessity in the lower. And here, once more, we must note the synonymous import of the words, liberty and necessity, when the highest perfection is spoken of.

It appears to us, in the second place, that reason, common sense, and even our consciousness itself, plainly recognize the grounds on which Necessity (so called,) is argued; and that the dissent, which there is in our nature, from the ultimate conclusion of that doctrine, relates to nothing in the several stages of its analytical process, but to something that may be supposed to lie deeper than the process goes. As to reason, we need not show that its deductions from general principles are in favor of Necessity, since this is commonly acknowledged; with the exception, perhaps, of what is inferred from the fact of human responsibility, and the reality of moral distinctions. We shall, therefore, proceed at once to the testimony of our consciousness, which is commonly supposed to be wholly on the other side. Now, the question on this one point, may be reduced to a very simple form: Are we conscious that, in willing or choosing, we will or choose independently of causes? we mean, independently of causes in the previous and existing state of our affections, habits of mind, &c., as well as independently of causes in the world of circumstances around, and in the considerations and inducements that come to us from without. We scarcely need say that, if we are conscious at all, in the case, it is of the very reverse. Observe, the question is not, Whether we are conscious of doing freely, what we already will to do; it is the will, not the consequent act, that we are now concerned with. Let the two be kept distinct; for it is by confounding these, that most of the blunders are made, which are current on the subject. Neither is it the question, Whether we are conscious of willing without the sense of compulsion, violence; for, whatever it be, that turns the will, it can not, in the nature of things, be felt as violence, since the turning must be voluntary,—that is, must be the turning of the will. But are we conscious that we will without any cause, good or bad, to make us do so?—this is the point. Sitting here in my study, this quiet afternoon, the thought occurs, to rush out, bare headed, into the street, and to cry Fire! at the top of my voice. Now, there are two things, here, of which I am distinctly conscious: 1. That I can do so, if I please,—all which, however, has nothing to do with the question. 2. That under existing circumstances, and with my habits of mind, I can not will to do so,—nor please to will so,—and for this reason only, that there is nothing to move me to the determination, and much to restrain me from it. I am conscious that my will is as the causes in the case. I can, indeed, conceive of some other conditions in which such a will would be, not only possible, but certain; as, for instance, with my present habits of mind, let a fire actually break out, and the alarm be needed; or, let my habits of mind be thoroughly bent to the practice of all kinds of ludicrous, boyish mischief, and then let this wild freak be suggested to me, &c., &c. Or, change the case to one of a purely moral character: There is my good neighbor over the way,—I am conscious that I can injure him, if I will; and I am equally conscious that I can not, now, will to injure him, nor even try heartily to form such a will. I have the capacity to hate him, were I so disposed; but, just now, I neither am, nor can be, so disposed. I am conscious that I can neglect to visit yonder family in distress, if I will; and I am conscious, that as things are, I can not will to do so at present; though a new circumstance may occur, in the next half hour, or the next minute, which will determine me to that effect. And so, in all cases of the will, as distinct from the consequent act.

We have intimated that we are, indeed, conscious of doing freely what we already will to do. Yet there is no dispute between the two parties, that, here, the consequent 'doing,' or act, follows by strict necessity, so called. It is produced by the will; it is governed, from beginning to end, by the will; and nevertheless, our consciousness recognizes it as free,—we do not mean as uncaused, but as free. This is a very significant fact, letting us at once into the real character of conscious freedom. I will to take up that instand; forthwith my hand, arm, &c., are moved by that volition, and directed by it, and all the process is regularly evolved out from it, by the law of cause and effect. Indeed, some metaphysicians hold that our first idea of causation, as distinguished from mere sequence, comes from our consciousness of thus producing effects by our will. Here, then, is an unquestioned case of what is called necessity; and still it is one of conscious freedom. In it, we see all the fact that is expressed, in common usage, or that is intended to be expressed, by this latter phrase. The two ideas become identical; not, however, the two ideas involved in the metaphysical question under review; but the two ideas of acting by causation, and of acting freely. Indeed, we do not naturally conceive of freedom as exemption from law, but from oppression; we naturally conceive of it, not as opposed to what is here termed necessity, but as government by such law as is congenial with the nature of the case.

It is important to remark, by way of digression, that the term, freedom, is not the proper one to be set in contrast with necessity; or, rather, that neither term is fitly chosen. In the strict use of language, the will is actually free, in all its determinations, even according to the doctrine of Necessity; and so is the act which is produced by it.—The question in debate, instead of being framed thus, Are our wills determined necessarily or freely? should have been stated in some such form as the following, Are they determined by the law of causation, or by contingency? are they governed, or not governed? &c., &c. We will not, however, dispute about words, but leave the old technical terms in their place, from which it would, now, be so hard to dislodge them. At the same time, the reader can not guard too carefully against being misled by them, and by their associations. He must look through them, and fix his eye on the ideas for which they here stand.

But let us return. Had we proposed in the outset, to show that the plain common sense of mankind habitually recognizes the principles of the Necessitarian doctrine, it would perhaps have been regarded as an extravagant paradox,—a sort of advertisement that we were about to enter on a game at ingenious quibbling. But at this stage of the development, it is needless to do more than just to refer to the facts which illustrate the position. Now, all social confidence stands on the universal persuasion that men's minds are regulated by certain laws, of which we have some general knowledge, and which, when known, may be depended on.—All our calculations with respect to men's conduct, are made on the same ground. We all believe in the control of the human will by causes. We strive to turn each other's wills; and we actually do govern them, with quite as much success as a physician controls the course of a fever, or other disease. A man's practical influence in society, is but the hold he has on the wills of his fellow men. Whoever has charge of others for discipline, whether moral, intellectual or physical, is required by us to govern their wills to a corresponding extent; and if he fails, we cashier him for incompetency, or neglect. If a schoolmaster does not govern the wills of his pupils, within the prescribed limits, we censure him, turn him off, and get one who can govern them; for we know that such are to be found. How would he succeed, before practical committee-men, with a plea that his pupils were free-agents, and therefore not to be governed by man or God? The human will is, indeed, a very delicate subject, and the elements that go to make its particular determinations, in a given case, are so numerous and complicate as often to baffle our calculation; just as the causes that will combine to determine the blowing of the wind, at a given hour, are too various to be anticipated with certainty.—But 'if we knew a person thoroughly, and knew all the inducements which are acting upon him, we could foretell his conduct with as much certainty as we can predict any physical event.'

Such appear to be the facts in relation to the movements of the will. All men recognize them, and act upon them. It is curious to observe, how perpetually disputants themselves betray their consciousness of them, even while arguing against necessity, or asserting absolutely independent volition.

At the same time, however, we ought also to remark, that all men evince an equally irrepressible consciousness that our wills are not determined for us, as the doctrine of Necessity in its grosser form, might seem to imply, but that it is we who immediately determine them; that it is we who must resolve, must settle the confusion of conflicting motives within ourselves; and that we must do it by putting forth efforts of our own, by exerting our own power of self-control, and thus ruling the chaos. In short, we are conscious that we are not machines, waiting passively to be put in motion; we are not impelled by any thing like mechanical forces. No man ever acts on this idea, even when he pleads for it; no man can act, but on the persuasion that we are living agencies, instinct with power of our own, having the spring of action in ourselves, and that we are umpires amid surrounding influences,—all this, in every sense that we are personal beings, and not mere sections of a Pantheistic whole. The facts we have adduced, in favor of necessity, must be interpreted within limits circumscribed by these considerations; and these, again, must be held in consistency with them. A difficult problem, indeed! which we do not attempt to solve. We only bring together the facts on both sides.

There are two sides. Were we to take the doctrine of Necessity as adequately expressing all there is in the case, and stop at the conclusion that every volition of ours, every movement of our minds, every act, is but a fixed link in the chain of causes and effects, which runs forth from God, and constitutes the universe,—let this be regarded as the whole of the matter, and we are brought to Pantheism at once. In this case, God is the sole agent, moral, intellectual and physical. He does all the willing, he does all the thinking, through us; he makes our characters for us, does our labor in the field and workshop, loves for us, and hates for us, eats our dinners for us, perpetrates our crimes for us. Or, rather, he being the sole agent, the only life of the whole, we do not exist as persons, but merely as integral parts of him; and it is he alone who acts in us as, literally, his members.

It is unnecessary to add, that, at this point, all moral distinctions would obviously cease, both in God and in man, if we might still use this latter term. There is another consideration, however, which is more likely to be overlooked: Even in its most guarded form, the doctrine of Necessity, if taken for the complete statement of the subject, legitimately resolves all moral principle into a mere notion or prejudice. For example: The universal chain of causes and effects, in its straight-onward process, evolves out certain actions in us, and evolves them altogether by the will of God, or by the unalterable constitution of the universe. These actions, in turn, have indeed their effects, of pain or of pleasure; but they are neither right nor wrong, we mean in respect to any absolute, eternal law. For this law simply is, that they are to be; never, that they ought to be different than they are, nor indeed that they ought to be even as they are.—There is no 'ought' in the case. They are simply bald facts, produced by the regular development of the universal mechanism. There is no moral element in them, in relation to the great First Cause; though it is wisely provided that we should feel as if there were something of the kind. But this feeling itself does not reach beyond ourselves, and is found to be erroneous when judged by higher laws. We have, however, discussed this point more largely, in a former volume of our work.*

* Universalist Quarterly, vol. i. art. vi.

The doctrine of Necessity, then, appears not to cover the whole ground, at least in any form in which it has hitherto been defined. Though it be true, as far as it goes, there are principles and modes of power it does not embrace. Man is not only acted upon by causes within and without, but, in some mysterious way, he does, at the same time, really act from himself, even distinct from the action of God, in the same sense that his personality is distinct from the personality of God. In both cases, the sense must indeed be a limited one; but who shall tell us where the boundary lies! It may be said, that we are now following the subject into mystery. Well do we know this. There is mystery all around us, from the spire of grass that grows beneath our feet, up to the secrets of the invisible world; and are we so greatly astonished at finding it here? Before we explain the ultimate grounds of the human will, it might be instructive to try our skill at explaining the mysterious power of vegetable life in yonder flower. The power of the will is the life of the soul. Have we fathomed the depths of our own being, and laid them all bare, so as to name every element within us, as we name the wheels in a machine? Have we descended to the very bottom of our spiritual existence, found out the primordial germs of the soul, and traced every vital filament that connects it back with the existence of the Creator, so that we can tell, in clear scientific phrase, just how it operates? or have we seen through all the laws by which we live, move, and have our being, as separate personalities, but still in Him? When all this shall have been thoroughly done, we may expect to have a complete analysis of human agency in its relation to the divine; and certainly we can not have it till then. For, be it observed, our agency goes down the entire depth of our personality; the springs of our action are in the lowest foundations of our being. Who, but God, has looked in upon them!

To use the nomenclature of foreign metaphysicians, the subject is inextricably involved in the question concerning the passage from Psychology to Ontology; and that is a question we never can lay open, while we remain finite creatures.

UNIVERSALIST HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

This body held its annual session, (agreeably to adjournment from last year,) in Troy, N. Y., on Wednesday the 16th September, 1846, and proceeded to business in the following order, viz:

1. The meeting was called to order by the President, Rev. W. S. BALCH, of New York, when

2. Rev. THOS. J. GREENWOOD, of Connecticut, was chosen Secretary.

3. Voted to proceed to the choice of officers for the current year, and the following gentlemen were chosen, viz:

Rev. HOSEA BALLOU, D. D., of Mass., President.

Rev. PITT MORSE, of New York, Vice President.

Rev. T. J. SAWYER, of New York, Permanent Secretary.

LEWIS SEYMOUR, Esq., of New York, Treasurer.

4. The following gentlemen were chosen as Corresponding Secretaries for the year ensuing, in the respective States, Territories, &c., to which they belong, viz:

Maine, Rev. Calvin Gardner; New Hampshire, Rev. Moses Ballou; Vermont, Rev. Kittredge Haven; Massachusetts, Lucius R. Paige; Rhode Island, Henry Bacon; Connecticut, T. J. Greenwood; New York, O. A. Skinner, S. R. Smith; New Jersey, J. Gallagher; Pennsylvania, A. B. Grosh, Nathaniel Stacy; Maryland, J. Shrigley; Virginia, R. T. Wicker, Esq.; North Carolina, Dr. D. G. C. Marchant; South Carolina, Rev. Allen Fuller; Georgia, D. B. Clayton, Esq.; Alabama, Rev. S. J. McMorris; Louisiana, Rev. Theodore Clapp; Kentucky, E. M. Pingree; Tennessee, N. M. Gaylord; Ohio, A. C. Thomas, J. G. Forman; Indiana, E. Manford; Illinois, S. P. Skinner; Missouri, L. C. Marvin; Iowa, J. Robinson; Wisconsin, C. F. LeFevre; Michigan, E. M. Woolley; England, David Thom, J. R.

Beard; Canada West, J. Leavitt, Esq.; Canada East, J. Ward, Esq.; New Brunswick, Oliver Smith, Esq.; Nova Scotia, D. M. Knapen.

5. The following resolution, offered by Rev. O. A. Skinner, was adopted, viz.:

Whereas, This Society has been given to understand that the Unitarians of England generally believe and preach the doctrine of the ultimate salvation of all men. Therefore

Resolved, That we appoint a committee of three, to correspond with the Unitarian clergy of England, for the purpose of obtaining more definite information respecting their views on this subject, and of ascertaining how far they sympathise with us as a denomination.

6. Revs. T. J. Sawyer, H. Ballou, D. D. and E. H. Chapin were appointed said Committee.

7. On motion of Rev. T. Whittemore, it was Voted, That a collection be taken up at the close of the religious services to-morrow morning to aid the funds of this Society, and that notice thereof be given this evening.

8. Voted, To adjourn, to be assembled by call of the President.

Wednesday, 2 P. M. The Universalist Historical Society met agreeably to adjournment, when

1. Rev. T. J. Sawyer, Permanent Secretary of the Society made a verbal Report which he was desired to write out, and publish, together with the translation of a Letter referred to by him from Dr. Credner, of Germany.

2. Voted, That Rev. T. J. Sawyer be added to the 'Book Committee.'

3. The Treasurer of the Society made no Report.

The collection taken up, agreeably to vote, amounted to about Fifty dollars.

The business of the Society being thus transacted, Voted, That the Society adjourn to meet in New York city on the first day of the meeting of the General Convention of Universalists in said city, in 1847.

Attest, T. J. GREENWOOD, Secretary.

REMARKS.—1. Sufficient importance is not attached to the Universalist Historical Society, by our ministering brethren, generally.

2. Sufficient time is not devoted to the transaction of its ordinary business.

3. No TIME is given to the discussion of matters of grave moment, whereby its doings might greatly advance the well-being of our cause.

Who shall devise a plan by which existing inconveniences shall be remedied, and the extended influence be given to the Society, which, properly attended to, it is calculated to exert?

He who does this, will be entitled to the grateful acknowledgements of the Society, at least, in the opinion of T. J. G.

MEETING OF TRUSTEES OF THE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.

The Board of Trustees of the Clinton Theological School, appointed by the Universalist Convention of the State of New York, held their first meeting in Troy, Sept. 17, 1846. Present, Stephen Van Schaack, of Albany; Rev. D. Skinner, of Utica; Rev. J. Moore, of Troy; Rev. T. J. Sawyer, of Clinton; Rev. J. M. Austin, of Auburn, and Rev. O. A. Skinner, of New York. After a statement of the principal objects of the meeting made by the President, the following business was transacted:

1. Rev. Otis A. Skinner was chosen Clerk of the Board.

2. The Clerk was appointed a Committee to draft a Circular, in accordance with the suggestion of the United States Convention of Universalists, and send it to every Universalist minister in the United States, asking him to take up a collection for the benefit of the 'Universalist Theological Seminary at Clinton,' in the society or societies with which he is laboring, at his earliest convenience.

3. The President of the Board having stated that he found his labors too arduous, and that he earnestly desired to resign the charge of the Theological School as soon as a successor could be obtained, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, Br. T. J. Sawyer has signified to this Board that he finds his labors in Clinton Liberal Institute so great that he has neither the time nor strength to continue his charge of the Theological School.

Resolved, That we appoint Rev. Hosea Ballou, D. D., of Medford, Mass., as Principal of the Theological School, at Clinton.

Resolved, That if he accept the appointment, he be requested to enter upon the discharge of his duties, as soon as the funds can be raised for his support.

The foregoing Preamble and Resolutions were adopted with the understanding, that Br. Sawyer shall retain his present connexion with the Theological School, until Br. Ballou can succeed him.

4. The Clerk was appointed a committee to solicit the funds requisite to carry the foregoing resolutions into effect.

5. Voted to adjourn. T. J. SAWYER, Pres.
O. A. SKINNER, Clerk.

REMARKS.—From the above proceedings, it will be seen, that Br. Sawyer has expressed a desire to resign his office as Principal of the Theological School at Clinton, and that Br. H. Ballou, D. D., has been appointed his successor. But before he can accept the office, he must have secured him a salary of at least $800 per year. How is that money to be raised? We answer, there are three ways. 1. By donations to the theological School, the interest of which shall be appropriated for the support of the Principal. 2. By subscriptions running for five or ten years, guaranteeing for that time so much per year. 3. By collections in our churches. In these three ways we think the money can be raised with ease. There are many men who can give $500 or $1000 to the School, and never feel its loss. How many of them will now come forward with their donations? Br. Ballou has labored long and faithfully for our denomination, and no man is more deserving of favor than he is. But it is not for him we ask these donations, so much as for our denomination—for our religion. In fitness for the office to which he has been appointed, he has no superior; and what a blessing it would be to us as a people to have him at the head of a School for the education of ministers!

What can not be raised by donations can be raised by subscriptions and collections. There are hundreds who can pay five or ten dollars a year without the slightest inconvenience. How many such subscribers will now come forward? The churches will no doubt cheerfully give a collection, and if necessity requires, an annual collection.

It will also be seen by the above proceedings that I have been appointed a Committee to solicit funds. I shall enter upon my work as soon as Br. Ballou signifies his acceptance of the appointment. And as I can not be absent long from my Parish, I shall hope to have the co-operation of all my ministering brethren. What time I devote to the work will be given. About $350 have been subscribed to compensate Br. Sawyer for his services. This amount will be transferred to Br. Ballou, so that we have only $450 to raise—that is, $450 per year for five years.—[Christian Messenger.

IMPORTANT QUESTIONS.

1. If the doctrine of endless misery, endless death, and endless punishment, be true, why are not those sentences found in the revealed word of God?

2. If, as Partialists tell us, one sin merits endless misery, when shall the sinner receive punishment for the remainder of his sins?

3. If Christ, and his disciples, taught the doctrine of endless misery, and if the same doctrine had been taught for five centuries previous to the Saviour's advent, how could it have been truly said of Jesus, and of Paul, they taught a 'new doctrine'?

4. If, as Partialists admit, the Pharisees believed in endless misery, and if Jesus taught the same doctrine, why did he warn his disciples to 'beware of the doctrine of the Pharisees'? Would he have warned them to 'beware' of the doctrine that he himself was laboring to impress upon their minds?

5. If a faith in such a tremendous devil as the Partialists hold to, be the apostolic faith, why were not the satanians, of the third century, (of the same faith) called Christians?

6. If the doctrine of endless misery is the doctrine of Christ, why were not the monicheons of the second century, called Christians?

7. If the doctrine of endless misery is the 'only sentiment moralizing in its tendency, why did it produce so immoral an effect, during the 'dark ages'?

8. If the doctrine of endless misery is Christianity in America, what is it in heathen lands? (For example Africa?) and if it is heathenism in Africa, what is the same sentiment in America?

9. If God will endlessly torture the wicked in the world of spirits, why did the wise man say, 'Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner'?

10. How can it be true, that one is not three without the addition of two, and three is two more than one, and still one is three! and three is only one?

PARENTAL GOVERNMENT.

Rev. Dr. Sharp, of Boston, a man of more than three-score, and who has brought up a large family of children, lately preached a discourse on the subject of Parental Government, extracts from which are given in the Boston Christian World. We copy two paragraphs, which seem to us to embody much sound sense, and to furnish a very proper answer to those who are forever quoting Solomon in defence of the rod:—

'In most instances corporeal severity is unnecessary—scarcely ever, if there be a rational, uniform, affectionate, and firm system of parental government. Where there is much correction, it is the hand taking the place of judgement; it is the temper supplying the place of reflection; it is haste taking the place of patience; it is doing what requires no thought, in preference to sober protracted inquiry. How can I reclaim my child from his waywardness, and bring out the better qualities of the mind and heart? And let it never be forgotten, that corporeal severity generally fails of its purpose. The most turbulent and unruly children you can find any where, are those who are beaten most frequently and most unmercifully.

I grant that in the age of Solomon, when the vast multitude of human beings could neither read nor write, and of course there was but little just thinking—the hand was necessary in maintaining order and authority. It supplied the place of reason and argument to those who were incapable of exercising either. But another—a better rod has been discovered—one better adapted to the present state of society. I mean the rod of moral power. In other words, parents and teachers now feel the importance of governing their children and scholars, more by touching their minds than their bodies. They now exercise authority by instructing their children—by creating a good family opinion, as to what is proper or improper, right or wrong, and especially by enlightening the individual conscience, and by training up to right habits. This is the most effective and elevating kind of discipline. It is astonishing how many generations have passed away, without any other thought than that evil tempers and refractoriness were to be rooted out by lacerating and bruising the bodies of children, rather than by informing the minds and consciences.'

EXHORTATION.

BY MISS LAURA EGGLESTON.

Rise, sisters in Zion,
Attune the sweet lyre,
And chaunt for your pean,
The praise of our Sire.

O, shall we be silent,
And tuneless our tongues,
While the wild harps of terror,
To sadness are strung?

While Error is chanting
Her favorite air,
Of endless perdition—
Of sin and despair?

Our Partialist sisters,
The friends of our youth,
Join in the sad chorus,
And slander the truth.

Ye can not be silent;
The foe is abroad,
Proclaiming the vengeance
Of an angry God!

Oh, no! from the willows
Our harps let us take,
And the glad songs of Zion
In harmony wake.

On Zion's fair mountain,
Our hearts free from thrall,
We'll sound the sweet anthem,
Glad tidings to All!

German, N. Y., July, 1846.

We copy the following pretty tale from the Talisman and Odd Fellows Magazine, for August.

FLORA.

BY AUGUSTINE J. H. DUGANNE.

Was there ever a sweeter creature than dear little golden haired Flora Campbell, with her light, fairy footstep, and rosy cheeks, and violet eyes? How lovely she looked, as she bounded over the green braes in the morning, or lingered by the loch-side at the still gloaming! Her heart was all sunshine, and her thoughts pure and fresh as the flowers that she twined in her shining tresses.

It is a beautiful story they tell in the Scottish valleys, of a poor idiot (innocent, as they call him) who, when a sunbeam fell across his sight, as he sat in the church, threw his cloak across it—and it hung there. Faith, they said worked the miracle, and Heaven would not disappoint the idiot's trust.

Sweet Flora Campbell—she might have thrown her mantle over the sunbeam; aye, and walked the glittering path with her delicate feet till she reached the bright heaven above—for her young heart was all Faith, and Hope, and Charity. She prattled with the flowers, and the streamlets, and the birds; and her clear, ringing voice was heard at day break amid the heather, when the shepherds led forth their flocks, O, sunny, and joyful, and happy as the day was long, was dear little Flora Campbell.

All loved the gentle girl—and why should they not? Did not her tender hands bring fresh flowers to the sick wife of Robert the ploughman? And did not her low voice tremble softly in prayer, at the bedside of old Elspie, the blind beggar woman? O, who would not love the angel-hearted little maiden!

But where is Flora? The twilight is falling over the mountains, and shutting in the vales like a grey curtain. One by one, the bright stars steal up into the summer sky, and twinkle amid the evening clouds. The tinkling sheep-bell sounds nearer and nearer, as the flocks return to their folds, and the lowing of the kine in the farm yards tell that the labors of the day are over. But where is the golden haired Flora Campbell?

She was not used to linger so long from her grandfather's dwelling, for now the evening meal was spread, and the cottage lamps were lighted. The aged man clasped his hands together, and murmured a prayer, while his daughter, the mother of Flora, looked anxiously out of the window, yearning for her child's return.

But Flora came not.

The shadows crept fast and faster around the valley—the old peasants sat at their cottage doors, and the young men and maidens gathered upon the village green—some to walk and talk of love under the broad chestnut tree—some to play the pipe, or dance to its merry music, and some to hurl the quoit, or wrestle in the ring.

But all was hushed when Gaffer Campbell came hurriedly from his cottage, and inquired of the villagers if they had seen his grandchild. Yes, indeed had they.—One had beheld her far up in the mountains, plucking the wild-flowers and weaving them into a garland of heather—another had met her upon the path to the Moss Glen, sitting upon a way side stone, and plaiting a willow basket for her grandsire—and a third had received some forest fruit from her hands, as he met her seated with her basket of flowers in her hand, near the head of the loch.

'Ah, we must seek Flora,' cried the youths immediately, 'the dear child—no harm can surely come to her.'

'Ah me, Gaffer Campbell,' said a white haired old shepherd, shaking his head. 'I fear something—for the youngest lambkin of my flock was lost to-day, and it is a bad sign, they say.'

'Heaven grant that my poor child be safe,' said Gaffer Campbell, solemnly.

'Amen,' murmured the white haired peasant.

The villagers now dispersed in the various paths leading to the mountains, the forest, and the loch, and soon torches gleamed upon the heights, and glimmered among the trees, and flashed brightly over the water. Up and down, along the stream and through the woods, went the young men, calling upon the name of 'Flora—Flora.'

But no Flora answered.

Gaffer Campbell leaned upon his staff, and spoke no word. He could not weep, but a heavy sorrow weighed upon his heart. But the mother of Flora was lost in her grief. She wept and beat her breast, and called aloud the name of her child.

The aged pastor now approached. He had heard at the manse, of the disappearance of Flora; for every house had been searched within the hour; and he came now to comfort the bereaved ones. 'Fear not, daughter,' he said, 'Flora will return.'

'Ah, she is lost—she is lost to me,' cried the mother.

'He who tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb will protect our sweet child,' said the old pastor, 'Fear not!'

And as the reverend man spoke, the loud barking of a dog was heard in the depths of Moss Glen, and lights passed quickly from the mountain to the valley.

'Trust in Heaven,' said the minister, 'and follow me.'

With trembling, yet hurried steps the pastor and Gaffer Campbell took the way to the deep glen. But the mother of Flora passed them, and flew wildly down the narrow path. Louder and louder sounded the bay of the dog, from the thick gloom that shrouded the valley.

They reached the brink of the wild ravine, or chasm, commonly known as the Deer's Mouth, and paused near a group of the villagers, who, with torches in their hands, were listening eagerly to catch the baying of the hound. Again it came, low and deep, seemingly from the chasm beneath them. They bent their torches over the edge of the precipice, and looked down; but all was dark and silent, save only the barking of the dog, now quick and sharp.

'We must descend,' said a young man pressing forward—'That's Luoth's bark, and Luoth knows Flora, as well as we do. Run, Donald, for ropes.'

A half dozen lads started together at this bidding, and soon stout ropes were brought and held by strong men, while the youth prepared to descend.

'Take heed, Christie,' said the white haired old shepherd—'Remember the omen my lad, the youngest lambkin of my flock was lost to-day, and I fear more evil.'

'Fear nothing, father,' cried the young peasant, swinging himself from the edge of the precipice; while the loud bark of the dog sounded again from the chasm.

Down, down, the youth was lowered, startling the wild birds from their nests under the cliffs, and brushing the twining ivy from the sides of the rocks. At last he reached the bottom, and the noble dog Luoth sprang upon him and barked loud and joyfully.

The glare of the torch which the young man held, flashed around, and lit up every object. There upon a thick bed of wild heather, lay the sweet Flora Campbell, holding in her white arms and close to her bosom, a young lamb.

Christie stooped, and gazed at her. She breathed calmly, and he knew that she was sleeping. He glanced at the little lamb, and saw that one of its legs was tied with ribbons from Flora's hat. Then he looked up and shouted aloud—'She is safe.'

This shout was echoed so loudly and so gladly that it woke the young maiden from the slumber which had held her. She glanced around with a bewildered gaze, and recognized the youth. 'Dear Christie,' she said, 'I am so glad you have come. Now we will save your father's lamb.'

Christie and the villagers soon learned all. How Flora had beheld the young lambkin where it had fallen, at the bottom of the 'Deer's Mouth,' and saw that one of its delicate limbs was broken—how she had descended from ledge to ledge of the chasm side, clinging to the ivy, and thinking not of danger—how she had bound up the broken limb with her ribbons, and held the young lambkin in her arms—and how, at last, weary with her exertion she had fallen asleep, and heard not the cries of those who searched for her.

Joyful and happy the villagers were, when they learned the safety of Flora, and the little lambkin she had rescued, was given to her by Christie's father. And Flora was often seen afterwards bounding over the braes, with her pet frisking beside her—and often as she appeared, the old villagers would smile, and say, 'God bless her.'

MORALITY—RELIGION, &c.

CHAPTER II.

From the conclusions, as based upon the premises and causes established in chapter first, we are under the necessity, either to seat religious impulse with the inferior faculties of man, (the animal,) or include it in, and identify it with the morals: which, [morals] are undoubtedly and unequivocally the highest and most dignified faculties of man, and the only connecting link, by which earth and Heaven are united; the only medium through which man breaths forth heavenly kindness, or receives spiritual instruction. The motive power, by which man is influenced in his religious feelings and exercises, is based in, and flows through the moral medium.

We will now make some little inquiry into the nature and meaning of the term—religion. And first—What do we learn from authors generally, and conclusively? Here I shall only give the ultimatum or substance, without quoting all they have said, or giving every author's name. It matters but little what they have said; since they neither possessed the knowledge, nor the means of such knowledge, by which they could come to legitimate conclusions upon the subject.

Most authors define it as—'A system of divine faith in God'—founded in reverence to the Supreme Being.—Mr. Barclay, the prototype of most others, says—'Religion, [religio Latin,] that worship which belongs to the Deity, when considered as our Creator, preserver and benefactor. Any system of faith and worship.' Cicero says—'Religion is derived from relegere, to consider.' But Servitus, and others—say—it is from religare, to bind fast. Mr. Buck says—'The foundation of all religion rests on the belief of the existence of God.' The most of the foregoing authors, seem to give some of its effects; but it is clearly seen by their variations, that they had no correct rule, or definite means by which they could come to direct, and certain conclusions. [The Bible overlooked.] All appears to be vague, mistified, and in the dark. Many identify it with godliness; but give the same explanation. Mr. Saurin has said—'It is difficult to include an adequate idea of it, in what is called a definition.' Still we might go on, to give authors and opinions; but still to the same, and no better purpose. Dr. Dodridge perhaps has come as near the truth, as any one who has acted without correct data. He says—'Religion consists in the resolution of the will for God, and in a constant care to avoid whatever we are persuaded he would disapprove, to dispatch the work he has assigned us in life, and to promote his glory in the happiness of mankind.'

To be religious among the Romanists, was to be 'bound by the vows of purity, chastity and obedience, and to a monastic life.' Finally, various factions of bigotry, vice and idolatry, have all claimed to be religious:—as with the Monks, Pagans, Mahometans and others. So we see, that agreeably to the vague notions of men, religion, may be almost any thing, and every thing:—good, bad, or indifferent. And agreeably to the general course of interpretation, one has as good a claim to define and establish his own religion as another. And all, thus blinded and in the dark, have most lamentably run astray. Aside from cause and effect,—as founded in the nature and constitution of man, I deny all, and every possible rule of interpretation. All who understand and follow these laws and principles, whether in Europe, Africa, or America;—will come invariably to the same conclusions. All have the same starting point, the same guide, and consequently, all happily arrive at the same end.

2. But what instruction does the Bible give on this subject? The term religion is seldom used in the New Testament. I am not sure that Christ used it, even once, in his whole ministry. Yet he taught that which comprises all that can properly be called true religion. He strictly implies a full prohibition of all the abuses of man's faculties, the subjection of his inferior sentiments and propensities to his moral faculties, and finally and fully, he sets forth the heightened principles of equity—mercy—truth and benevolence, which only have their origin and birth in the moral fountain of man's nature. This conclusion is so plain to me, that I refer to his general precepts, and there leave it. Consequently, the religion of Christ is purely and strictly moral. And as soon as I would undertake to show to the contrary, I would undertake to create a new order of constituted rights and things. From these unavoidable conclusions it follows that ninety nine one hundredths of all that has been called religion in the world of man, has been wrongly and falsely named. It is not religion, but its opposite, irreligion. The apostle James, in doing as we sometimes do, taking for granted what others say, calls such religion, 'vain.' And having his testimony at hand, we will see, whether it will harmonize with the foregoing conclusions. He says—'Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.' Now, what should we correctly infer, from this definition? He does not say, that religion consists in any particular system of faith or worship,—in making any formal claims to what is called religion,—or in claiming great reverence for God. No! But he says—the act of visiting the fatherless and widows, (i. e. the lonely, the disconsolate and needy,) in their afflictions, is, 'pure religion.' In this operation, which the apostle calls pure religion,—we find, (either directly or indirectly,) the concentrated force and beauty of every moral faculty, which man possesses. So much, and no more! Any more we do not wish. Science and the Bible go hand in hand in this matter; and surely, who should find fault?

3. As there are many in our world who claim religion, but possess it not, even so, on the other hand, there are many who actually have religion, notwithstanding their neighbors deny it, call them infidels—opponents of God, etc. And how is this? Why, 1. It may clearly be understood by bearing in mind that there is but one correct principle of religion, and but one legitimate means of ar-iving at, or possessing that principle. 2. That men, aside from these principles, form systems of religion for themselves, and, right or wrong, proscribe all others, (who do not conform to their standard,) as heretics and infidels. And 3. that when the mass is tried by the golden rule, or weighed in the true moral scale, they will certainly be found—minus, (wanting,) while many of those whom they have proscribed will as surely come out—plus, wearing the white garment. But there is another difficulty:—The Atheist—of whom it is said, 'he neither believes in, nor worships any God.' It matters not what is said of him, aside from the established rule. You may call men atheists, infidels, or what you please; if they are under the impulse which is approved by the moral standard, they possess the religion of Heaven, and are approved of God. And undoubtedly, there are thousands in our world, that are such. But how can one that denies God, be a Christian? Here again, the interrogator appears to be in the fog. We forget the rule, which both science and the Bible establishes. That the only way we can venerate God—show faith in, and love and obedience to Him—is, to make it manifest by acts of kindness, goodness, love, veneration, benevolence, hospitality, respect and sympathy, towards his creatures. To remove pain and misery, and produce the greatest possible happiness, for ourselves and others. This is the only way we can obey God—do justice to ourselves, or to our fellow beings. We have already seen that the proscriptions of the one, for each, and every other sects, matters nothing. Shall we now say, that any little difference with regard to the modus—form, shape, part or parts of God, will exclude a person? If so, then we fall back into the same obscure difficulty. All would be right in their own estimation, but condemned by each, and all others. 1. The Trinitarians must be infidels; because they believe it actually takes three Gods to make one: which would be no God at all. 2. The Unitarians must be infidels; because they deny the former. 3. The Deists, (properly called Theists, from the Greek theos—signifying God,) must be infidels; because they neither believe it takes three Gods to make one, or that the one, has any special son to aid him in any of his plans or purposes. 4. The Atheists must be infidels; because they, as it is said, believe in no God at all. And yet it is acknowledged that many of them are as good citizens, good neighbors, kind, hospitable, benevolent, honest, and in every way, (excepting their views of God,) are as desirable as any others could be. Finally, it is allowed, that such have a good intellect, and all the moral impulses predominately active.—Consequently, are not to be condemned; for the reason that such as we have defined, (be called what they may,) do believe in a supreme power, principle or being, which others call God. They differ from others in their views, as to the form, quality and parts of that Being, rather than deny his power. They believe in the God of nature which fills all things, surrounds all—moves all—and 'whose body, universal nature is, and (he) God the soul.' They, (as well as other classes of people for other reasons,) have been misrepresented and abused, by being accused of not believing in any God, as the Framers and Governor of the universe, with all the beauties and glories it contains. This is a mistake. They believe matter to be eternal; but, that there is a primeval intelligent principle therewith identified, as the great first Supreme cause of motion, governing, beautifying and crowning the whole.

They, with the Deists, deny all special revelation; but believe that God reveals Himself and his requirements, his laws and his perfections to his creatures, in all the formations and operations of nature. They inherit veneration in a greater or less degree, and they venerate nature and nature's God. They nominally deny Christ; but they virtually obey his requirements, by 'doing unto others, as they would that others should do unto them.' They visit the sick, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and kindly and affectionately administer to the wants of the needy:—while many others, who claim to be all that is religious—Christ-like—Heaven-born, 'pass by on the other side,' and with an iron grasp and furtive look, prove to all, that, though they profess to know God, yet, in works they deny him. Who is our neighbor? 'If we love not our brother whom we have seen, how shall we love God whom we have not seen?' Which of these two characters is the most desirable; the upright infidel, or the hypocritical and cold hearted Christian? (so called.) Who the most vilified, or denies the Supreme Being?—Those who believe in one good, never varying principle of right, which administers comfort and happiness alike to all; or those who believe in a fickle, malicious, revengeful and cruel being—as God? For one, I would infinitely prefer the former to the latter. Yet, irrespective of the views of God—his form—shape—mode or parts, (mere vaguery,) when we find the one or the other, conformable to the moral rule, we are bound to receive them. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in Heaven.'

People differ from each other, and call each other by different names; but agreeably to the only definite rule of Bible and science, all human freaks (as we have seen) amount to nothing. Religion has its origin and rise in human soil; and those who possess it (like vessels of glass) will show what they contain: such, and such only, are adjudged as right, without respect to grade, rank, wealth or poverty. Such are the 'chosen ones'—the salt of the earth—'a city set on an hill which can not be hid.'

Let all remember that real merit, is of much greater value than a mere empty name: and to succeed in Christian merit and purity, we must first succeed in giving an exclusively moral reign to an enlightened intellect.

L. HYATT.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We admit the above article, not because we think it has any great merits; for we can not discover any thing in it of that sort, although it has some very good things; not because we agree with the author in all the views he advances; for this is far from being the case; but because he desired its insertion in order to carry out some of his views which he had commenced in a former article and left unfinished.

Br. Hyatt thinks those who can not understand how an Atheist can be a Christian, are very much in the fog. But really, if any of them are more foggy than he is upon this subject, we pity them. An Atheist a Christian!—Away with such nonsense! We would as soon try to prove that he is a mermaid or a centaur, and think we could make it appear much more plausible! We think neither Deists nor Atheists will thank him for attempting to prove them Christians; for they have never claimed nor coveted the name—nay, they utterly contemn and despise it. They would not be proud of their company when thus associated; and certainly we should not, by having them so associated. True, they have a right to their opinions, the same as we have a right to ours. Let them enjoy them, and their name too; and not seek to foist them into a class whom they contemn.

It is true, the Atheist, from early habits, associations, or self interest, may practice Christian morality—that is, he may outwardly conform to the usages of Christians and do those outward acts which Christ and his apostles enjoined; and so may a Protestant, in a Catholic country, cross himself and kneel at cathedrals, uncover in the presence of a Pope or priest, go to mass, pay outward worship to the host, &c., &c., for the sake of personal gain, or personal safety, without being a Catholic; and yet he is as much a Catholic in all this as the Atheist who outwardly conforms to the morality of the Gospel is a Christian.

Br. H. seems to forget that religion, however important and essential practice is and ever must be to its genuineness, has any thing else connected with, or essential to it, but practice—he seems to forget that faith has any thing to do with the Christian religion. As we understand St. James' definition of 'pure religion,' he defines the effects or fruits of the uncorrupted religion of Christ. Religion is both theoretical and practical. He gives the practical. We would have both the theory and the practice; just the tree and its fruits. It is true, if we could have but one, we would prefer the practical to the theoretical.—But what hinders our having both? Theory without practice is a barren tree. Practice without theory, is unstable, without any permanency, and like a building without foundation, liable to be overturned by every wind that blows.

As we read our Bible—that good old book which we take as the ‘man of our counsel,’ faith has much to do with the Gospel, and is a very essential part of Christianity. ‘As a man thinketh, so is he.’ And if a man thinks there is no God, he thinks as a fool—if he thinks he is an Atheist, he is one; and all the blarney and sophistry of Br. H. and others can never prove him a Christian. On one occasion, (see John vi: 28, 29,) the disciples inquired of Christ, ‘What shall we do that we might work the works of God?’ Jesus answered and said unto them, ‘This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent.’ And good old Paul said, ‘Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith’—[a faith that works by love and purifies the heart] ‘without the deeds’ [ceremonial observances] ‘of the law.’—Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness. Now to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not [or conforms not to the ceremonial law] but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness.’ Rom. iii: 28. iv: 3-5. Abraham had a strong faith, and his faith was counted to him for righteousness and was the ground of his justification. It was a living and active faith, and its fruits were in accordance therewith.—That it was prolific of good works is abundantly proved from Heb. vi: 10-15, and xi: 8-19, and numerous other passages.

We do not believe Abraham’s works would have been what they were without any faith in God. And we can but marvel that a professedly Christian minister in this 19th century should attempt to prove that because practical religion is necessary, therefore theoretical is useless—that, because certain social duties are enjoined, therefore faith is unnecessary—and that the Atheist is a Christian if he practices them, though he disbelieves in God and ridicules Christ and the doctrines which he taught.

HYMNS FOR CHRISTIAN DEVOTION.

Especially adapted to the Universalist denomination. By J. G. Adams and E. H. Chapin. Boston. Abel Tompkins, Publisher, 1846.

Such is the title, (labelled on the outside, ‘Universalist Hymns’) of a new and beautiful hymn book just received from the enterprising publisher. If a large collection of well assorted and excellent hymns, ancient and modern, selected and original, well adapted to all occasions and circumstances occurring in our denomination, got up in very neat style, and executed with great mechanical neatness, entitle a new work to a favorable reception in our denomination, then is this Hymn Book justly entitled to such favor; and we shall not be surprised if this shall prove, among other works of the kind, a troublesome competitor for denominational favor.

The book contains 642 pages, and 1008 hymns, arranged under different heads, according to the nature of the subjects, with a general index of subjects, an index of first lines, and a particular index of subjects. The following general index will show the number of Hymns under each subject:

‘Introduction and Close of Worship, 1 to 100. Character, Attributes and Providence of God, 101 to 148.—General Praise 149 to 167. Religion of Nature, 168 to 183. The Scriptures, 184 to 197. Christ, his Character and Offices, 198 to 256. The Gospel and its Invitations, 257 to 323. Triumph of Christianity, 284 to 322. Repentance and Reformation, 323 to 338. Christian Character and Life, 339 to 421. Devout Exercises, 422 to 513. Life, Death, and Futurity, 514 to 565. Mourning and Consolation, 566 to 605. Submission and Reliance, 606 to 635. Religious Exultation, 636 to 652.—The Church and Ordinances, 653 to 695. Dedications, Ordinations, Installations, 696 to 718. Associations, Conventions, and Missionary Meetings, 719 to 737. Early Religious Culture, 738 to 763. Philanthropic Subjects, 764 to 824. Seamen’s Hymns, 825 to 835. National Hymns, 836 to 850. The Seasons, Annual Occasions, &c., 851 to 901. Social and Domestic Worship, 902 to 934. Morning and Evening Hymns, 935 to 960. Miscellaneous, 961 to 1005. Doxologies 1006 to 1008.’

In their preface the compilers return thanks to the friends who have kindly aided them by suggestions or contributions for the work. They say in reference to the design and character of the work:

‘Although evidently designed in one sense for a denomination, they have also intended that it shall answer in some measure the demands of a liberal and progressive Christianity—a Christianity under whatever name or pretension found, that would diffuse Christ’s spirit and do his works of truth and love amongst men.

‘We have sought to give variety in these Hymns; to have the number ample enough; and while cautious in relation to their literary character, to select those of a devotional tendency, rather than those chiefly commendable for their poetical excellence. We have intended also to pay due respect to the old hymns so justly familiar with those of every age among our worshippers, while we have not been unmindful of the new claimants of public favor.

‘It will be perceived that there is a greater variety of Hymns on several topics than in most Hymn books now in use among us; especially in relation to the philanthropic nature of our religion, and the peculiar indications of this nature in the present age. In the department of the book entitled the ‘Triumph of Christianity,’ faithfulness in representing this great truth is designed.’

There have been a great number and variety of Universalist Hymn Books published for the use of our denomination, considering the time of its existence as a distinct denomination. We need not here enumerate them all. There was one compiled by Kelley, another by Winchester, and, we think, one by Murray. Then there was the old Universalist Hymn Book, compiled and published by authority of the ‘General Convention of the New England States and others.’ Subsequently Ballou and Turner’s Collection was published, and had a somewhat extensive sale.

In 1829 the New Universalist Hymn Book by Revs. S. & R. Streeter, now in so wide and general use by our denomination, was published. This was an excellent work, and well deserving the extensive circulation it has received. It has passed through a large number of editions—something over forty, we believe. It has its defects, however. Many of its old and familiar hymns were altered, as many of the lovers of the good old spiritual songs of their fathers believed, not for the better; and there were hardly a sufficient number and variety of hymns for all subjects and occasions; and to congregations holding two or three or more meetings every week for many years, there was a want of something more, while many of the Hymns had been read and sung so many times as to seem stale with age and usage.

In 1837 the ‘Universalist Collection’ compiled by Rev. H. Ballou, 2d, and published by B. B. Mussey, made its appearance. It is an excellent collection; but from some cause, to us unknown, and which we can not imagine, unless it be the extensive sale, and world-wide popularity of Streeter’s collection, it never obtained very general notoriety or favor.

The ‘Hymns of Zion’ by Br. A. C. Thomas, a small work of about 200 pages, with music attached to each Hymn, next appeared in 1839. It was designed more for private circles, families and conferences than for general use in the church; and for that reason, though it is good and has passed through several editions, it has never taken the place of others in the church.

The late Rev. George Rogers, of Cincinnati, came out with the next in 1842. This we have never seen; but from what we have heard from others, and the well known character of the compiler, we believe it was a very reputable Hymn Book.

This brings us down to the present work named at the head of this article. The compilers, Brs. Adams and Chapin, are abundantly competent to the task they have undertaken to perform. And though we would disparage the claims of none, nor make any invidious distinctions, where so many meritorious works of the kind are claimants on the public favor, we think the present work, considering the great number, purity, and variety of its Hymns, and its adaptation to all occasions and circumstances, pre-eminently entitled to notice and favorable consideration. MOHAWK RIVER MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

‘To be or not to be?—That is the question?’

It will be recollected that at the June session of the Mohawk River Association of Universalists, the subject of a Missionary society was introduced in the council and in the assembly and urged with considerable earnestness upon the attention of our friends as an important step towards disseminating more widely and successfully the great doctrine of the Restitution. A committee of three was appointed to report on the subject—did report in its favor—and were directed to take measures for organizing such a society. In August a meeting of that committee was called. But two out of the three met; and wishing to have a fuller attendance of the friends of the enterprise in organizing, and to know what amount of funds could be relied on, those two drew up a Circular and the form of a subscription, got it printed and sent it out to some twenty five or thirty individuals, scattered over the Association, whom they considered among the most active friends of the cause, appointing them Trustees for the time being to carry out the design, and requesting them to circulate the subscriptions to the extent of their ability, and be sure to meet on Thursday, Oct. 1st, at 10 o’clock A. M. at the Village of Herkimer, to complete the organization. Well, the day and hour came—we took the cars and were on the spot at the appointed hour. But what then? The Trustee appointed for Herkimer had left home that morning—neither of the other committee men appeared—not a single Trustee appointed was on the ground—and we wandered about the village like a lone pilgrim on Zahara’s desert, till about 12 o’clock, when, to our great joy, we found Br. Mason, a Trustee appointed for Middleville. But owing to the effort being made at his place to sustain local preaching, he had not succeeded in raising any amount of funds, and we two could do nothing alone about organizing—so we adjourned sine die.

Learning that the Herkimer county Agricultural Society held its annual Fair at Little Falls that day, we proceeded thither, to see if we could hunt up any of the stray members (that should have been) of our council. We were lucky enough to encounter two or three of them—among them Br. Hicks, who said he had visited Herkimer after we left—but nothing had been done. Every body was, like Martha, ‘careful, and troubled about many things,’ but not the things pertaining to our organization. Well, what was to be done? No one knew. Another call and another meeting was talked of, for the last week in this month—the first in the next—or the week after election—or the first of sleighing, could we know when that would be—for some place not known. A Conference meeting for one or two days, at some time and place, was talked of, under the supposition that such a meeting, if its objects were understood, would induce an attendance of the friends of the Missionary cause. But nothing was agreed upon. And so the matter stands—still!

Now, if the brother who introduced to the council of the Association the project of organizing a Missionary Society, and at the time seemed the most anxious about it of any one present, and who was put on the committee for completing the organization, ‘can not come’ to attend a single meeting, either of the committee or of the Trustees because he has married him a wife, then we must think that getting married is a bad business, at least for the Missionary cause. And if those appointed to act as Trustees, feel no interest in the matter, and the Universalist public, within the bounds of this Association care nothing for it, and do nothing about it, notwithstanding numerous destitute places might thereby be supplied with the preached word, why, then, both the project and all the good anticipated therefrom, must be given up—abandoned, either for ever, or till ‘a more convenient season.’

Brethren, shall it be so? Will you abandon it forever. If so, then speak out and say so. If not, will you act? Will you say, you’ll act, and then do according to your saying? Or will you be like the servant that said, ‘I go sir, and went not’? Something like $40 was subscribed for the object at the Association. Shall the matter stop there? Speak, brethren; we wait your decision. We can not do all the talking, meeting and acting too.

LABOR IN VAIN.

Being at the house of a friend a few days since, we took up a paper purporting to be published in one of the Western States, and bearing for its title these two words—‘The Regenerator.’ From its name and the general character of the various communications appearing in its columns, it must be looked upon by a certain class of community as a publication of no little importance to the world. From its contents however, it is an impossibility to determine the religious faith of the Editor; and were he called upon to ‘define his position’ we have some doubt of his ability to accomplish the feat.

There are many, very many, wise people in this world; many whose powers of mind enable them to unfold laws and principles which have been buried in darkness for ages; many who take such a comprehensive view of the institutions which the great Supreme has ordained for the government of nature; that they are unable to master those which have engaged the attention and thought and inquiry of philosophers whose fame has been wafted afar, and whose names awaken veneration in the minds of those who admire the wisdom, power, and research of the human understanding. We say that there are many such ‘lights’ in the world at the present age, and we remember of having read of one—though perhaps ere yet he has gone to the solitary tomb; if so, sweet be his slumbers—who took such a grand and enlarged view of subjects presented for his consideration; formed ideas of such ponderous dimensions, that there was not room in his mind, sufficient to enable him to turn the idea over and glance at the other side; in consequence of which, his opinions were always one-sided? Whether the Editor of ‘The Regenerator’ is one of this stamp, and a descendant of that venerable sage, is a question which we shall leave for his readers to decide, resting assured that so great a man will not fail of having justice done him at the hands of a justice loving community. But to the character of his paper; and let a question from his standard device, give the desired information—

Speaking of ‘The Regenerator’ he says: It ‘is devoted to no one idea. Is the servant of no sect; the organ of no party; the defender of no faith; the establishment of no creed; the expounder of no constitution’—and thus onward to the end of the chapter.

A paper devoted to such a purpose, or rather, devoted to no purpose, must be made up and present a strange medley of strange things; a batch of contradictions; a heap of inconsistencies, thrown together pell-mell, without order or arrangement, making the publication highly unworthy of confidence or support. And yet in the number before us, a lengthy communication appears from one of the best writers of our denomination. But we presume that the manner in which his communication was replied to, has taught him the fact that in endeavoring to preach truth to ‘The Regenerator’—to use a figurative expression of course—he was only casting ‘pearls before swine,’ to be trampled under foot.

It is labor in vain; worse than useless for the writers of our denomination, or those of other denominations, to enter the columns of such a publication in behalf of what they may consider to be the truth. Nothing is accomplished, though they conquer, and instead of endeavoring to enlighten the mind of a man who in his own estimation knows more than every body beside, they can find far better employment for their pens. Pass such publications by as unworthy of notice; let every friend of man labor for the improvement of the morality and intelligence of the world, and such publications will soon perish for the want of sufficient support, and perish they should for their existence has an influence upon the morals of society highly deleterious in its nature and tendency.

THE PENNY MAGAZINE.—This instructive and useful work in course of republication by J. S. Redfield, New York, is now complete, consisting of eight volumes of 3 numbers, each volume containing 508 pages, double column octavo, making upwards of 4000 pages. Science, literature, biography, natural history, the arts, &c., &c., are treated of, and present to the reader something instructive on almost any subject that he may desire, and to make it the more interesting, each subject is accompanied by an appropriate engraving—the entire work contains upwards of 2000. Full sets (24 numbers) can be had of the publishers, New York, or of G. N. Beesley, this city, at 25 cents per No.

Mr. Beesley has just received a large assortment of late publications, small miniature gift books, stationary, etc., etc. Give him a call.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Floods and drouths often alternate with each other in the literary as well as the physical and spiritual world.—A few weeks ago we got nearly run ashore as to communications, and our drawer was nearly empty. It is now overflowing with long articles waiting an insertion in our columns. It is true we have but few short articles.—These are and ever will be welcome. They are excellent chinks to fill up corners and interstices, and to give variety.

We have now on hand Br. J. Douglass’ Address before a Literary Association; Br. A. Moore’s Occasional Sermon before the U. S. Convention; our Agricultural Address before the County Agricultural Society which some are calling for; the New State Constitution, proposed by the Convention for adoption at the coming Election; two good length communications from Br. L. Perry respecting Christian connections and treatment; a very long one from Br. J. T. Goodrich in reply to a ‘Country Pastor’; articles from Brs. W. D. Bradford, H. Van Campen, S. M. R., J. S. Kibbe, A. B. Copeland, sisters Lyra, K. J. F. and sundry others for all which we are duly thankful, and will endeavor to give them a hearing as early as possible.

Br. A. Upson, your notice of the Conference in your Association was so carefully (or carelessly) laid aside for the proper time that we forgot it till it was too late instead of being too early, as it would have been if published when received, ‘all of which is most respectfully submitted,’ &c.

REMOVAL.—Br. C. A. Skinner, late of the Theological Class at Clinton, has removed to Dexter, N. Y., and wishes all communications addressed to him, directed accordingly.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The editor will preach at Oran, on the 3d Sunday inst., and lecture on the Saturday evening preceding, (i. e., 17th inst.,) in Christ’s (Episcopal) church in Pompey, at early candle lighting.

Br. T. J. WHITCOMB will preach at Graves Hollow the second Sunday in October, and once in four weeks thereafter during the ensuing year.

Br. J. H. HARTER will preach in Mottville, the second Sunday in October, and in Genoa the third Sunday in Oct.

DEATHS.

In Deerfield, on the 26th ult., Widow MERCY HALL, relict of the late Calvin Hall, Esq., aged 83 years. The deceased was one of the early settlers, and one of the most respected and worthy citizens of this county. Though she had never made any public profession of religion, nor joined any particular church, yet her religion was aminely practical, and consisted in doing good to all men as she had opportunity. She was industrious, frugal, temperate, exemplary and charitable. She has left a numerous offspring of children, grand children, and great grand children, and a wide circle of relatives and acquaintances, by whom her memory will long be cherished and blessed. Her funeral was attended by a large circle of sympathising friends, to whom the Editor of this paper administered the consolations and hopes of the Gospel of peace.

On the first inst., at Preston Corners, Miss MARY T. AVERY, daughter of Hubbard B. and Mary Avery, aged 21 years.

In the death of this young lady, the parents are called to part with a daughter of more than ordinary promise. Her mild and benevolent disposition has endeared her name to a large circle of very intelligent relatives and friends, who testified their respect and heartfelt regret at her funeral this day. The mourning neighborhood offered the silent tribute of their sympathies to this stricken family: This scene will long abide in many a heart; and may God in his wisdom sanctify it to us all.

The opportunities that she enjoyed of becoming acquainted with the spirit and teachings of the Saviour of the world, except by the study of the Scriptures, has been rather restricted; yet it is believed that her faith in Christ sustained her in her dark and trying hour. ‘As in Adam all die even so in Christ shall all be made alive.’

Cease ye mourners, cease to languish,
O’er the grave of those ye love,
Pain, and death, and woe, and anguish,
Enter not the world above.

Preston, October 3, 1846. M. NEWTON BYINGTON.

In Westmoreland, on the 3d inst., Mrs. ANNA, wife of Charles Clark, Esq., in the 73d year of her age. Mrs. Clark was born in Lebanon, Connecticut, and removed with her family to Westmoreland near 20 years since. She has brought up a large family, and her children showed that they deeply felt her loss. She was a good woman, and filled all her social and domestic relations with propriety and honor. Her aged companion now more than fourscore years of age suffered an irreparable loss, though he consoles himself with the thought that he can not long remain behind her. Her funeral was attended on the Sunday following her death in the Presbyterian church in the village of Hampton, and a large audience was addressed on the occasion by the writer.

Upon the old chief's face there grew,
A shade of deeper, darker, hue;
His features changed like Summer cloud
Before the fitful tempest's breath,
Ere lightning's glare midst pealings loud
Have heralded its threatened wrath;
Yet as the tempest dies away,
Ere yet the stillness has been broken,
His spirit owned a brighter ray,
Ere yet the words of wrath were spoken.
Then spake the chief—'Young brave, my sires,
Came from whence yonder sun doth rise,
Its smiling beams beheld their fires
Wafting their incense to the skies.
They left a pleasant valley there,
Rich fields of corn, a quiet home,
And forests fanned by mountain air,
Where erst the huntsman loved to roam;
They left behind the sacred graves
Of sires who sleep by ocean waves
Unwakened by the stormy billow,
And strangers' feet now careless tread,
Unmindful of the mighty dead,
Who slumber in their lowly bed,
The cold damp earth their pillow.
Their sons, my sires, left them, left all,
At the Great Spirit's potent call,
Who led them to this Western bower,
My sires were clothed by him with power
To nourish, shield, protect and lead
Our tribe, and in their cause to bleed,
Long have they ruled and triumphed o'er
The hostile tribes along the shore.
Our line a race of warriors, born
In blood, and nourished by the storm,
Must end their mighty race in one,
The last, and least,—I have no son!
I long to see my daughter wed
To one who has in battle bled,
One who may be a chief in soul,
A warrior, bravest of our race,
Who may assume the high control
Of all I leave; who may replace
Our failing line, with one whose blood
Is as a torrent in its flood.
Go then, before another sun
Shall rise and set, go seek the foe,
And ere another moon hath run,
Her tranquil course o'er all below,
Bring back some trophy that may be
To me a sign of victory.

The sun had sunk behind the hill,
Which rose above the village green,
Yet lighting up the forest still,
Its rays seemed struggling to be seen,
And the lone hour of deep twilight,
Ere day dissolves itself to night,
Had held its momentary sway,
Last relic of the parting day.
Within a bower the maiden stood
And scanned with anxious eye, the wood,
Until her watchful vision caught,
And rested on the form she sought.
He came! his cheek had lost the flush
It late had caught from her warm blush;
Or it may be the forest gloom
Hid from her eye the rosy bloom;
Yet on his brow her eye could trace,
Lines the darkness could not efface.
'Olga,' she murmured, and oppress,
With fear, she sank upon his breast;
'Olga, what means that threatening brow?
Can aught of anger dwell with thee?
There gentleness late beamed, and now,
Thy glance as fiercely lights on me
As though 'twould search my very heart
Which claims to be of thine a part.'
'Icola, fear not, but farewell;
Thy sire would have me worthy thee.
I love thee, and I fain would tell,
Before we part, how tenderly
Ere yon pale orb, whose beams now light
The darkness on the cloud of night,
All bashfully shall shrink away,

Before the rising beams of day,
I must prepare to win thy hand,
By deeds of valor, and the brand;
Yes, even now, I bid adieu.
To all I love, to all that's dear,
And go to meet the fierce Sioux;
Yet deem it not with aught of fear,
Who could not win a hero's name,
With all he loves to cheer him on?
Bring for each smile a wreath of fame,
For thy bright eye to rest upon?
Icola, by thy raven hair
Which floats so gently on the air,
Thy brow, thy cheeks, thy lips, thine eye,
And by those soft and silken lashes
Which partly veil thy eyes' deep flashes,
And by that gentle breathing sigh
Which o'er thy pure lip's ruby glow,
Breathes sweetness on thy lover's brow,
By each, and by thy beauties all,
Which bind my senses in their thrall,
I vow that, ere a moon has told
Her fleeting hours from new to old,
My chieftain, love, and thy proud sire,
Shall own me worthy of my hire.'
Thus said, and with a parting kiss,
A warm embrace, a fond caress,
He darted from her and away;
And ere the rising God of day,
Had lighted with his earliest ray
The gloom which night had gathered 'round,
O'er the stillness so profound
Was broken by the faintest sound
From the dark forest's savage fold,
A youthful band so silently
Had gathered neath a blighted pine—
A withered, shrunk, and branchless tree,
Whose blasted front and dim outline
Defied decay, though worn by time,
And in their village reared its head,
A ghostly tombstone of the dead.
Their shrill war cry, the first that told
Their purpose, and their dance of woe
Was lighted by the morning star,
Without a friend to bid them speed,
Ere they could hear, or hearing heed,
They had departed, and once more
Reigned death-like silence as before.

A GOOD HUSBAND.—When you see a young man modest and retiring in manners—who cares less about dress than his moral character—depend upon it, ladies, he will make an excellent husband. If you see one who is kind and attentive to his mother—affectionate to his sisters—industrious in his habits and economical in his business, rest assured, you have found one of whom you will never be ashamed. The ball-room is no place to find a husband; the fashionable assembly is no place; it is in the retirement of home, in the place of business—where you can study character and disposition; and where the best outside is not put on for effect and display.

Many a young woman sadly misses it, who is carried away by a bright look and a splendid dress. The man who makes the most polite bow and is the most graceful in his manners, is not always the most suitable person for a husband. Look at the heart—study the character, and learn the disposition.

There was once a beautiful young lady—beautiful to look upon we mean—who turned up her pretty nose at a shoemaker, refused to acknowledge a painter in the street—finally married a dashing fop, the son of a wealthy man. Poor girl! a few years of misery passed away and her husband became reduced—and she to maintain him actually took in washing. Many a shoemaker's wife and many a painter's daughter has contributed to her comfort during the last few years of her life. Girls be wise, and look to the heart, if you want good husbands.—Portland Tribune.

A SHOWER.—A merchant was one day returning from market. He was on horseback, and behind his saddle was a valise filled with money.

The rain fell with violence, and the good old man was wet to the skin. At this time he was quite vexed, and murmured because God had given him such bad weather for his journey.

He soon reached the border of a thick forest. What was his terror on beholding on one side of the road a robber, who, with leveled gun, was aiming at him and attempting to fire! But the powder being wet with the rain, the gun did not go off, and the merchant giving spurs to his horse fortunately had time to escape.

As soon as he found himself safe, he said to himself, 'How wrong I was not to endure the rain patiently, as sent by Providence. If the weather had been dry and fair, I should not probably have been alive at this hour; the rain which caused me to murmur came at a fortunate moment, to save my life and preserve to me my property.'

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered before the Oneida County Agricultural Society, at their Annual Fair and Cattle Show, at Whitesboro, N. Y., September 24, 1846.

BY DOLPHUS SKINNER, PRESIDENT.

[Published by request of the Society.]

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN—Members of the Oneida County Agricultural Society, and friends of Agricultural Improvement—for as such I trust I may venture to address all present—We are now assembled to celebrate our Sixth Anniversary Fair since the organization of our Society. We have come from the East and the West, the North and the South, to bring together, and present to each other and to our fellow citizens, our annual offerings—the various productions of our Farms, our Gardens, our Work-shops, and our Dairy-houses—our Fields, our Stables, our Hog-stys—our Parlors and our Kitchens—our Looms, our Spindles, our Knitting Needles and our Embroidery Needles—in short, the productions of Nature's true nobility of all classes, from those of the sun-browned and hard fisted follower of the Plow, to those of his delicate rosy cheeked daughter.

We have brought them here for inspection, for examination, for trial; to compare them with each other, and with the productions of former years, to see what improvements we have made, and what further improvements are attainable. We have no secrets in our society, and seek no monopoly. We ask no letters patent for the improvements we have made, or may make in Agriculture—in the productiveness of our farms, our orchards, our gardens, our dairy-houses, our domestic animals, or our work-shops.

They are freely offered for the inspection, the adoption of all, pro bono publico, for the general weal. And we are happy in the assurance we have, that, in the various productions presented, and classes represented, there is necessarily no conflict or rivalry of interests involved. The interest of each is conducive to the interest of the whole; and the general prosperity of the whole adds to the interest of each. No mutual jealousies, therefore can legitimately spring up between us. The sun-browned, hard-handed tiller of the soil, who prides himself on the largest and best crops of wheat, corn, potatoes and onions, and sleekest and best oxen, horses, cows, sheep and swine, will not object to his parlor's being ornamented by the more delicate taste and skill and needle of his blooming daughter; or if he does, we hope she will keep her ornaments for her own rather than her father's parlor. But if she, or any of her sex, has become so exquisitely delicate as to be afraid of the dairy room, or feel offended at the liberal representation here made of the humble domestic animals so essential to the convenience and comfort of all classes, we hope she will never be so inconsistent as to taste of a piece of pork or beef or butter or cheese.

I can not but congratulate the friends of agriculture generally, and the members of this society in particular, upon the growing interest manifested in the prosperity and improvement of our home agriculture—upon the growing conviction that agriculture is the first and most important of all arts, and lays at the foundation of state and national prosperity—that those who follow its quiet and useful pursuits are much the largest portion of our great nation's population—that they form both the substratum and the bone, muscle and sinew of our vast Republic, and furnish both its defence and its nourishment; and that the interests of agriculture are to be regarded as the interests of all classes, throughout the length and breadth of our land.

And I congratulate you upon the exhibition which we have now witnessed. It speaks for itself in regard to the improvements that have been made in the agriculture of our own county—in the in the noble display of animals both of improved and foreign breeds, and those of native origin—in the increased excellency of the products of the dairy, the garden, the orchard, the work-shop and the fireside.

I need not here particularize in regard to the exhibition in any one department, when each is so well represented and so abundantly supplied. The show of animals in nearly if not quite every one of the different classes, the rich production of the dairy, the orchard and the garden; and the variety and excellence, as well as beauty of the articles exhibited in the ladies' department, I think I may safely and truly say, exceed those of any former year since the organization of our society.

I now propose calling your attention to some of the relations, interests and duties of agriculturalists.

I have said that agriculture is the first and most important of all human occupations, and that those engaged in its pursuit form the substratum, the bone and muscle, and sinew of our nation. All other classes depend directly or indirectly on agriculture for their subsistence. The farmer feeds the nation. He constitutes the main defence of the nation. He fought on a hundred battle fields in our revolutionary struggle; he beat back our proud oppressors and watered our soil freely with his heart's richest blood; and he who led our armies to victory, liberty and glory—the illustrious Father of his country—was himself a farmer, a fitting and noble representative of the future inheritors of the soil. The farmer not only feeds and defends the nation, but he also furnishes the material for clothing the nation.

But though these are great and undeniable truths, it is no less true that other professions and pursuits, other occupations and employments are necessary, and in connection with agriculture, largely contribute to the general weal—to the greatness and glory of our country—and to the convenience and prosperity of agriculturalists themselves. True, they are not as essential as agriculture, and could not subsist without it; though agriculturalists could subsist without them; yet in the latter case the farmer would be obliged to unite to a certain extent, mechanical and manufacturing pursuits with that of agriculture—to make his own farming implements and dwelling houses and manufacture his own clothing—thus varying and extending his pursuits much more than at present and to the obvious detriment of his own interests.

While therefore we honor agriculture as the most essential and important of all occupations, we do not, and would not on any account disparage or undervalue any other laudable calling or useful pursuit. Happily there exists no necessity for this. There is not necessarily any conflict of interests between the different useful occupations and pursuits in which our countrymen are engaged.

While the farmer turns over his furrows, tills his fields, rears his stock, improves his soil, and diligently pursues the legitimate business of his profession, the mechanic constructs his farming implements, and builds his house, his barns and his furniture, in a better and more expeditious manner than he could do it himself; and the manufacturer receives his raw material—his wool, his cotton, his cocoons and his flax, and returns him a more elegant and substantial fabric than himself or his family could manufacture, and at less cost; while he furnishes the provisions and means of subsistence both for the mechanic and manufacturer much cheaper than they could produce them themselves. And the merchant accommodates both by receiving and exchanging their various productions, not only with each other, but with foreign merchants and producers, for articles of convenience and luxury not produced in our country, and thus gives existence and employment to the thousands of navigators and ships that plow the billows of the mighty deep. And this last business in turn confers its signal benefits on our race, brings distant nations and continents together, extends the social principle and the discoveries of science and the arts, as well as the blessings of civilization and Christianity, and thus cements the vast family of man into one common brotherhood of mutual benefactors.

He therefore, who would array one class of our fellow citizens against another and set them in hostile attitudes, can be looked upon in no other light than as the enemy of the community in which he lives and of all classes composing it.

But while the general interests of the whole community, the great body politic, are to be regarded and sought by all, and the interest of each is identified with the interest of the whole, each class has its appropriate sphere of action and its appropriate duties to perform for itself and those pertaining to it. And agriculturalists especially, being the most numerous class, and following the most important of all occupations, have numerous and weighty duties devolved upon them which they can not consistently nor innocently neglect. And I desire now to call your attention to some of these duties.

Nor need I here to speak particularly of those duties that are alike common to all men and nations, all ages and all climes, such as the duties of religion, the allegiance you owe to God and conscience, to the laws of your country, and to universal humanity. The pulpit, the church, the Bible, and the statute book, are to be your resort as touching those duties. And I will only add here in general terms, that the 'fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom,' that 'righteousness exalteth a nation,' but sin is a reproach to any people.'

Of the important duties specially devolving upon agriculturalists, and to which I now invite your attention, I will first speak of the duty of every one engaged in this calling, of possessing a thorough knowledge of his business. A farmer should know what good farming is—how all necessary work on a farm should be done—at what time it should be done—what are the different kinds and qualities of soil constituting his farm—what the best modes of cultivating it, the manures best adapted to make it productive, the best kinds of grass, grain and other productions—the best and most profitable kinds of stock or domestic animals for him to keep—the best method of feeding, sheltering and taking care of them. In short, every department of his appropriate business should be as familiar to him as his A B C's.

It is related of the late Billy Gray, of Mass., a very wealthy individual extensively engaged in shipping and commerce, that once having in his employment a mere pretender, whose business habits were very loose and defective, he reproved him sharply for his negligence and bad manner of doing business, when the offender, somewhat piqued at the freedom of the reproof, tauntingly said to Gray, 'I believe, Sir, you were once a drummer, were you not?' 'Aye,' said Gray, 'but didn't I drum WELL?'

It is not of so much importance which of the many kinds of necessary and lawful business a man engages in, as it is how, or in what manner he performs it, or that he does the business well—even if he be drumming.

'Act well your part—there all the honor lies.'

There are some farmers, or rather some who occupy the place, and bear the name of farmers, who appear to know about various other kinds of business much more than about agriculture—appear to be acquainted with every body's business but their own. They may be called jacks at all trades, but good at none. They make a hundred experiments, but bring them to no legitimate, profitable or satisfactory results. They enter into a thousand speculations, but succeed in none.

In order to success in his calling, the farmer must be industrious, prudent and observing. His mind must be stored with a competent knowledge of the theory, and his hands know how to perform the practical part of his profession.

I am aware that since the introduction and more general circulation of periodical publications and treatises on different branches of Agriculture, a certain class of farmers have had much to say against the practice, and decried what they were pleased to call book farming as a pernicious degeneracy, an innovation upon former practices that ought not to be encouraged or tolerated.

If by book farming be meant the abandonment of long tried and justly approved methods of cultivation—the truly practical of past ages—and the adoption of new and untried theories, or if it mean the substitution of theory for practice, or reading for labor, then I should be as much opposed to book farming as any man among you. But if thereby be meant the duty of adhering to all we have that is good and acquiring additions thereto by reading, availing ourselves of the practical experiments and tried results thereof of the best and most observing and successful agriculturists of the age, testing all new theories by experiments, obtaining by these publications the aggregate wisdom and experience of all, then indeed is book farming good, and we could wish the number of book farmers multiplied far beyond what it now is. Reading, understanding and applying what is published in these agricultural works, is to the farmer what the reading, understanding and applying doctrines, precepts and practical duties of the New Testament is to the Christian. You would think that a strange Christian community which should repudiate the New Testament and refuse to read it on the ground that their fathers had taught them all they need to know of Christianity, and they had been practicing its duties from their youth up. You would think them far more likely to be true Christians if they often read and had recourse to the New Testament for instruction in theory, and then endeavored in all their practice to carry out and apply all its wholesome duties and sublime truths. So the farmer, who often has recourse to books on agriculture, and applies and carries out in practice all the valuable knowledge he thus acquires will be far more successful than, and far in advance of, the one who never reads nor seeks any improvement from books. The world is advancing and improving in every department of knowledge. The Christian world is becoming better and better acquainted with the principles, precepts and duties of the Gospel. Its spirit is better understood and its power felt far more than during the long dark ages that brooded o'er the Church, when the Bible was a sealed book to the common people. Man is advancing in knowledge, philosophy, science, the arts and mechanical skill.

This is attested by the perfection to which machinery has been brought in our various manufacturing establishments and almost all the arts of life—in the rapidity regularity and power of our steamboats' movements through oceans, seas, lakes and rivers—in the still more rapid flight of the locomotive and rail-road cars through mountains and over valleys the length and breadth of our land—and in the still more astonished invention of the Magnetic Telegraph, by which intelligence is sent with lightning speed for a thousand miles in a moment, so that time and space seem almost annihilated. And I ask, shall agriculturists alone, of all classes, remain stationary and their arts and business unimproved? Forbid it, Spirit of the Age in which we live! Forbid it, ye shades of Mount Vernon and Monticello, of the Hermitage and North Bend!

Let our motto be Improvement, and our watch word Excelsior.

Secondly. Another important duty devolving upon agriculturists, is that of providing for and properly educating their children—Without this, farmers will never attain their true footing in society, nor maintain the influence and standing to which by their numbers and pursuits they are entitled. All will concede the obvious duty of providing wholesome food and suitable clothing for the body. But not less obvious is the duty of providing suitable food for the minds of your sons and daughters—of looking after their morals, their habits, their education, appropriate to their sphere.

By education I mean something broader and more comprehensive than mere literary acquirement—or a knowledge of books and science. Your children should be taught good morals, respect for the aged, exemplary habits, habits of industry, purity, neatness, order, frugality, temperance, and charity. For without these they are wholly unfit for any respectable station, and all other acquirements and accomplishments will only tend to make them appear ridiculous. To these necessary and practical lessons add as much other learning as possible without detriment to any of these.

I care not how deeply learned farmers' sons may be in Philosophy, Astronomy, Geography, History, Botany, Chemistry, Mathematics, Language and the sciences generally; or how highly accomplished and refined the education of your daughters, in Horticulture, Botany, Music, Painting, in French, Italian, or other languages: the more the better, if these accomplishments are superadded to the necessary and practical education first mentioned. But if a farmer's son can solve the most difficult problem in Euclid, and talk and write Latin, Greek and Hebrew, and yet knows not how to turn a furrow with a plow, or rear cattle, or fatten swine, or swing a scythe, or how to economize and procure a living, he is but poorly educated, and will make a sorry and contemptible figure in the world.

And if the farmer's daughter can sing and play on the piano never so sweetly, and simper, 'parlez vous Français?' and 'comment vous portez vous?' never so gracefully, and yet knows not how to knead and bake a batch of bread, churn a pot of cream, cook a beef-steak, roast a loin of lamb, wash and iron her father's shirt—and mend it too if need be—preserve sweetmeats and pickle cucumbers, she is certainly not half educated—is a useless and cumbersome piece of furniture in her father's house, and will be in her husband's, if she ever gets one, unless she goes into the kitchen to complete her education, and thus finishes where she should have begun it.

Let the foundation of the education of your sons and daughters be laid deep, strong and sure, and rear the superstructure as high and ornament it as well as your means will allow or circumstances warrant: but never lay the foundation in gold leaf, silver tinsel, gew gaws and gossamer, and then attempt to finish the building with a ponderous block of granite.

Respect your own calling and business in life and teach your sons and daughters to respect it also. Educate them in and for it, both by precept and example, to the extent of your ability, and furnish them with the opportunity of further improving it according to your means. Encourage them to pursue the same calling, as a healthful, honorable and useful occupation, having less temptation to evil and being a safer and surer road to competence, than most other occupations: but compel them not to pursue it against strong inclinations and peculiar genius for some other. For nature and providence fit different individuals for different stations and pursuits in life. And you can never teach a chicken to swim in the brook, nor a young duck to perch upon the hen-roost. But whatever may be the stations or pursuits of your sons and daughters in after life, a practical knowledge of the arts of husbandry and house keeping can never injure them, but may be of great and lasting utility to them.

Thirdly. There is another duty incumbent on Agriculturists which I trust I shall be pardoned for introducing to your notice on this occasion—I mean the duty you owe to the government and laws under which you live, and the state and country which you belong—the duty of respecting the powers that be, obeying the laws of the land, and showing yourselves peaceable, exemplary and patriotic citizens:—and especially the duty of being well informed in relation to constitutional and statutory laws, and qualified thereby to exercise understandingly, and prudently the elective franchise—and power and influence with which you are invested.

Agriculturists are more numerous than any other class, yea, than all other classes of our citizenry united, and are capable of wielding, and do wield a mighty power in the state and nation, for good or for evil. How important then, Brother Farmer, that we know how to wield that power, and wield it only for good!

We are entitled to a representation in our state and national councils proportioned to our numbers. But has that right ever been conceded to us? No, for we have never claimed it. And we may be assured that till we learn to respect ourselves as our rights, others will never respect them. For we have not too often been flattered and wheedled by the honied words and fair speeches of politicians, demagogues, who had no common interests nor feelings with us, into the support of measures and measures inimical to our own and the best interests of the public at large? Have not many corrupt and unprincipled men, who follow no regular and useful business or occupation in life—mere political mountebanks—through false pretensions and flattering appeals to us, by our own unpardonable ignorance and remissness—obtained offices in our legislature and elsewhere, for which they were utterly unfit—who sought them only to fatten on the public bounty—while as a consequence agricultural interests have been depressed and heavy taxes imposed on farmers and other industrial classes of useful citizens?

These remarks are not made for the purpose of exciting jealousy, or ill will, or arraying one class against another. No; God forbid I should do anything of the kind. For I have said there is necessarily no conflict of interests between those of different occupations. The interest of all is the interest of each and vice versa. Nor are they made to excite your ambition, or lead you to court office either in the legislature or elsewhere. For I hope none of you will ever seek office for the sake of office or its emoluments; but accept it freely when offered; if you believe yourselves capable of filling it properly—and that you can be more useful to your class, your constituents, and the community at large, than you could in a private capacity. The shades of Vernon were ever more grateful to Washington than either the laurels of Trenton or the chair of the President. But what I wish to impress emphatically on your minds, is, the importance of being well informed on the subject of knowing both your power and your true position—of understanding where, for whom, and why you give your votes—of voting for no man unless he is capable, honest, faithful. If you know him to be such, let his occupation be what it may, give him your support.

It is fortunate that in this country there are always two or more political parties, for they serve as mutual checks upon each other. When either party gets in power and abuses that power, its errors and corruptions are sure to be seen by the eyes and exposed by the trumpet tongues of the opposing party, and thus they are soon called to render an account of themselves. I doubt not that the masses of both the great political parties are equally honest and equally patriotic. They entertain different views of what are the best laws and best policy for the country. And through the wisdom and vigilance of both we generally have very tolerable laws, for which we ought to be thankful.

But though the existence of different and opposing parties is undoubtedly a public benefit, yet has its evils, one of the greatest of which is, the perfect bondage that party often imposes on its members.

UNIVERSALISM IN CANADA W.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

ers. I object to no one being a party man if he choose. But I do object to a man's selling himself so entirely, soul and body, to a party that he dare not support a measure which in his conscience he believes right, because his party is generally opposed to it; or dare not oppose a measure which in his very soul he believes to be wrong, because his party support it, or the opposite party oppose it. Give me the man that has the moral courage, and honesty, and soul, to go for the true, the just and the right, let which party may oppose, or which may support it. And here I can not withhold what I believe to be a justly deserved compliment, or tribute of praise due to our late democratic Representative in Congress from this county, the Hon. Timothy Jenkins, for his able speech and honest vote in the national legislature on the subject of the total and radical change in the tariff, from 1842 to 1846, wherein I doubt not, though he went against a mighty odds of his party, he expressed and endeavored to carry out, the honest views of at least four-fifths of his constituents.

Finally, my brother Farmers, upon this subject, see that you are well informed—that you are not misled blind-fold by designing men—that you act understandingly, and not from prejudice—that, while you are liberal and friendly to all classes, you understand and maintain your own rights, and faithfully and conscientiously perform your duty. You belong to different and opposing political parties, yet you can act together and in harmony upon the subject of agriculture; and as a means of allaying political prejudice and hostility, I would suggest that each of you take one good political paper and exchange weekly with your neighbor of the opposite party, thus informing yourselves on both sides and being the better qualified to act understandingly, and probably in greater harmony.

In conclusion—having detained you longer than at first designed—I will add but few words more. See to it, ye friends of Agriculture, one and all, that you are well acquainted with your own appropriate business, both theoretically and practically—that you know what to do, when to do it, and how to do it—that every thing be done decently, reasonably, and in order: That your families are all provided for, and especially that your children be thoroughly educated with that substantial and practical knowledge that will enable them to act well their part and pass reputably, usefully and happily through life: And that your own rights and privileges be respected and maintained, while you prove your patriotism and your love of order in all things.

And when you go home from this annual Festival, this Farmers' Holy-day, this interesting Fair, and have gathered in and safely stored the abundance of your later harvest, and the storms of winter shall have whitened the fields you so lately tilled, and its bleak winds shall whistle around your wellings, you may seat yourselves around your cheerful firesides and bid defiance to the raging storm without. Your granaries are all full and unrunning over—your cattle and domestic animals are all safely housed and full fed—your rosy cheeked sons and daughters return from the school, and cheerfully tell over the tales and incidents of the (to them) eventful day.—Sis gently rocks the cradle and sings to little Bub—the good wife spreads the clean table linen and loads the board with plenty—the fire crackles upon the hearth—the cricket chirps merrily from his crevice—the very dog wags his tail in gratitude, and puss paws quietly in the corner—and when it is that your full hearts will go up in gratitude to the great Father of all—your dwellings become vocal with your evening prayers and your morning thanksgivings—your children will rise up and call you blessed—children's children shall praise you. And when, like shocks of corn fully ripe, you yourselves shall be gathered in at the last great harvest, into the garner of endless life, you shall be greeted with the welcome plaudit, 'Well done good and faithful servants, enter ye into the joy of your Lord.'

A Christian profession saves many a good name in this life, but never a soul in the next.

In the month of September I spent three weeks at Merrickville, C. W., where resides our good sister Church, who at times has lifted up her voice in defence of the Gospel of the grace of God which bringeth salvation to the ends of the earth. This place is about 30 miles from Prescott and about the same distance from Brockville, on the Rideau canal. I preached ten discourses to a constantly increasing congregation. On the last Saturday and Sunday a Conference was appointed there, for the purpose of bringing about a closer union, of establishing a greater concert of action between our brethren of the Lower and Upper Province, and for the purpose of devising means for a more rapid advancement of the cause of God's impartial grace therein. At the Conference we had a pleasing and we trust, truly profitable time—one which will long be remembered by many of us. Seven discourses were preached on the occasion and listened to by a truly attentive and respectable audience. The preachers present and who participated in the exercises were Ers. Leavitt of Belleville and H. Roberts of Rochester, and myself. The only thing which was a matter of regret, was the absence of Br. Ward from Canada E., who was expected to meet with us. But we had a good time—a refreshing from the Lord. Some who were present with us, came from fifty to sixty miles and for the first time listened to the preaching of a grace broad enough for the salvation of the whole world. It was to them, as to many others, a time of rejoicing. Their hearts were full to overflowing. They felt as if they had cause to thank God and take courage. And never was it our privilege to address a more devout and listening assembly. The spirit of inquiry was abroad and we believe that there and then was seed sown which will eventually yield a rich and plentiful harvest.

Our friends in Merrickville and vicinity are but few in number, but they are strong in the faith.—And measures are being taken to have the good news of the grace of God in the salvation of entire mankind preached in their midst. If this is done Universalism will live down the reproach which is now cast upon it by the self-styled orthodox Christians of the land. Their opposition is almost without bounds. And they act as if they felt that everything was needed to meet the dreaded foe. Sure it is that many hard sayings are told about Universalist and Universalism. Old stale and worn-out anecdotes which have been uttered and refuted for a thousand and one times, are again and again repeated in the pulpit and fireside circle with all the assurance of a Paul on Mars Hill. But they must be suffered to foam and foam until they have foamed out their shame. Verily the wrath of man shall praise the Lord and the remainder of wrath will he restrain. We were received by our friends with warm hearts and open arms, and our stay was made very agreeable, for all of which may they be abundantly blessed from the storehouse of the Lord.

There was a protracted effort in the vicinity of Merrickville in full operation when I arrived in town, where tribute was being laid upon the records of the past, for low cunning and threadbare anecdotes about Universalists, that precious immortal souls might be born into the kingdom of God. There was much said about the sandy foundation of Universalism and that it was but a school boy's past time to put it into the shades, and how many victories had been gained over Universalists.—When we learned of the boasts of these mighty men in modern Israel so called, Doct. Church and myself addressed a letter to the two officiating clergymen—Pool and Williams, (the latter of whom, some eight or ten years ago, held a discussion with Br. Langworthy, in Augusta, Canada, and last winter, with Br. Leavitt where victory crowned his efforts as he says,) giving them an invitation to discuss the merits of the doctrine of the endless misery of a part of the human family. This letter was followed up by another after a few days, but these mighty men were too deeply engaged to honor us with any kind of an answer during our stay. We presume that these men felt as if it was just as easy to fight Universalism in their own pulpits where there was none to defend it as it would be to meet one of its advocates. And perhaps we should give them credit for blundering into the right of the matter in this respect.

Before closing this notice I would remark that Br. H. Roberts, of Rochester, is stopping for the present at Brockville, where there is considerable interest awakened and considerable anxiety to sustain the ministry of the reconciliation. We hope that their efforts may prove successful, and that the friends of truth and righteousness may be multiplied as the sand upon the sea shore. Let our friends there and elsewhere take a decided stand, and be active and energetic as other denominations are, and they will prosper. Universalism will live in any and every place where its friends will cling to it, live in it and suffer it to have a living. This is all that is wanting to establish it where it is hardly known and to build up the waste places of Zion.

ELDER L. PERRY AND THE CHRISTIAN PALLADIUM.

BR. SKINNER—As my name has already been introduced to your readers by Br. Worden, and yourself, I shall make no apology for presuming to ask permission to lay before them the following statements, which relate to the treatment that I have recently received from my old friends, in consequence of having embraced and proclaimed the glorious doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind.

Could I, however, have had the privilege of speaking in self-defence,—had any thing like an open field, and fair play been shown me in the paper where I have been assailed and publicly excommunicated, I should have felt less cause of complaint against my old brethren; and should not have troubled you nor your readers with this exhibition of their faults. I should then have made my defence to them before whom I had been accused.

But, Sir, this just and equitable privilege has been utterly denied me. The privilege which was readily granted unto Paul by king Agrippa, has been refused by a Christian Elder and Editor, Elder John Ross, one of the Editors, and 'Agent' (or more properly speaking, supreme, pontifical, and lordly comptroller) of the 'Christian Palladium.' He has pursued a course so false, unfair, dishonorable, and mean, in reference to this matter, that it deprives me of all charity for him as a Christian, and all respect for him as a man.

On hearing that I had become a Universalist, he first wrote me a letter, of which the following is a true copy:

'Charleston, 4 Corners, June 4th, 1846.

'BR. PERRY—I understand that news is rife at the Palladium office, that you have indeed become a Universalist; and have commenced preaching the doctrine which teaches that all men will be saved. I can not inform you from what source the news is derived, as I learned it from Br. William Clarke, verbally, at the late session of our conference at Freehold. Feeling pained at the thought, as I consider the doctrine a dangerous error, calculated to strengthen the hands of the wicked by promising them life, unconditionally, and the preaching it a wicked and unchristian work, I embrace the first convenient leisure moment to write you on this subject. If the report is untrue, we shall expect your immediate disclaimer at the Palladium Office, and shall endeavor to do you justice by laboring to wipe away one of the foulest stains attempted to be fixed upon a Christian minister, and to expose your foul calumniators. If the report is true, and you have thus in an evil hour fallen into the error, you will have the frankness boldly and ingenuously to avow it, and arrange yourself under your proper and appropriate banner. I hope for the honor of Christianity it is not true, that you have thus changed your principles and preaching. If true, I hope you will see your error soon, and forsake it. I want to hear from you. Direct to Charleston 4 Corners, Montgomery county.

'In great haste—yours, JOHN ROSS,
'Elder Lyman Perry.'

To the above imperial, arbitrary and dogmatical production of his royal highness, which I suppose the author considered very modest, charitable and gentlemanly, I had the 'frankness' and most astonishing presumption, to 'avow boldly and ingenuously,' my honest and cheering belief, that all men would finally be saved. It was perhaps rather unfortunate for me that I did so, as it was in part, the cause of his subsequent onslaught upon my character in the Palladium, which met with so just, but dreadful a fate from the pens of brethren Skinner, and Worden. In this article which was the next from his pen, he came down upon me in the language of personal detraction and abuse. To this, I sent a reply which he refused to publish. But his course being disapproved by several Christian preachers and brethren, and feeling conscience smitten when the excitement had abated under which he acknowledges he wrote his unchristian remarks, he writes to me a private letter, intended as a satisfaction by way of explanation and confession. The following is a true copy.

'Charleston 4 Corners, August 18, 1846.

'Br. Perry—Your article over date of August 8, 1846, designed as a reply to mine, published in the Palladium, headed 'Fall into Universalism,' was duly received, and had it contained only corrections of my errors, or castigations for my faults, or a defence of your character, it should cheerfully have been admitted into the Palladium. But it is now inadmissible for the following reasons. It is conceived that it would lay the foundation for a long and unprofitable controversy in the Palladium. For,

'1st. It charges that there are many Restorationists in the Christian denomination. I presume the Christian brethren, as a body, would contradict this, and ask for proof. I have never known one Restorationist among us, unless you are the exception.

'2. It charges the doctrine upon the Unitarian denomination, and I believe that they, as a body, would not avow it.

'3d. It charges Mr. James Kay with being a staunch Restorationist; and I believe he would deny the application.

'4th. It charges the doctrine upon Elder Jones, (deceased), and I think his friends would challenge proof.

'5th. It makes Elder Ira Allen fellowship the doctrine, which probably he would disavow.

'Now we do not wish to open a controversy with all these in the Palladium, much less to permit a correspondent to accuse them, and not suffer them to reply.'

This is very conscientious indeed, for a man who can himself publicly slander a correspondent, and then refuse him the privilege of replying.

He continues, 'I confess, that I wrote the article headed 'Fall into Universalism' under some excitement. After receiving your answer to my inquiry relative to your having embraced the doctrine of Universalism, in which I understood you frankly to acknowledge you had, (for you did not in that letter even hint at being a Restorationist or that you believed there was any punishment after death.) I determined to let the matter rest until the meeting of our Executive Committee, and the Book Association, next October. But in the mean time, the Universalist paper containing the swaggering article of Mr. Worden, was put into my hands, and I learned that other Universalist papers were trumpeting the conversion which provoked me to notice it.

'Knowing that you had embraced the doctrine, and connecting this with Mr. Worden's expressions, 'formerly (not now) one of the main pillars,' &c., and 'we do not desire that all Partialists should fall into our ranks,' (organization,) 'but Br. Perry is just such a man as we want;' I did conclude that you had become one of that people, and were in their ranks. And I believe that is the fair conclusion that any disinterested person would form on reading that article. And so understanding it, I stated my 'supposition' that it was true. In stating my conviction that your talent and temperament fitted you for the wants of Universalists, I designed only to refer to what I thought, and what I believe society generally accords to you, a love of controversy, or delight in discussions and disputations. I designed no disparagement to your character. I regret that I used the term 'Bumps of self-esteem and combativeness,' though I did not design it as an opprobrious epithet. Forgive me this wrong. As far as any thing that I have said or written is injurious to your Christian character or feelings, I am ready and willing to make honorable restitution.'

The remainder of this letter is unimportant. It is therefore omitted.

Now who can believe that this professed penitent who so humbly asks forgiveness, 'designed no disparagement to my character,' when he asserted that the 'development of certain bumps of self-esteem and combativeness eminently fitted' me for preaching Universalism, which in his first letter he said he 'considered a wicked and unchristian work?' Is saying that a minister is eminently fitted for a wicked and unchristian work, no disparagement to his character? And can a man make such an assertion without designing any disparagement to the character of which he thus speaks? Tell it not in Gath.

But notwithstanding all this, seeing he declared himself 'ready and willing to make honorable restitution,' wrote to him that I should be satisfied if he would make an honorable retraction soon, as public, as was his attack, or the 'wrong' he had committed, even though my reply was not published. But what has been the course since? Hear it, and be astonished at the utter falsity and insincerity of his pretensions.

1st. He has published no retraction.

2d. He has suppressed a statement of Elder E. G. Holland, which Elder H. informed me he had left at the Palladium office for publication, and which he said would me better justice than Ross's article.

3d. He has published a preamble and resolution of the Black River Christian Conference, in which the clerk said Conference is instructed to drop my name from minutes, because I believe in what they term Universalism, but suppressed my statement of facts which develop the inquisitorial proceedings of said conference, at which I sent him in early season, with a request that he would publish them in connection with said preamble and resolution. These have shared the same fate with my answer to his ungenerous and unchristian reply to Mr. Worden. And this is the way this pious penitent 'makes honorable restitution!'

But perhaps he thought these 'facts' as well as my previous response to him, would 'lay the foundation for a long and unprofitable controversy in the Palladium.' Indeed! But there is no danger I suppose of any such controversy from the publication of articles or resolutions ever so 'wrong,' slanderous and abusive, providing reply to such communications is permitted to appear in the Palladium. Go on then, Mr. Ross. I shall look on you no more for even the semblance of fairness or justice. You are welcome if you choose, to make your paper jug-handled, one-sided affair, and the vehicle of personal detraction, and sectarian animosity. Go on, and reap all the laurels you can in this brave and honorable warfare; and proclaim to your readers how triumphant you have succeeded in crushing the man you first intended to sacrifice at the shrine of sectarian Christianity. You need have no fears of controversy in the Palladium for nobody will probably attempt to confront you there while you remain the exclusive guardian of its columns. After your 'flourish of trumpets,' and the publication of the sublime preamble and resolution of the B. R. C. Conference, your readers may think the catastrophe is completed—Elder Perry is justly excluded—and that he regards it, inasmuch as not a word of protestation—a breath of remonstrance—has yet been heard from him on the subject. And many of them will probably never know that I have protested, and vainly endeavored to present my protestation before them, seeing you are so careful of your way of making 'honorable restitution,' not to publish the fact, or suffer any thing from others in my behalf to reach them.

But why has this Christian Elder delayed rectifying what he has himself acknowledged to be wrong, if he is willing as he asserts, to have his faults corrected. If he flimsy reasons he assigned for rejecting my reply, was the only cause of that rejection, why has he not since published his retraction of these faults, and thus made 'honorable restitution'? But, Sir, the truth is, he is afraid 'to come to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved.' He was afraid to publish my reply for fear of the influence of the facts it developed. It is true that many of the Christians are Restorationists, at least, there are thousands of them disbelievers in endless punishment. Many of them have told me so since my rejection of the doctrine. The Unitarians I have always understood to be Restorationists. It is but a short time since I saw an article copied from the Christian Register, a Unitarian periodical, arguing strongly against endless misery. The Christians are at present much in fellowship with the Unitarians. Elder James Kay is a staunch Restorationist; his writings in the Palladium are to be relied upon for evidence. Elder Abner Jones, the founder of the Christian denomination in the East, was a Restorationist before he died, if his biography written by his son, and so among the Christians, states the truth. Elder Ira Allen, of Pottsdam, N. Y., has baptized Universalists, and that he will not deny. In view of such facts, as these, I asked in my reply, why it was considered criminal in the view of the Christians, for me to be a Restorationist? Why I should be disfellowshipped and others fellowshipped who believe the same sentiments? Especially since the Christians profess to make Christian character the sole test of Christian fellowship. But enough. With these strictures, Elder Ross must pass for what he is worth, and my notice of the proceedings of the Black River Conference must be deferred until another time.

L. PERRY.

Chaumont Bay, Jefferson county, Oct. 1st.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We welcome Br. Perry to our columns, both because the Christians, so called, are so unchristian as to deny him justice, or the opportunity of speaking in self-defence in their paper, and because we know our readers will be pleased to see the traces of his pen in the Magazine and Advocate, and to give his defence, as well as any other articles he may write, a fair and candid consideration. We shall look with interest for his notice of the proceedings of the Black River Christian Conference, in his case. What a generous, magnanimous soul Br. Ross must be! What noble 'restitution' he makes to an injured brother?

THE INVITATION.—NO. I.

BY A. B. COPELAND.

Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest. Mat. xi: 28,

The above are the words of the blessed Jesus—the Saviour of the world. Already had he given his twelve apostles power over all unclean spirits—to heal the sick, cure the lame, give language to the dumb, hearing to the deaf, and sight to the blind. In short, we are informed, that he had given them power to heal all manner of sicknesses, and all manner of diseases. What a beautiful illustration is here given, by the great Redeemer of the world, of the deep and ardent sympathy he felt for man; and how much he desired the amelioration of the many woes, by which all the low, the degraded, the miserable, the lost, and dependent children of humanity were so grievously afflicted! Jesus beheld these dependent objects, with feelings of the tenderest regard, and the deepest emotions. Though the entire number that composed the mass of people by which the Saviour was at this time surrounded, were not, perhaps, afflicted with physical diseases, that caused them extreme suffering, yet, in a moral and spiritual sense, perhaps, we may safely say all were diseased; and the Saviour's whole soul was moved with compassion, toward them; and most deeply did he desire that they might all soon be made to see and believe, embrace and fully understand the principles of the eternal truth, which he had then made known to the world. Though the truth, in its fullness, was not then made known to them, yet enough of its fundamental principles was already demonstrated, which, if they would believe, embrace, and in all their walk and conversation practice upon, would most assuredly yield them far more transcendent joys than they had ever yet experienced. It was only by an immediate and hearty concurrence with the truths of the doctrine that he taught them, and by allowing the heavenly principles of the same to exercise their benign and saving influence over their lives, that they could be relieved from the extreme severity of the unrelenting tyrant under which they had so long lived. The blessed Saviour of the world received of his Father,—who is also our Father,—the ability to cure all manner of diseases, of which his brethren of the human race were afflicted. Whether it was a physical, moral, or mental calamity, it was subject to his divine power, and for its speedy and entire removal, Jesus had but to speak the words, 'Be thou clean,' or 'Go thy way, and as thou hast believed so be it unto thee.' I say, Jesus had but so to speak, and the suffering mortal was instantaneously restored to perfect health of body, soundness of limbs, or rationality of mind. And hence, as it was not supposable that Jesus could visit in person, all the afflicted ones, in the whole world, in which the Gospel was to be preached, nor be sought after and approached by the friends of such afflicted ones, that he might heal them, in answer to a request to do so; and to retain this power within himself, alone, did not, and could not, satisfy the benevolent soul of the Redeemer of the world—he conferred the power of healing upon all his apostles—I would not, however, be understood by the reader to say that the above is the only reason why the Saviour conferred upon the apostles the power to perform miracles. But I am inclined to the opinion that it was, at least, one of the causes that led him to do so. It, doubtless, was necessary, that the apostles should be possessed of this miraculous power, in order that they might not fail to establish by the resistless force of arguments that could not be evaded nor gainsaid, the truth of their divine mission. It was by the irresistible influence of such arguments alone that they could send the arrow of conviction of the truth of the doctrine they preached into the hearts and the consciences of the doubting, the stubborn and the unbelieving, and cause them to acknowledge that the agency of divine power and grace was most signally manifested by them, in the execution of their mission. Already had the apostles been sent out by the Saviour, to preach the Gospel to all the chosen people of God, who resided in all the land of Judea. That, at this time they were strictly forbidden to preach this Gospel to any other people, or nation, than the children of Israel, is evident, from the Saviour's own words—'Go not into the way of the Gentiles; and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not. But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.' Matt. x: 5, 6.

From Matt. xi: 1, we learn that when the blessed Jesus had given the apostles their commission to preach the Gospel to all the lost sons and daughters of Jacob; and they had gone forth on the execution of this mission, he himself also went out and preached in all their cities;—and, while so preaching it was that he spoke the language of the text to the multitude by which he was surrounded. Though, with few exceptions, great numbers of persons continually followed the Saviour, to whatever place he went, yet, it is highly probable that by far the greater part of them were led to do so by the influence of no higher, nor more honorable motives than those of mere idle curiosity. Hence, though in one sense—an outward sense, they had already come to the Saviour, they had not come to him in that way that could enable them, reasonably, to expect that he would confer upon them any real or lasting benefits. As we have rather more than presumptive evidence to show, is the case with quite too many professing Christianity, in the present age of the world, many followed the Saviour more for the 'loaves and fishes' than for any thing else. It was not from a sincere and anxious regard for the truth, nor a desire to obtain a knowledge of the new doctrine he preached, by which the mass of those who followed the Son of God were actuated. And hence, Jesus knowing, as he did, that it was from motives of curiosity only that the multitude followed him, wished to have them understand that before they could expect to receive of him any good thing, they must become more humble in all the feelings of their hearts, and come to him in a lowly, simple, and penitential manner.

THE COUNTRY PASTOR'S DEFENCE DEMOLISHED.

I have read the very labored defence of the 'Country Pastor' published in the Magazine and Advocate of September 4th, and should have immediately reviewed it, but the absence of some individuals, and other circumstances not necessary to relate, made it impossible for me to sooner obtain the requisite information. Those who have not attentively perused my articles and compared them with his reply, may be led by it to conclude that his friends have been materially, and he grossly misrepresented. And those who have thoroughly examined all that has been written may suppose that I was unwarrantably severe, and in several essential respects in error; although they will scarcely fail to perceive that the communication of Mr. Dyer contains no small share of ambiguity, evasion, equivocation, duplicity and misrepresentation.—But when its downright falsehoods, (perhaps I should say errors when reviewing so kind hearted and clever an author as the Reverend gentlemen; but I prefer to write as I mean,) are exhibited in all their naked depravity, you will not wonder that near two months exertions have scarcely enabled him to refute or impair an important feature of my allegations.

He represents me as accusing him of 'standing at the head, and being the 'instigator,' or chief mover in the various plans and efforts set forth, as pursued by sundry individuals in Preston towards their fellow citizens of other persuasions,' and declares that whatever dishonorable measures may have been taken in obtaining funds for the erection of the meeting house now occupied by the Presbyterian congregation in that town, 'he could not have been the instigator'—nor have I ever intimated that he was; and what object he has in vindicating himself from charges never made against him, I can not conceive, without it is to blind the reader to, or divert his attention from, his entire failure to disprove some I have presented. I did not declare that he was the instigator of any of the movements to which I referred. I wrote incidentally of him, that he was 'perhaps the instigator of the infamous deeds recorded in the preceding communication; alluding to the efforts to prevent our holding meetings in the school house and the attendant circumstances. And yet, notwithstanding his article externally appears so charitable, he frequently misrepresents me, imputes to me language I never uttered, and asserts that I unqualifiedly accused him with what I only intimated perhaps he perpetrated. He alleges that he never recommended or in any way instigated or encouraged, 'any individual whatever, to oppose the holding of religious or other meetings in the school house of District No. 4.' Having no reason for doubting that he was the author of the memorial to the State Superintendent, to exclude such meetings from the house, and certain books from, and to substitute others in, district school libraries, I suppose he had at heart encouraged, if not recommended and instigated such opposition. But he avers that my statement that he was its author is an unwarrantable assertion, and 'that nothing can be further from the truth.' I rely on the following facts to sustain my assumption. 1st. He wrote the memorial. This I can prove and he dare not deny. And I would ask him if he has not acknowledged that he rewrote it, because the first time it did not suit him? 2d. He had previously used the very language of a portion of it in public and in private. 3d. He had published it as original in the N. Y. Observer—I subjoin a specimen.

FROM THE MEMORIAL. FROM THE N. Y. OBSERVER.
'Combe on Man,' which MORE SNAKES IN THE GRASS.—'Combe on the Constitution of Man,' the work which infidels themselves profess to regard and recommend as the work of all others best calculated to subserve their purposes.'

4th. The State Superintendent did not direct the reply to the memorial as Mr. D. and the signers anticipated; not to one or all of them exclusively, but to the trustees of the district; and Mr. D. left the Post Office as the Universalist trustee entered and received it, and soon the ringleader of the memorialists was there and requested it, and he, Mr. D., and several others assembled on the evening of that day, and, as afterwards appeared, concluded to suppress it, though he forfeited his word by so doing. 5th. If any of the signers of the memorial knew that it contained any thing concerning certain books, all did not, or one or more of them has been guilty of falsehood. 6th. For at least five years Mr. D. has been a bitter opposer of Universalism, frequently preaching against it in no very mild and amiable language, and assailing it as strongly as he is capable. This he will probably concede. not my first three and the corroborating circum-

my next two reasons, with the last, showing that he was a violent enemy of Universalism, laboring zealously for its prostration, justify me in asserting that 'perhaps,' yea, probably, Mr. D. encouraged or instigated that memorial? And I would inquire, if, after the Superintendent's reply was received, upon beholding that the school house was lighted one evening, and learning that it was for a Universalist meeting, he did not say, 'we shall have to give it up after all;' or, 'we are outwitted at last.'

He asserts that he 'never advised to, nor in any way encouraged the signers of that memorial to make an appeal to the State Superintendent.' Did he ever advise or in any way discourage them from making that appeal? This he does not pretend; for he had not even formed an opinion whether the course was advisable or not! Notwithstanding all he had written upon the character of the works specified in the memorial, approving some, and disapproving others, his complaints in the N. Y. Observer against a portion of them; calling the attention of parents and the friends of truth, evidently with a view to their exclusion, he had not formed an opinion whether it was advisable or not, to endeavor to have them excluded!—He could write a 'lying memorial,' as we proved it to be, whether he knew its falsity or not, and as will again appear before we conclude; keep it concealed from all opposed to the proscription of Universalist and unsectarian books, so that its misstatements shall not be exposed, and the individuals so scandalously maligned be deprived of a privilege granted even to murderers and pirates, of a defence, meet in secret nightly conclave with those who decided to suppress the reply, because it was adverse to their ungodly designs, and yet be so ignorant of what became of it that he knew nothing about it, save that the individual to whom he handed it is 'said to have signed it,' and 'both in regard to the facts of the case and the expediency of the measure' be in no way responsible!—And yet, had he been consulted, his advice would have been 'not to oppose, but to insist on the right of each religious denomination in the district to occupy the house its due proportion of the time.' But he was not; it was no inconvenience, as he resided two or three miles distant; though there was the Post office from which he obtained all his letters and papers, a large proportion of his church and society members, and there he transacted much of his business.

But the leaders of the opposition were not his tools.—Well, we are not difficult to be suited. Concede his statements to be correct, and he was their tool. They were not of his congregation. Name the man who circulated the remonstrance, against opening the school house for Universalist meetings; or upon the failure of that, because its bigotry and intolerance was too barefaced for even Preston Partialism, who obtained signatures to the protest against its occupancy for any purpose but the day school; or who signed the memorial to the State Superintendent, who attends any other meeting if he can? True, but two of the signers belong to his church, for he has but two male members in that district; but he was not honest enough to state that five more are its supporters, and their wives communicants; and I believe but five, and not seven, are connected with the Baptists, and the rest with what he terms 'the world's people.'

Mr. D. denies that 'that practical follower of Calvin' who obtained signatures to the remonstrance, 'is a member of any religious denomination.' I never said that he was. And he adds, there is not 'probably the man in Chenango county, more generally and extensively known as the decided and uncompromising opponent of the doctrines held by John Calvin, than he.' I suppose Mr. D. preaches as pure and unadulterated Calvinism as did his fathers, when they burnt witches and hung Quakers; that he is deadly hostile to every innovation that has since been made; and yet this 'uncompromising opponent of the doctrines' of Calvin, so 'generally and extensively known,' is a legal member of his society, and supports no other preacher. But he opposes the doctrines of Calvin. So do the vast majority of the Presbyterians and Baptists. Scarce one in a hundred of them will acknowledge that they believe them. I never affirmed that the individual alluded to was a doctrinal but a practical Calvinist. His conduct has frequently abundantly proved all I intended to declare that he exercised the same spirit to those who disagreed with him in opinion, that Calvin did when he burnt Servetus. A professed Universalist, Arminian, Presbyterian or even the devil, might cherish it, and be a practical Calvinist.

The 'Country Pastor' denies that the memorial intimated that it was only professedly that the building referred to was erected as a school house, and accuses me of substituting 'the word only,' knowing it was necessary, 'to make out even the appearance of falsehood.' I challenge him to point to a quotation in my articles purporting to be from him, that was not made 'verbatim, et literatim, et punctuatum.' But he has both misquoted and unfairly quoted me in several instances. And he knows that I did not insert the word only in quoting from the memorial; though I then declared, and now declare, that that was his meaning. The memorial says money was raised 'OSTENSIBLY for the purpose of erecting a school house.....which house has been constructed much larger than necessary for the school, WITH THE EVIDENT INTENTION OF OCCUPYING IT FOR RELIGIOUS MEETINGS, so called, &c. OSTENSIBLY for a school house, but constructed MUCH LARGER THAN NECESSARY for the school WITH THE EVIDENT INTENTION OF OCCUPYING IT FOR RELIGIOUS MEETINGS. The defence, the very article that charges me with misrepresenting him, says, 'he felt it to be unreasonable and oppressive that individuals of other denominations should BE HEAVILY TAXED WITH EXPRESS REFERENCE TO THE ACCOMMODATION OF UNIVERSALISTS WITH RESPECT TO A PLACE OF WORSHIP,' and yet he has not intimated they were taxed with express reference to our accommodation; has made no representation but that the tax was ostensibly for a school house. Again, he declares, 'it would be a little remarkable if they (the Universalists, J. T. G.) should not have foreseen and endeavored to provide, (by the erection of such a house, J. T. G.) for the wants of so rapidly increasing a congregation. It is remarkable if they did not provide for their wants in constructing the school house; but he has not hinted that they did! And the State Superintendent was appealed to, to decide that poor men, who, Mr. D. alleges had no moral (had no legal) right, first to vote away the property of others professedly to build a school house, and then appropriate that house to an entirely different object. PROFESSEDLY to build a school house, and then appropriate that house to AN ENTIRELY DIFFERENT OBJECT; and he has not even intimated that it was for any other object! It needs no substitution to brand Mr. D. with the appearances of falsehood. His own contradictions have stamped its reality upon him beyond a doubt. In the same breath he has virtually affirmed that the house was, and was not, built for our accommodation; and the reader will want no better evidence of his guilt, than his miserable sophistry, evasion and deception.

The house was, or was not, reared for our convenience. If not, upon this point there is no controversy between us. That he has several times plainly hinted that it was, even the child who reads must perceive. He evidently aimed to stigmatize our friends with building it of unreasonable size, and when proof is demanded he has none; he has not so represented! In the estimation of every candid mind, such equivocating, ambiguous, double-sided, hypocritical efforts to extricate himself, are derogatory, not only to the character of a distinguished divine, but would disgrace the lowest lawyer.

It was impossible for the Universalists to erect a school house of unnecessary dimensions. They have always been a minority of the voters of the district. At the time of building, it contained 37 or 38 voters, 9 of whom are members, and 10 attendants of the Baptist meetings, 2, and the wives of 7 more, belong to the Presbyterian church, making 9 voters who support no other meeting, 19, half or more, who support Calvinism. Giving the Universalists all who are not connected with any meeting, some of whom sympathise with their foes, and one or more signed the protest against their occupying the school house. Does any sane man believe that the 'Country Pastor,' or his friends were honest in declaring that the Universalists, with only 4 male members of their society, and at farthest, not more than 8 or 9 other voters that even prefer their meetings, could have accomplished any such purpose.—At the time of building, they were a minority of the trustees of the district. One supported the Presbyterians, 1 the Baptists, and 1 the Universalists. They were a minority of the building committee. It was composed of 2 members of the Baptists, 2 supporters of the Presbyterians, 2 of the Universalists, and 2 of no denomination, one of whom never attends our meetings.

A WAY TO DO GOOD.

Readers and subscribers to this paper, have you ever thought of the many different ways in which you might do good, and benefit the cause you profess to love, and spread wider the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation? Among the many different ways we could name, we will now mention but one; and we name it to those only who are able to do it and not be injured thereby. It is this—for you who are able, to pay for and give away one, two, or more copies of the Magazine and Advocate, for three, six, or twelve months, according to your ability, to some of your poor neighbors who are not able to pay for it, or to some of your semi-universalist and semi-orthodox neighbors, who are too bashful or timid to avow their faith in Universalism and voluntarily subscribe for the paper, but who would nevertheless read it if given to them, and probably soon become open and avowed advocates of the doctrine. Some, who have orthodox wives who are opposed to their husbands' subscribing and paying for a Universalist paper, would gladly receive and read it in this way, so they could say to their wives that they did not pay for it, and hence were none the poorer for reading it. In many such cases the wife would soon begin to read; and finally like the paper well enough to be willing the husband should subscribe for himself the next year. How much good might be done in this way! We mean the application, of course, only to those who are able to do these good deeds. Can you expend a dollar or two more profitably to the cause, than in this way? This would not only benefit the cause in general, strengthen the hand and encourage the heart of the publisher, but increase the circulation in your neighborhood, reduce the price of the papers taken at your office by increasing the number of the club, as the greater the number taken the smaller the price; and thus good would result in every way.

D. S.

RESPECT OF PERSONS.

St. James, in his letter, urges his brethren to refrain from the cultivation of a disposition having the nature of partiality, or of determining the mete of praise and attention to mankind by worldly considerations. 'My brethren,' says he, 'have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons. For if there come into your assembly, a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment; and ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool; are ye not then partial in yourselves, and are become judges of evil thoughts?'

To say nothing of those out of the church, yet with those, in it how generally is this language of the apostle unheeded; and even in the sanctuary of public worship, respect shown to those who are of the wealthy and fashionable world. When John's disciples came to inquire if Jesus was the Messiah, we find it embodied in the answer, that the poor had the Gospel preached to them.—And perhaps the poor now may have the Gospel preached to them, but if so, in too many instances they have it to pay for, and somewhat dearly too. In the fashionable assemblies the poor man seldom meets with that cordiality of welcome extended toward those of fortune and fame. It may not be spoken in words, but he may see it in looks and actions; 'stand thou there, or sit thou here under my footstool,' by many who pretend to be followers of that meek and lowly being, who had not where to lay his head while a dweller upon the earth. That this is truth, is not at all questionable, for it is a matter of every day's observation, and remarked upon by every individual whose sympathies are not very much in favor of the cause of Christianity. By too many of those who are laboring for the conversion of the world, the salvation of the soul is a matter of consequence bearing strict proportion to the wealth or station of the individual. There is no little noise, no small rejoicing when a 'Ruler' or a 'Pharisee' believes on the Lord Jesus; but when a son of poverty, from a heart overflowing with love to God and to man expresses his faith in the Christian religion, it is an event which falls in silence, entirely unworthy of notice, and the humble professor is left alone to pursue 'the even tenor of his way'; while in spirit it is fully impressed upon his mind, that his admission into the church is an evidence of great condescension, of which he should ever after be truly thankful.

Partiality! The respecting of persons because of rank and worldly considerations, is far beneath the true dignity of the Christian character, and highly unbecoming in any one who has declared himself a disciple of him whose humility so beautifully appeared in all of his course, and who was at all times, as willing and as ready, to extend his welcome and his charity to the low as well as the high, to the poor as well as to the rich. It is far from the nature of his religion, to regard mankind in the light of partiality; governing respect and esteem by the possession of the individual. And those who act upon such unworthy principles, exert a powerful influence against the progress of religion; pure and undefiled, and lead many to reject it, who, under other circumstances, would be its most zealous advocates. Heaven hasten the coming of that time when all professors will walk worthy of their professions, and their Religion shall appear in all of her loveliness and beauty, and Skepticism be banished from the world.

Harpers Publications.

We have before us a large and handsomely bound work of 508 pages 12mo., to which is added an Appendix of 78 pages, entitled "ETCHINGS OF A WHALING CRUISE," with notes of a sojourn on the Island of Zanzibar, to which is appended a brief History of the Whale Fishery, its past and present condition, by J. Ross Browne. This book is made up principally of interesting incidents of a whaler's life on board ship while engaged in the dangerous occupation of taking whales, and on shore among the inhabitants of various countries. The manners and customs of the people of Zanzibar are dilated upon, and the relations concerning them, as well as the general character of the book, as far as we have had time to examine, is both instructive and certainly amusing. For sale at Tracy's and at Beesley's.

No. 115—116 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE contains the greater part of King Henry Sixth. 25 cents.

Nos. 5 and 6 of MARTIN, OR THE FOUNDLING, six cents each. At Beesley's.

No. 9, and the last, of MORSE'S NORTH AMERICAN ATLAS contains Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Louisiana and Virginia. The whole work contains altogether forty-six maps, got up in fine style, and when bound will make a very useful as well as cheap work, and which should be in the hands of every family. The numbers, (each containing from four to six maps,) are sold at 25 cents each, and can be had of G. Tracy, Bookseller, this city, or of G. N. Beesley.

We have received a copy of THE WHIG ALMANAC AND UNITED STATES REGISTER FOR 1847. Greeley & M'Elrath, New York. Its contents are:

STOPPING NEWSPAPERS.

We place at the head of our editorial page for the present certain established principles of law on the duties of subscribers to newspapers. There are some among our subscribers who ought to read and remember them. Sometimes subscribers who wish to discontinue, instead of giving notice, or getting the Post Master to give notice, at the proper time, will let their papers lie in the Post Office until the Post Master is pleased to notice them as "lying uncalled for." This is mean. Again, others will let their paper run some weeks or months over the time paid for, and then order a discontinuance without sending pay for the balance due, or asking for their bill. This is unjust and troublesome. Why will not all do what is right?

We read the foregoing in the Christian Freeman, (Br. Cobb's paper,) and it strongly reminded us that we had once performed similar unpleasant tasks, that is, written and published similar paragraphs. We believe we are not prone to offer advice to, or meddle with the matters of, other publishers voluntarily, specially those who are older and more experienced than we are, but as we once had a similar complaint which Br. Cobb has, (and for that matter, nearly all the newspaper publishers in our denomination have the same,) and as a friend of ours gave us a prescription, which not only proved palatable, but decidedly curative, we trust Br. Cobb will excuse us for recommending him to try it. The dose is simple and effectual, as we can testify, and we give the prescription with hearty good will and charge nothing. It is as follows: Send your paper to no office, (except such as you do not expect to pay for it,) until it is paid for, or an agent in whom you can trust, becomes responsible for the pay. You may rest assured that every subscriber will then take his paper from the Post Office, or provide for its being taken—no notice from the Post Master that Mr. so and so has left for parts unknown, and his paper lies dead in the office," after you have sent it there six or nine months without receiving anything therefor; you will be saved the unpleasant alternative of thinking or publishing anybody as mean, unjust, dishonest or troublesome; you will be saved the expense and trouble of printing and sending out bills and many other vexations, too numerous to mention. Let all who have the complaint try it and see.

TROY.

Br. W. H. WAGGONER, of Canton, passed through this city to-day on his return from a brief visit to Troy. We learn from a communication shown us from the Society, that Br. W.'s visit resulted in a call to settle in Troy, that the invitation was given at a large meeting of the Society, and that the expression was one of unparalleled unanimity. We believe Br. W. has signified his acceptance of the invitation, and that it is his intention to remove to Troy so as to commence his labors there about the first of December. But who will now locate at Canton? We hope our worthy friends there will soon find a Pastor who will occupy as large a place in their affections and esteem as did Br. W.

The Agricultural Address published in this week's paper, may by some be thought inappropriate to our columns. Others have desired its insertion. As some of our denominational papers devote a column or so weekly to agriculture, and as a very large share of our readers are agriculturists, we trust we shall be excused for occupying so much space for one week with the subject. If any dislike it, why, they may just omit it, and we shall take no offence.

Br. Goodrich's reply to the Country Pastor's Defence, commenced this week, is a very long article, or will be before it is finished; but we trust it will not be read with less interest on that account. It required considerable space to trace out and expose all the serpentine windings of the renowned author of "More Snakes in the Grass." We think Br. G. has done it up effectually in this article.

Br. Perry's article will also be read with interest. We have since received his article exposing the unfair and illiberal proceedings of the Black River Christian Conference, and shall publish it soon.

Several editorials are necessarily deferred, or left over.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The EDITOR will preach in the new School House, at Little Falls next Sunday and at Ilion the Sunday after.

DEATHS.

In Dexter, Jefferson co., Sept. 25, JAMES NATHANIEL, infant son of William J. and Eliza Comins, aged four months and fifteen days. 'Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not.'—JESUS. C. A. S.

In Lime, Jefferson co., Sept. 30, Mr. WAYNE BURDICK, aged 19 years. By this dispensation of divine Providence, an afflicted mother and three affectionate brothers have been deprived of a promising son and brother. Their tearful eyes bespoke the anguish of their hearts, but they were not the tears of despair, they were the outpourings of the sorrows of the soul; for they trusted confidently in their Father in heaven, and believed that he who has taken their friend, has only taken to bless. The consolations of the Gospel of peace were tendered to the mourning relatives, and a large concourse of sympathising friends, by the writer, from St. John xvi: 33. CHAS. A. SKINNER.

In Strykersville, Sept. 8th, of typhus fever, Mrs. ELIZABETH, consort of Lloyd Angle, and daughter of E. Loomis, Esq., of Cowlesville, in the 30th year of her age. Her sickness was most severe. She was often delirious—but in her sane moments she appeared to be reconciled to her lot—and well she might, for she believed the Gospel. She has left a husband with three small children to mourn their loss. The funeral was attended on the 9th, at the Universalist church in Cowlesville, Discourse from Luke vii: 52, by the writer of this article.—[Evangelist. G. S. A.]

WAWANOSH.

'Twas night again, the silent wood
The plain, the mountain, field and flood
In gloom reposed, so calm, so still
Not even the lone Whippoorwill
Awoke his pensive note, the air
Was motionless;—devoid of care,
Nature reposed; nor seemed in deep Forgetfulness. Who could not weep
That scene so calm must soon awake
By sounds to bid the bravest quake—
That those who breathe the gentle breath
Of sleep, must sound the shriek of death?

Upon the summit of a hill
An hundred dusky warriors stood—
There, motionless, remained, until
The deepest midnight gloom was thrown
Over the scene they gazed upon.
We left them at the hour of night
And find them with no other light;
But many days had passed, the few,
Had marched the forest's mazes through;
Were now (impatient of delay)
Ready to pounce upon their prey.

A quiet village lay below
Wrapt in slumber still and deep,
Unconscious that a deadly foe
Were watching o'er their silent sleep.
The mother clasped her lovely child
Unconscious to her dreamy breast;
Unconscious too the infant smiled,
And on her bosom sank to rest;
And her fond husband and the sire
Lay stretched before the flickering fire.

And on his wigwam's clay cold floor
He dreamed his toils and dangers o'er.
But hark!—a deep and startling yell
At once disturbs the silent spell,
And on his quick and anxious ear
It strikes with something more than fear;
His smoking dwelling wreathed in flame,
And butchered kindred meet his eye;
And calling on his chieftains name,
He madly rushes forth to die.

And where is Olga; he whom love
Has changed from cooing turtle dove
To one of the untamed vulture brood
Who revel o'er a field a blood?
Towering above their foemen all,
Heedless of pity, mercy's call
Falls all unnoticed on his ear!
Destruction marks his mad career,
And every note of his battle cry
Is answered by one of agony.
Through the deep forest, clothed in night,
The Sioux fled the fatal fight
But breathing vengeance in each tread
For their defeat, and kindred dead.

Then speed thee, lone and weary few;
For vengeance is the fierce Sioux;
And thus with battle's toils o'er worn,
Their steps shall harass thy return,
And gathering in their might and power,
Shall make thee rue the venturesome hour
That led thee to that bloody feast,
A dreaded, uninvited guest.
Olga, now flushed with recent spoil,
Of conquest heeds no more the toil,
But homeward turns his steps again
With trophies of a score of slain.
But hate supplies a swifter steed
Than victory's more careless speed;
And ere one half the distance's o'er
A secret foe had gone before,
So circled round as to enclose
Him fast in the embrace of foes.
Now Olga, may love's magic spell
Circle around thy form as well
And nerve thy sinews; shield thy heart
From vengeful foe's envenomed dart;
Canst thou no secret influence feel
With warning voice around thee steal?
Ah, no; thus will it ever prove.
Unheeding, fond, delusive love!
Of Olga's band ten sank before

The unseen attack to rise no more.
When rising from their hiding place
Their foes engage them face to face.
Though great the odds, yet firm they stood,
As meet the rocks the tempest's flood,
And in their fury hurls them back
As gallantly disputes the track.
Yet as the waves which once have striven,
By tempests breath once more are driven
Resistless on the rugged rock
Which swerves and trembles to the shock,
So at their leaders voice and call
Again the Sioux rally all,
Through fear and shame, and anger borne
Upon the pinions of his scorn,
They close again and fight once more
With fury greater than before.
Fierce was the contest, red the field,
And only step by step did yield
That little band; for Olga's cry
Rose o'er the din of battle high;
As from a fallen foe he tore
The warm scalp reeking in its gore.
But the cry which the gentle breeze wafted o'er
The field, by his band shall be heard no more;
For vengeance had winged a fatal dart,
Which pierced the exulting chieftain's heart;
And his cheering cry, was closed with a sigh
As he sank on the plain, the last of the slain;
As it died on the air, they fled in despair,
Their foes pursuing their weary flight
Till hid from their view by the shades of night.

I CAN NOT STAND THAT.—And what could not the sailor 'stand?' He has stood the beatings of many a storm. Often had he mounted up to heaven, and gone down again into the depths. many a time had his soul been melted because of trouble.—Yet he has rode out the storm; trod the pillow deep boldly, and given his trouble to the winds. But now he meets something he 'can not stand.' What is it? He can stand the perils of a lee shore. He can bear being a night and a day in the deep. He can buffet the hardest gale that ever blew off the 'Horn.' He can do and endure more severe labor and hardship than any other man; but now he knocks under. It is the picture of a woman teaching a child. 'O,' said he, 'I can not stand his; it reminds me of my poor dear mother; it is rust the way she used to teach me—but she is gone,' and he burst into tears.

Mother! there are no human teachings like your own. Call your boy to your side, and give him instructions warm for a mother's heart. And should that boy break away from his home, and become a rover on the deep, some little incident may recall the scenes of his early years. He, too, may be reminded of his 'poor, dear mother,' who used to call him to her side, and tell him about Jesus Christ and the way of eternal life.—Sailor's Magazine.

KINDNESS IN CORRECTION.—The way to make people forsake their errors, is to treat them kindly. Speak to them in a calm and gentle manner. Harsh words should never be indulged in, thinking to reform any one. If a person wishes to correct me of any fault, he must do it kindly and affectionately, or I should be much worse for his interference. Remember that kind words cost but a trifle, and the effect, even upon our own disposition, amply repays us for any exertion we may make.

A cheerful temper, joined with innocence, will make beauty attractive, knowledge delightful, and wit good-natured. It will lighten sickness, poverty, and affliction, convert ignorance into an amiable simplicity, and render deformity itself agreeable.

OCCASIONAL DISCOURSE,

Delivered before the United States General Convention of Universalists, in Troy, September 16, 1846.

BY REV. ASHER MOORE.

'When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him.' Isa. lix: 19.

In discoursing upon any portion of the Scriptures, it seems proper that we should endeavor to ascertain what it was at first intended to signify. And having satisfied ourselves concerning the original meaning, we may apply it to other subjects as propriety directs. But the habit of using the divine oracles as mere mottoes of sermons, is not to be commended; nor does it benefit a teacher of religion to seize upon a word or single expression, and without any regard to the connexion in which it is found, or the meaning which it was designed to convey, to make it the foundation of a discourse. True, there are simple aphorisms and didactic precepts in the Bible, that may be well understood without any reference to the particular connection in which they occur. But any text not a mere maxim, but constituting a part of a discourse, should never be entirely torn away from the subject to which it originally belonged, and without any proper respect for its true and primary meaning, made the motto of a sermon. Such preaching seems wanting in reverence for the authority of God's word; and such preaching we may add, is by far too common in the Christian church at the present day.

Another kind of preaching which we deem no less objectionable, consists in what seems to be a complete setting aside of the Bible, to discourse about letters and poetry, and improvements and reforms, and to explain some wonderful and newly discovered laws of mind and of matter, of which the inspired servants of God never even dreamed, but which have been found out by the Solomons of this remarkable age! This kind of preaching has been considered so far preferable to that of Christ Jesus and his Gospel, that some professedly Christian ministers speak in such lofty and mysterious strains that common people can not understand their speech, and would perhaps receive but little profit if they could comprehend it all!

Now we confess that we are simple hearted enough to prefer plain, old fashioned Gospel truth, at least for the Christian pulpit. This truth we believe contains treasures of unspeakable value; while we regard the riches of Christ Jesus as being unsearchable. Here are subjects fully adequate to our best powers; and in our religious discourses we need not leave them to seek after any thing more ennobling and sublime. We dare not attempt any lofty flights above the revelations of the Gospel, lest we should fall and be injured; and we fear to dive below its truth, lest we should be lost. Let all sciences be diligently investigated, and all discoverable truth brought to light; and no considerate man will offer any objections. But we still conceive that all subjects are not alike appropriate to the Christian pulpit; and we can not but regard it as an error of our times, to mix up and blend with the Gospel of Christ the mere dreams and speculations of pretended philosophy, and every new fangled scheme that may happen to be dignified with the name of Reform. And we even venture to hint that it would be well to appropriate our temples of devotion to no other than religious uses; and that the business of our ecclesiastical councils should be confined to such subjects as properly belong to our denominational affairs.

The apostle Paul, in speaking of himself as an ambassador for Christ, said to his brethren, 'For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified.' He had a proper and distinct work to perform; and to that work he steadily and exclusively devoted himself and all his powers. In him the Christian minister finds an example worthy to be followed. There are places and times enough for the discussion of general subjects, without introducing them into houses solemnly consecrated to the worship of God, and into discourses intended for religious edification and comfort. And there ought, it seems to us, to be at least one place and one stated time for the discussion and inculcation of Gospel truth. But we need not farther pursue this train of thought.

The writings of the ancient prophets abound in the most significant and beautiful imagery. They delighted in a highly metaphorical style, and drew their bold figures from the works of creation—from the manners and customs of the people—from implements of husbandry—from weapons of warfare—and from every thing that observation could discover, or imagination conceive. Much of their writings would be unintelligible to us, without a tolerable acquaintance with the things to which they refer. Some of their allusions, even with the most careful research, present difficulties not easily to be removed; but for the most part their figures of speech may be clearly understood by suitable attention to the several objects from which they are drawn.

The imagery of our text may be regarded as of the more simple kind—almost explaining itself to every mind. The enemy is an armed force, marching against a city or country to desolate and destroy it. By pouring in like a flood, and rising and spreading abroad like mighty waters, is represented the great power of the foe. The reference may be to the sweeping deluge in the days of Noah; but if merely to any great flood, the figure is still full of significance and force. Against this great enemy, coming in like the impetuous rushings of waters that have fled from their peaceful channels, and are sweeping over the whole face of a country, the spirit of the Lord is represented as lifting up a standard. The standard was a pole or spear, decorated at the top, and borne aloft in the van of the army by a chosen and tried soldier; and it is believed that the standard-bearer was required to strike the first blow against the enemy. And hence, the prophet in speaking of a time of great depression, and suffering, says it 'shall be as when a standard-bearer fainteth'—that is, when even the most valiant, chosen to lead on the troops shall fail.

The time to which the text primarily referred, we think it not difficult to determine, as the context seems very explicit touching this part of our subject. The prophet speaks of the great wickedness of his people, and employs language, which St. Paul, in Rom. iii, has directly applied to the state of things which existed in the world, when the Son of God appeared among men to drive back the fearful flood of iniquity, and to lift up the standard of truth, against the enemies of the Lord. It was at a time when all had gone out of the way and together become unprofitable; and when there was none that did good, no not one. And such was the general corruption of doctrine and vileness of practice by which men were characterized at the coming of the Messiah, that the prophet thus speaks in verses preceding our text:—'And judgement is turned away backward, and justice standeth afar off, for truth is fallen into the street and equity can not enter. Yea, truth faileth; and he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey; and the Lord saw it, and it displeased him that there was no judgement. And he saw that there was no man, and wondered that there was no intercessor; therefore his arm brought salvation unto him; and his righteousness, it sustained him.' And the verses immediately succeeding the text have also been applied in the New Testament to the great work of Christ in turning away ungodliness from Jacob, and in writing the law of God in the hearts of his people. 'And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord. As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord: My spirit which is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and forever.' The fulfilment of these predictions, through the mediation of the Son of God, may be found declared in Rom. xi, and Heb. viii, and x.

Without, therefore, attempting any extended argument, we shall conclude that the text was originally spoken with reference to the evil and corrupt times when the man of Nazareth lifted his reforming voice upon the plains of Judea, and in the streets of Jerusalem. The righteous man had perished—the intercessors of the people had fallen—truth was turned away backward—and wickedness swept over the land like a mighty and desolating flood! But there was a limit, beyond which, the swelling tide of corruption was not permitted to flow. He who has 'set laws and doors' to the great deep, and who can say to the ever heaving ocean, 'hitherto shalt thou come but no further, and here shalt thy proud waves be stayed,' raised the standard of his own redeeming power, and sent the rod of his strength out of Zion to rule in the midst of his enemies! God, though his eye seemed to slumber, and his hand to be shortened that it could not save, still viewed with deep concern his own works, and suffered not the spoiler to triumph! He turned not away from fallen, degraded humanity; for he there saw the image of himself, and the living germs of future excellence and glory! He still governed the world though it seemed to be deserted. Every principle of evil and every element of corruption are subject to the supreme control of him who directs the stormy winds in their course, and sways his sovereign power over every object throughout the vast extent of his unbounded empire. Nothing, even the most evil in the world, comes by chance, or is uncontrolled by him, 'who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out the heaven with a span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance!' His will is done among the inhabitants of the earth, as well as in the army of heaven. We may not, indeed, be always able to trace the operations of means which he puts forth to do his pleasure. To us his judgments may be unsearchable, and his ways past finding out. But we still believe, and can not give up the confidence, that God rules in all the affairs of men, and is constantly working out the accomplishment of his own benevolent and unalterable purposes!

We are never moved in the least by the senseless cry of predestination, fatalism, or any other cry, intended only to stave the inquiries of the mind, and to extort the profession of satisfaction where such feeling does not exist. If it be fatalism to believe with St. Paul that God 'worketh all things after the counsel of his own will,' and with the Psalmist, that 'the wrath of man shall praise' him, while he will restrain the remainder of that wrath, then we are fatalists, and even the name shall not alarm us. But my brethren, this is not fatalism—it is but confidence in the wisdom, and goodness, and unbounded control of Him who has created all things for his own pleasure, and whose word declares that all his works shall praise him!

Our text sets forth a great principle of the divine government, that may be applied in view of all the evil influences that can operate in the affairs of men. 'When the enemy shall come in like a flood'—rising, to the greatest height, and reaching to the farthest allowable extent, 'the spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him.' This restraining, redeeming, saving principle will never cease its mighty operations, while the enduring throne of the Almighty shall remain, and the ages of eternity shall continue their ceaseless rounds! And it is to this principle that we propose to direct your attention; and we hope to be able to derive from its operations in the government of God encouragement and strength to prosecute our labors in the good cause to which we have solemnly dedicated our powers. All our efforts for truth and right would be worse than vain, if, in the economy of God, there were at work no active principle, that will defeat the powers of darkness and of evil, 'crowning good,' and 'repressing ill.' But because this principle lives and operates throughout all time and space, we feel nerved and invigorated to toil on through trials and oppositions in the cause of our great Master, 'forasmuch as we know that our labor is not in vain in the Lord.'

Let us glance for a moment at one or two prominent events in the world's history, where we may see the effectual workings of this mighty principle. A very familiar, but at the same time a most beautiful and satisfactory illustration of our subject is presented in the wonderful history of Joseph and his brethren. The wicked and envious brothers, filled with murderous intentions, and holding in their grasp the object of their hatred, were still restrained from taking the life of the lad. That was a pitch of wickedness to which they were not suffered to go—for it would have defeated the intentions of Him whose all-seeing eye watched the whole affair, and who saw the end from the beginning. They sold their brother into bondage, and returned with lying reports to deceive their aged and afflicted parent. The old man believed that every thing was against him, and felt that he should soon go down into the grave to his son, mourning. God seemed to have no concern in this business; but to permit wickedness to triumph uncontrolled, to the gratification of corrupt and evil minded men; and to the destruction of the hopes and peace of a faithful and righteous patriarch. And yet God did manage and direct the whole matter—so that in the end, Joseph said to the very brethren who had sought his destruction, and sold him to be a bondsman, 'But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive.' The flood of wickedness was swept back by a superior force; and the worst intentions of bad men and the deeds of cruelty, were so directed and overpowered by the Almighty as to be made instrumental in working out a great and good result.

Some persons, who have scarcely one clear thought on any subject—who are blind, and can not see afar off, would instantly say that according to such views man can not be responsible for his acts nor can any thing in the world be wrong.—Such persons, however, skim over the surface of things, and understand not what they say. The conduct of Joseph's brethren was as vile and as deserving of punishment, as though it had led to none of the good that followed, and had produced all the wrong that was intended. No person can doubt the enormity of their deeds. But who can question that their doings were so controlled by the wisdom of God as to be made the means of ultimate good? If our views of the subject, therefore, present any difficulties to the mind, how stands the matter in reference to the views entertained by others? We all recognize the same facts; and with respect to this one event in the world's history, we all reach the same conclusion. But while some persons regard this event with strange wonder, and seem not to think of the important lesson which it teaches, we here witness the development of a settled principle that incessantly operates in all the affairs of the divine government.

If God rules the world, and is a being of infinite wisdom and inimitable goodness, how can any thing happen without his permission?—or how can any creature ever go beyond his control? We deny not the responsibility of man; and we offer no palliations for his deliberate deeds of wrong. But we believe that chance never sports with the works of God; and we cherish the humble confidence that there is over all this a Providence that never errs or ceases to be kind, and which will cause even the wrath of man to praise the Lord, while the remainder of that wrath shall be restrained!

Without such confidence how could we unreservedly trust in our Maker? What reasons should we have to hope that truth will ever triumph over error, or that God will ever look with satisfaction upon the completion of his works, and the accomplishment of his pleasure? If one thing comes by chance, so may another. And if any creature or event passes beyond the control of the Almighty, others may do the same. And so we might go on with our foolish doubts and vain speculations, until we divested God of every proper attribute of his nature, and left the world with all its concerns as loose and unsafe as a deserted ship at sea, abandoned to the mercy of the winds and the waves, with no hand to direct its course! But God never withdraws his guiding hand. And when the enemy comes in like a flood, and reaches the farthest extent that can be allowed, the Spirit of the Lord lifts up a standard against him!

Look again at the time to which our text referred—the time when the great Deliverer came to stay the flood of wickedness, and to roll back the mighty torrent of corruption that had deluged the world.—His appearance as a divinely authorized teacher in Judea aroused all the bad passions of his countrymen, and hastened the time when the sins of many generations were to reach their utmost limit in the murder of the Lord of life and glory! But there was a bound which the flood of wickedness could not overpass. Though the innocent victim of deadly malice and murderous persecution was pursued unto death, and mocked and derided in his last sufferings, his fall was but the presage of his triumph! He rose again in his might; and, turning the seeming victory of his foes into utter defeat, he erected upon the ruins of the opposition that Church against which the gates of hell shall not prevail! The wise were taken in their own craftiness—the counsel of the forward was carried headlong—and the pleasure of the Lord prospered in the hands of his Son! The perfidy of Judas—the malicious envy of the chief priests and rulers of the Jews—and the fearfulness of the Roman governor, which led him to sacrifice the life of an innocent man, were by the hand of the Lord turned into so many effectual means of working out a great and glorious result, full of interest and importance to the race of man. All this, however, did not excuse the wickedness or extenuate the guilt of the betrayers and murderers—for their intentions were bad, and they aimed at no justifiable end. But it clearly illustrates to us the great principle that 'when the enemy shall come in like a flood, the spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him.'

The good work of the Lord, begun by his chosen servant, progressed with astonishing rapidity and power. Without the aid of civil power or the force of arms, Christianity, by its own mild and effectual workings, won the affections of the human soul, and engaged in its service multitudes of faithful and devoted men. The combined forces of the adversary could not stay its mighty course. Though opposed with extreme violence by the ruling powers, it gloriously triumphed. And before the death of the last surviving apostle of the Lamb, the Gospel of Christ had been preached and its power felt throughout all Judea and the whole Roman empire.

Christianity, in its peaceful but mighty movements, overthrew the long established systems of man's device—demolished the glittering temples of Pagan gods—stript the veil of deception from the hypocrite, and sent forth into the world a healing and redeeming power! Every where the proclamation of the word of truth was attended with success. The power of the enemy fell as lightning from heaven before the apostles of righteousness and truth. And one success after another gave to the hearts of good men the encouraging promise of complete triumph to the cause of Immanuel.

But there were still evil tendencies in the world, and even in the church of the Redeemer. Converts from among both Jews and Gentiles, retaining a moiety of the old prejudices, began at an early period to blend their own foolish devices with the sublime teachings of heavenly wisdom. One sect after another started into existence. And the contending factions soon aimed more to promote the interests of party, than to subserve the cause of true religion. The evils of fanatical zeal crept stealthily into the church; and the spirit of persecuting madness was unfortunately mistaken for the healthful operations of the grace of God! And the silly vagaries of pretended philosophers were called in to aid the work of perfecting that religion which was committed to men without defect! The light of divine truth was thus darkened, and the true power of the Gospel consequently began to loose its hold upon the hearts and affections of men. Ignorance, superstition and vice stood boldly forth. In the holy places, where they ought not; and the church became in many respects, and to the most alarming extent, the engine of civil power and cruel oppression.

Darkness again covered the earth, and gross darkness the people. Corruptions of doctrine and of morals again came in like a devastating flood.—And the enemy, emboldened by past successes in oppression and wrong, carried the daring work of opposition to righteousness and truth to such an alarming pitch, as to claim the prerogative of God, and to barter for money indulgences to commit crime! But the mystery of iniquity had now done its work to the full; and he who restrains the troubled ocean and controls all the elements of nature, again sent forth his redeeming power. The flood of corruption could spread no farther. The desperate wickedness of the heart of man had done its worst. The standard of the Lord was lifted up. And while 'bigotry raged and superstition trembled,' a noble work was begun, the effects of which will continue to be felt while virtue remains in the world, and liberty has a home upon earth! The Reformation in the sixteenth century was God's work; and the men by whom it was prosecuted were but instruments in his hand to do his bidding. It was a work for truth, for righteousness, and for man; and it was intended to prepare the way for a still more effectual reformation in the world.

It was needful that some Moses—some great master-spirit should rise up among his brethren, and strike for freedom. The deliverer was the honest, bold and daring LUTHER! The God of Jacob nerved his arm and gave courage to his heart. He put his life in his hand in the midst of dangers; but God made him immortal until his work was finished. The time had come for the morning to dawn, that the long and cheerless reign of night might be succeeded by the welcome beams of day. The light that burst through the surrounding gloom was like the sun breaking out from the darkened clouds of heaven. The veil of hypocrisy was drawn aside, and men were permitted to look into the seat of corruption, whence issued the oppressions and the scourges of the world! The wronged and the deceived were taught to know that they had vainly followed blind leaders of the blind, and committed the keeping of their souls to the hands of men whose monstrous vices called for the righteous vengeance of insulted Heaven! Man was made to know his rights. And truth, which had been supposed to dwell only in cloisters, was presented in its native simplicity before all as the common inheritance of the race of Adam. And the good work which then commenced has been in progress ever since; and will continue its course until every vestige of darkness and corruption shall be removed, and all men are brought to see the light of truth, and to rejoice in the righteousness of God!

But the light which broke in upon the world in the days of Luther was only the morning light. It has since shone still more brightly, and we humbly believe that it is now approaching the splendor of the noonday. Others rose after that great man to assist in the good work which he had so well begun. None of them were without errors in belief and faults in practice. But they all had a part to act in the great drama. And to Him who could see the workings of the whole machinery, the constant advancement to the accomplishment of good was distinctly perceived. Calvinism and Arminianism, systems of doctrine bearing the marks of human selfishness and worldly wisdom, still recognized great truths, not acknowledged by the papal Church. But these systems were in due time to be set aside by one still more compatible with the tender mercies of him who is the Father of all men, and with the benevolent spirit of Him who is 'the Saviour of the world.'

Evil influences were still at work in the world. The old leaven of malice and wickedness wrought in the hearts of men who had been set free from the bondage of papal power—dreadful and savage notions were entertained of God—cruel and barbarous customs characterized even the disciples of the Reformation—and another change, attended with no outward 'pomp and circumstance' of revolution, but fraught with momentous consequences to the peace and happiness of man, began at length to be visible in the world. UNIVERSALISM, a system a doctrine far removed from the last lingering partialities of dark and corrupt ages, was still left to complete the work of reformation, and to bring man back again to the pure Gospel of Christ in all the fullness of its divine blessings! This doctrine was never in any period of the world propagated by the sword and the fagot—it never obtained nor sought the patronage of secular power—it never oppressed the weak, nor despoiled the honest man of his property and his rights, to pamper an indolent and vicious priesthood—and it never aimed to rob people of their reason and their natural affections, and to frighten them into the belief and support of doctrines, which dishonor God and blight the peace and hopes of man! But it has borne the good tidings of divine mercy and forgiveness to many a heart oppressed with woes and tormented with fears. It has wiped the scalding tear of despondent grief from the eye of the weary and suffering mourner. It has dispelled the delusions of cruel, pagan theology, that clothe God in garments of fierceness and terror, and make him the object of violent dread, while no heart can truly love him—and it has presented him before the mind as the merciful God of all the spirits and the Saviour of all men! It has divested religion of the corruptions of ages, and stripped from it all the cunning devices by which blinded men have sought to urge it upon the world. In a word, the system of faith and practice which we hold, discarding all secular influences, and rejecting the instruments of terror which others have employed, have made man understand this great truth, that religion itself is a blessing of unspeakable worth!

The progress of Universalism since the era of the Reformation, and its present condition and prospects fill our hearts with joy that can not be expressed, while we are led involuntarily to exclaim, with the highest feelings of gratitude, 'It is the Lord's doings, and it is marvellous in our eyes.'—When we look back about three quarters of a century, we see a single individual—a stranger in a strange land, lifting his lone voice upon the wild shores of America, to repeat the good tidings of great joy to all people, which were once heard upon the plains of Judea, when an angel from heaven announced the advent of the Saviour of the world! We see that meek and self-sacrificing servant of the Highest peaceably pursuing his way, through evil report and through good, and counting the most fierce and malignant persecutions as nothing, so that he might honorably fulfil the high purposes of his mission. We see him not only in the midst of bitter reproaches, but exposed to severe personal injuries from the violence of bigotry and the rage of maddened zealots, still casting the good seeds of the kingdom of God, and proclaiming 'the unsearchable riches of Christ,' to sinful and suffering humanity.

But he preached not in vain, neither did those whom he instructed concerning 'the testimony of our Lord' believe in vain. He lived to see the seed which he had sown in tears yielding a plentiful harvest of joy. And when his earthly course was finished, he must have experienced feelings akin to those which dwell in the breast of good old Simeon, when he clasped the infant Jesus in his arms, expressing his desire to depart, because his eyes had seen the salvation of the Lord, which was prepared before the face of all people.

It is true that the venerable Dr. DeBenneville, of Germantown, had preached the doctrine of universal salvation in this country before the time of which we speak. But preaching was not the main business of his life, nor were his labors very widely extended. Rev. Richard Clarke, of Charleston, S. C., and Dr. Jonathan Mayhew, of Boston, had also preached this doctrine, though they were both connected with denominations holding a far different faith. And perhaps there were several more advocates of 'the common salvation.' But the reverend MURRAY, from the great extent and success of his labors, may well be called the father of Universalism in America.

Since the death of John Murray, the good cause in which he labored with so much success, and to promote the interests of which he counted not his life dear unto himself, has been spreading throughout the whole country, and been constantly gathering up new and increasing strength. From a mere handful we have risen to a mighty host. The fields which were sown by the departed, are now white to the harvest. And the cheering and encouraging prospect which is opened before us, fills our hearts with unspeakable joy.

We have now in the United States (according to the last statistics) 1,072 societies, 664 preachers, 636 meeting-houses, and 22 periodical publications. These preachers are generally men of influence; and these publications, as well as vast numbers of books, are circulated throughout the whole length and breadth of the land. So that we are at this time, through our ministry and our publications, powerfully operating upon the minds of hundreds of thousands of American people. In Canada the good work is onward, while Europe 'keeps not back.' In Germany the doctrine of endless misery has become a matter of history; and the ruling powers of the Church of England have already sounded the alarm that the Establishment is in danger of being overthrown, from the great prevalence in that kingdom of 'Unitarian and Universalist principles!' The Church of England, established by means of monstrous injustice and horrid cruelties, and founded by a tyrant and a murderer, will yet be crumbled into ruins, and her pampered lords and bishops, and her dissolute clergy will stand aghast, and weep over the fall of the idol.

We should greatly err, however, if we were to estimate the present condition and actual prosperity of our cause, merely by the number of churches, ministers and members embraced in the statistics of the Universalist denomination. The broad principles of Christian truth and universal benevolence, which we delight to cherish and labor to propagate, have extending their redeeming and salutary influence far beyond the limits of our own churches.—Their power has been felt, and the good fruits of their operations are made manifest in every Christian sect around us. Doctrines that were proclaimed in tones of terror, and submissively received into fearful and trembling hearts but a few years ago, find neither advocates nor believers in these days of better light and increasing knowledge. The character of preaching in general has become essentially changed. And almost every successive change is but an abandonment of some false tradition of men, and a certain, though perhaps an imperceptible, approach toward the doctrine of Universalism. The hard features of popular theology are wearing away like the stone beneath the incessant falling of waters. The orthodoxy of twenty years ago has in a great measure lost its distinguishing characteristics, and is now presented in a new, and in some respects, greatly improved form. And what is still more encouraging to the lover of truth, there is a manifest disposition on the part of the people in general, to hear and believe a better doctrine than their fathers held. Universalism is finding its way into all the churches. In all these there are believers of this doctrine, and far more who would rejoice to embrace it, if the scales were only removed from their eyes, so that they could see its consistency and truth. The state of the times, indeed, and the very tendencies of the age in which we live, are all favorable to the interests and prosperity of our cause—the cause of truth and humanity.

But it must not be forgotten that we have an important work yet to perform. Though we have wonderfully flourished, considering our means and opportunities, there is still room for great advancement. Though many obstacles to our onward course have been removed out of the way, others of no trifling character still remain to be overcome. And though our spiritual warfare against the errors of men has been attended with the divine blessing, the victory is not yet complete. Many of our fellow beings are still addicted to hurtful vices, while others are held in bondage to tormenting fears.—Both classes deserve our sympathies and demand our labors of love. And we are solemnly required by 'the high vocation wherewith we are called,' to employ all the means which God has placed in our power, to promote in the world the interests of righteousness and the cause of truth.

We now occupy an important position in the world and high and responsible duties are required at our hands. We humbly trust that we are in advance of others around us in the knowledge of divine truth. And the circumstances by which we are attended imperiously demand of us the active employment of all suitable means, of zeal and energy, of persuasion and example, to diffuse abroad a knowledge of that truth in which we ourselves rejoice with unspeakable joy! We feel convinced beyond a doubt that every renewed effort, properly directed, which we put forth to advance the interests of this truth, will be attended with a good measure of success. The barbarous dogmas of former times are gradually losing their hold upon the public mind, and we witness all around us a constantly increasing tendency toward something more just, merciful and benevolent. Thousands who have long been held in subjection to the merciless creeds of worldly wisdom, are ready to be set free from their bondage to rejoice in the truth. And as we have been made stewards of the manifold grace of God, every consideration of duty and of philanthropy requires that we be faithful in the proclamation and defence of the pure Gospel of the blessed Redeemer. We can, with the blessing of God, do much toward the furtherance of this glorious work. And with united, zealous and persevering efforts, for the future, the time will soon come when we shall forget the day of small things, in the abundance of our prosperity.

Let us then arouse at once to a living sense of our obligations, and resolve before God that we will ACT as men engaged in a great and good work.—And He whose word has assured us that 'when the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him,' will give success to our efforts, and crown with his blessing our labors of love! Amen.

EXPLANATION WANTED—EZEK. XIV: 9.

REV. SIR.—As you saw fit a few weeks past, to oblige the 'old man' in Groton, by publishing the lines he sent you, I will after returning thanks, endeavor to contribute a few more, as I read in the Advocate that your drawer was somewhat empty; and if you see proper to give them a place in your columns, you will again please me, and may be some others. I also have another request to make; that is, I wish to have, if convenient, a few words of explanation of the ninth verse of the fourteenth chapter of Ezekiel. This may be asking too much. If so, pardon an old obscure man, who wishes to know the truth, and who from a child has been an inquirer for it. But as you will see by the lines on this sheet, my days of manhood were spent in infidelity, to which I was driven by Orthodox preaching, as some call it. If an explanation of the above is too much to ask for, pass it by.

Yours, cordially, JAMES M'ALLASTER.
Groton, October 11th, 1846.

REMARKS.

What particular point or language in the text referred to, it is, of which our aged brother seeks an explanation, we know not as he does not inform us. But we suppose, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, the difficulty in his mind lies in the fact that the Lord himself is said, in the text, to deceive the prophet of whom the idolatrous Jews sought instruction. Taking it for granted that such is the case, we think our brother will find, by closely attending to the whole context, and a few parallel passages, the seeming inconsistency explained or accounted for, in the wickedness of the inquirers, and the disposition of the prophet to accommodate such idolators, with answers to suit their corrupt desires. Let us quote the whole passage from verse 2d to 9th.

'And the word of the Lord came unto me saying,

'Son of man, these men have set up their idols in their heart, and put the stumbling block of their iniquity before their face: should I be inquired of at all by them?

'Therefore speak unto them, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; Every man of the house of Israel that setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumbling block of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to the prophet; I the Lord will answer him that cometh according to the multitude of his idols;

'That I may take the house of Israel in their own heart, because they are all estranged from me through their idols.

'Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God; Repent, and turn yourselves from your idols; and turn away your faces from all your abominations.

'For every one of the house of Israel, or of the stranger that sojourneth in Israel, which separateth himself from me, and setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumbling block of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to a prophet to inquire of him concerning me; I the Lord will answer him myself:

'And I will set myself against that man, and will make him a sign and a proverb, and I will cut him off from the midst of my people; and ye shall know that I am the Lord.

'And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel.'

From the context thus quoted, we perceive the people had lapsed greatly from their allegiance to God, and were deeply sunk in the grossest idolatry, and notwithstanding this, they would still come to the prophets for counsel and instruction, while their idols were still set up in their hearts. The prophets evidently connived at the wickedness and idolatry of the people—did not reprove them for their sins; but for hire, or some sinister motive, sought to accommodate themselves to their corrupt habits and thoughts, and as a natural consequence, did not know the mind of God concerning them. Therefore God gave them up, both prophets and people, to their own delusions as a just judgment upon them, and said (verses 4, 5), 'I the Lord will answer him that cometh according to the multitude of his idols; that I may take the house of Israel in their own heart, because they are all estranged from me through their idols.'

Sin is self-blinding, self-deceiving; and when, as in the text, God is said to deceive them, the meaning is obviously this—that he simply gives them up to the delusions and blindness of their own hearts. A clear and parallel instance of this is found in Psalm lxxxi: 11—16. 'But my people would not hearken to my voice: and Israel would none of me. So I gave them up unto their own heart's lust; and they walked in their own counsels. Oh, that my people had hearkened unto me, and Israel had walked in my ways! I should soon have subdued their enemies, and turned my hand against their adversaries. The haters of the Lord should have submitted themselves to him; but their time should have endured forever. He should have fed them also with the finest of the wheat; and with honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee.' By thus giving up the house of Israel to their own heart's lust and delusions, God intended to punish them for their iniquities and thereby bring them to ultimate repentance and reformation.

See as another instance of this, Jer. ii: 19. 'Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee; know therefore and see, that it is an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God, and that my fear is not in thee, saith the Lord God of hosts.' That the Lord's deceiving, or giving up the house of Israel, to their own self-deluding wickedness, and its condign punishment, was, as a judicial blindness, designed for the ultimate benefit and salvation of that people, is obvious from the two verses following the text, viz: 'And they shall bear the punishment of their iniquity; the punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh unto him; that the house of Israel may go no more astray from me; neither be polluted any more with all their transgressions; but that they may be my people, and I may be their God, saith the Lord God.'

Another, if possible, still more striking instance of judicial blindness and punishment, by delusion is mentioned by St. Paul. 2 Thess. ii: 11, 12. 'And for this cause, God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie that they all might be damned (or condemned) who believed not the truth but had pleasure in unrighteousness.' For what cause? Why because they 'had pleasure in unrighteousness,' and 'received not the love of the truth that they might be saved.' If they loved not the truth, they of course would follow delusion which God sent upon them as a just punishment for their unrighteousness. And never can they be saved from that delusion and damnation till they forsake their unrighteousness, and 'turn to the Lord, who will have mercy upon them, and to our God who will abundantly pardon.' Isa. lv: 7.

We trust our aged friend will find in the above remarks a satisfactory solution of his difficulties. The case of our friend is but one among the many instances where the popular doctrines called orthodox, have driven those who listened to them to the cold and barren regions of infidelity. In such cases nothing but the pure Gospel of God's universal grace can satisfy and draw back the soul from its labyrinth of darkness and doubt, into the quiet path of truth, and love, and joyful hope, as we are happy to learn it has done in this instance. THE MANUAL AGAIN.

Montreal, Sept. 22, 1846.

To the Editor of the Magazine and Advocate.

Sir,—On the 6th of August last I wrote you respecting the propriety of getting up a Universalist Pocket Manual. I beg leave to offer a few additional reasons.

I believe there is not a Universalist work to be procured in this city; if procured here they would cost 40 or 50 per cent above the New York prices. In most parts of Canada the difficulty and expense would be increased so as, in some cases to be almost an impossibility. From these causes many (perhaps most) Universalists in Canada have no such books in their possession, and can't get them. To all those the Manual would be accessible by post, unbound; thus each isolated Universalist (of which there are many) would become the nucleus of a large society.

Opportunities often occur in travelling, in which a Universalist might use up his adversary 'as cool as a cucumber' with the Manual; but for want of it, interminable discussions are entered into, which only serve to engender ill feeling and prejudices, without convincing. I know an instance of that kind myself.

It may be said that 'believers.....having battled so long and successfully for the truth, are already furnished by memory, both in head and heart with all the necessary weapons to defend the truth and to assail error without any such Manual.' But how is an isolated Universalist, who has not battled long and successfully for the truth, to go to work? with perhaps learning and talent against him? This has been done, but it might have been done much easier with a Manual; and with greater success. I have myself missed many opportunities of convincing persons for want of such a Manual; and therefore I believe the responsibility rests on me to get it done; and I will get it done, if I have to write all the Universalist papers in the States; but it may as well be done in Western New York as anywhere else. Such a book is useful every where, but invaluable where Universalism is young. The expense of printing is but little; $40 would cover it; I wish I had $150; it should soon be done. If Universalism is to extend over the world instead of being confined mostly to a few American States;—if it is for the many, and not for the few;—if 'the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea';—if it is to be the religion of all nations, kindreds and tongues;—if these things are to be, (and I believe they will be,) then it must be by the active exertions of isolated individuals. But I have shown what disadvantages those persons are subject to, for want of the Manual. 'The harvest is plenteous, but the laborers are few;' and they want good and handy tools.

If any one thinks it won't answer, let him state his reasons; if no one does so, then it is to be presumed that it is universally approved of, but that the Universalists of Western N. Y. are too lazy to go to work, and care nothing about spreading the doctrine beyond their own State; but there are other places with human beings in them. I am, &c. ALFRED CRIDGE.

REMARKS.—We give the above to our readers and the world. If any of our readers, ministering brethren, or others, who may hear of our Canadian brother's wishes and plan have any thing to say or do on the subject, let them speak. Our columns are free for the discussion of the matter. We gave our views of it when we published Br. C.'s former article. Ed.

THE COUNTRY PASTOR'S DEFENCE DEMOLISHED.

Mr. D. declares, that in the estimation of good judges, the seats already constructed in the new school house, will comfortably accommodate 'at least 145 adult persons' 'aside from the unoccupied area,' &c. Then 'the blessed doctrine, in Preston,' is spreading more rapidly than its most sanguine admirers have claimed, its enemies themselves being judges; and our congregation is three times as large as the 'Country Pastor's.' But this, like other statements of Mr. D., must not be taken without several grains of allowance. Public speakers soon discover that even good judges generally greatly over estimate the number a house will commodore. By actual count I know, and will satisfy the 'Country Pastor,' if he will attend our meeting when it is full, that the seats will not contain 145 adults or men, women and children; and no one who has ever examined the house need be told that a meeting house of that size might accommodate near double; and that, like all our best arranged school houses, it can commodore vastly more adults at a lecture than children in school. So if none attend the winter school who are over 15, and the summer who are under 5, which is far from true, Mr. D. has not proved it too large for the 43 scholars he mentions, which, whether or not the number of the age declared, I have not ascertained. The late County Superintendent, the late and present Town Superintendents, the teachers of the last winter's school, and even the Rev. Mr. Richards, a Presbyterian, who lectured in it, approve, and no disinterested friend of education disapproves its size. But if it is too large, the minority, the Universalists, could not have been responsible.

Though the old school house had for years disgraced the district, and been totally unfit for use, the 'Country Pastor' affirms that the resolution for a new one was carried by a single vote; his friends, opposing, of course.—Praise worthy act! What better might be expected of them? This declaration is true; but the idea conveyed that the house, as constructed, was so carried, is untrue. The vote was for a house; leaving its site, size, expense, &c., to be afterwards determined. There were advocates for three or four locations; and probably some of each sect voted affirmatively, others negatively, and others not at all. A portion, fearing that their favorite spot would not then be selected, preferred for a time to hire a room, hoping finally to be gratified. Hence not many voted, and the majority was but one. I do not believe there were 12 voters who demanded a special meeting to rescind that resolution; but, whatever may have been the number, they were not 'denied, lest the favorite project should be defeated;' for a large majority were for a house; but because the old house was sold, and as it was August or September, if delayed, a new one could not be erected that season. But, if otherwise, the minority trustee, the Universalist, could not be censurable. All but 3 or 4 voted that the expense of the house should be precisely what it was; nor was it afterwards increased, as Mr. D. asserts. The additional tax was to paint it, which was not included in the original calculation, and to procure a stove and fixtures, which it was supposed could not legally be embraced in the tax for the house. The plan was left with the building committee to determine, but a minority of whom were Universalists. IT WAS PRESENTED BY A SIGNER OF THE MEMORIAL AND ALMOST UNIVERSALLY ADOPTED. IT WAS NEVER CHANGED BUT TO SUIT SOME OF THE OTHER MEMORIALISTS, AND ITS SIZE WAS NEVER INCREASED. NOR did it ever encounter strong opposition from any source. It will be perceived, by reading one of my communications, that my statements upon this point were not entirely correct, because of misinformation; but in all their most essential bearings they are true; while the most important of the 'Country Pastor's' from forgetfulness or recklessness of himself or friends, are false.

The signers of the protest did not pay near two thirds of the expense of the erection of the house, as Mr. D. maintains.

Before the publication of my former article, in drawing off the amount they paid, I unintentionally omitted over $20.00; and yet I conceded all that could be claimed, that 'THEY WERE THE MOST WEALTHY,' or paid the greatest amount. In raising $374.08, they lack $36.40 of paying two thirds. Which of us has the 'peculiar knack of making figures lie,' I leave the reader to decide.

I again declare that the Universalists had not used the house 'against the wishes of one half, or of but 15 of about 40, (not 33 as Mr. D. represents, but 37 or 38,) of the legal voters of the district.' By representation and misrepresentation, but 13 of the taxable polls, and 14 or 15 in all, had signed the protest; and I challenge Mr. D. to name 3 or 4, or more than 1 or 2 others, who were its approvers. And if he can canvass the votes, and then 'look his fellow men in the face, and declare as he has done,' that we used the house 'notwithstanding the strong remonstrance of almost one half of the legal voters of said district,' he has a more brazen front than I have supposed.

The 'Country Pastor,' with his usual justice and correctness, represents me as pronouncing it a 'gross falsehood' a monstrous 'breach of charity' for the memorialists to express an opinion respecting the tendency of our meetings; and contends that I have especially exercised the right I denied to them, which belongs to Partialists as well as Universalists. I have never questioned the right or propriety of either to express an opinion of the tendency of the sentiments of the other; but merely the consistency of men, whatever may be their views, while perpetrating deeds as low, clandestine and underhanded as those proved upon the friends of Mr. D. in my present and former communications, denouncing any doctrines, save those which they themselves have embraced. To do so, 'savors not a little of the policy of the pickpocket, who after robbing his comrade of his purse, immediately joined in hot pursuit, himself loudest in the cry of, stop thief! stop thief!'

In reply to the remainder of the paragraph of Mr. D. containing the assumption just refuted, I aver that I have always paid that respect to others I demand for myself I have never trampled upon the rights of any of my fellow beings, nor have Universalists feared meeting houses by swindling, or endeavoring to exclude the meetings of other sects, from school houses they aided in erecting, by secret villainy or wholesale falsehood. I have never called any professed Christian an infidel for his opinions or poured upon him harsh and approbrious epithets; a trait for which some are, and no one who has read that despicable effusion, 'More Snakes in the Grass,' can doubt that Mr. D. is peculiarly distinguished. If I am correctly informed, he generally speaks of Universalists, with Atheists, Deists, and the vilest characters, without he excepts his friends! I respect the opinions of all honest men, whether Jews, Pagans, Mahometans, Mormons, Calvinists, Catholics, Protestants or Infidels. But knavery I abhor; and if I anathematize its perpetrators, I do not criminate the whole sects to which they belong. I am willing the tendency of my labors should be judged by my expose of 'A Country Pastor' and his friends. It is bold, plain, open, honest and straight forward, and its truth or falsity can easily be tested. Mr. D. has not attempted to meet it by examining its statements in the order they are presented, or any other, but by taking one here and another there, sometimes altering both the form and language, and introducing entirely irrelevant matter; and then, with what success the public will correctly decide. I wrote no snaky, ten-sided productions, and concealed no deep seated hatred with honied words; and I hope the world will judge the influence of both our sentiments by the state of society that upholds or denounces us. Can Mr. D. say as much?

Why does the 'Country Pastor' assail the man who saw the memorial in the office of the State Superintendent, and who declares that 'he knows it to be his hand writing'? Why so incensed, if all was honorable? If unsuccessful he never intended that base transaction should be known; or if successful, that he was its agent or originator. But 'his bar-room stands in the very centre of Mr. G.'s field of labor.' If, as he affirms, he who 'by one hour's scribbling about some snakes in the grass has convulsed the Empire State to its very centre,' by ten years labor has not removed it from the very heart of his church, am I censurable if it has not been prostrated by my few lectures? Seriously, the individual thus ungenerously attacked, is the Hon. Daniel Noyes, a prominent citizen, and in 1844, a member of the Legislature.—Through the mad efforts of Mr. D. and Co. for no licence, Preston voted for licence. Mr. N. is the only man in the town who sells intoxicating drinks; and no landlord in the county, even in the no licence towns, who keeps it, disposes of less to his immediate neighbors than he. No tavern is more respectable. And if he joins me 'most heartily in my liberal efforts to blacken the character of the hated 'Country Pastor', may he not have been shamefully abused by him and his friends? The wife of Mr. N. is a communicant of the Presbyterian church; and his general character as a husband, parent, neighbor, brother, and citizen, is above reproach. And if our endless destiny depends upon feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, &c., he may hear the welcome plaudit, 'come ye blessed,' while many loud mouthed professors must listen to the awful mandate, 'depart ye cursed!' When he declared that his neighborhood once so peaceful had 'become a perfect hell upon earth,' he did not mean that such was the case with the town or that even the inhabitants of his school district were generally immoral, but that a little band of bigots kept it in a constant turmoil and contention.

Mr. N. gives liberally for our meeting house; but less than half what he paid for the Baptist, and entirely from his natural generosity. He is no Universalist, seldom or never attends or supports, is no more friendly to our meetings than others, and had never passed a word with me about Mr. D., or his associates; but an innate sense of right prompts him to assail the injurers and defend the injured, and me, unsolicited to render to him this tribute of justice. So much for the exertions of a man, who bitterly growled at being called a co-laborer with an equally malignant foe of God's impartial grace, to associate me with Mr. N., and by his usual low and indirect manner, derogate from our characters, and disgrace the town that has been so abundantly blessed by his labors. It is worthy of its origin.

I preface my review of the statements of Mr. D. concerning certain books with the following CERTIFICATE.

I hereby certify that I have been librarian of school district No. 4, in Preston, since the first Tuesday in October last; that 'Combe on Man' did not belong to the library until after the State Superintendent decided that it was a suitable work, and that during my residence in this town I have never owned nor circulated it. Neither 'Watt's on the Mind,' 'Abbott's young Christian,' nor any books were denied by me to any person on any ground whatever, nor 'selected out and laid aside from those belonging to the library.' The last named works, came, with others, from the library of a district annulled, a portion of which district and library were added to No. 4, and want of room kept them without the book case of the library. G. A. THROOP.

Preston, September 26th, 1846.

I might publish certificates from H. B. Seeley, Dr Fayette Avery, P. R. Minor, J. and M. J. Ferry, declaring that neither of the works specified, of Watts, Abbott, or Combe, were in the library when it was under their charge, nor was Combe, ever 'taken from and circulated and read as belonging to the library.' And these are all who have ever been librarians in the district, except a Baptist member, whom neither the 'Country Pastor' nor others will pronounce guilty of the charge they have made. Mr. Smith, the only trustee, in 1845, who is not an opposer of Universalism, or in 1846, who is its avowed believer, is prepared to make affidavit that he never declared that 'Abbott's Young Christian must be expelled from the library,' and the librarians of both years say they never heard such declarations. Smith Johnson, Esq., a member of no sect, since October last a trustee, and whose word none will question, avers that he never read, expressed an opinion, or gave any directions concerning it; and as the only remaining trustee, signed the memorial, he must have been the guilty man, complaining to the State Superintendent of the baseness of the end he had attained, or the defence of the 'Country Pastor' must contain a pious error. All I stated concerning the above mentioned books was true, and the defence of Mr. D. is false in every particular; and I call for the proof the memorialists stand ready 'to furnish.' 'Abbott's Young Christian,' is and was purchased by a trustee, knowing it was sectarian, as he admits. But does hearing of such an opinion, and surmising that it may be excluded, or perceiving a heap of library books out of the case without inquiring the cause, justify representations to the State Superintendent unqualifiedly wrong, as they now virtually admit all of them to be, which, as far as concerns 'Watts on the mind,' their defence does not even assert their honesty, and in relation to the rest makes but a plausible appearance of sincerity, by falsehood manufactured by Mr. D. or his friends, as he can best explain.

The subjoined certificate refutes the next declaration of the 'Country Pastor.'

I hereby certify that the articles published by Rev. T. J. Goodrich, in the Magazine and Advocate of July last, as far as they refer to me, were true, and that the defence of the 'Country Pastor,' in every respect that it contradicts them is false. When I ascertained that the memorialists had privately made unjust accusations against me to the State Superintendent, depriving me of all knowledge and opportunity of refuting them, I felt seriously aggrieved. And whether or not they reflected their calumnies at the time, the public reiteration of them by Mr. D., long after I supposed all conceded them groundless, I can but regard as wilfully and maliciously designed to injure me. Circumstances render it extremely unpleasant for me to make this statement, but justice to myself demands it at my hands. G. A. THROOP.

Preston, September 26, 1846.

No man can specify an act that Mr. T. performed, pertaining to the exclusion or retention of the books named, or our occupancy of the house. And he said so little that I was told at the time, that if left to him it was feared he would decide against our legal right to hold meetings in the house, and retain 'Combe on Man' and the 'Voice to Youth' in the library. And unless Lucifer guided his pen, I can not account for the declaration that 'no one in Preston will pretend to deny' that he acted 'in all the measures of which the memorialists complain.' And unless Beelzebub sat at his elbow, I can not conceive how he could convey three false intimations in two lines, viz. that my friends in Preston are in favor of rum selling; that they had cast Mr. T. out of their synagogue for opposing it, and that Mr. T. had belonged to the Universalists. And this by a man who aims to extricate Presbyterianism from the disgrace of leading the effort to exclude us from the school house, &c., by denying that its supporters, legal society members, and even advocates, who are not communicants, are Presbyterians!

Mr. D. declares that the County Superintendents do not, as Mr. G. asserts, nor ever did belong to a self-styled evangelical church. This is true of the present, but untrue of the Superintendent when the school house was reared; the late worthy Superintendent as in my article termed him; D. R. Randall, Esq., Superintendent in 1844 and 1845, who was all I represented him, and recommended District No. 4, to build the house they erected. So Mr. D. need not write to learn the sentiments of those who held that station 5 years since, or may hereafter. As the present excellent Superintendent was appointed about the time of their efforts to exclude us, and 'they had no fear from the closest investigation of all the complaints preferred by them to the State Superintendent,' why did they not appeal to him? Why select so distant a tribunal, in room of one so natural and near, and represent that there was no other? The reason is well known in Preston; 'they feared their reckless falsehoods would be detected.' But they did nothing clandestinely; though 'the Country Pastor' secretly wrote, and they privately signed a black and calumnious memorial, and its reply was suppressed at the expense of truth; a reply addressed externally to the trustees and designed for the district. And whether it was interally directed to the inhabitants of the district, as my informant supposed, or to the signers, inhabitants, as Mr. D. declares, as the author kept no copy, the original is still retained, and what is said to be it, before its publication, passed through the hands of at least one man who has no very great regard for truth, I am unable to determine.

Br. Austin has clearly refuted 'the Country Pastor's' declarations concerning the 'expurgated edition' of 'the Voice to Youth.' He was best acquainted with the facts and has my sincere thanks. He pronounces Mr. D.'s statements concerning it 'reckless in the extreme, to say the least,' and adds, 'if it is a specimen of the general character of his assertions, it must detract much from their weight in the estimation of the candid.' He will perceive that its moral turpitude leaves no comparison to many made in the 'memorial' and 'defence.'

The 'Country Pastor' still clings to his characteristic statement, that every other but the expurgated 'edition of the Voice to Youth' was published with the avowed design of propagating Universalism; but can not name a man who ever published it avowing such a design, and does not present a particle of proof that that was its real object. It was strongly commended by many political, literary and religious periodicals of all parties and sects, by that very widely circulated Methodist paper, 'the Christian Advocate and Journal,' and others self-styled 'Evangelical,' by thousands of Partialist church members in every part of the country, Presbyterians included; and it was left to the Rev. Mr. Dyer to immortalize himself by making this important discovery, and to perceive that all these were idiots, dots or maniacs; not to see, or liars to deny this obvious fact.

Concede what we neither affirm or deny, however Mr. D. has represented us, all that any one ever attempted to prove, that a few sentences on one or two pages teach that sentiment, (or rather go to refute its opposite,) the one thousandth, or possibly, the five hundredth part of the book; that no more gives character to the whole, than does one man to an assemblage of 500, or 1000 men.—According to such reasoning, that it had an object, 500 or 1000 sentences had none. 'The Country Pastor' doubtless knows that the libraries contain many volumes that more decidedly and lengthily oppose, than it is claimed that the 'Voice to Youth' supports, Universalism, and about which there is no complaint; and his deceptive and unprincipled course concerning this work, will lead community to rightly conclude in regard to the truth and honesty of his other statements, and to correctly decide whether he has a 'soul' or a 'gizzard.'

If I conveyed the idea that Mr. Richards was invited to lecture in the school house exclusively by Presbyterians, I was in error, my information being defective. Some of them and others were consulted, and that it was with their approbation is conceded. Nor did I affirm that the lecture was religious. But the essential point for which it was introduced, to show the inconsistency of men in attending and officiating as officers of debates, and approving of lectures in a house, at the very time that they, by protest, remonstrances, or memorials, declare it a grievous wrong to use it for any such purpose, and endeavor to open it for nothing but the day school, can not be met.

UNIVERSALIST QUARTERLY AND GENERAL REVIEW.

The October number, (the 4th and last of the third volume,) of this valuable and critical work, has come to hand, laden as usual, with choice and edifying matter.

The first article is on the 'Ronge Reform,' in Germany, which had its origin in the exhibition at Treves of what the Catholics called the holy seamless coat in which Christ was led from the hall of judgment to the cross of Calvary, and the solemn protest and earnest expostulation of John Ronge against such a blasphemous and hypocritical pretension of the Bishop of Treves. Multitudes ranged themselves under the standard of Ronge, throwing off their allegiance to the Pope of Rome, and many of the Catholic superstitions, and establishing what they call the New German Catholic Church. Ronge appears as a second Luther, and the reform is spreading rapidly through many of the German States. This article is a timely and pertinent review of the interesting facts and features of this reform, and bears the signature of G. W. G.

The second article is from the pen of Rev. A. D. Mayo, and entitled 'Universalism, the demand of the Age.' The writer proceeds to show that the whole tendency of the moral and religious world, the various reforms and philanthropic movements of the day, the temperance, peace, anti-slavery, prison discipline, moral and social reform associations, the remodelling and softening down of the rigid features of old and cruel creeds, and every important change and movement of the age, is in harmony with the spirit, and tends to the ultimate triumph of Universalism.

The third article is entitled 'Philosophy imperfect—

Christianity perfect,' and written by Rev. O. A. Skinner. Its design is to show that, however beautiful and attractive may be the speculations of philosophy, they are at least imperfect, often discordant, and never satisfying to the moral and spiritual wants of man, and leave his duties, obligations, and especially his finally destiny in the dark; and that on the other hand Christianity is perfect, as a system of morality, exhibiting the true character of God, man's relationship to him, the true nature of worship, a perfect pattern of life in the example of Jesus, a perfect system of rewards and punishments, and a perfect assurance of a future life and immortality for man beyond the grave. It is a well written article, and should be attentively read by all preachers as well as laymen who are inclined to 'spoil' themselves 'through philosophy, falsely so called, after the traditions of men and not after Christ.'

The fourth article is from the pen of the editor, Rev. Dr. Ballou, and entitled 'The Faith requisite to Christian Fellowship.' It is a most critical and searching article, eminently characteristic of its author. It exposes the weakness and folly, and silly flummery of the pretension set up by some modern soi-disant reformers, that no faith at all in Christ as the Son and divinely appointed, and anointed Messenger of God to men, is necessary to entitle one to the Christian name and fellowship—that a Deist or an Atheist may justly claim to be a Christian if his life and example, be such as the Gospel points out. The article is most searching, timely and appropos to these days of latitudinarianism and transcendentalism; and should be attentively considered by all who are inclined to break away from the anchor ground of the true Christian, who maintains, with his Master, that 'This is the work of God; that ye believe on him whom he hath sent,' as well as obey his precepts.

The other articles in the present number are two poetic articles—'God's Temple,' by H. J. W., and 'The Joy of Sadness' by A. G. L., (Br. Laurie, we suppose,)—'Death and its Agencies,' by Rev. H. Bacon; 'Lessons of Theology taught in the works of Creation,' by Rev. C. F. LeFevre; 'Sources of National Prosperity and Ruin,' by the Editor, and 'Literary Notices' of the Rose of Sharon, and Hurlbut's Essays on Human Rights and their Political Guaranties.

The publisher of the Quarterly says if all who are indebted for the work will immediately pay up arrearages (a very reasonable request,) the work will be continued, 'otherwise it must stop.' We trust, for the credit of the denomination, that those in arrears will pay up, every soul of them, and try and get new and good subscribers enough to encourage the publisher to go on his way rejoicing. Br. Tompkins, as well as the Quarterly is worthy of extensive patronage. D. S.

REMOVALS.

Br. A. G. Laurie, of Canada West, we understand has received and accepted an invitation to settle at Erie, Pa., as pastor of the Universalist society in that place. Br. L. we believe is an excellent and devoted preacher, and we doubt not will be eminently useful in promoting the cause of truth in his new location. Erie is an important place, and needs an able and efficient preacher.—Our friends in Canada, however, will sustain no serious loss in his removal.

Br. J. A. Coolidge has removed from Petersham to Shirley Village, Mass.

Br. Z. Thompson, has removed from New Market, N. H., to Cabotville, Mass. In a late letter to the editor of the Trumpet he says, the society in the latter place have lately been fitting up their church in excellent style, and are now in quite a prosperous condition.

Br. G. W. Quinby to Franklin, Mass. Br. G. K. Shaw from Dixfield to Paris, Me. The 'Primitive Expounder' from Jackson to Ann Arbor, Mich. Br. A. G. Laurie is about to remove from London, C. W., to Erie, Pa. Br. E. Case, Jr., has accepted an invitation to locate in Boston, Erie county, N. Y.

Br. Barry, send on your articles on the Resurrection, and also your article on the seal of Christ's Messiahship. They will be abundantly welcome. Ed.

Harpers Publications.

The Harpers have just issued a beautiful 12mo. volume of 292 pages, entitled 'MYRTIS,' with other etchings, by Mrs. L. H. Sigourney. Its contents are as follows. Myrtis, Bertha, Lady Arabella Johnson, Mary Rice, Fall of the Pequod, The Yankee, A legend of Pennsylvania, The Lady of Mount Vernon, A tale of Poland, The Alms-house, The Plough and the Sword, The Reverse and the Lost Children. Such a collection, with the name of the well known author can not but ensure an extensive sale of the book.

Nos. 9 and 10 of the PICTORIAL ENGLAND, are issued and comprise the history of that country, civil and military, during the reigns of King Henry III, Edward I, II, and III, and Richard II, a period of 183 years. A portrait of each of those Kings, and an engraving of their great seals are given, besides engravings illustrating many remarkable events. 25 cents per number.

Nos. 117-118 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE contains the remainder of Part II of King Henry Sixth, and begins Part II of the same tragedy. 25 cents. The above works for sale at Beesley's.

The COLUMBIAN and GRAHAM'S Magazines for November with their usual number of handsome engravings and quantity of interesting matter, are received and for sale by Beesley.

Mr. Beesley has also received the November No. of the N. Y. ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE. Four handsome engravings embellish its pages, among which the 'Flower Girl' specially attracted our attention. It is a beautiful and expressive thing and worth the price of the No. The 'Young Shepherd,' is another pretty rural picture—all are good, as well as the full and varied complement of reading matter. 25 cents.

The MECHANICS' MIRROR for October contains an address by Thomas P. Judd, P. S. P. before the Protection of Geneva Mechanics. Subject, 'Union among Mechanics.' It contains other good things. At Beesley's.

THE WESTERN UNIVERSALIST has just entered upon its VI volume. It is edited and published by Br. E. Manford, at Indianapolis, Ind., Semi-monthly—in the quarto form—is a good paper—doing much good for the cause in that region and—we wish it abundant success. Br. Manford offers the following generous proposition to his patrons for the ensuing year.

A PROPOSITION TO OUR PATRONS.—If each of you will obtain one subscriber for this volume, we will publish the next volume in weekly numbers for one dollar per year. We believe each of you can do this. Will you try? Forward the names as fast as you get them.

RHODE ISLAND UNIVERSALIST TRACT SOCIETY.—Our acknowledgments are due to Br. H. Bacon for copies of the several Tracts published by the above named society. These little tracts, short, pithy, pungent and to the point, are calculated to do much good when freely circulated among the people, in removing objections to, and furnishing concise arguments in proof of, the doctrine of impartial grace.

STEUBEN ASSOCIATION.

An extra session of this body was held in Springwater, on the 7th and 8th inst. The Council was called to order by the Standing Clerk. Br. C. Carpenter was chosen Moderator, and Br. O. Roberts, Clerk pro tem., and who also was chosen to prepare the minutes of this meeting for publication, and accompany them with suitable remarks. There were six preachers of our faith present, viz: N. Sawyer, O. Roberts, Robinson, A. Upson, C. Carpenter, and Wm. Burlingame. The first two, preached two discourses each, and the last two, one each; making in all six discourses on the occasion. A goodly number were in attendance on the last day, and much praise is due the singers for their songs which so much enlivened our feelings and added interest to the meeting. And our good friends in Springwater are entitled to our thanks for their very kind and hospitable feelings which they manifested towards us during our stay among them.

From the delegates and other brethren who came up to this spiritual feast with us, we heard some encouraging news concerning the condition of our common cause in different parts of this moral heritage of our Master. One unanimous cry seemed to come up from nearly every hill-top and every valley, in the language of the Macedonians, 'Come over and help us.' There are but few preachers in their midst; and, as a matter of course, but little organization. There are a great many believers scattered over this vast territory, and they need faithful shepherds to guide them, to take them by the hand and lead them up out of the land of spiritual darkness and bondage, and feed them with the true bread from heaven. They have found after years of toil, that organization is absolutely needed among them for their future prosperity; and, therefore, at this meeting, after much discussion upon the best means of promoting the cause, the efficiency of establishing of a Missionary Society, etc., to this end it was, therefore, unanimously

Resolved, That brethren be appointed to obtain the necessary funds for the support of preaching among them, and that they report the result of their proceedings to the next Conference. The following brethren were appointed to act as that committee, viz: J. Healy, South Dansville; Curtis Molby, Orange; Asa Rockwell, Hornby; William S. Beers, Beaver Dam; G. Coryell, Townsend; J. Pierce, Cohocton; S. Holmes, Avoca; Z. Bradley, Kennedyville; Wm. Goff, Howard; G. Ford, Springwater. These brethren are empowered with authority to appoint, and are expected earnestly to request other brethren living in sections where no committee has been appointed, and where meetings may be sustained, to co-operate with them in these measures. All are requested to engage in the work assigned them immediately. And to give a more thorough and speedy impetus to this important undertaking, Br. Wm. Burlingame will visit several places within the bounds of the Association, and commence his tour immediately, preaching in Springwater on the first Sunday in Nov. A. M. and P. M. On Tuesday evening at Liberty Corners, and on Thursday evening, at Howard. Then he will return either by way of Springwater or Dansville to Conesus, where he will attend to his regular appointment on Sunday. The friends living off from this route, and attending either of the meetings will come prepared to name the time and place of meetings in their respective neighborhoods, on the week following, when Br. B. will make them a visit also. He is determined as far as he has ability, God helping him, to make a thorough work as a missionary among them, and wishes their united action, and hearty co-operation with him and without delay. The committee appointed at each of the places above named, are respectfully requested to attend to the duty assigned them, if possible, before Br. B. visits them, that he may without hindrance continue his labors steadily among them from that time forward.

Brethren will you now awake to your duty, and show to the world that you feel what you profess, and mean what you say. Do not let these many long evenings, this most favorable time in the year for meetings pass away without availing yourselves speedily of the benefits of the preached word. Do not let it be simply said at the next Conference, that you have obtained such an amount of funds, but that you are also having regular and stated meetings—that you have spiritual laborers actually employed in the field. One of the objects of the next Conference is to organize a Missionary Society, or to adopt some more general system of organization; and for the purpose of more immediately and effectually obtaining the object, the above committee was appointed, since if they discharge their duty faithfully, they will be enabled to ascertain the number, strength, influence, wants and prospects within the bounds of the Association, and report at the next meeting.

Two requests were made at this meeting for letters of fellowship, one from Br. Robinson, who was 'brought up' in Springwater, and has lately commenced preaching the doctrine of universal grace in his native town, to good acceptance. The other from Br. Wm. Burlingame, who is a convert from the Baptist among whom he labored with untiring zeal for some years, beloved by all; but who having embraced the doctrine of a world's reconciliation, is now devoting all his energies in our holy cause. He is now preaching half of his time to good acceptance in Conesus, where we have a good and well organized society; consequently he is recommended with all confidence to our Steuben brethren, and to all to whom God, in his providence, shall call him to preach.

Let all remember the time and object of the next Conference at South Dansville, on the first Wednesday and Thursday of Jan. next, and let all the members of the above committee, especially be present; or if not possible to do so, let them report by letter, directing the same to the Standing Clerk, Br. A. Upson, Hornellsville. Those who receive this paper are requested to send a copy to such members of the committee as do not receive the paper from the publisher, that there may be one simultaneous action, and all move on together in the great and and glorious work of spreading the Gospel among men.— [Evangelist. Per order, O. ROBERTS, Clerk.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

WAWANOSH.

[Concluded.]

'Twas on a bright and lovely day,
The sky was clear and birds were gay,
And sweetly caroled forth their lay;
And nature far and near was seen
Glad in her choicest robe of green;
Icola had seized the balmy hour
To rove once more to a rock-hid bower,
Where the gentle breeze through the boughs above,
Had echoed her lover's vows of love—
She threw herself upon the sod
Her lover's feet so oft had trod.
And Hope pictured future scenes of bliss,
While memory clung to his parting kiss,

She tarried there, in pleasing thought
Till the sun's last rays by the hills were caught,
And, glancing through the forest thw,
Around her couch their fading hue;
And the joyous song of the feathered crew
Was checked by the damps of evening dew.
She left the wood whose gloom had grown Fearful to her excited brain—
Phantoms of fear till now unknown
Unnerved her weak and trembling frame.
She reached her home in trembling mood
And in her father's presence stood.
The chieftain sat in downcast mood—
A warrior stained with dust and blood
Thus spake: 'My chieftain, I alone
From Olga's daring band have flown,
Though none would flee till hope was lost
With him whom thou wilt prize the most—
The leader of our fated band—
Thrice nobly did his voice recall,
And thrice with foremost blade and hand
Beat back the foe, when each and all
Of our lone few abandoned hope
Successfully 'gainst odds to cope,
And had he lived to stem the flood
And turn the current of this blood,
All the fierce fury of their hate
Would but have made our vengeance late!—
He paused—for now his eye first fell
Upon the maid whose looks foretell
Too soon another sad farewell,
Her fixed gaze and changeless look,
The warrior nor the sire could brook;
For in its deep unearthly glare,
Shone the keen misery of despair.
One shriek she gave, and heard no more,
But helpless sank upon the floor.
They laid her gently on the bed,
As one already with the dead;
But by degrees, her pulse so still,
A feeble fluttering gave—a blush
Stole o'er her cheek; and with a thrill
Of joy they marked that mocking flush.
For many days she lingered on—
No ray of hope, no cloudless sun,
Had yet upon her spirit shone—
Death was the only boon to crave;
The hand of death alone could save
From pangs she never could forget,
And useless sighs, and vain regret,
Thus passed; and neath yon clump of trees,
(On a green spot close by the water,)
Whose boughs make music of the breeze,
Sleeps Wawanosh's lovely daughter.

THE TOLLING BELLS—SABBATH MORNING.

Hark! what mean those different sounds.
Of tolling bells the village round?
From hill to dale each Sabbath morn,
Like warning gems—or sportsmen's horn?
In language plain do they not say,
'Come to our church—this is the way!—
Our creeds are pure—and from above,
And sanctioned by the God of love?

Our preacher too—a man of God—
By word and work points out the road,

That all 'who run may read' and know
The path to shun—the way to go.

Come wandering sinner, hear the word
Of love and mercy from the Lord,
Thy precious soul must ever dwell,
With saints in heaven, or sink to hell!

How hard men toil, and vainly strive,
That sinners may repent and live!
Unmindful that the God above
Exceeds them all in power and love!

How vain to think that human skill
Can vie with God, whose power and will—
As heaven above the earth is higher,
So far from ours do God's aspire!

O! when will error disappear!
The light of truth shine bright and clear?
That all may hear and know God's word,
Acknowledge Christ, and own him Lord?

In Christ the Son, all fullness dwells,
All fear and doubt his truth dispells,
To him all majesty is given,
All power on earth, and power in heaven.

Sectarian creeds nor partial love;
Can ne'er divide the church above;
As on the 'just and unjust fall
The dews of heaven,' so God loves all.

DEPEND ON YOURSELF.

Bad luck, as well as mischance and misfortune, are the daughters of misconduct, and sometimes the mothers of success, prosperity, and advancement. To be thrown upon one's resources, is to be cast into the very lap of fortune. Had Franklin entered Philadelphia with a thousand dollars in his pocket, instead of one shilling and nine-pence, as he did, in all probability he would have gone on a 'spre'e,' instead of hunting employment, and died at thirty-five from driving tandem teams and drinking brandy smashers, instead of living to the green old age of eighty, and dying a philosopher, whose amusement was the taming of thunder bolts and bottling up lightning. Had Napoleon's father been the owner of a princely estate, his son would never have got to be Emperor. A good kick out of doors is better for a boy, than all the rich uncles in the world. One never tries to swim so hard as when he's got to do it or drown.

To be a rich man's son is the greatest misfortune that can befall a young man, morally speaking.—Who fill our offices of state or of honor?—not the children of the rich, or the sons of the opulent.

A knowledge of starch and debauchery is all a rich man's son aspires to. The parlor is the scene of their oratory, and hair oil the care of their souls; poor creatures!—Albany Knickerbocker.

THE COUNTRY PASTOR'S DEFENCE DEMOLISHED.

[Concluded from page 349.]

The following letter refutes Mr. D.'s assertion, that the meeting house in which he labors was erected by honest means. It was voluntarily written by the highly respectable friend whose name is attached. He is well known, and his character for veracity is not excelled. He has kindly consented that I should use it as I deemed advisable. No honest man will censure its decided warmth. With the subjoined certificates from men of unimpeachable integrity and truth, it establishes more than I ever stated.

Mount Upton, September 24, 1846.

MR. GOODRICH,

SIR—Since the first of July last, I have had the pleasure of perusing several articles in the Magazine and Advocate, entitled, 'The Country Pastor,' 'Memorial of the Country Pastor,' 'Review of it,' 'The Superintendent's Reply,' etc. Having formerly been acquainted with the character of the individuals therein implicated, and also being witness to some of the nefarious acts committed by them, and there referred to, I was compelled to endorse every word as truth, and recognize the whole article as a full and faithful statement of the facts, and a just expose of the frauds and intrigues of the 'Country Pastor' and his friends.

I was greatly surprised to find in another number of the same periodical, an article entitled the 'Country Pastor's Defence.' I was surprised, because I had supposed that Mr. Dyer and his friends, had too much respect for their own characters, and too much admired an honorable reputation, a good name, and honest report, to publicly declare that to be true, which he, his friends, and the public, well knew to be basely and utterly false. 'The Country Pastor,' doubtless labored long and assiduously in preparing his 'defence,' and has failed not in carefully avoiding all truth, honesty and self-respect. I was happily surprised when I read that part of it relating to the erection of the meeting house in Preston; for in that, I find the pledge of a trustee, who unlike the rest, is not a 'pious swindler,' which secures to me the small sum of $80, with interest eight or ten years, by renewing my legal claim, which before was outlawed, and for which I expected neither cents or favors. The good pastor says, that 'you would confer a favor on the trustees, by naming to them the individual who furnished a dollar toward the erection of the house under the encouragement Universalists were to occupy it on any occasion whatever;' and if any other individual, whether Universalist or otherwise, will make it satisfactorily appear, that he has funds vested in the Presbyterian meeting house in Preston, dishonestly or unfairly obtained, the word of a trustee for it, who is no 'pious swindler' neither, he shall have his money back again, with interest, though it may have become outlawed twice over.

Dear Sir, I am one of those individuals who contributed to the erection of said meeting house, under the encouragement and express promise, by them solemnly made, that the house should be open one half of the time to any and all denominations. They wished it to be called a Presbyterian house, and only asked to occupy it one half of the time. I too, among the 'individuals,' who at the time 'acknowledged myself to be a Universalist,' and was 'supposed to be such,' that has furnished not only 'one farthing,' but $80, for its erection. I too am the individual who can and will make it satisfactorily appear to that conscience-stricken trustee, if his name shall be disclosed, that I have funds vested in the meeting house in Preston, dishonestly and unfairly obtained,' and will, the first opportunity, give him the invitation to pay over principal, interest, and if needs be, costs.

In consequence of the decided and solemn promise of the leading Presbyterians, I vested my $80, gave my time and consented to act as trustee, or building committee, and incurred the liabilities to pay for the erection of said house. At that time it was supposed by all concerned, that it was to be called a Presbyterian house, and occupied by them one half the time; the remainder by any and all other denominations. It was so talked by all, till two or three months after its completion. During that time the house was unoccupied. I at length appointed a meeting for a Universalist minister, Mr. Doolittle; and the evening previous, the Presbyterians collected together at my house, and protested against my opening the house for him, and demanded of me the keys and papers, which were then in my hands. I could have opened and had the meeting in it, for I had the right and the means. I however yielded to them, gave up the keys and papers, and opened my own house, upon this condition, viz., that they would immediately call a meeting of the subscribers, and if possible, buy out the half that belonged to me and others, or sell their half to us. Such meeting has never been called; and with one exception, no moneys thus fraudulently obtained have been refunded. This Mr. Dyer speaks of in his defence, and says it was refunded to avoid all appearance of wrong; and that the amount was only $20. The good pastor is much mistaken; $50 was the sum subscribed, and it was refunded to avoid a law suit, and a bill of costs. I authorize you to name me as one of the individuals, whom the trustees challenge you to name, viz., 'one who was a Universalist at the time, or supposed to be such,' 'who paid a farthing,' &c., and 'who signed under encouragements,' &c. You will confer a favor upon me, to ascertain if possible, the name of that trustee, 'who is no pious swindler,' and inform me of the same.

I am, Sir, with respect, your friend,

H. BILLINGS.

REV. J. T. GOODRICH.

I hereby certify that I subscribed fifty dollars towards the erection of the meeting house now occupied by the Presbyterians, at Preston Centre, in consequence of the inducements presented to me, that the Presbyterians would use it but a part of the time, and the remainder it should be free for all denominations of professing Christians; that I paid betwixt twenty and thirty dollars, and withheld the remainder, because of the exclusion of Mr. Doolittle from preaching therein; that I compelled them to refund me what they had received by threatening them with the legal consequences, if they refused; that I have not a doubt that others aided them from the same considerations; and that I will swear to the truth of what is herein stated in a court of justice when called upon so to do.

CLARKE LEWIS.

Preston, September 26, 1846.

I hereby certify that I paid $12 for the erection of the meeting house above referred to, in consequence of the representation that the Presbyterians would occupy it but one half of the time, and the remainder, it should be free to all sects of professing Christians; that I have not a doubt that others aided them on this condition; and that I will swear to the truth of what I herein state when called upon in a court of justice.

CHARLES ECCLESTON.

Preston, September 26, 1846.

The above letter declares that the key was obtained, and Br. Doolittle excluded, by the blackest falsehood; by conceding that the Presbyterians owned but half the house, and if possible would buy the other or sell their own, which they never endeavored to do. Hence, they designedly swindled their neighbors out of $700 or $800, the value of their half of the house. The money offered and not obtained was on condition that the house, if free as represented, should be called in the subscription, a free and not a Presbyterian house, which was desired, as it would prevent them from defrauding others of their money or depriving them of their rights. Mr. D. challenges me for the information I have given, and I challenge him to name the trustee, 'who is no pious swindler' who will refund $92.00 with interest, some 10 years, not 'to avoid even the appearance of wrong,' but to rid his church from longer countenancing down right knavery! Perhaps he may then learn that I have similar certificates from others, demanding their honest due so long withheld. Not only were Universalists, but Baptists, and community generally, promised that the house should be free to all sects, a portion of the time; and how well it has been performed to them they can testify.

Instead of being as unfortunate 'in my statements relative to the affairs of the society' as the 'Country Pastor' represents, I have proved greater frauds and more reckless falsehoods than I ever intimated. And yet I possess other facts severely reflecting upon some of his leading friends, which that 'charity and love sufficiently liberal to embrace' 'near all the human race,' causes me to suppress. And while the public see that if the friends of Mr. D. had obtained but a comparatively small sum of money as fraudulently and converted to their own use, they would be prominent candidates for Auburn, with every prospect of success, they will satisfactorily decide whether or not I have animadverted upon such transactions with too much 'pious indignation,' or regarded such movements with too much distrust.

The 'Country Pastor' pronounces phrenology a harmless thing, 'especially when divested of infidelity;' concedes that he once publicly debated against it, but contends that he wastes no opposition upon it. Phrenology harmless, if 'divested of infidelity;' and he asserts that he did represent 'Combe on Man' as infidel to the State Superintendent, only that infidels so regarded it. In his 'More Snakes in the Grass,' he considered it worthy of especial notice, that County Superintendents had deservedly reprobated 'The Pirate's Own Book,' 'Book of Murders,' 'Criminal Calendar' &c., while 'Combe on the Constitution of Man,' 'Austin's Voice to Youth,' with others of kindred character, are known to abound in our district libraries, and suffered to pass without the least animadversion. He also says of Combe, 'On a careful examination, its deadly fangs, though artfully concealed, were discovered; and by timely exposure of its snaky wiles, the intended victim was rescued from its grasp.' And again, 'a mother professedly pious read the work; and despite the warnings and expostulations of her partner, persisted in recommending it to the perusal of her children. It scarcely need be told that these children now sit in the seat of the scorners, and are the loud advocates of infidelity. A lovely youth, the child of pious parents, and for a member of the church of unusual promise, fascinated by its gilded scales, yielded to the syren voice of the charmer, and all hope of her recovery to the belief of the truth, and to the paths of righteousness is gone. This and other kindred works, among which might be named 'Austin's Voice to Youth,' have found their way into many a district library, and it is to be feared, into no small part of the school libraries throughout the land; where unsuspected, they are exerting a most powerful influence in corrupting the religious sentiments of the rising generation." Still again, "calling a short time since upon a female acquaintance of high standing for intelligence and piety, I found 'Combe on the Constitution of Man,' the work which infidels themselves profess to regard and recommend as the work of all others best calculated to subserve their purposes, occupying a place in her parlor more conspicuous by far than the Bible; and to my still greater surprise, I found the mother of an interesting family deaf to all warning and remonstrance against the dangerous tendency of so insidious a foe." Once more, "For one I rejoice that infidels themselves have come out and distinctly avowed 'Combe on Man' as one of their own progeny, and as the work on which, of all others, they place their chief dependence for undermining the Bible and Christianity." Though such books had sadly corrupted the fountains of knowledge "with the poisonous seeds of error and infidelity," were of the "most vitiating and decidedly infidel character," "dangerous," "most pernicious," "owing to the disguised and artful manner in which infidelity is concealed," "together with the specious titles under which works containing its more bold avowals and sent abroad," "tares," "Snakes in the Grass," "not only filling the fountains of knowledge with their deadly slime, but worming their way into our parlors, and the bed-chambers of our baptized offspring, and there fastening upon their very vitals with their deadly fangs," "serpents," "armed with 'deadly fangs,' unsuspected spreading 'their poison throughout our land,' while multitudes 'have fallen beyond the power of recovery,' without hearing but a gentle, uncertain and indistinct 'note of alarm' sounded from 'the pulpit and the press,' as it was not until recently that even the Evangelicals had exposed their true character, &c.; and though he declared 'Combe on Man,' to the State Superintendent, to be, 'the book which infidels themselves recommended as the work of all others best calculated to subserve their purposes,' yet he has not said it is infidel, or other than harmless, as it is, if divested of infidelity! The wayfaring man, though a fool, could but conclude that he intended to teach that it was thoroughly infidel. And is the equivocation and deception of his defence, in point of morality, better than lying? Phrenology harmless, and he no foe of it, if divested of infidelity, and still he delivered several lectures, at Preston Corners, in the estimation of all friendly to it, designed to ridicule it, independent of its Christianity or infidelity, as I can prove by G. A. Throop, Drs. Avery, Dwight, and many others.

With his usual ambiguity, Mr. D. denies he has discovered "that it is dangerous to teach children in general many of the higher branches of science, as they lead into infidelity, and what is still worse, Universalism," and pronounces it an old calumny that has been dead and rotten in the grave near four years, now dug up "for the exquisite purpose of adding spice and perfumery to the columns of the Advocate." Well, I have not affirmed its truth, all I declared was that it was so said. But that "infamous strolling lecturer," as he is, since he effectually prostrated Mr. D. in argument, is not my informant, and I am not convinced that such "a putrid carcass" has been resuscitated. Will the 'Country Pastor' answer two questions? Has he not sometimes so expressed himself, that he designed at least his own supporters to suppose that to be his opinion? And since the publication of my review of the memorial, did he not ask a venerable member of his church, in Sunday School, in substance, if he did not think a high cultivation or development of the mental faculties, (meaning by the study of the higher branches,) led to infidelity, and give a silent assent to an affirmative answer? Unless he can return an unambiguous negative, he is "entirely welcome to all the laurels he may reap" from this portion of his defence; and the public will correctly decide how well known was the falsity of my insinuation in Preston.

Mr. D. still speaks 'of opposing the circulation of Universalist and infidel works through the school libraries,' but has not proved the 'Universalism' of one, not mentioned any infidel book but 'Combe on Man,' and has not said that that is infidel! He denies that his object is to supply 'their place with the publications of the American Tract Society,' though he appeals to the State Superintendent to know 'if they are to be accounted sectarian,' and excluded or not admitted! He knows that the law neither favors anti-evangelical or evangelical works; concedes that the libraries have contained the latter, of course in direct violation of it, but bitterly denounces their removal, and avows that he only wishes to guard their own rights and secure equal privileges to all! He asserts that we have joined with the Catholics, because we justly obtained the exclusion of some partialist, and they of some protestant works, and asserts that we demand and enjoy privileges denied to other sects!

The 'Country Pastor's' allusion to the article of J. M. Day I consider unworthy of notice. As remarkable as it may appear, he may yet learn that his 'More Snakes in the Grass,' are so ridiculous and contemptible, as 'to become a by-word, a hissing, and a reproach among all' liberal and enlightened minds who ever peruse them, of all parties and sects; though less 'blue,' 'illiberal,' and 'bigoted,' than the source from whence they emanated.

Mr. D. with his usual fairness, quotes the phrase, 'undivided influence,' which I applied to our friends in Preston, as referring to himself and Mr. Bush. In representing that these two Reverend gentlemen were co-laborers, I did not perpetrate an act so mean, "so much beneath the dignity of any man of common decency," as to slur the virtue of the good 'Country Pastor!' I meant, as the reader doubtless well understood, that as bitter foes of Universalism, they were both 'marching under the black flag of damnation,' to use the language of Mr. B. on a certain occasion, aiming at its annihilation.—In this sense they were co-laborers, how distant soever were these posts in this common army.

'Orthodoxy as it is,' names many Partialist clergymen who have perpetrated most infamous crimes, a part or all of them clearly influenced by their sentiments; and refers to hundreds of its believers whom it has driven to insanity, suicide and murder. Being unable to meet its stubborn facts, or controvert its conclusive reasons, it must feel the withering influence of Mr. D.!

It will be seen by carefully perusing my article published July 3d, in connection with this communication, that the only intimation I made which has been shown to be erroneous, was the comparatively unimportant one, that Mr. Richards was invited exclusively to lecture by the Presbyterians. Every other statement was correct, unless the reply of the State Superintendent was internally directed to the memorialists, inhabitants, instead of the inhabitants of the district; which, if true, was not very essential. Hence those implicated are by no means extricated from the outrageous effort to exclude our meetings from the school house, with all the attendant circumstances I have presented; nor have they offered a material fact in mitigation, that I have not fairly refuted. Whether the 'Country Pastor' was at the head or tail of, or had no connection with the wrong, it was perpetrated; and if he wishes to be considered innocent because it would disgrace him, does he not perceive that it is equally disgraceful to his friends?

By attentively comparing my review of the memorial with what is here presented, it will be discovered that I was still more fortunate. In that I used the following language, all of which is strictly true. 'The intimation concerning the object for which the house was reared; the allegation that it was of unnecessary size; the insinuation that those who performed their devotions in it only possessed religion in name; that they were corrupt in morality and theoretical and practical Christianity, all, are false. Nor had the Universalists occupied it more than twice when the State Superintendent was addressed, nor "repeatedly," nor but one once after any had remonstrated; nor was it against the wishes of one half, or of but fifteen of about forty of the legal voters of the district; nor did they pay, although they were the most wealthy, near "two-thirds of the expense of its erection." And again, "the statements concerning the exclusion of any and every work specified; the avowed and real design of publishing the 'Voice to Youth,' the infidelity of 'Combe on Man,' its being in the library of district No. 4 in Preston; the Town Superintendent 'taking an active and officious part' in relation to the books named or the occupancy of the school house; are all untrue." And if he wishes not to be considered the responsible author of all these falsehoods, because it would be dishonorable in him, it is equally dishonorable in his friends. Without naming such assumptions as that my articles were called forth by his 'More Snakes in the Grass,' or his scores of errors to sustain his former misstatements, the assertions in his defence that the leaders of the opposition to Universalists were not members of his congregation; concerning the expense, &c., of the school house; the erection of the meeting house in which he labors; 'Abbott's Young Christian,' 'Combe,' and the revised edition of the 'Voice to Youth,' the late Town Superintendent, newly invented as well as old, and many others are unqualifiedly untrue; and still more, if true to the letter, or partially so, are equally deceptive. No wonder that time failed him to write more to point out all my mistakes, and that 'the FEW' thus presented, 'must suffice as a specimen of the rest,' which, with characteristic regard to what he had just recorded, in the same paragraph, he affirms, 'amount to several scores, exclusive of all those which have been suffered to pass unnoticed.' No wonder that he may never turn aside to reply to me again 'through the columns of the Advocate,' and that weeks after I had there stated that his defence, which I then believed was partially prepared, would be reviewed, I am informed that I 'will be expected to attempt no further attacks through the press!' And that, by one who would fain be thought honest and conscientious; and who trembles for poor Universalists in eternity! Well may such men inform the Almighty where they should long ago have been if they had their just deserts! How appear his declarations that he has wiped out the misstatements charged upon the memorial; that I was in error concerning the religious standing of the County Superintendent; his opposition to phrenology, &c.; that he had repeated the mistake of his responsibility as the author of the memorial 'little if any less than fifty times?' 'Surely, I must have a monstrous conscience, of purely india rubber texture, to strain thus horribly at so small a gate,' and to 'review the articles I have published without feeling not only a readiness, but a desire to retract,' and too little 'love and benevolence' 'to embrace the universe.' And under such circumstances, who but the meek and humble 'Country Pastor,' could unblushingly assert, that he or his friends 'stand ready to meet me before the tribunal of an intelligent public, where witnesses can be confronted face to face, and there test the truth or falsity of each of the several charges' I have made against them; or insinuate that 'Universalists have secured a patent for manufacturing errors by the wholesale, regarding 'the least infringement of the right as sacrilege,' or that I became horrified at only 'pretended falsehoods,' while 'engaged in grinding out and palming upon others, those of a far more malignant character, by fifties at a gist.' 'One would suppose he might have found enough' 'to gratify a relish for moral putrefaction,' in the scurrilous book of Rev. E. T. Hatfield, alias Dr. Whitaker, the great renouncer, or the works of that periodically insane or blackhearted renegade, M. H. Smith, 'to fully satiate the most greedy carrion worm that ever crawled without such an effort.' Still, he is free from 'hissing,' 'spite,' 'venom,' 'calumny,' and disposition to 'malign;' and does not, like me, pour out harsh and opprobrious epithets; for though Universalists possess an exclusive right, 'secured by patent or otherwise' to deal 'out anathemas against others,' they appear unlovely in those 'of such liberal views and unbounded benevolence,' and still more odious in him; hence he only calls my misstatements, 'MISTAKES,' not wilful falsehoods nor intentional misrepresentations!" Charitable soul! Seriously, I would inquire whether the article he has furnished for the Advocate, presents a fair specimen of what Partialism really is; and of the measures necessary in the estimation of its advocates to its support and propagation in the world? And if so; I would also inquire of such as may be suspending their unending destiny upon its teachings, whether if it be subject to so many mistakes in relation to things seen and temporal; and which withal might have been so easily guarded against, it may not also have fallen into a far more important mistake, respecting those which are unseen and eternal?"

"I have generally lived in peace with all men; as even many Presbyterians, whom as neighbors and citizens I highly esteem, will certify. The first personal attack I have ever made upon any man, through the press, by more than merely alluding to his misconduct, is upon the 'Country Pastor' and his friends. Whether sinners or not above all others, I have yet to find the place that contains more dishonest, inhuman and reckless bigots than some of his supporters. The outrages I have exposed are but fair specimens of the spirit they have exercised for years; a spirit which would depopulate heaven and involve earth also in the bitterest broils and contentions." And though their blessed doctrine annihilates hell; in this world, and since men must have one somewhere, it follows of course it must be in the future, the withering condemnation of an indignant community may make them feel that it is 'in the earth.'

"I have not written unadvisedly. I know whereof I affirm. I have but performed my duty to God and man. For this I am compared to the toad, endeavoring to spit venom in the faces of my fellow beings. I am unintimidated by threats and unswayed by favors. I am prepared to meet my accusations before any tribunal in heaven or earth, that decides upon any other principle, than 'THE GREATER THE TRUTH, THE GREATER THE LIE!' As long as men persist, I shall expose their rottenness, whatever may be nature of that immortality I secure, or the color of the pillar whereby I perpetuate my 'own glorious achievements.'

"I have nearly done with the 'Country Pastor' and his co-laborers. If this, as he declares of my other communications, makes a sooty column in the Advocate, my only apology is, it is upon a sooty subject. And if I have heaped abusive missiles from the summit of the hayloft upon the peaceful animal below, they are but stern and stubborn facts that may effectually stop his braying!" Influenced by such liberal views, and actuated by such unbounded charity and benevolence, however strongly I am 'inclined to err,' or strict to mark 'the faults of others,' I do not believe Mr. D. is the author, though he is the endorser and writer, of all the falsehoods of the memorial and defence. At least a portion of them may have been in him unintentional errors, ignorantly made. But I can not regard him as entirely undeserving of censure. Let him acknowledge his whole agency in the memorial, &c.; and from impartial men in the district, who have not been active in its difficulties, ascertain the facts thereto pertaining; and if they are as I have represented, faithfully expose and rebuke, and in future withhold his confidence from his informants, who have little or no regard for truth, until he has abundant evidence that they have thoroughly repented and reformed, even though they are his supporters or communicants, and publicly apologize for the misstatements he has made; and the writer, his friends, and community, will freely forgive him, not only those, but all his other offences, flagrant and numerous as they may be. In Preston, where the facts I have adduced are not only well known, but acknowledged by all, except those they directly or indirectly implicate, no one would consent to less. It is only because desperate diseases require strong remedies, that their treatment has been severe.—But while I aim to imitate that God 'who will by no means clear' them from a full retribution, but will 'chasten them for their profit,' I intend to profusely exhibit the spirit of that faith, which 'embraces a universe of guilty creatures.' If he is not destitute of that consciousness of right and wrong which is common to our race, he will not only feel a strong desire, but 'neither give sleep to his eyes, nor slumber to his eyelids,' until he has performed the obvious duty of making a suitable retraction. Let his friends also do 'works meet for repentance,' and they too will be forgiven, and may realize that 'some advantage can be gained even in respect to this present world,' whatever may be true of the future.

SISTER LAURA EGGLESTON.

The following letter from this feeble and afflicted sister, will serve to show the strength and sustaining power of her faith in the Restitution. With it she is happier in poverty and sickness 'than the gayest daughter of affluence' without it.

BR. SKINNER:—I will venture to send a few short articles for the columns of your paper, to which you will please give a place, if worthy.—Some of them were composed during my illness last winter. My health is very poor at present.—A few days since, I accidentally fell, and hurt my side severely, and have not felt as well since. I think it will be some time, perhaps, before I shall feel as well as usual. My lungs are much affected, and have bled some recently. During the summer, I have done considerable work with my needle; and have supported myself comfortably. In the seclusion of my mother's cottage, I have spent the summer pleasantly for an invalid, with my book, paper and needle; always at some employment, as long as feeble strength will allow. I fancy myself happier in all my afflictions, than the gayest daughter of affluence, who is a believer in a limited system of Christianity! Yes; I do rejoice with joy unspeakable, and can exclaim with the royal musician of Israel,—'The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.' Dear Sir, I feel I am trespassing on your time, and ask pardon for this, perchance, tedious epistle.

Yours sincerely, LAURA EGGLESTON.

GROWTH IN GRACE.

No other teaching than that of Universal Divine Love can prompt its recipient to 'grow in grace,' as we are enjoined in the Scriptures, to grow. No partialist inculcation, so utterly at variance with the impartial, just and true spirit of universal grace, can incite to a progress 'unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.' Where in the limitarian creeds of men do we find the remotest resemblance to the undying love and quenchless sympathy of our blessed Lord? Where, but in the Scripture teaching of grace superabounding over and beyond the ravages of sin, can we find the slightest analogy to the pure, and lovely, and gracious Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ? To talk of human creeds and traditions, so contracted, so limited, so utterly out of keeping with the grace and truth which came by Jesus Christ—to conceive even of such anti-evangelical systems of superstition and unbelief, stimulating to progress, is in the last degree preposterous! But receiving God's great truth of universal grace and reconciliation, at the same time conforming our lives to the spirit of that truth, we shall 'grow in grace.' Human deficiencies and infirmities are made up, and supported by the shepherd and bishop of souls. Notwithstanding the frailties and short-comings of imperfect humanity, the faithful, trusting disciple can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth [him]; such an one may, with Paul, 'know both how to be abased—...both to be full and to be hungry—both to abound, and to suffer need.'—While the humble Christian can do all things in the strength of Jesus; (mortifying to the pride of the Pharisaic spirit that would 'work its way' to the realms of immortal blessedness!) without His fulness, His grace and truth, the disciple can do nothing. Let us seek to grow in grace in humble reliance on divine assistance, and in grateful dependence on the teachings of Jesus.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

To the Editor of the Tribune:

Judge Edmonds remarked, while sentencing Charles Thomas to death, that it was the fifth case of murder that had come before him within a few weeks, and few persons can have failed to observe that the crime of murder is rapidly and fearfully increasing. From nearly all parts of the country accounts of horrible murders are pouring in upon us, and the frightful number is only exceeded by the atrocity of their character. It is true, that among the mass of our busy population these things soon fade from their remembrance, but there are those who look on with concern and dismay, anxiously inquiring whether there is any remedy for this state of things. We believe that the greatest check that could be devised, for the increasing number of murders, would be the Abolition of Capital Punishment. We argue this from reason as well as experience. For while every week we see some plainly guilty murderer escaping all punishment, under some specious plea, evidently from the repugnance of jurors to consign a fellow-being, however guilty, to death, it is plain that the Law can have but little effect in deterring men from this crime. This is so evident, and is becoming so generally admitted, that we need not enlarge upon it. Now let us look for a moment at what History and Experience teach.—Without alluding to the striking cases of Tuscany, Belgium and Russia, let us look at home. But few if any murders have been perpetrated in Maine and Vermont since those States practically abolished Capital Punishment; and we believe that not one has occurred in Michigan, where the Death Penalty is absolutely and entirely abolished for Murder. These facts speak in loud tones, and it becomes every good citizen to hear and heed them.

THE BLACK RIVER CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.

BR. SKINNER—The following is the statement respecting the proceedings of the above mentioned Conference, which was sent to Elder Ross for publication in the 'Palladium,' and which he suppressed after having asserted his readiness to make 'honorable restitution' for 'wrongs' he was conscious he had before committed against me.

L. P.

MR. EDITOR—A preamble and resolution purporting to be an expression of the mind of the 'Black River Christian Conference,' at a special session on the 18th inst., (Aug.) at Stone Mills, Jefferson county, N. Y., and 'instructing,' for certain reasons therein mentioned 'the clerk of said Conference to drop my name from its minutes,' will probably soon reach you for publication. I ask, in justice to all concerned, that you publish, in connection with said preamble and resolution, the following statement of facts.

1st. No notice of said session was given as usual through the Palladium, nor, as far as I can learn, in any official, or general manner. Two churches, and one minister, to my certain knowledge, were not notified of the meeting, and some, and it is presumed, many of the members of those churches that were said to be notified, knew nothing of the meeting. How many others were ignorant of the matter, I have not at present the means of knowing. Time will develop.

2d. The meeting was composed of some less than twenty members of the B. R. C. Conference, and of this small number, those who were most forward to procure my excommunication, had been, for some months previous, my most active, and bitter opposers. One of them had called me mean, and indecent, and otherwise used language more becoming a madman than a Christian.

3d. No notice was given me beforehand of what would be brought against me, or, in what shape they intended to proceed against me at the meeting. This was kept profoundly dark.

4th. A caucus was held, or a private meeting just before Conference, and the preamble and resolution, the same as voted upon, adopted, before giving me an opportunity of saying a word in self-defence.

5th. After the resolution had been introduced, in connection with quite a lengthy speech in its support, I inquired if a general notice of the meeting had been given, and contended that, as it then appeared, I was arraigned, and to be cut off, and I ought, in all fairness, to have my trial before all my brethren, or at least, a greater number than were then present. This they could easily have granted, as the annual Conference sits in Sept. next, but it was said that I was 'out of order.' I then asked to have the minutes of the last Conference read, but I was accused of 'interrupting the Conference,' and a motion was made to proceed to act on the resolution, unless I spoke to it immediately. Seeing that they were determined to push the matter along without apparently knowing, or desiring to know, as the minutes of the last Conference would have informed them, what jurisdiction, in reality, they had over me, I concluded to speak to the resolution, and let them proceed as they wished.

6th. I maintained that I had not gone out from the Christians, as the resolution asserted, by believing and advocating what they termed Universalism, if the Christians were on the ground upon which they first started, and still advocated. Opinion is not with them (professionally) a test of church fellowship,—that test is Christian character. How then have I gone out from them unless I have become anti-Christian? What right or privilege have I violated, which their position does not give me? None. As to preaching to Universalist societies, this I did not do till the Christians withdrew, and not only refused to hear me themselves, but actually labored to prevent my holding meetings in their vicinities. Though I would here state that I am quite as well pleased to preach to them, as I ever was to the Christians, but should have preferred to preach to both could it have been acceptable.

7th. The discussion was hurried, the resolution acted upon, and passed, with only one voting in the negative, namely, Elder Somes; and because he did not fall in with their 'previously concocted scheme,' he was called to order, and more than once interrupted in his remarks. He was evidently grieved with their conduct and withdrew from the Conference.

8th. I then asked for a letter certifying that they had nothing against my moral and Christian character. This they refused to give. I then asked them to publish in connection with the resolution a statement certifying that they had nothing against my moral or Christian character, otherwise, than believing and preaching Universalism. This, they would not grant. I then asked them to present their charges, if they had any, against my character, besides believing and preaching Universalism. They would present none. They had none. Elder Ayers then proposed that an amendment to the resolution be published, in which it should be said that my moral and Christian character is not impeached, otherwise than by believing and preaching Universalism. This also was rejected. And this, sir, is what I get for all I have done and suffered for the Christians! Conference then adjourned.—The above are facts and comment is unnecessary.

But the clerk of this Conference has a Herculean task to perform. He is 'instructed to drop my name from minutes,' where it is not and never was. Had they consented to the reading of the minutes of the last Conference, they would have seen that, instead of me, the resolution itself, was entirely out of order. The following resolution taken from those minutes, will explain to them their mistake.

Resolved, That this Conference be composed of churches and preachers, and that all ministers who may wish to become members of this Conference, must, in order to become such, unite with some local church, that is a member of Conference, and a membership in such a local church, shall constitute them members of Conference, and the only mode of their reception to Conference.

P. S. In justice to several Christian brethren who witnessed the above inquisitorial proceedings, I will state that they were honorable exceptions, and Elder Somes in particular. And I very much mistake, if the Christians generally sanction these transactions.

Natural Bridge, Aug. 1846.

LYMAN PERRY.

I have said comment is unnecessary; but as Elder Ross has been so generous as to publish the mighty, terrific preamble and resolution of this great, wise, and august assemblage of Christian divines, and Christian sages, but excluded the above 'facts,' I will now add a few thoughts and facts to the foregoing, and then leave this sapient body to its own merited obscurity and insignificance.

Seriously, what a ridiculous light this Conference has placed itself in, by these unfair, underhanded, and illiberal proceedings! It professes to be a Christian body, to have no creed but the Bible, and no test of Christian fellowship but Christian character. It claims no affinity with sectarianism, and complains of the sects for rejecting them, on account of their principles. But do they not know that wherein they thus judge others, 'they condemn themselves? for they do the same things.' Where is the difference in principle, in disfellowshipping a Christian for not believing in the doctrine of the Trinity, or, for not believing in endless misery? For believing Christ is the Son of the Father instead of the Father himself, or believing in the restitution of all things, 'which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets, since the world began?' Is the principle not the same in both instances? Is opinion not the test in both cases? It is. What unblushing impudence, therefore, it must be in this Conference to ever look the sects again in their faces, and assert that opinion is not with them a test of Christian fellowship,—that they have no creed but the Bible,—and that they are no sectarians! Could not the sects retort with propriety, and say, 'Thou hypocrite! first cast the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to pull the mote out of thy brother's eye?' 'Thou that sayest that a man should not steal, dost thou steal? Thou that abhorrest the idol of sectarianism, art thou not sectarian?'

But it was contended at this Conference, that it was morally impossible for the Christians to co-operate with a preacher of 'the restitution.' What a sublime sham, then, is the union they advocate—a union of all Christians in one organization! If they can not co-operate with one of their old preachers, who has become a preacher of the restitution, and whom they acknowledge still to be a Christian, then their profession of union and liberality is all a farce—a creature of utopia, a wild vagary of the brain. There is not a particle of truth or consistency in the position. Hence, by this excuse for their proscription, they annihilate their own position as a people.

But how do the believers of endless misery and annihilation in that body, 'co-operate,' if unanimity of sentiment on that point, is necessary? 'O the destructionists keep still,—do not preach their doctrine, and tolerate the endless miseryites!' Why not, then, tolerate a believer and preacher of the final restitution? 'O, he would not keep his sentiments to himself, but would preach them, and it was intolerable!' And so endless miseryites and destructionists, about twenty of them, got together, and excluded him. Yes, sir, both these were in that Conference of which I am speaking, and operated against me, Pilot and Herod-like.

And more than this, Elder G. S. Warren, who drafted the preamble and resolution, and spoke to it chiefly, told me some time previous, that if I would not preach my sentiments in reference to the final destiny of the wicked, I could still remain among the Christians. So, what is a sufficient crime for my exclusion when proclaimed, is no crime at all, in his estimation, when kept secret. The same has frequently been told me by others of that order, since the change in my views. 'Preach the Bible,' say they, 'and say nothing about endless misery, or destruction, or restitution.' This is impossible, if a minister means to be honest, and intelligible to his hearers. Can he be honest and conceal his real sentiments, or evade and prevaricate when interrogated concerning them? Or can he preach intelligibly to his congregation by simply quoting a mass of Scriptures, without pretending to define the meaning of those Scriptures, or that they mean to inculcate any theory whatever? Why cite them, if he means to enforce and impress no truth by their citation? To preach intelligibly, and with any force, he must tell what he means, and then back it up by the word of God. But, had I consented to hide my light under a bushel, to keep my real sentiments in the dark, and to take this unintelligible, non-committal, and prevaricating course before the public, why, I could still have remained in good standing among the Christians. But who would pay such a price for union with any body of professed Christians? Certainly not I.

And because I would not do it, the Christians withdrew from my meetings,—refused to hear me preach,—'prayed' me not to come near their 'coasts,' and to 'depart out' after I had come—refused to give out an appointment for me at Hounsfield—afterwards gave out one, but remonstrated at the same time with their hearers against going to hear me, appointed, at Leray, another meeting but a short distance from mine, and at the same hour of the day; and, not satisfied with this, 'clapped an appointment in top of mine and shut me out altogether—they have flattered, threatened, cried, scolded, slandered, and some of them abused, with the most shameful and unchristian language. And all for what? Why for an honest opinion, when opinion with them, at the same time, is not religion, as they say.

More than this, some of them have imputed my change to mercenary motives. But a guilty conscience needs no accuser. The Christians know that they half starve their preachers, and it is not at all to be wondered at, that they should conclude, when one leaves them, that he leaves for that reason. In no denomination that I am acquainted with, are preachers so wofully pinched and embarrassed with poverty, as among the Christians.

Now, after having taken such a course as above described, a special Conference is called a few days before the annual Conference, in order to prevent the brethren generally having any thing to do with it, and a preamble and resolution adopted, and since published to the world, in which it is represented that I am to blame, for 'identifying myself with Universalists by preaching to Universalist societies.' Was there ever anything more unjust and deceptive than this? They first drive me out from them by proscription and abuse, and then assign this egress as a reason to the world, for expelling me from their body. It was a crime in their view, sufficient for excommunication, for me to preach to Universalist societies, after they had driven me from them by their hard speeches, and illiberal and proscriptive proceedings!

But to cap the climax of beauty and consistency in this special Conference operation, they not only violated the fundamental principles of their faith, and gave the lie to their profession by acting the part of zealous bigoted partisans, instead of cool, deliberating Christians, but they assumed to do what the principles of their Conference organization, gave them not even the shadow of right to do. As that Conference was organised last year, it had no jurisdiction over me whatever. If I belonged to a local church that was a member of the Conference, I was amenable to that church for my conduct, and Conference could do nothing with the matter, except to approve or disapprove the decisions of the church. As the church had taken no action on the subject, the Conference had no business with it, as I stood not responsible to the Conference, but to the church. If the church was not a member of Conference, why then, I had no connection with Conference, since no minister could be a member of Conference except by belonging to some local church of the Conference. So it has expelled whom it had no power to expel. Another farce of this sapient body! The truth is, they were so ignorant of the principles of their own organization, and their consequent rights and powers, and so blinded by superstition and prejudice, that 'the more part knew not wherefore they were come together.' May the Lord forgive them their ignorance and blunders.

In my next, I shall give some reasons for rejecting the doctrine of endless misery.

INDIVIDUAL MERIT.

The inhabitants of Judea, at the time of our Saviour's appearance upon the earth, were in constant expectation of his coming. Their prophet's centuries past, had spoken of his advent in the power of the God of Israel.—They had lifted that veil, ever hanging between the present and the future; looked with the eye of inspiration upon the purposes, and plans, and counsels of the great Supreme, and then to the anxious mind of the Jew, proclaimed the truth of God; that one should come clothed with the power and the wisdom of Heaven, and redeem the world from that oppression which had long rested in heaviness upon it. But in the contemplation of those prophecies, owing to the peculiar manner in which the Israelitish people had cultivated their powers, the opinions formed of the manner of the Saviour's advent, were erroneous in the very extreme. 'On fancy's ardent pinion's borne,' their minds might have been wafted afar, and reveled in the regions of the ideal and imaginative.—They might have looked forward to that period as one of some grand display of infinite power and glory; a period when the powers of heaven and earth united, with a voice echoing afar, should proclaim the glorious deliverance of the people of God, and thrown around them the charms of a peace forever unbroken. They might have looked for him to come as one, who, though clothed with authority from above, should yet be attended by the pomp and splendor of earth; that a retinue of the chief men of the nation should follow on in his train, while he stepped upon the throne of David, within the city of the living God, and swayed a sceptre over the land of Judea. Be this as it may; whether we can or can not say, at this age of the world, what were the exact opinions of the Jewish people respecting the coming of the Saviour, yet one fact is too plain to admit of a doubt, and that is, that when the Saviour did make his appearance, it was in such a different manner from what they had apprehended that they knew him not nor acknowledged him as the expected Messiah.

It is true, that upon the eve of his birth there were demonstrations of the workings of a power higher than that of earth. A star dawned in the eastern heavens, but its rays fell only upon the vision of the humble. A song of praise, peace, and salvation, was sung by the heavenly choir, but the music thereof was heard only by the humble shepherds. And when Jesus went forth to his public ministry as a man 'approved of God,' one endowed with divine wisdom far beyond any prophet that had ever appeared; one clothed with power from on high sufficient to accomplish the grand and beneficent object of his mission, then his attendants, instead of from the halls of wealth and grandeur, were a few unlettered publicans from the receipt of custom, and some rude fishermen from the waters of Galilee. But the arm of Heaven was nerved in the cause of truth and salvation. That arm stayed up the powers of the Saviour, and his works were of such a nature as to strike the mind of the beholder with wonder and astonishment; to carry conviction to the candid mind, that he who was endowed with such extraordinary power, was what he professed to be, the Son of God, and the Saviour of mankind. But alas! no 'prophet is without honor save in his own country and among his own people;' so he spake, and how true relative to himself. Though there was seen the might of power supreme; though there displayed the wisdom of heaven; and though there benevolence appeared in all of its purity and glory—though there the hand which touched the palsied nerve and gave it the vigor of youth; there the finger which brushed aside the curtain of darkness and poured the beams of light upon the benighted vision of the blind; there the voice to summon back the dead from the silent and solitary sepulchre—notwithstanding all this, yet there stood the Jew with his mind enslaved by blind bigotry, and inquired if Jesus was not the carpenter's son? alluding to the occupation of Joseph; and for this reason, so frivolous in its nature, turned away from the cause of truth, and declared to the world that the Saviour was an impostor! It seems to us almost impossible that the human mind could stoop to such ignoble acts; so be led and biased by feelings so far below those which should ever govern the children of men; so form a judgment because of secular life, and turn away from one who was to reconcile a world to God, and redeem a creation from the powers and darkness of sin, death, and the grave. But so it was, and that nation, governed by such unworthy principles, met its fate by being rent and torn by internal dissensions; swept away by the desolating ravages of war; and those of the remnant which escaped the ordeal of that dreadful judgment, scattered among all nations, wanderers in a strange land far from their remembered home, suffering all the miseries of a heart-grieving banishment. While such is the sad fate which has overtaken the people of Israel, the being whom they despised for his humility, from whom they turned away because he was not of the proud and chief of the nation, receives the willing homage of millions, and the cross on which he met his death, is no longer an emblem of shame and reproach but a mark of honor and esteem.

Passing from a consideration of the principles upon which the Jewish people acted, and the manner in which they treated the Saviour, we remark—

1. That individual merit should be the only criterion by which we should pass judgment upon our fellow beings, or by which we should determine the amount of respect and esteem shown them.

It is a truth, however, much to be regretted, that the judgment passed upon individuals by others around them, is often upon considerations aside from true merit. Too many are governed in the opinion which they form of another, by looking mainly upon the members of his family and their relatives, almost if not quite regardless of the real merit of the individual himself. If the members of that family have heretofore occupied high stations, and are at present occupying them; if they have been called to seats of honor and trust by their fellow citizens; have maintained what is supposed to be high characters, it is amply sufficient; sufficient to induce many to extend to those of the same family who may come upon the stage at an after period, respect and attention to which they are not in justice entitled. But those who thus judge are far from forming a judgment in agreement with the principles of truth. They are influenced by opinions which should have no possible weight in the formation of an opinion. They do not look to the proper evidence for the foundation whereon to rest their decision; and were they to view the history of men of other days, and even of the present age, then they would behold the impropriety of giving praise or condemnation in agreement with stations occupied by relatives.

How often do we behold a young man coming forward as an active member of society; in possession of a mind noble and generous in the extreme; his intellectual powers far above mediocrity; his moral faculties of an active nature and upon whose character the hand of iniquity has never thrown a solitary shade. He goes forward to the discharge of the active duties of life. He secures the respect and esteem of the honest and upright. They readily welcome him to their society and extend to him that cordiality of feeling which should ever mark the conduct of man to man. And yet we look around for those who are connected to him by relative ties, and perhaps we find them vicious and dissolute, unworthy of confidence or respect, and even his father perhaps a worthless vagabond, a victim to the habit of degrading dissipation. Now those who form a judgment of men, not by their own individual merit only, would form a very low estimate of the worth of such a young man. They would thrust him aside as one unworthy of attention. They would but seldom if ever admit him to their society, and all because the family from which he descended did not occupy a higher station, or perhaps its members were not as virtuous as they might and should have been. And though such people may, at some period, extend to such a young man, attention somewhat marked, yet it is not because of any qualities of a meritorious nature in him, but because some influential men who act upon principles different from their own, and whose good opinions they wish to secure, greet him with the hand of fellowship, and then they too, will give him his due for the time being.

Again: We look around upon the world, and behold a man moving in high life, occupying an important station in the government of the nation; a man whose opinions and judgments command the respect of thousands, and whose course in life is such as to secure the remembrance of posterity for years to come. Yet his offspring are far from being truly meritorious. He may have sons of dispositions marked by the greatest viciousness, wild and dissolute, they go down to premature graves, degraded and dissipated men. Hence, we may observe at once the impropriety of having any consideration by which to form an opinion of worth and respectability, aside from that of the real merit of the individual himself. But alas! how many there are who do judge upon different principles. How many whose decision is determined by considerations other than that of individual merit, and what sorrowful consequences such a proceeding anon brings in its train. High stations occupied by the members of his family, and a father who has wealth at his command, are considerations for hundreds. They form a kind of passport, by which a young man may be admitted to their society, and by which he may rely upon their support, regard and esteem. But the young man of humble family, whose father has not the influence of wealth to throw its charms around his name, though in possession of a character above the whisper of reproach, is passed by with cold neglect and unfeeling scorn; the other, worthless vagabond though he may be, is greeted with smiles and welcomed by the hand of fellowship.—Not by the honest and upright, however; not by those who possess true nobility of character; not by those whose minds are governed by exalted principles—no; by such men no such judgment is formed. They look for individual merit, and wherever they find it, be it with the high or the humble, the rich or the poor, it secures their respect and admiration. But there are others, and their name may well be said to be 'Legion,' who are not governed by such noble principles. They never acknowledge individual merit unless found with the high or the wealthy; and vice seldom receives condemnation at their hands, unless beheld in the humble and the poor. But the opinion of such people is unworthy of respect. They are influenced by motives base in the extreme. They are governed by principles far from being virtuous. And had they lived at the period when the Saviour was upon the earth, like the Jews they would have inquired—'Is not this the carpenter's son?' and turned a deaf ear to his instruction! But while such a course should be shunned as one far from the virtues of integrity; while it should be looked upon as beneath the character of man, and unworthy of a Christian; every well-wisher of humanity should hope and pray, that the time may not be afar, when individual merit alone shall enable one to rise in society, and individual demerit alone to be the cause of one's fall. Then a change shall be witnessed in the tone of society. Then the morals of community shall rise to a higher stand; and then, where vice now throws the blighting influence of her sad desolation, virtue shall build her beautiful bower and strike the golden harp of peace.

2. Individual merit is the only safe reliance for a life such as should be lived by man.

A young man may have lately reached that period in life, at which one goes forth to act for himself. He may have gone out to mingle with the busy throng, and to follow some pursuit of life, but perhaps there are thoughts and sentiments within his mind of a nature calculated to prevent the accomplishment of his plans and purposes.—How often is one beheld going forth and depending almost wholly upon the influence of his relatives; his connexions may be those regarded by the world as people of rank and honor, and he may say to himself perhaps, 'This is sufficient to gain me admittance to the highest circles of society, and to secure the accomplishment of all my purposes.' Thus saying, he takes no great thought for himself; makes no serious effort to cultivate, and school, and strengthen his powers of mind, and hence ruin meets him in the end. Looking back to stations occupied by relatives; stations which carry with them weight and honor, and stations to which but few are called; looking upon the extensive possessions of a father and witnessing the attention paid him on this account, and not realizing that it is fawning sycophancy alone, he dreams that these shall make his course one securing the respect and esteem of all. But oh! hapless youth. Such a thought is indeed but a dream; a wild vagary of a fanciful imagination, and one which ever in the end brings down upon the head of the dreamer, its sorrow and woe, and clothes his latter days in a reality that brings forth an acknowledgement that individual merit, and not the influence or wealth of friends is the only safe dependence upon which to rely for the commendable discharge of the duties and obligations which the living God has placed upon man.

Young man—never place your reliance upon the influence of friends although they may be moving in exalted circles, for this is far from being a safe dependence even if they remain, and a breath from 'the destroying angel' may carry them away. Never rely upon the wealth of a father for it is but a frail support at best, and then 'riches may take to themselves wings and flee away' and leave you at the mercy of a rude and gain-saying world! Individual worth is your only safe reliance. A character graced with the beauties of virtue and intelligence will alone sustain you, as one should, and will wish sooner or later, to be sustained. True, you may succeed in a pecuniary point of view, with a mind enveloped in the thick darkness of ignorance; and a heart the seat of dishonesty; but in all other points of view, your life will be a season of vexation; a time of trouble and sorrow, for the approbation of neither God or man shall speak peace to your mind in the hour of reflection. How necessary then, that you let wisdom be your guide; that you labor to store your mind with the treasures of knowledge, and preserve your character from the evil consequences of vice and iniquity. Here is your treasure, your main dependence—a well informed mind, and a pure and spotless character. With this valuable possession your days shall be days of happiness and pleasure; without it, your life will be a life of sorrow and misery.

And what though your parents may have been compelled to contend with the evils of poverty; and what though there are those around you who judge from rank and riches only? Yet these things should have no weight upon your mind. People who thus judge are beneath notice. Their course is contemptible, and had they lived at the age when the Saviour appeared, and witnessed those miracles wrought by Almighty power, they would have asked: 'Is not this the carpenter's son?' and turned away from him and the cause of everlasting truth! Such men, we repeat are beneath the notice of men of integrity and virtue. They have no exalted powers of mind. They are fair specimens of human folly, and will go down to their graves unhonored and soon be forgotten.

And what though you may be the son of a mechanic or farmer, yet is this a reason why you can not rise in the world? Look upon the biographical history of your own land and observe what noble examples are placed before you. See what has been accomplished by individual merit. How many have arisen by the proper exertion of their own powers, and by this alone. You may observe the son of a tallow chandler, unaided by the influence of wealth or rank, applying his mind to the study of nature's laws, until he even reaches forth his hand, grasps the thunder's bolt, and bends it in obedience to his will, and while the world is lost in amazement because of the wondrous feat, the charm of immortality is thrown around the name of Franklin! Behold a Sherman, a Godfrey, a Henry, and numerous others; and then nerve your powers to the work; think, reflect, examine, labor; and honor and place will reward you, sooner or later.

EXPLANATION—OF DIFFICULT TEXTS—HELL FIRE, &c.

Rev. Mr. SKINNER—Sir, The Magazine and Advocate frequently falls into the hands of Partialist brethren, and it appears to lack one thing to please them, viz. endless punishment.

I have been urged to ask of you a few explanations concerning some texts which they think are stumbling blocks in the way of universal salvation. The following were handed to me by a lady who, occasionally, of late, reads the Magazine and Advocate. She says that in reading these and the like passages she can not but believe that they teach endless misery to a portion of the human race, and humbly requests you to give her your opinion. Matthew v. 29; x. 28; xii. 41, 42; xviii. 8; xxiii. 15, 33; xxv. 41, 46; Mark ix. 45, 46; 1 Peter ii. 8; Rev. xiv. 11; xx. 14, 15. W. C. WETMORE. Burkettsville, Md., Sept. 21st, 1846.

It is presumed that the principal objections against Universalism, supposed by the above named lady to be found in the passages of Scripture referred to by our correspondent, are found in the frequent occurrence of the words hell, hell fire, unquenchable fire, everlasting punishment, torment, forever and ever, &c. And it is but natural she should suppose them objections difficult to remove, if she has been educated in the popular theology of the age, and has never critically examined the passages, comparing them with each other and with parallel passages, and especially if she has never read the writings of Universalists and many eminent Orthodox commentators on the passages, who have clearly shown that most of the texts referred to furnish no proof of the doctrine of endless misery. Had she ever read Balfour's 1st and 2d

Inquiries, Paige's Selections, Whittemore's Notes on the Parables, Universalist's Book of Reference, Ely and Thomas' Discussion, Campbell and Skinner's Discussion, Winchester's Dialogues, and many other works which we could name, and which are generally for sale at all Universalist Bookstores; or had she read either of those works, she would probably have found out more respecting the true meaning of the passages than she has by all the orthodox preaching or writings she has ever had access to.

But our correspondent and the inquiring lady of whom he speaks should remember that it is much easier asking questions than it is answering them—that in one or two lines a dozen or more texts can be referred to, that would require pages, or even volumes, fully to explain, with all their bearings and principles involved. And furthermore, that the passages referred to have nearly or quite all been commented on and explained heretofore in our columns; and that if we were to publish one half the comments that Universalists have given thereon it would occupy our entire columns for months. We will therefore only offer some general remarks, and give a few explanations, which, if duly regarded, will serve as a key by which to explain the whole and all other similar passages.

The word hell occurs in our common English version of the Bible—Old and New Testaments—fifty five times. There are four original words in the Hebrew of the Old and the Greek of the New Testament, which are rendered hell, viz. Sheol in the Hebrew, and Hades, Tartarus, and Gehenna, in the Greek. Sheol is found sixty four times in the Old Testament, and is rendered hell in thirty two instances, and pit and grave in the other thirty two. Hades in Greek corresponds with, and is the translation of, Sheol in Hebrew; and occurs eleven times in the New Testament, being rendered hell, ten times, and grave, once. Tartarus occurs but once; (2 Peter ii. 4,) or rather not at all, but a denominative verb, embracing the idea of Tartarus; and is rendered 'cast down to hell.' Gehenna occurs twelve times, and is uniformly rendered hell. The words hades, however, (Heb. sheol) and gehenna, are of very different significations. They no more mean one and the same thing than do the words grave and furnace.

Sheol, in Hebrew, Hades in Greek, signifies literally the grave, or more properly the hidden, unseen state of the dead indiscriminately, whether good, bad or indifferent—for, as Solomon says, 'all go to one place.' In this sense Jacob used it when he said he would go down to hell to his son mourning; and in this sense Job and Jeremiah used it when they prayed that they might go down to hell, or that God would hide them in hell. In this sense it is used too, when it is said, 'O hell, where is thy victory?' and 'O, hell, I will be thy destruction.' In a secondary, or figurative sense, the word was used to signify doubt, darkness, sorrow, affliction, guilt, remorse, or temporal destruction: as when David said, 'The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God'—'Great is thy mercy, O Lord; for thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell.'—'The pains of hell gat hold upon me; I found trouble and sorrow.' Or when Jonah said, 'Out of the belly of hell cried I, and thou hearest my voice.' Or when Christ said, 'And thou, Capernaum which art exalted to heaven, shall be brought down to hell.' In all these passages the word sheol, or hades, occurs.

But Gehenna, used in the Greek, but of Hebrew origin, is of very different signification from sheol or hades. Its literal meaning is entirely different in every instance, and its figurative meaning is generally different, excepting in a few instances where both words are used in their figurative sense, to designate severe judgments, or great calamities, and hence nearly synonymous. Literally hades signified a state—the state of the dead;—and gehenna, a place—the valley of Hinnom. Gehenna, as a place was as well known to the inhabitants of Jerusalem as are the places, the Battery, the Tombs, and the Navy Yard, to the inhabitants of New York city.

Professor Stuart of Andover, one of the most eminent of the, so called, Orthodox divines of New England, says:

The word Gehenna is derived, as all agree, from the Hebrew words Gee Hianom. The valley of Hinnom (Gee Hinnom) is a part (the eastern section) of the pleasant Wadi or Valley, which bounds Jerusalem on the south, (Josh. xv: 8. xviii: 6.) Here in ancient times, and under some of the idolatrous kings, the worship of Moloch, the horrid idol god of the Ammonites, was practised. To this idol children were offered in sacrifice, (2 Kings xxiii: 10; Ezek. xxiii: 37, 39; 2 Chron. xxviii: 3; Levit. xviii: 21; xx: 2.) If we may credit the Rabbins, the head of the idol was like that of an ox; while the rest of the body resembled that of a man. It was hollow within; and being heated by fire, children were laid in its arms, and were there literally roasted alive.—We can not wonder then at the severe terms in which the worship of Moloch is every where denounced in the Scriptures. Nor can we wonder that the place itself should have been called Tophet, that is, abomination, detestation, (from Toph, to vomit with loathing.) Jer. xxxi: 32; xix: 6; 2 Kings xxiii: 10; Ezek. xxiii: 37, 39. After these sacrifices had ceased, the place was desecrated, and made one of loathing and horror. The pious king Josiah caused it to be polluted, (2 Kings xxiii: 10;) that is, he caused to be carried there the filth of the city of Jerusalem. It would seem that the custom of desecrating this place, thus happily begun, was continued in after ages down to the period when our Saviour was on earth. Perpetual fires were kept up, in order to consume the offal which was deposited there. And as the same offal would breed worms, (for so all putrifying meat of course does,) hence came the expression, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.

Ever after its desecration, Gehenna, or the Valley of Hinnom, was a place of loathing and horror to the Jews, and in process of time was made a place of execution for the worst of criminals, who were burned alive in its fires. Hence the expressions that occur Matt. v: 22, 29, 30. xviii: 8, 9. Mark ix: 43-48, and other similar passages, that speak of hell fire. In a number of places where our Saviour used the term Gehenna, he evidently used it in a figurative sense, to foreshadow and represent the awful judgments, the sore calamities, and the terrible woes that the Jews were to suffer when their city and temple were destroyed; when there was to be such a time of tribulation as never had been since there was a nation, and never should be again.

This must suffice for our correspondent for the present. We will endeavor hereafter to present some further comments, either of our own or Br. Paige's upon some of the passages he refers to. D. S.

THE ROSE OF SHARON FOR 1847.

This beautiful, chaste, and valuable annual is again before the public: Br. A. Tompkins, publisher, and Miss S. C. Edgerton, (now Mrs. A. D. Mayo,) Editress, as from the beginning of the work. We recognize in the present number several new and valuable contributors; among them are the names of T. Starr King, J. M. Edgerton, P. H. Sears, D. H. Barlow, and Mrs. F. M. Cheesebro'. But several old and familiar names are missing. Thus it ever was, and is, in all progressive undertakings—one generation passeth away, and another generation cometh.

Besides the above named contributors, we perceive the names of T. B. Thayer, Horace Greeley, Henry Bacon, A. D. Mayo, Mrs. L. J. B. Case, Mrs. N. T. Monroe, Mrs. C. A. Jerauld, (now deceased,) Mrs. C. M. Sawyer, Mrs. M. A. Livermore, Miss Eliza A. Starr, Miss H. J. Woodman, Miss M. A. H. Dodd, Miss Julia A. Fletcher, Miss L. M. Barker, Miss S. C. Edgerton, and several 'Anonymous.' The 'Aurora Borealis,' is really one of the cleverest little poems we have ever read. 'Hope for Humanity' is an interesting and valuable paper, illustrative of the maxim 'Hope on, hope ever.' 'Regeneration and Faith' is one of the finest specimens of composition in the literary and religious world. It abounds with original and beautiful thoughts; and yet there are a few sentences in it which we should wish altered a little to suit our taste; albeit, we can not say as we rightly understand the author's meaning. 'The Empty Cradle,' though brief, is touching—both the poetry and the plate. 'Under the Mystick' has the benefit of two good authors, and is worthy of both. The poetry of 'The Lord de Beaumontaire' and 'Udollo,' is equal to any, even the finest, specimens from the ready pen of the Editress.

The mechanical execution of the present number is, we think superior to any of its predecessors. The plates are mellow and good, though we think we have seen better. On the whole, the present is a beautiful and interesting number, highly creditable both to publisher and Editress, as well as to its correspondents; and, for that matter, to our denomination also. And we can not but hope it will receive a generous patronage, and encourage the enterprising publisher to make it still more valuable in coming years. We doubt not that many a newly married husband, fond lover, generous brother, indulgent father and tender friend, will avail themselves of this chaste publication, to make a Thanksgiving, Christmas, or New Year's present to the objects of their regard. The work is for sale at this office. D. S.

BR. HYATT.

We have received another article from Br. L. Hyatt on 'Morality and Religion,' in which he calls our editorial remarks on his last published article, (see No. 42,) 'scurrilous,' insists that we are greatly in the fog—that we know not what an Atheist is—that we are ignorant of the nature and merits of the subject on which we write—reiterates his assertion that what we called an Atheist (i. e. one who believes in no God) is a Christian, nevertheless, &c., &c. He has full liberty to withdraw both his article and his charges, and seek another and better market for them. We have heard of alchemists in former ages whose wrapt visions and infallible crucibles enabled them to extract the purest gold out of baser metals, and by certain mysterious combinations to procure the life-elixir which, when drank, would ensure them immortality upon earth. But we supposed those days had long since past away, no more to return. But we find ourselves mistaken; for 'certain philosophers' (that would be 'so called') not 'of the Epicureans and the Stoics,' have 'encountered' us, whose alchemical crucibles are so powerful that they can transform Deists, Atheists, et id omne genus, into the best of Christians, notwithstanding they may deny both God and Christ and every thing else that is sacred! Ed.

Another Conversion in the Ministry.—A Methodist minister at Columbus, Ill., by the name of A. H. Cooper, has lately avowed his belief in the doctrine of universal holiness and happiness. And straightway he preaches the faith which he once sought to destroy.

Union.—The Unitarians and Universalists of Nashua, N. H., lately united in a Sunday school celebration. 'Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.'

A new Unitarian paper entitled the 'Christian Inquirer' is about to be started in the city of New York. Success to all efforts to spread light and liberality.

Governor Silas Wright has appointed THURSDAY the 26th inst., as a day of public thanksgiving throughout this State. This we believe makes some eight or ten States in which similar appointments have been made on the same day.

Harpers Publications.

The Harpers have just issued a beautiful 12mo. volume of 292 pages, entitled 'MYRTIS,' with other etchings, by Mrs. L. H. Sigourney. Its contents are as follows. Myrtis, Bertha, Lady Arabella Johnson, Mary Rice, Fall of the Pequod, The Yankee, A legend of Pennsylvania, The Lady of Mount Vernon, A tale of Poland, The Alms-house, The Plough and the Sword, The Reverse and the Lost Children. Such a collection, with the name of the well known author can not but ensure an extensive sale of the book.

Nos. 9 and 10 of the PICTORIAL ENGLAND, are issued and comprise the history of that country, civil and military, during the reigns of King Henry III, Edward I, II, and

III, and Richard II, a period of 183 years. A portrait of each of those Kings, and an engraving of their great seals are given, besides engravings illustrating many remarkable events. 25 cents per number.

Nos. 117-118 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE contains the remainder of Part II of King Henry Sixth, and begins, Part II of the same tragedy. 25 cents. The above works for sale at Beesley's.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The EDITOR will preach at Clayville, next Sunday, and at Frankfort the Sunday after.

Br. Hathaway will preach at Tallcottville, on Sunday Nov. 15th, at Constableville in the evening, and at Collinsville the Monday evening following.

Br. T. J. Whitcomb, will preach in Middleville, the 4th Sabbath in November, and every 4th Sabbath in each month, the ensuing year.

DEATHS.

In Middleville, on the 23d ult., Mrs. LAVINA FORD, consort of Mr. Addis D. Ford, aged 24 years. In the death of Mrs. Ford, her husband, two young children, and a large circle of relatives and friends, are deprived of the counsel, and society of a most estimable woman. She lived and loved Universalism. A discourse was delivered by the writer, to a very numerous congregation of sympathising friends in the Union church, at Middleville, on the 25th ult. T. J. W.

In Ephratah, on the 27th ult., Mr. JOHN KNIFFIN, aged 67 years. In the death of Br. Kniffin, his widow and children mourn the loss of an affectionate husband and father, and society of an unfortunate, but honest friend. His remains were taken to Middleville for interment, where a large and respectable audience of sympathising friends, testified their respect for the character of the deceased, by mingling their sympathies over his grave. The consolations of the Gospel were administered to the bereaved family and friends, by a discourse from the writer, in the Union church at Middleville, on the 29th ult. T. J. W.

In Springfield, Vt., on the 15th ult., Mrs. MARTHA B. D. BAILEY, wife of the Rev. G. W. Bailey, pastor of the Universalist society in that place. She was 32 years of age.—Thus early has this excellent woman been called away from life; and thus soon has a severely afflicted husband, together with a numerous circle of relatives, been left to mourn the decease of one who was dear to all of them.—Her moral worth had endeared her to a great number of friends in the place where she had lived the last few years of her life. A large congregation of people were present at her funeral, with sympathising hearts and tearful eyes to show their respect to the deceased and to console with the bereaved husband and relatives.—[Fountain.

In Varysburg, Sept. 12, RUSSEL STONE, Esq., in the 72d year of his age. The deceased was one of the first settlers in the town in which he resided. He had seen the wilderness give way before the axe of the white man—and in place thereof had beheld the fertile field. He was for several years Justice of the Peace of the town. He had raised a large family, and seen most of them well settled in life—although he made no profession of religion—yet he possessed a noble heart. Though possessed of some eccentricities, he was a good man,—and his loss will be deeply felt by many in his neighborhood. The funeral was attended on Sunday, the 13th, at the Methodist church in that place, and a discourse delivered to a very large concourse of people, from John xix: 30. 'It is finished.' G. S. A.

In Bennington, Sept. 7th, Mr. J. M. RICE, in the 24th year of his age. During a protracted illness he manifested much patience and resignation. He was an unwavering believer in the doctrine of the Restitution. He delighted to converse upon the subject of religion—and seemed anxious that he might depart and be with Christ. He made all the arrangements for his funeral—chose his preacher—selected the text (2 Cor. v:) and hymns for the occasion, and when the time arrived for him to depart, he went—

'—not like the quary slave at night

Scourged to his dungeon: But sustained and soothed By an unfaltering trust approached the grave Like one who wrapt the drapery of his couch Around him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.'

The funeral was attended on the 8th, and by his request, the writer delivered a discourse to the afflicted mourners.—[Evangelist. G. S. A.

FAREWELL TO SUMMER.

Farewell, refulgent Summer!

Thy balmy dews and showers,
Thy purple dawns and twilights,
And silvery moonlight hours!Thy sweetest birds that warble
In sylvan shade and dell,
Their gay and mellow music
Are going now, farewell!The jasmine wreaths, and roses
Are fading in their sheen;
The bright clematis bowers
Are losing fast their green.
The gentle tribes of Flora,
In ruin fall around;
The woodlands leafy mantles
Will soon o'er spread the ground.The soft sad gales are sighing
A spirit melody,
O'er Summer's withered honors
In parterre, grove and lea.
The skies are still inviting,
A ramble in the bowers;
The diamond rills still sparkle
That erst were deck'd with flowers.Then farewell, brilliant Summer,
How transient is thy stay!
Soft gales and sunny flowers
Pass with thee hence, away.
I, too, would leave this region
Where thy best beauties fade,
And soar to that fair kingdom,
Which knows no chilling shade.

TWENTY FIFTH PSALM.

To thee, O Lord, I lift my soul,
And place my only trust in thee;
May I not be ashamed; let not
Mine enemies triumph over me.Show me thy righteous ways, O Lord,
And in thy paths teach me to walk;
O, lead and guide me in thy truth,
Thy loving kindness ne'er forget.Remember not my youthful sins,
Nor all the evils I have done;
Forget them, for thy goodness sake,
In mercy spare a sinful one.Thou art a God upright and good,
And teachest sinners in the way;
The meek in judgment wilt thou guide,
And teach them in thy name to pray.To thee mine eyes are ever turned,
For thou shalt pluck me from the net;
Turn thou, and mercy have on me,
For I am lone and desolate.The troubles of my heart are large,
O, bring me out of my distress;
On mine afflictions wilt thou look,
My sins forgive, my spirit bless.Mine enemies do thou forgive,
Though cruel hate they bear to me;
O keep my soul, thou faithful friend,
For I have placed my trust in thee.

HORRORS OF THE PRISON HOUSE.

Dr. Joseph T. Pitney, of Auburn, who was for some time medical officer of the State Prison, gives the following description of the barbarities there, under the present system of prison discipline: 'What more revolting and heart-rending exhibitions could be made, than those (which have so often rung through the ears of the citizens of this village) of a man's having been stripped entirely naked, and made to clasp his arms around a post, or to have them stretched upwards, and his wrists tied fast to the sides of a ladder or rack, which, with a disgusting levity, was emphatically called by the executioners, 'The Adjutant's Daughter,' standing with a slight slope, and his breast and stomach bearing on the naked rounds—or to have his wrists tied fast together with one end of a rope, and the other end thrown over a beam and drawn by an assistant executioner till the hands of the victim are stretched high above his head, and there held firmly, while he was most inhumanly whipped with the cats or rawhides, until the skin, covering the body and lower extremities, was extensively vibicised and lacerated, and the blood consequently streaked down his back and quivering limbs, and stained the floor, which the feet or toes of the poor helpless victim may possibly have touched. And then, not satisfied with seeing their victim writhe and groan under the torture of such bodily lacerations, executioners have applied the strongest brine to them, which must have produced sufferings inexpressible.

'The above is a description of the horrid penalties and sufferings which convicts have been obliged to endure for offences far from being of aggravated character, or for a repetition of them; such as turning their eyes from their work when spectators or other persons were passing by, or when they heard the blows of the cats, rawhides or clubs vehemently applied upon the head or body of their fellow convicts, or for some act of negligence or carelessness in their work, or for an impertinent remark, or for picking up an old chew of tobacco, or for whispering, and occasionally for offences of a higher grade.

'These punishments have been inflicted by, or in the presence of some vindictive, blood-thirsty tyrants, intoxicated with their official robes; but, shall I say, whose more appropriate place would have been that of the victim? But I do say, that 'every man concerned in this cruel and barbarous punishing of convicts,' should not only have been 'handed over to the next Grand Jury,' but should have been confined in a strait jacket, and sent to a mad-house or a dungeon, or to work among galley-slaves, and there have remained, living only on bread and water, until, if possible, some slight glimmering of returning reason and humanity could have been discovered, breaking throw the mists which obscured his vision, and bewildered his imagination. But he never should have resumed his station as keeper or turnkey in a State Prison.'

'Such an animal, though stamped with the image of his Maker, could never have been designed for a keeper and example for convicts in a State Prison.'

In all societies it is advisable to associate, if possible, with the highest; not that the highest are always the best, but because, if disgusted, we can any time descend;—but if we begin with the lowest, to ascend is impossible. In the grand theatre of human life, a box ticket takes us through the house.—[Lacon.

PARABLE OF THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

'The rich man also died, and was buried; and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment.' Luke xvi: 23.

PREFACE:—The 15th and 16th chapters of Luke form a part of but one continued discourse of our Saviour. It is very important that we keep this fact in view if we wish to understand the parable under consideration. You will perceive that this discourse is composed of parables, one after another—varied in phraseology according to circumstances, yet all having the same great object in view, viz., to illustrate the duty, conduct, motives, and finally the fate of the two classes which then existed—the scribes and Pharisees, on the one hand and the publicans and sinners on the other hand. The reader is requested before going any farther, to read carefully the 15th and 16th chapters, and then proceed with me.

1st. 'Then drew near unto him (ch. xv. 1, 2,) all the publicans and sinners for to hear him. And the Pharisees and scribes murmured saying, This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them.' Now it is evident that these Pharisees and scribes cherished improper feelings on this subject; and Jesus, in order to correct those erroneous feelings and to teach these proud, self-righteous people their duty, spake unto them the parables of the lost sheep, and of the piece of silver; and concluded by saying, 'Likewise I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.'

2d. The Saviour next introduces the parable, as it is termed of the Prodigal Son. By this beautiful parable he showed them their selfish and wicked conduct towards those publicans and sinners, as exhibited in the 'elder brother.' The publicans and Gentile sinners, like the younger brother, had gone off and had squandered their living—had become spiritually dead; and now, when they are disposed to come back to their father's house, instead of assisting them to do so, and rejoicing at their return, these Pharisees commence murmuring about it, and deride Christ for receiving them, saying, 'Behold, he receiveth sinners and eateth with them.' Like the elder son they were angry, 'and would not go in!' How very appropriate is this parable, and how well it suited their case!

3d. He proceeds next with the parable of the unjust steward—which commences with the beginning of the 16th chapter; and by this parable he exposes the real motives and objects of their adherence to the law, and exhibits the moving principle of their hearts, viz., covetousness.

The parable commences by saying, 'There was a certain rich man, who had a steward; and the same was accused unto him that he had wasted his goods,' etc. To perceive the beauty and force of this parable, let it be understood that the rich man compares with the Jewish hierarchy, and that the steward corresponds to the priests, scribes, and Pharisees, or those that managed the affairs of this government. The object of the parable seems to have been to show the scribes and Pharisees, who boasted of their wisdom and self importance, and whose character had been so faithfully depicted in that of the 'elder brother,' that although they felt proud of their moral attainments, and were generally regarded as the 'children of light,' yet in reality, they were not so wise and prudent as men generally are in the management of their worldly affairs. The unjust steward showed more wisdom in providing for the future than they had done.—Like him they had wasted their master's goods, and were soon to be turned off; but unlike him, they had made to themselves no friends without, but rather enemies. That while they had made void the law, by their traditions, and perverted the prophets by their iniquities, they had ground the face of the poor, and looked with scorn and contempt upon the publicans and poor Gentiles. They were now soon to be deposed from office—their ecclesiastical government should be abolished—should die—and that, instead of making friends of the Gentiles, and those without, by giving to them of their abundance, they still cherished towards them a deadly hatred. Consequently they would have no claims to the gratitude and assistance of those whom they had thus neglected and ill-treated, when they themselves should be cast out, and the stewardship given to another—even to that same people whom they so much affected to despise. This seems to be the principal object aimed at in this parable.

4th. Having followed the Saviour in the chain of his discourse, link by link, we are prepared to understand the parable which is soon to follow. In the first place he shows the Pharisees and scribes the unreasonableness of finding fault with him for receiving sinners and eating with them. If they could justify themselves in searching for a stray sheep or a lost piece of silver, why should they condemn him for using all proper means to reclaim and save lost and sinful men? He next, in the case of the 'elder brother,' gives them a view of their conduct, and self-righteousness; and then, in the parable of the unjust steward, exposes their leading motive covetousness; while at the same time he ministers a mortifying rebuke to their pride and boasted wisdom. By a few pertinent remarks, he next shows them their wickedness and folly in blindly and wilfully adhering to the law, instead of embracing the Gospel. They stand before him convicted and condemned; and the only thing that remains to be done is to show them their inevitable fate—the just punishment which is certain and soon to overtake them.

5th. Our Lord then addresses them in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, in which their fate is clearly predicted and contrasted with that of the publicans and sinners who believed in him.—This evidently seems to be the design of the parable.

It is sometimes objected by the more ignorant class of limitarian preachers and writers that this is not a parable, but a literal history; that our Saviour does not call it a parable, but distinctly says, 'there was a certain rich man,' &c. In answer to which it is sufficient to remark that our Saviour does not say that any of his discourse is a parable. Luke, the historian, says, (ch. xv: 3,) 'And he spake this parable unto them, saying,' &c. Jesus does not say that the parable of the prodigal son is a parable. He says positively, 'A certain man had two sons,' &c. And he also says in the chapter where this relation is found, 'There was a certain rich man which had a steward.' It is just as evident that the story of the rich man and Lazarus is a parable, as that the story of the lost sheep—the lost piece of silver—the story of the prodigal son—and the story of the unjust steward, are parables. We will now attend to the text.

Let me repeat that our Lord intended in this parable to show the Pharisees and scribes their impending punishment. They had waxed fat in the service of Mammon, and had departed from the service of the true God. For their abominations in the sight of God, they were about to feel the full weight of his vengeance. 'A fire is kindled in mine anger and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains. I will heap mischief upon them: I will spend mine arrows upon them. They shall be burnt with hunger, and devoured with burning heat, and with bitter destruction.' Deut. xxxii. Thus we have a faint representation, at least, of the punishment which was soon to overtake this haughty and obstinate people. So much for the rich man: his punishment will be more particularly illustrated as we proceed.

6th. 'And there was a certain beggar named Lazarus, who was laid at his gate full of sores, and desiring to be fed with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table; moreover the dogs came and licked his sores.' Here we have 'the lost sheep'—the 'lost piece of silver'—the 'prodigal son'; in other words the publicans and sinners, and those who did not enjoy the religious and civil privileges of the Jewish church and state; the Samaritan and Gentile citizens, resident in Judea included. These were dependent on the scribes and Pharisees, and the higher classes, who held the authority, for civil justice and religious instruction. They are therefore represented as being laid at the gate of their rich and influential neighbors. The figure of the crumbs applies particularly to the inferior religious privileges of this oppressed class of the Hebrew commonwealth.

7th. What is to be understood by the death of the two characters? They both 'died.' In answer to this question, we remark that they ceased to be; that is, the scribes and rulers ceased to be scribes and rulers officially. The Gospel was established—the legal dispensation done away, and consequently the offices in the Jewish church and state, which had been filled by the priests, scribes, and rulers, were abolished. Their nationality was destroyed by the Romans.

So the lower class—the beggars—the publicans and sinners—the irreligious, heathen portion of that community, ceased to be such; they embraced the Gospel, became believers—became God's people; while the scribes and Pharisees rejected the Gospel, became unbelievers, and ceased to be God's people. Thus the two classes died, as classes.—These distinctions passed away, or rather were reversed.

8th. What is represented by the opposite condition of the two characters after their death?

The poor man 'was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom.' This figure of 'Abraham's bosom' is worthy of particular attention, as it may serve to throw much light upon this portion of the subject. Why was he said to be carried into Abraham's bosom, rather than into the bosom of any other ancient Jewish worthy?

Abraham is the parabolic representation of faith, especially the Gospel faith. He is called throughout the east, at the present day, the 'Father of the faithful.' To Abraham was first given the promise of the Gospel. 'And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, 'In thee shall all nations be blessed.' So then they which be of faith, are blessed with faithful Abraham.' Gal. iii: 8, 9. And Jesus says, 'Many shall come from the east and west, and sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven; but the children of the kingdom (the scribes and Pharisees, the 'rich man,' shall be cast out, into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.' Matt. viii: 11, 12. To 'be blessed with faithful Abraham'—to 'sit down with Abraham in the kingdom of heaven'—and to be carried into Abraham's bosom,' are figures which signify, not future happiness, but belief in the Gospel. The lowly publicans and sinners represented by 'the beggar,' were carried, into the 'bosom' of the Abrahamic faith, by the ministers of Christ, which are here called the 'angels.'

9th. We next consider the condition of the rich man. 'In hell,' (hades in the original, meaning simply the state or place of the dead) 'he lifted up his eyes, being in torment.' This represents the wretched condition of the Jewish unbelievers, after the overthrow of their church and state, after their national death. They suffered the mortification of national destruction and captivity, and their descendants have continued to suffer till the present day, the contempt and persecutions of a great portion of the world. They still continue to reject the Gospel, and all efforts to Christianize them have so far proved unavailing. There is emphatically 'a great gulf fixed' between them and those who are in the bosom of the Abrahamic faith.

It may be objected by some, that the Jews do not desire the Gospel. Neither is the rich man represented as asking to be carried into Abraham's bosom. He only wanted his condition in hades alleviated. So all the Jews ask of Christian nations among whom they sojourn, its protection and toleration, to cool and soften the evils of their wretched condition; and not to be initiated into the Christian faith. But the great gulf of fixed prejudice between the Jews and Christians has hitherto been impassable; and has generally prevented any favor being shown the former. The once proud Jewish church is now dead—in power and glory. They have long verified the prediction of the Saviour, that many shall come from the east and west, and sit down with Abraham in the Gospel kingdom, while they, 'the children of the kingdom,' should be 'thrust out.'

10th. But who are the 'five brethren'? We answer, that it is not probable that this part of the story has any definite application. It should not be expected that every item in the imagery has an application in the reality; but only the more prominent and important ones. As it has been pertinently remarked, 'Parables should not be made to go on all fours.' Professor Stewart has well observed, 'Comparison is not to be extended to all the circumstances of the allegory. Thus in the parable of the good Samaritan, the point to be illustrated is, the extent of the duty of benevolence.—Most of the circumstances in the parable go to make up the verisimilitude of the narration, so that it may give pleasure to him who hears or reads it.' Numbers, for instance, seldom have any definite meaning in parables. The one hundred sheep, and the ten pieces of silver, have none. Any other numbers would have done just as well. So of the five brethren. Whether this has any definite meaning or not, is immaterial for us to know. So we understand the main, leading part of the allegory—its spirit and object—we should be satisfied.

11th. 'If they hear not Moses and the prophets.' If the unbelieving Jews had been candid they might have discovered from the writings of Moses and the prophets that Jesus was the Messiah, for they testified of him, and Christ fulfilled their testimony. 'We have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write.' John i: 46. But so bigoted were they, and so deeply rooted was their prejudice, that had Christ appeared and preached to them, after his resurrection, they would not have believed! He therefore gave them over to temporal destruction; and after his resurrection appeared only to his disciples.

Thus we have briefly gone through with this memorable discourse of our Saviour—at least we have noticed all the leading and important points in it. We might have been more elaborate, and have extended our remarks to a much greater length; but our object was to come at the truth in as brief and short a manner as possible. We might have quoted largely from commentators, and learned authors, in support of what has been said; but this we deemed unnecessary—believing that if the main object and tenor of the subject were laid open to view, that the reader would at once see its force and application, and would be satisfied without the addition of collateral evidence; satisfied, we add, though he may not be able to find in the reality a direct counterpart for every little item and allusion in the imagery. This, as has been remarked, must never be expected in parables.

We have not applied this parable strictly to the two nations—the Jews and the Gentiles—the rejection of the one, and the reception of the other—as is frequently done by our writers. The subject, we think, will not warrant such an application. It may in an accommodated and secondary sense be thus applied; representing the conditions of the two classes—Jews and Gentiles—down to the present time, and even for time to come. The 'fixed gulf,' would then properly represent that barrier of fixed and determined prejudice which ever has existed betwixt the two nations; and which will not be removed till the 'fullness of the Gentiles be come in.' Though the Jews have been thus rejected from the Gospel kingdom, and though they should continue yet for ages to come in their sad condition, still a time is to come when they shall obtain deliverance. Paul said to the Romans, when discoursing on this subject: 'Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid; but rather through their fall (or unbelief) salvation is come unto the Gentiles, to provoke them to jealousy.' And again in the same chapter, 'For I would not brethren that you should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness in part is happened unto Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, 'There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob; for this is my covenant unto them when I shall take away their sins.' Rom. xi: 25-27.

Hence, should this application of the parable be admitted, it would prove nothing against the final salvation of the Jews, for, in the fullness of times, they are to be restored to favor. And still further; take either view of the subject, the application of the whole matter is strictly confined to scenes this side of the grave—to things of time. This must be admitted by every well informed student of the Bible. But we incline to the preceding interpretation, as being the most natural and consistent; in fact we are confident it is the only one that can be given consistent with truth and reason. The 'rich man,' on the one hand, representing the dominant class among the Jews—the priests, scribes, and Pharisees, in the time of our Saviour; while on the other hand, by the 'beggar' is to be understood the publicans and sinners—Jew, Samaritan or Gentiles—who lived at the same time. This conclusion is justified by the whole connexion, kept up throughout the Saviour's discourse, of which this parable forms a part. Of this fact we are as well convinced as we are that the parable has any meaning at all, or that Christ ever spoke it—things of which we never entertained a doubt. Reader, the subject is before you; scan it closely. What we have said is subject to criticism: we challenge investigation. 'Prove all things; hold fast that which is good.'

THE FALL—TOTAL DEPRAVITY.

BY AN OLD MAN.

'Lord, we are vile—conceiv'd in sin,
And born unholy and unclean—
Sprung from the man whose guilty fall
Corrupts the race and taints us all.'

This hymn (commencing with the above stanza) I have heard put forth for singing by several denominations; wherefore I conclude that it contains the substance of their belief respecting the condition of the human family, at least so far as to embrace the idea that we all sinned in Adam, and are born into the world in a state of total moral depravity.

My purpose now is to examine these sentiments, and I think it will not be difficult to prove them unreasonable, unjust, contrary to common experience, unscriptural and impossible. It is unreasonable to suppose that a God of infinite wisdom and goodness should commit the destiny of many millions of his unborn and unoffending children to the keeping of one man, and be inexperienced and ignorant, not knowing good and evil, and himself certainly knowing, at the same time, that within a few days or hours his implacable adversary would, in his sight and immediate presence, fall upon them, and with his poisonous arrows put them under the pains of a lingering death, and make them subjects and heirs with himself of endless misery. The harboring of such a dogma is not better than a conspiracy against reason and common sense. It is unreasonable that children should suffer any moral disadvantage for, or on account of their parents.

It is unjust; for justice holds even scales, deals to all according to their deserts, and ordains that every man's sins shall lie upon his own head.—This is just and equal; therefore for us to suffer for Adam's faults, or Adam for ours, would be obviously unjust. Common experience proves the doctrine a mistake, and that we are not born totally depraved. It hath been proved in cases innumerable that children trained up under a good moral culture are loving, kind, obedient, religious, and bear the semblance of angels; whereas if they were born in a totally depraved state, all the exertions of parents and teachers to civilize and moralize them, would be as vain as an attempt to quench the fires of Etna and Vesuvius with a bucket of water. It is contrary to common experience, as proved by children in another point of view. Ask a child respecting any thing that he is knowing to, and he will tell the truth direct—if he tries to tell a falsehood he has an impediment—truth is in the way. It is born with us and we must do violence to our natures to shake it off. How long shall man be engaged in a warfare against reason? It is contrary to common experience in reference to conscience, for that is given by the most High to admonish and reprove for every fault;—but no cognisance is taken of the sin of Adam—this is like an oracle or warrant from Heaven that we have no concern in that affair. It will now be shown that several passages of Scripture adduced to prove that children are born in sin, prove the reverse, Gen. vi: 12. 'All flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth.' This was a work of their own agency—no intimation that they were born in sin—Job xi: 12. 'Man is born like a wild ass's colt.' A wild ass's colt is born without sin or moral depravity. Man is born like one, and therefore sinless. Psalm xiv: 'They are all gone aside, they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good—no not one.' Here nothing is said about being born aside—their becoming filthy was a work of their own—no intimation that they derived it from Adam. David, in this Psalm, speaks of two sorts of people—one company that had done abominable deeds—and says, 'Have the workers of iniquity no knowledge? Who eat up my people as they eat bread.' Rom. iii: 12. 'They are all gone out of the way.' This, when rightly understood, will completely nullify the doctrine that children are born in sin. For as none could go out of the way, unless they had first been in it—therefore, they were born in the way—in God's appointed way; and their becoming unprofitable is their own mismanagement, not Adam's. Rom v: 12. 'Therefore as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.' To read this in conformity with the Orthodox belief, it would be, by one devil sin entered into the world which he brought with him from heaven, (of course of heavenly origin,) and inoculated, or some how conveyed the pestilential infection to Adam and Eve, which will rattle in all their children throughout their generations.

Until Scripture is wrested from its plain and evident meaning there is nothing to support the debasing God dishonoring doctrine that we sinned in Adam, and are born totally depraved. Jesus Christ in all his preaching and teaching never recognizes the doctrine of the total depravity of children; but quite the reverse, took them in his arms, blessed them, and said, 'of such is the kingdom of heaven.' Heb. ii: 17. 'Wherefore, in all things it behooved him (Christ) to be made like unto his brethren.' What, totally depraved? Yes, certainly, if the doctrine of total depravity is true, the conclusion is unavoidable, as blasphemous as it is. James, a servant of God, is a witness against the doctrine, his testimony is, that men are made after the similitude of God. Here total depravity, if admitted, implies another blasphemy! Do we teach our children that God made them, and do they come from his hand polluted with sin, totally depraved!!! From whence then is sin, and where was its origin? It was not imported from the upper world, brought by a fallen angel; neither is it an exotic of foreign growth, but indigenous, constitutional, a common growth of every man's garden; no exception even among saints. Let the sinner pray for a renovation of heart—the prayer is granted—he is renewed in the spirit of his mind—is the law of sin in his members disannulled? Can he lay off his armor, and dispense with his vigilant watchfulness, and no longer feel the stragglings for the mastery of foes to spiritual life that dwell within? Nay, verily! He that hath chosen him to be a soldier permits no such thing; for he would soon be wounded and disgraced as a soldier of the cross, if not led off a captive into bondage. But why is this? It is because the decree of Heaven can not be set aside—'The creature (man) was made subject to vanity, not willingly.' Not willingly?—no, his counsel was not asked—and even now, those that are renewed in the spirit of their minds, are unwilling to be thus subject to vanity; but there is no reprove—the decree is immutable. Nevertheless, there is an earnest expectation and hope of deliverance by Jesus Christ. This order of things proves most clearly that we stand in the same station and relation to our heavenly Father that man did in his primeval state. The law was given to man, what!—the earthly man?—No; for he hath no pre-eminence above the beast—is carnally minded—is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.—'The natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. God's law is spiritual: therefore can be received, understood, and obeyed only by the spirit—the inward man, to whom was given authority and power to control all his attendant household servants, and to him they were entrusted for orderly keeping. Sin or holiness can not be communicated by natural generation; therefore it is impossible that we have received any moral attainer from Adam. Our heavenly Father, in condescension to the ignorance and mistakes of his creatures, hath made known to us by his prophet Ezekiel the equitable principles of his government that children shall not suffer for the sins of their parents, nor parents for their children—but every man's sins shall lie upon his own head. Now for people still to contend that from our first parents are entailed upon us the condemnatory plagues of sin, is no very indirect charge against the Almighty, of cruelty, mutability and injustice: whereas, he is without variableness or shadow of turning.

Had we received our spirits from Adam when he was under an attainer of sin, there would have been some plausibility in the doctrine that we are contending against. But God being the Father of all our spirits, which are 'made to be an image of his own eternity,' Adam being no more to us than a brother in the organization of man, and our spirits coming from the fountain head of purity and 'are made after the similitude of God,' (James iii: 9,) therefore to hold that children are born in sin and totally depraved, is an error of the grossest kind. How can the doctrine of the fall of man be made to harmonize with the paternity of the King Eternal, who is worthy to receive glory, honor and power? for he has created all things, and for his pleasure they are and were created. Could it be for his pleasure that the devil had brought all the human race under his (God's) wrath and curse, and made them liable to all the miseries of this life, to death itself and the pains of hell forever? Could it be for his glory that he was thus frustrated in the design and end for which man was created, (i. e.) to glorify God and enjoy him for ever? Was it to the honor of his wisdom and power that he was thus circumvented and foiled by his implacable enemy?

About this fallen angel that was cast down into hell there are inexplicable mysteries. How came he out of prison? Did he break the walls? Was he let out by him who has the keys of death and hell? Was not his malignity well understood, and that he was an overmatch for all the sagacity and experience of Adam and Eve, who had not yet attained to the knowledge of good and evil? Where was the sympathy of a Father? Even savages and beasts of the field will protect their young. As a shepherd, he saw the wolf coming—knew his design was to fall upon his unprotected, unsuspecting lambs—saw him tear and wound them to death, but made no objection or resistance! How can these things be made to harmonize with the love and tender feelings of a Father, or the vigilant watchful care of a shepherd that will lay down his life for the sheep? He that is able let him give an answer to

THE INVITATION.—NO. II.

BY A. B. COPELAND.

'Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest.' Matt. xi: 28.

In order that we may rightly understand, and duly appreciate the above language, it becomes necessary and highly important that we inquire by whom it was given;—what was his nature and character—and his ability to bestow what he promised;—and lastly, whether he will keep his word, by the final fulfilment of the promise made, by the bestowment of the promised blessing, upon all who have, and shall hereafter come unto him? If, upon a careful investigation of the evidence that is given, it shall be ascertained that the personage who gave the invitation and made the promise, was no more than a mere mortal man, possessed of no more power nor wisdom than any other ordinary man, then we most certainly shall have very strong reasons to suspect the sincerity of his pretensions, and also, to fear a want of ability on his part to bestow upon the weary, heavy laden sinner that which he promised him. And if it should be ascertained that this being is not able to fulfil what he has promised, then there would be nothing to induce the weary and heavy laden ones to come unto him. But on the contrary, if it shall be found that this being has the ability, and, in every instance of a compliance with the conditions, he did grant the proffered blessing, then there will be found no ground for man to doubt or hesitate; but there will be the most cheering and soul-enlivening reasons to press forward, and cast all our burdens down before him. To the first question, I reply, the invitation was given by the Son of God, the Saviour of the world.

We have now learned that this invitation was given, and promise made by a being who has said of himself, 'All power is given me, both in heaven and in earth.' Hence, it is seen there can be no want of ability on his part, to perform what he has promised. It being settled that the Son of God has the power to do all that he has promised and undertaken, the question now is, has he the requisite goodness to actuate him to consummate the work? That many, if not all, of those to whom the text was spoken, understood the Saviour to refer not to a spiritual rest in the Gospel, which all who would come to him in a right and acceptable manner would receive, but to a mere physical rest, is perhaps not unreasonable to conclude. And hence, in this opinion, is found perhaps one cause why so few of the weary ones of the multitudes who followed after, came unto him in the right manner. As they had not, as they supposed, had any tangible evidence of his supreme power, they were not certain that he was able to do what he had promised, and therefore, would not come to him as he required. That the blessed Jesus is possessed of the adequate goodness, to cause him to do unto all that will come unto him all that he has promised them, is evident from the following reasons. 1. Because he is styled the 'Saviour';—the 'Prince of Peace';—the 'Son of God.' Now it is the humble opinion of the writer, that, if the Saviour were not possessed of unlimited and impartial goodness, it would be quite unreasonable to call him by these names.

That he is the Son of God is undeniable and conclusive evidence that he is possessed of superlative and unlimited goodness. For the Scriptures teach, and so do all the works of God, that he 'is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all the works of his hands.' And the Psalmist says, 'O taste and see that the Lord is good,' Psalms xxxvi: 8.—Again, the apostle John says, 'God is love.' 'He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him; for God is love.' I have now shown that God is good; and nothing but good; and hence, all that he does, or ever will do to man must tend to promote man's highest good; according as it may be done in this, or in the eternal world; and I will now show that the Saviour, as being the Son of God, seeks to confer, and will confer upon man all the good that he has promised him. If I shall succeed in proving, that the Saviour is possessed of the very same traits of character that his Father is, then, as it has already been shown, that all the dealings of the Father towards man tend to his greatest good; it will then follow, as a matter of course, that all the dealings of the Son toward man tend to the same happy end. By turning to the first chapter of Hebrews we there find that the Son of God is called the brightness of his Father's glory, the express image of his person. Hence, it is no more than reasonable to conclude that as are the dealings of God toward man, so are the dealings of the Son of God toward man. But I have already made this article sufficiently long; and therefore, I reserve what more I have to say upon this interesting subject, for a subsequent communication.

A KNOWLEDGE OF THE SON OF GOD!

And what is a 'knowledge of the Son of God'? Let us read the answer in the words of Jesus himself: 'This is, life eternal, that they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou has sent.' A knowledge of the Son of God, then, is eternal life: the doctrine of Jesus is the doctrine of Him who sent Him; he, therefore, who has knowledge of Jesus, has knowledge of the Father! Of what transcendent value must Paul have conceived such knowledge to be, when he could say—'Yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the KNOWLEDGE of Christ Jesus my Lord!' (Phil. iii.) To know [and, consequently, to be influenced by] the perfect character of Jesus in all its purity, its sincerity, its loveliness, were an acquisition infinitely paramount to all wisdom and knowledge, for 'in Him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge!'. But here, [in this condition of flesh and blood] 'we can know only in part, (1 Cor. xiii:) for 'the love of Christ passeth knowledge!'. To know, and to imitate that blessed spirit of disinterestedness—of mercy, of forbearance united with an indomitable firmness—of sympathy, which breathed in the soothing words, which prompted the tenderly compassionate looks, and which animated alike the words, and manner and deeds of, our ever to be revered Lord, were an acquisition and a progress towards the 'perfect man,' more to be desired than all the knowledge, and wisdom of the world, or all the riches either attainable or conceivable by us. He in whose heart the Word of Christ dwells thus richly in all wisdom, may be truly said to 'have put off the old man with his deeds, and [to] have put on the new man, which is renewed in KNOWLEDGE, after the image of Him that created him! With such a true disciple, Christ is ALL, and IN ALL! Colos. iii.

MEMORY PICTURES.—NO. I.

Come to our old trysting-place, by the window, Sis, and look again, upon the beautiful elm, that spreads its branches with such a look of protection, in the ancient grave-yard. By the by—how many a tale might be woven, from just the sight of that old tree! and how many fancy dreams one might have, of the slumberers underneath its shade. By those, who ever do such strange things, I mean. Our dreams are all of other days, sister! We go not in to the far-off future, in search of unknown treasures. May be—we shall learn the art in our womanhood; but as yet, leave the lore to older heads, and give us the pleasant song that Memory sings, upon our childhood shore. Be it ours to go back and catch the sun-beam, unshaded by a cloud—to hear the murmur of the fountain, undrowned by the bellowing thunder—to find the roses, where the thorns were not, and play with the dew-drops, as they slept in the garden flowers.

Some days there were,—that came to us then, more fraught with joy than sorrow; some nights—where the moon and stars, all shone, and the wind went by with a pleasant murmuring, and the spirit of hope came and nestled like a dove, in our little hearts. Beautiful are some of the lessons, written in the first book of life!—There is a glory about them, that never dims; and a freshness, that dwells with the spirit, as it treads its last upon the sandy steep of time.

There is a magic about that old elm, a kind of mesmeric affinity—that draws me closely to it. I played under the branches of one just like it, in the years that left the first memory of a spring warbler knocking at my heart.

And just now Sis, I remember me of one day, more bright than all the others; when we gathered under its shade, the wildest, rudest creatures, that ever felt the very soul of happiness dancing within their hearts. But among us all, you and Mary were the gladdest! Dost remember Mary? the noble hearted, black-eyed, beautiful haired, Indian girl; that played with us in the school-yard, and saved poor Lyra, from a couch neath the beautiful blue of Stockbridge Creek? Ha, ha! loved stream, (for one may love thee, wild, capricious thing, as thou art!) not just the acquisition you thought, that sunny day! Well—well! scold kind Mary for that. 'Twill do for you! She sat beside you in her infancy, and played with your short-lived bubbles in her childhood; she rode upon your silver waters when reading the book of the girl, and put up her darkened braids by the light of your countenance, when the soft wing of maidenhood hung over her head. Scold Mary, if ye will—she cares not a fig, for your mutterings.

But I had forgotten our pleasant pic-nic party, in my apostrophe to the stream! For do you know? some of the brightest visions of my childish days, are woven with the singing wavelets, that spring gaily o'er the old rocks, and around the rugged hills, that hem in the romantic little village of M. I'll tell them to you, some day that sleeps in the future, but now let's bethink of the beautiful, July morning, when the sun peeped in between the dark leaves, with a half smiling look, and the summer breeze lifted the light tresses from our foreheads, with a saucy finger, as we spread our tables beneath the bountiful shade of that old Elm tree.

A passer by would have envied us the sunny joyousness, that gave so much laughter to the air, and sent so many words to the lip; even, if he had not cared for the strawberries and cream, fruit-cake, pine-apples, and lemonade, that lay with such a delicious and tempting look, upon the white linnen spread, whose folds fell down and played with the mossy leaves of dame Nature's carpeting.

'Twas very kind in our teachers to deal thus by their pupils! and kindlier still, for them to go away, when the sun was high up in heaven, leaving us free from the restraint we felt in their august presence.

Some of the scholars, (those who had learned that it was not lady-like and genteel, to romp in the fields, and scale the fences,) had tripped after their mentors; but a few young heads and little bodies, remained. And the squirrels that frolicked upon the meadow-grass, or the birds that sung way up in air, were not happier than we.

We were busily intent upon our sports, when a strange man came along the road side, and attracted by our mirth, commenced chatting with Mary, she being his nearest companion. Children have a wonderful bump of curiosity, and they know how to show it too! or we did that time. We crept close to Mary's side, with wonder-looks and sly glances, but the good man had a kind word for us all. And he put his hand upon the young heads, with a gentleness, such as the pure hearted always carry about them. After chatting with us a while, he let down the bars, and asked if we would like to go with him? and with the confidingness of innocence, we went pattering along by his side. He carried a Bible underneath his arm, and we were not surprised, when he stopped in front of our little village church.

We had been up the foot-worn pathway many a time before, but it never seemed half so short as now.

'Twas a pretty spot where the old church stood! A large green spread away from the door, dotted here and there with fatherly looking maples, in whose age-worn branches, robins have made their nestling places, since time immemorial.

Friendly old vines, with beautiful blossoms in their hands, reached out their arms, and embraced the old porch, and hung many a festoon of living green, about the windows, and away, almost to the church top.

We always loved the old spot! but better than ever that night. For the whippowill sang in a white rose tree near the east window, and the evening zephyr whispered softly to the vine blossoms, and then mingled with the musical voice of the speaker, as he stood before the altar. What a quiet dignity sat upon his forehead, and gentle truthfulness in his soul-lit eye! There was a sprinkling of silver, even then, upon his hair, and furrows around his mouth,—marked by a mighty hand. But not of time.

There was stillness from door to door, and from basement to arching, while the holy man opened the book, and showed unto us the way of life. And we came out into the open air, with a holiness upon our hearts, that they will wear in heaven.

Dost remember it Sis? you were young then, and your locks hardly long enough to twine around my little fingers. But the heart hath memories that begin with life and never end, not even in eternity.

You know, I've had many rambles this summer, and on my homeward way, a few weeks since, I tarried a while within the township of C. I was with Genie in the grave-yard, where we have been so often, when she pointed me to a newly made grave. 'Twas just sodded over, and no love-mark yet around it; save a beautiful marble stone, on which I read the name of the Disciple of the Anointed. With no comment, but these expressive words—'He passed away even as his Father called him.' I had no tears for the departed. God had taken him, and heaven is brighter than earth.

As I stood within the shadow of a marble monument, I looked back to the spot, where the holy man slumbered, and saw that the widow had come up with her children, to the threshold of their father's home.

The mourner threw off her sable veil, and pressing her thin hands upon her throbbing temples, looked upon one and the other of her children, as though reason was becoming a veiled minister. The elder boy looked pityingly upon his parent, and leaning gently over the head stone, with his dark hair thrown back from his beautiful forehead, said in a low, sweet voice, 'Don't mourn so, mother! I could bear this deep grief, but it makes my heart ache and tremble so, to see you suffer like this. I know we all miss father, more than we can tell! But when I grow to be a man, I will try and be like him, and we shall love each other very much, and be very happy. Believe me—mother!'

And then the little urchin as though to follow his brother's example, crept closely to his mother's side, and putting a little, chubby hand upon one cheek, and his silken locks against the other, said in his childish, artless way; 'I wouldn't cry any more muder! you know fader said there was a good man up in heaven, who loved us all.—You, and Fader, and Willie, and I. And all the world, too! And if he loves fader, I guess he'll take care of him, just as fader used to take care of us. So don't cry any more muder! Willie and I'll take care of you, and some day we'll go and see fader.'

God bless the widow of the Christian, and the orphan boys of the noble hearted! For all over our land, are there voices that go upward in prayer for them; and on the mountain, and in the valley, over island and over sea—in the green wood and on the prairie, are there hands that would rest in benediction upon their heads, and eyes, that have been dimmed with tears, at the cause of their mourning.

But come Sis—see! the moon has gone down behind the woods, and the dew-drops have come to nestle in the half-shut blossoms, and play upon the bosom of the little warbler, that kisses so lovingly the base of the tree-crowned hill, behind our night-curtained home.

'Tis time we were sleeping! The stars will keep watch above us, and the leaves of the old Elm, will whisper with the Angels while we rest. LYRA.

ELDER JACOB KNAPP.

It seems that some of the Baptists are getting their eyes open to see that the immaculate Jacob Knapp is not any better than he should be, after all. Some investigations, it appears, have lately been had into his conduct, the result of which is published in a pamphlet by the Baptists themselves, and which does not reflect the highest honor upon this notorious evangelist. We copy the following from a late number of the New York Christian Messenger. It is the only account we have ever seen of the pamphlet.

'A pamphlet of about 45 pages has recently been put into my hands, written and published by Charles Burdard, Chairman of the Committee of Investigation, appointed by the Church, which 'shows up' the Elder in just about the light in which many have for years regarded him. The specifications and charges appear to be well established by documentary testimony, and by the declarations, not of Universalists, but the Elder's contemporaries, and in some instances his former coadjutors.—We will give a few extracts from this pamphlet to show how the elder stands among the Baptists. The following are the grounds of complaint:

I. 'That Mr. Knapp should represent himself as worth no more now than he was ten years ago, except as property had risen; while it is well known that he had greatly increased in wealth during the last ten years; and yet that he lost by the fall of his property, rather than gained by its rise.

II. That he should declare he had spent the last eleven years of his life in preaching, by night and by day, without advancing his worldly interests at all; while within the last seven years, he had in some way been able to accumulate over $7,000, and to invest it in real estate; i. e. he had within that time purchased a farm for about $7,500 which was all paid for but $300, yet he wishes it understood that he has no money at interest, and no property that has been productive.

III. That he should, in a letter written for the purpose of soliciting money for himself, represent this farm as a piece of land, and mostly an uncultivated swamp; and declare that this, with his house and lot in the village, was all that he owned of this world's goods; while he owned scores of sheep and cattle, and other personal property besides.

IV. That he should represent himself in the same letter, as in such circumstances, that he had difficulty in meeting the bills of his family, and had often to borrow money to bear his expenses to the places of his appointments; while this was said at the close of the period of his highest pecuniary prosperity, the period of three years in which he had received according to his own confession about $9,000.

V. That after being liberally compensated for his labors at New Bedford, he should have stipulated for an exorbitant pecuniary sum as the condition of staying longer; i. e. that he should ask $200 for two weeks more labor.

VI. That after he had been liberally compensated for his labors in Boston, he should go to Lowell, and there complain that he was greatly disappointed in what he had received in Boston, putting the amount at about one half of what he had actually received, or knew he would receive, and representing one church in Boston as having given him nothing, when he knew that they were to place $200 in deposit ready for him on his return.

VII. That Mr. Knapp should encourage certain students in the doctrine of Oberlin Perfectionism.

VIII. [The specification under this head is of too gross a character to copy.]

IX. That he should withhold and destroy certain important letters entrusted to his care.

X. That he had repeatedly taken occasion to speak of his ministering brethren, both in the pulpit and in private, sometimes referring to them indirectly, sometimes mentioning them by name and holding them up to reproach.

XI. That Mr. K. had under unjustifiable circumstances required and obtained from one of the students his obligation in word or bond to pay for a horse which Mr. Knapp had charged him with killing.*

The foregoing are published as a 'statement of facts,' and the vouchers are given with them; and ought they to be published in Universalist periodicals? I for one say yes; that the public may be disabused in reference to the impression which has been made that Universalists were hunting the Elder down, and persecuting him with envy and calumny. Have they said too much when they have affirmed that it was rather the love of money than of souls for which Mr. Knapp got up his terrible 'Revivals'? Was it in the spirit of John the Baptist that he appeared in N. Bedford in a white vest, his remarks about which caused the pastor of the church there to get him a new black one? Was it in this spirit that he appeared in New Haven in such an old shabby cloak that his friends made it a subject of pleasantry and borrowed a better one for him to wear during the 'campaign'? He boasted when he left New Haven that he had got $1,300 which he had counted, and that there were several letters and packages given him as he was going on board the steam-boat that he had not counted. He appeared poverty stricken, (so it would seem,) that he might the better induce people to give largely.

PROF. STUART ON ENDLESS MISERY.—TORMENTING POWER OF THAT FAITH.

Professor Stuart, of the Andover Theological Seminary, one of the most eminent Orthodox Doctors in the land, holds the following language respecting the tormenting power of faith in endless misery. The extract with the note appended is furnished for the 'Trumpet,' by Br. J. M. Austin, and copied from the 'Biblical Repository' for July 1840. It is well worth preserving. If every Orthodox man in the world, who possesses the common sympathies of humanity, would confess the honest convictions and feelings of his heart, we believe they would all confess the same thing. Can that doctrine be true whose faith is thus tormenting? Surely not. And can they either hope or pray that all the sympathies of their nature will be extinguished in heaven? But to the extract.

'No reflecting mind can wonder that so many among us, [the evangelical,] are deeply agitated by this subject..... There are not a few who claim to be considered as Christians, whose minds are filled with difficulty in respect to the subject of endless misery in a future world..... No subject which can come before the mind, is more agitating or more deeply interesting, than that which respects the duration of future misery..... If it be true, that all men will be saved, it is one of the most interesting truths—in some respects, the most interesting truth—ever published to our guilty and sinful race!..... The social sympathies, too, of some men [i. e. some Christians in the Orthodox ranks,] are often deeply concerned with the formation of their religious opinions. They have lost a near and dear friend and relative by death; one who never made any profession of religion, or gave good reason to suppose that his mind was particularly occupied with it. What shall they think of his case? Can they believe that one so dear to them has become eternally wretched? an outcast forever from God? Can they endure the thought that they are never to see or associate with him any more? Can heaven be a place of happiness for them, while they are conscious, that a husband, or a wife, a son, or a daughter, a brother or a sister, is plunged into a lake of fire, from which there is no escape? It is impossible they aver, to overcome such sympathies as these. It would be unnatural and even monstrous to suppress them. They are therefore as they view the case, constrained to doubt whether the miseries of a future world can be endless! If there be any whose breasts are strangers to such difficulties as these, they are to be congratulated on having made attainments beyond the reach of humanity in the present world; or else to be pitied for ignorance, or the want of a sympathy which seems to be among the first elements of our social nature. With the great mass of thinking Christians, I am sure such thoughts as these, must unhappily for them, be acquaintances too familiar. That they agitate our breasts as storms do the mighty deep, will be testified by every man of a tender heart, and who has a deep concern in the present and future welfare of those whom he loves!.... This doctrine [the final salvation of all men] has become so wide spread in Germany that it pervades even the ranks of those who are regarded as serious and evangelical men in respect to most or all of what is called orthodox doctrine, saving the point before us..... That there are difficulties pressed by it [the doctrine of eternal punishment,] on the mind, when any one thinks of his own condition—that of his beloved friends, or his brethren of the human race it would be mere pretence to deny..... If parents, husbands, wives, brothers, sisters, must see those dear as their own lives, perish at last, while they themselves are saved, heaven in mercy will either extinguish their social susceptibilities, or else give them such sweet and overpowering sense of the justice and goodness of God, as shall not permit the joys of the blessed to be marred, nor the songs of the redeemed to be interrupted, with sighs of sympathetic sorrow!*

DIVINE JUSTICE.

It is often said by the opposers of the doctrine of Universalism, that we dwell too much and too constantly on the love and mercy of God, to the neglect of the Divine justice—that we in fact forget or never think of justice; or if we think and speak on the subject at all, it is to deny and set aside this divine attribute.

Now, the fact is, Universalists, so far from forgetting or denying the justice of God, are almost the only denomination in Christendom that fully believe and strictly maintain, at all times, in all places, and under all circumstances, the entire and perfect justice of Deity. We believe that all the demands of God's justice must be satisfied—that there can be no compromise—not one iota of its claims will ever be relinquished. Whatever punishments justice demands, will, and must inevitably, be endured. God says he 'will by no means clear the guilty'; that 'whosoever doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done,' and he is 'no respecter of persons'; that he will 'render to every man according as his work shall be.' But while we believe all this most devoutly and sincerely, we also believe that divine justice never requires an unmerciful punishment—never did and never can require a punishment to which the purest and warmest love and the tenderest mercy could reasonably object—that justice and mercy are not jarring but harmonious attributes, going hand in hand in the work of human redemption and salvation, both equally concerned for the honor of God and the good of his creatures; and that mercy holds and guides the very rod which justice raises for the punishment and correction of the sinful. And hence, for God to withhold the punishment which the sinner justly deserved, and which he needed for his correction, would be to injure instead of benefitting the creature; and certainly neither true love nor true mercy could approve of this injury.

But how is it with the opposers of Universalism who thus falsely accuse us of denying the justice of God? Do they believe in the justice of God? They profess to—they talk much about divine justice; but do they really believe in it? Let us see—What do they profess to believe the justice of God requires? Why, they profess to believe it requires infinite punishment for every sin, which each and every sinner of the human race has committed, or may commit—that strict justice demands endless damnation, as the righteous penalty for every offence. Well, do they believe this penalty will be inflicted in every case? O, no! not they. They believe no such thing. They believe it will in some cases, with some sinners, for some sins. But in the great majority of cases they do not believe justice will ever inflict or obtain what it demands. And thus they deny the strict justice of God. Indeed they adopt premises which forever preclude the possibility of the divine justice's ever being satisfied or obtaining its demands. For see here; if each and every sin justly deserves infinite and endless punishment, then, as no individual can ever suffer more than one infinite and endless punishment which is the just demerit of one sin, of course all the untold multitude of his other sins, though millions of them lay at his door, must forever remain entirely unpunished! And even that one can never be fully punished—as what is always doing can never be done—justice will never be fully satisfied, even for that one offence: for if it should—if ever the time should arrive, during the future ages of eternity, when it could be truly said that justice was satisfied for that offence, and its full penalty had been inflicted, of course the punishment would then cease, and thus prove that justice did not require infinite and endless punishment for one offence.—And if not for one, it can not for any number of acts of a finite creature. Put as many finites together as you please, you can never make an infinite out of them all.

Thus the theory of Orthodoxy, so called, refutes itself. While it claims to be the exclusive advocate of divine justice, it denies and destroys the divine justice. It virtually denies the possibility of God's ever punishing justly any more than one sin of a man's whole life; and to cap the climax of absurdity, denies the possibility even of that. According to its theory of justice, if a man live four-score years, and for the last three score and ten of his life, should commit one sin per day, (which is a very moderate calculation for Orthodoxy,) it would require twenty five thousand five hundred and fifty eternities, to punish him justly for the sins of his life, exclusive of those committed on the extra days of leap years! Alack a day! what will they do for time in eternity?

THE UNIVERSALIST COLLECTION.

In giving notice of the new Hymn Book just published in this city, Br. Dolphus Skinner says:

'In 1837, the Universalist Collection compiled by Rev. H. Ballou, 2d., and published by B. B. Mussey, made its appearance. It is an excellent Collection; but from some causes to us unknown, and which we can not imagine, unless it be the extensive sale and world-wide popularity of Streeter's Collection it never obtained very general notoriety or favor.'

This we believe is a mistake. Br. Skinner's remarks may apply to the vicinity of Utica, but they certainly will not apply to the vicinity of Boston. The Universalist Collection' compiled by Rev. H. Ballou, 2d, has been one of the most popular Universalist Hymn Books ever published; and notwithstanding it is not perfect, (and we never have seen a perfect book yet,) it comes as near being so, however as any other. We care not how much other books are puffed; but let it not be done at the expense of the meritorious. Mr. Mussey is a highly respectable publisher; a staunch friend of the Universalist denomination; and Br. H. Ballou, 2d, is an author so generally known in our denomination that we need not add one word in his praise.

Mr. Mussey tells us it is his intention to add an Appendix to the 'Universalist Collection,' compiled by Brs. H. Ballou, 2d, and T. J. Sawyer, embracing a very large number of New Hymns, and the price will be reduced to fifty cents retail, and probably thirty-seven dollars and a half per hundred.—[Trumpet.

We are glad to hear that for we always thought the above an excellent collection. It certainly deserves an extensive patronage; but we are confident it has never obtained it in this region, although it may have done so in others.

EXPLANATION OF DIFFICULT TEXTS—HELL FIRE, &C.

In preference to writing long comments ourselves on the several passages referred to we will here present to the reader Paige's Comments on Mark ix: 43-48, which read as follows:

'Hell. The same word gehennā, which occurs in Matt. v: 22. See note there. 'Fire that never shall be quenched.' This phrase is substantially repeated in ver. 44, 45, 46, 48. The word answering to never shall be quenched, verse 43, 45, is asbestos: but in ver. 44, 46, 48, the phrase is ou sbennutai, translated not quenched; of which the former is an adjective, derived from the latter, though it is translated as a verb in the future tense; the latter is a verb. The worm and the fire are here added as characteristics and aggravations of gehenna, ver. 43; and the whole description is metaphorical, and by the use of lively and terrible figures, denotes a state of awful misery. So far, I suppose, all agree. But whether that misery be temporary or endless, is yet a question in dispute. The terms here used, therefore, should be well considered; because the question itself is of vital consequence.

'The adjective used in ver. 43, 45, occurs in the passages cited below from Strabo, Plutarch, Josephus, and Eusebius. 'Strabo, the celebrated geographer, speaking of the Parthenon, a temple at Athens, says, 'In this was the inextinguishable or unquenchable lamp,' by which he simply means the lamp which was kept continually burning, but which was extinguished or quenched, ages ago. Plutarch, the well known author of the biographies, familiarly termed 'Plutarch's Lives,' calls the sacred fire of the temple unquenchable fire, though, he says in the very next sentence, they had sometimes gone out. Josephus speaking of a festival of the Jews, says, that every one brought fuel for the fire of the altar which, 'continued always unquenchable,' although it had actually ceased, and the altar itself had been destroyed with the temple, at the time he wrote. Eusebius, the father of ecclesiastical history describing the martyrdom of several Christians at Alexandria, says, 'They were carried on camels through the city, and in this elevated position were scourged, and finally consumed in unquenchable fire,' though it could not have burned, probably, more than an hour or two at the most. These authors writing in their own tongue, or a language with which they were perfectly familiar, must have known most assuredly, the value and import of the phrase 'unquenchable fire'; and it is as clear as demonstration can make it, that they did not understand it to mean endless. Univ. Ex. N. Ser. vol. iv., pp. 338, 339. The scriptural usage of the word is similar. It often occurs where it can not be understood to indicate an endless burning. The adjective is not found in the Old Testament; nor does it occur in the New, except in the passage under consideration, and Matt. iii: 12, and the parallel place Luke iii: 17. And that unquenchable does not mean endless in the two places, last named, see note on Matt. iii: 12. But the verb here used in ver. 44, 46, 48, and from which the adjective is derived and has its force, occurs several times in the Old Testament. Its usage may show in what manner the Jews understood it when applied to fire. See Isaiah i: 31; xxxiv: 10; lvi: 24; Jer. iv: 4; vii: 20; xvii: 27; xxi: 12; Ezek. xx: 47, 48; Amos v: 6. In all these cases, though punishment be indicated by the fire, yet the unquenchableness of that fire does not denote that the punishment shall be endless; for the judgments were to be executed on the earth, and their end is manifest. The same word occurs, Ezek. xxxii: 7, where it is translated cover. This, however, being its positive form, does not clearly indicate its force, when used negatively. The same is true of several other passages where the word occurs, and which I therefore omit. But the same word is applied to the sacred fire, in a manner which more clearly, if possible, demonstrates the fact that it does not denote endless. 'And the fire upon the altar shall be burning in it; it shall not be put out; and the priest shall burn wood on it every morning, and lay the burnt offering in order upon it: and he shall burn thereon the fat of the peace-offerings. The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar; it shall never go out.' Lev. vi: 12, 13. It is worthy of remark, that Josephus, as before quoted, calls this fire by the same name, unquenchable, although when he wrote, it had already been put out and effectually quenched.

So much in regard to the general usage of these words. But it is agreed, on all hands, that this passage in Mark has special reference to Isa. lvi: 24, and that its peculiar forms of expression are taken from that place, almost literally. And, as our Lord gives no intimation to the contrary, we are justified in the belief that he used the language in the same sense as the prophet. To what kind of fire, then, did Isaiah refer? and to what kind of punishment? 'And it shall come to pass that from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the Lord. And they shall go forth, and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh.' Isa. lvi: 24, 24. This, it will be observed, was to be accomplished while sabbaths and new moons continued; and while men built houses, and planted vineyards, and occupied them, as appears by comparing ch. lvi: 17-22, with lvi: 22-24. The 'learned Gataker' thus speaks of the fire and the worm: 'The prophet, in this clause, pursueth the allegory taken from corpses unburied. And this the Jewish doctors, some of them, taking notice of, but without taking it literally, say this shall be part of the strange sign, ver. 19, that should be shown upon Gog's and Magog's army, that though the judgment inflicted on them by fire, Ezek. xxxviii: 22, yet the worms that bred in their carcasses, lying many months unburied, Ezek. xxxix: 9, shall live in the fire: which fiction, others, to shun, say that the worm hath reference to the bodies unburied; the fire to their cities burnt down with fire from above. Ezek. xxxix: 6. See Rev. xx: 8, 9. But such salvés need not; the worm hath reference to such vermin as is wont to breed in and feed on dead corpses; such carcasses especially as lie so long above ground until they rot, and become as dung or carrion, Job xxi: 26; Ps. lxxxiii: 10; Isa. xiv: 11; 19: 20; the fire, to the burning of such bodies, not fit now to be stirred, or removed, but to be consumed by fire, in the places where they lie, ch. ix: 5; xxx: 33; Ezek. xxxix: 9. So that the resemblance is taken from the bodies that he rotting on the face of the earth, till they crawl all over with worms and maggots, and in regard both of their unfitness to be managed and the multitude of them, it is a long time ere they can be consumed with fire.' So much for a literal exposition; by which the undying worm and unquenchable fire are represented as enduring for a long time. And in the spiritual application which Gataker thought it necessary to make, he by no means confines it to a future endless punishment, but allows it to be at least equally applicable to judgments executed on the earth: 'By the whole similitude, or allegory, that dreadful, direful, and detestable, condition is expressed, that shall, at first or last, befall all obstinate wicked ones; sometimes in exemplary judgments executed upon them in this world; partly, by inward torture of mind, Dan. v: 6; partly, by corporeal pains, 2 Chron. xxi: 18, 19; Acts xii: 23; and ignominious usages; Isa. xxii: 17, 18; Jer. xvii: 18, 19; amidst which, this also is one part of their misery, that they are generally rather abhorred than pitied, Ps. li: 5-7; lxxiv: 7-9; but even if they do escape vengeance here, after this life, immediately in their souls, and at the last day, in soul and body, joined together again.'—Assem. Annot. I repeat, that the worm and the fire are here added merely as characteristics and aggravations of gehenna, and again refer to note on Matt. v: 22, for an explanation of that term. The punishment here indicated was horrible, truly; yet there is no evidence that it was to endure without end. It was rather the same which our Lord predicted, on several occasions, as the damnation of hell, and a time of unequalled tribulation. See Matt. iii:

7; xxiii: 33; xxiv: 21; and the notes. See also Matt' xxiii: 34-36.

We may hereafter publish comments on some of the other texts which our correspondent refers to, though we have heretofore published expositions on most of them.—What is here presented, together with what appeared last week, will, we trust, aid the lady inquirer, in her desire to know the truth. REMOVALS, &C.—Br. L. L. Saddler, we learn from the 'Banner,' has resigned his pastoral charge of the Universalist society in Portland, Me., and engaged for a time in the Electro-magnetic Telegraph Office in Boston. We understand, however that he does not intend abandoning the ministry, but will resume its duties again when he finds a field therefor to his liking.

Br. Z. Baker, says the 'Union' of the 10th ult., 'will commence his labors as pastor of the Fourth Street Universalist church in this city, (New York,) on Sunday, tomorrow.'

Br. Gamaliel Collins, has commenced his pastoral labors in Hudson, N. Y.

We learn from the Trumpet that Br. Benjamin H. Clark, has removed from Wellfleet to Truro, Mass., on Cape Cod, and commenced his pastoral labors in the latter place. The society is in a highly prosperous state, and has commenced the erection of a house of worship which will hold about four hundred persons.

A new Universalist meeting house was dedicated at Fall River on the 28th ult.

Br. A. R. Abbott was ordained to the work of the Christian ministry at Lowell, Mass., on the 11th ult. Sermon by Br. Hosea Ballou.

We find the following announcement in the N. Y. Christian Messenger, by which it seems that that paper and establishment is for sale. 'Such a place as New York city ought to send out one good and well sustained Universalist paper at least. And it seems as though some able and enterprising friend of the cause might step forward, make the purchase and consummate such an end. Br. Price has labored long and faithfully as a Publisher and Editor, under many and serious discouragements, and we trust that in retiring from the cares and perplexities of an Editorial life his health will be restored and that he will meet with and enjoy that peace and quiet due to a 'good and faithful servant.'

UNIVERSALIST BOOK AND PAPER ESTABLISHMENT FOR SALE.—The condition of Br. Price's health being such as to render it imprudent for him to devote that time and attention to the affairs of the Union and Messenger and the Book Establishment connected therewith, which he has heretofore given them, and which is essential to the business; and the amount of my other business forbidding my attention to them in any proper manner; I have concluded to offer the entire Establishment for sale. Terms cash—or satisfactory security on time. Applications may be made, personally or by letter, either to Br. Price, or myself, at 140 Fulton street, second floor, New York. C. L. STICKNEY.

Br. Tompkins—Credit Br. D. Skinner $2.00 for the last volume of the Quarterly, and charge. A. W.

Also, change direction of Repository sent to Sophronia M. Curtis at Bridge water, N. Y., to Spring Prairie, Walworth county, Wisconsin.

PARTICULAR NOTICE.

In this paper, No. 33 of current volume, a short article appeared from my pen, in which is sketched an incident, which occurred in Peru, Ohio, in which the name, Dr. Salmon, occurs. Some have thought that said article may be construed so as to be injurious to Dr. Salmon's reputation;—and this is to inform all such, that the Dr. is one of the best of men, so far as I know him—a man of unimpeachable character,—and a man highly esteemed as a physician and minister,—and withal one of my friends. The charges alluded to were not against his character,—but against his religious views, as being more high minded and liberal, than some of his friends, as he withdrew from them as an ecclesiastical body, and organised a church on the Congregational principle. J. R. J.

COMPLAINTS—CAUSES—REMEDY.

We have sometimes, at long intervals, received complaints from various friends, that marriage or obituary notices, furnished by them for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, have been delayed unreasonably, or never been published. A recent complaint of this kind has induced the following remarks.

Such notices are almost always sent in by our ministering brethren and generally written on the same sheet with another communication intended for publication.—The communication may be a long one and it almost invariably happens that such notices are written on the back of the same leaf, and can not be separated from it without mutilating it, sometimes the communication is crowded or kept out of the paper for weeks for want of room; the notices are consequently not thought of until the article is wanted.

Again, these notices are reserved until the last, to fill up such space as may be left by longer articles and often in the case of obituary notices, they are of such interminable length as to exclude them for works.

Again, when such notices are written on the page opposite the article, the compositor, after setting up the article, throws the manuscript among a lot of other MS. that has been used, it gets astrayed with the rest, and is thus lost. This does not often happen however.

The friend who has just written us concerning this matter, sent us quite a long article for publication, several weeks since—that article has been lying among our 'prepared copy' waiting a favorable opportunity for publication. He informs us that he sent a marriage notice with the article—we find that to be the fact on examination—it is written on the opposite side of the same leaf of his MS., and has been quietly waiting publication with the article.

Our friends when they send us notices in this way can not reasonably expect that the editor or publisher will neglect his necessary business to copy one, two, three or a dozen notices for the press. No, that can't well be done.

The remedy then is this. Let the notice be written on a separate slip of paper from the other communication, or another part of the sheet so that it can be separated from it. Some we are glad to say always do this, and their notices hardly ever fail of being inserted at the earliest moment. Do this one and all—make your obituary notices as brief as possible, and we think you will have little cause of complaint.

In conclusion, our friends may rest assured that we never intentionally neglect, and certainly never refuse to publish marriages or deaths. PUB.

PRIMARY LESSONS: Being a Speller and Reader, on an original plan; in which one letter is taught at a lesson, with its power; an application being immediately made, in words, of each letter thus learned, and those words being directly arranged into reading lessons.—By Albert D. Wright, author of 'Analytical Orthography,' 'Phonological chart,' etc. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway.

We have received a copy of a neat little volume with the above title. It is prettily illustrated and can not fail we think to fully interest the young learner, and attain the object for which it is intended. We copy a large portion of the preface as it will more fully show the principle upon which instruction is conveyed to the young mind. It is for sale by G. Tracy, 58 Genesee street.

'In presenting a new plan for teaching the rudiments of reading, it may not be thought ostentatious to state some of its peculiar features.

1. One letter or combination is presented at a lesson, and at the same time its elementary sound is taught.

2. As fast as the letters are learned, an application is immediately made, by using them synthetically in familiar words.

3. No word is given in which a letter occurs that has not been previously learned, in the above synthetic method.

4. The capital letters are taught one at a time, and by review in reading lessons.

5. The plan of putting the letters, with their elementary sounds, together into words, by this original system of synthesis, it is believed will greatly facilitate the acquisition of words, and of letters and their powers.

6. The words are systematically presented in the synthesis, being classified by their vowel sounds and terminating consonants; and generally, at the end of each class, they are arranged into little spelling lessons.

7. The learner is immediately initiated into reading lessons, composed of words of two or three letters, and is then led, progressively, into more difficult words.

8. The reading lessons are composed entirely of the words previously presented in the synthesis, or the spelling lessons.

9. The cuts are intended to illustrate the reading lessons, to attract the attention of the young, and to suggest thoughts for oral instruction and for conversation to children.

10. The book constitutes a Primary Spelling-book and Reader,—thus combining two books in one of 144 pages adapted to families and schools.

HIDDEN FOUNTAINS.

BY MISS LAURA EGGLESTON.

In the heart's silent halls,
Where hatred must sleep,
There are beautiful pools,
Clear, sparkling and deep.

Their pure mystic wavelets
Must buried be;
The streams subterranean,
No gorges can see.

The pellucid fountains,
So broad and profound—
The heart may not cross them,
Nor Fancy's line sound.

In the soul's coral caves,
They silently glide;
And the calmer their waters,
The deeper their tide.

Their musical billows
Oft rise in the soul,
Whence feelings in numbers
Mellifluous roll.

And call for responses,
So soft, yet so high,
That earth's finest organs
Lack tones to reply.

THE NEW OLD CONVERT.

When minstrel's tune their harps to sing
The praises of our heavenly king,
My soul is filled with love;
On seraph's wings I seem to fly
To meet my God beyond the sky,
And dwell in realms above.

Love to my God, my heart inspires;
Then angels tune your golden lyres
And loudly sing his praise;
Let mountains, hills, and valleys ring,
All animated nature sing,
And echo heavenly lays.

Oh, had I heard in early youth
The Gospel preached in heavenly truth,
No doubts my heart had filled;
No burning hell my mind had soured;
Nor storms of anguish round me lowered,
Nor thus my bosom chilled.

To cheer and ease my gloomy mind,
In skeptic's gloom I sought to find
Relief from such dark fears,
And thus my golden days I spent;
But still my mind was not content;
But now new light appears.

O, God, return my youthful days,
That I may walk in wisdom's ways!
Vain prayer! that can not be!
I can not my passed life amend;
But what few days I have to spend,
I'll dedicate to thee.

SOCIAL EVILS—ODD FELLOWSHIP.

BY T. B. THAYER.

How manifold are the evils to which man is exposed in making the pilgrimage of Life. How much room, and how much need, is there for the exercise of Love and Charity, for the manifestation in action of that sympathy which is so often uttered in words. Wheresoever we turn, the evidence is abundant, of the temptations, weaknesses, trials, misfortunes, accidents, diseases, wants, sorrows, and multiplied evils of all sorts, to which our fellow-man is exposed.

We see a fellow-man who has been overwhelmed by some sudden and unlooked for revolution in his business. Every thing has been swept away into the vortex of ruin. All the fruits of long and weary years of toil and enterprise, have been lost by a single blow; and he finds himself standing face to face with poverty and want. He is completely discouraged. He has abandoned all hope, and goes about the streets with a melancholy and care-worn face, or sits at home lonely and silent, with a crushed heart. When his name and misfortunes are mentioned, the world pities him; and many regret that he should be so utterly discouraged and hopeless. Some express their conviction, very coolly, that he will soon sink to the grave; or, perhaps, which is worse, he will abandon himself to the fiery cup of intoxication, and so finish the work of ruin. They pity him; and yet, with all this word-pity on their lips, they go their way as carelessly and heartlessly as if their brother's sorrows were unknown to them. And perhaps the next Sunday, they go to church, and hear a sermon, and loudly praise it, from that great command of a great soul, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.'

But man is exposed also to bodily pains and wants. He suffers for bread, for raiment and shelter. He has known what it is to be deprived of healthful food, comfortable clothing, a cheerful dwelling, pure air, and the pleasant light of the sun. Hundreds and thousands are destitute of these wholly, or, in part; and these sufferers are not at the poles, not in Ireland, not in London only, but here all about us, along our daily paths, within sounds of our voice, within reach of our hand.

So of sicknesses—many are the shapes which they assume—the racking cough, the burning fever, the lingering consumption; loss of sight and hearing, paralysis of limbs, broken bones, the decrepitude and helplessness of age. In all these, and many more shapes, does disease come to our brother; and with their awful shadows around him, with their iron and crushing grasp upon him, he is stretched upon the bed of suffering, and oftentimes of agony, for weeks, for long and miserable months, broken in body and spirit, and of the world uncheered; forsaken and forgotten. The great tide of life, and business, and selfishness, rolls on by him; the multitude throng the streets; the manifold voices of his fellows fill the air about him; but few care to step aside from the crowded highway of business or pleasure to sit by him, to watch over his sick bed, to speak pleasant words to him, and so lighten the long and leaden-winged days and nights that go by so heavily.

Such are the sorrows and woes and wants which meet us in all the walks of life; and such, to too great an extent, the indifference with which they are regarded. Shall not something be done to remove or lessen these evils? Shall not something be done to bring men into a better knowledge of the relations existing between them, and into a more perfect obedience to the great law of brotherhood and love? Odd Fellowship answers, Yes! and forthwith sets about realizing the answer. And this is the thing that is needed; this it is that makes Odd Fellowship beautiful, and worthy of all men's love and approbation. It works, instead of talking; it gives action in the place of profession. Where there are want and suffering, it not only pities, but relieves.

'I pity you,' said a man of words, to one who had met misfortune by the way, and been suddenly reduced in the conflict, almost to beggary. 'I pity you very much.' 'How much?' significantly asked a bystander, who had already measured his pity by generous deeds. Yes, truly, how much do you pity and love me? I want evidence of it. What is it to me that you sympathize with me in my griefs, that you say you love me, if you give me no proof of it, when you are abundantly able, and I suffer greatly for want of it? If I am hungry, your word pity, will not make bread for me; nor will it clothe me, if I am naked; nor visit me, if I am sick, nor care for the widow and orphan, if I die. I am somewhat obliged, to be sure, that you feel kindly and lovingly, but I should be much more obliged, if you would act kindly and lovingly, and help to remove the evils which are crushing me to the earth. Right feelings are but the color of the rose; but right actions are the rose itself—color, fragrance, beauty, all conjoined.

Now this, as we have said, is what Odd Fellowship sets itself about—right actions. Silently, without sounding a trumpet before it, without any noisy, wordy sympathy, it goes to the work of relieving, comforting and blessing those who suffer. If calamity has come upon a brother, if his business is prostrated, if misfortune overtake him far from home, the beautiful teachings of the institution are not forgotten; but at once, whatsoever each can do, is done, and the brother is sent on his way rejoicing. If sickness come upon him, the Order watches over him by night and by day; his wants are supplied; the sick room is made comfortable and pleasant; and the ministers of Friendship, Love and Truth, are ever at his side. If he dies, they leave him not; but with a noiseless and delicate attention, the burial preparations are made and they follow him to the grave, and water the green sod with the tears of fraternal affection and regret. And then the widow becomes to them a sister, over whose welfare and interest they watch with a tender solicitude; and the orphans are to them the children of a brother, and they are cared for, till they are placed in safety, and are in the way of obtaining by honest industry, a respectable position in society.

Such is the work of Odd Fellowship; and from this, it will be seen that it does not waste its time and strength in words, in mere idle expressions of regret and sympathy; but, as we have said, does speedily whatsoever needs to be done, and talks afterward. Looking abroad upon society, it sees all the evils which weigh upon it; all the sorrows and sufferings to which man is exposed; and having devised what it believes the best plan for the removal or relief of these, it endeavors to accomplish this so far as its means will allow. And that it has done much, none will deny, who know its history, who have recognized the shining foot-prints which it has left all over the face of our broad land. Many a spot that is green and beautiful as a garden now, but for her presence would be a barren and desolate wilderness. Many a home that is now the abode of comfort, and plenty, and happiness, were it not for what she did in the hour of need, would now be the abode of poverty and wretchedness. And many a one who would have struggled with disease, and gone to the grave neglected, desolate and unblest, has, through the ministries of Odd Fellowship, met the trial with a calm trust, and death has come to him as peacefully and serenely as the close of a summer's day.

With all our heart, we say, then, let this noble institution live and prosper in the future as in the past. Let its followers be true to its broad and generous principles, and obedient to its Heavenly teachings, and it will prosper, and go forward in its divine work of mercy, till the coming in of that glorious era when the tears and griefs, and the woes of this world shall be submerged in the healing tide that shall flow from the fountain of benevolence and peace.

'How long, dear Father, O how long,
Shall this bright hour delay?
Fly swifter round, ye wheels of time,
And bring the promised day.'

THE DAY OF ADVERSITY.

BY REV. N. C. HODGDON.

'If thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength is small.' Prov. xxiv: 10.

The passage here quoted, is one worthy a few moments of serious attention. It was written by the same writer, who said, 'In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider.'

It is a solemn fact, that we are not only the children of prosperity, but of adversity also. And 'it is obviously ordered in Providence, that we are placed in a world where trials constantly beset us, where griefs and joys, and tears and smiles, come mingled together, not merely to render us either sad or happy, but to try to purify, and to discipline the soul.' This we believe to be true. And hence, 'if thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength is small.' Afflictions will come, and strength is then needed. But why is it thus ordered in Providence? Does that kind Being who keepeth the soul, 'render to every man according to his works,' if he chastises, afflicts, and lays the Christian low in spirit? We must answer yes, if we understand the nature and object of these chastisements.

We know that many persons are led to murmur and repine at the dealings of Providence. They faint in the hour of trial—in the day of adversity. But it is the want of spiritual strength that causes this faintness. How, then, can we gain strength for the day of adversity? It is by an acquaintance with God, and a right understanding of his government. Solomon says 'A wise man is strong; yea a man of knowledge increaseth strength.'—Why do we rejoice in prosperity? because we feel that God is blessing us—that he is doing us good—that he loves us. Why then do we faint in adversity? Because we have not wisdom enough to realize that God is still the same. We faint for lack of knowledge, and 'fools die for want of wisdom.' Could we feel that the day of adversity is for our spiritual good, we should not faint. We should be reconciled to the ways of God, and renew our strength day by day. And we should then be enabled to mount up with wings as eagles, to run and not be weary, and to walk and not faint.

Now what do the sacred writers say on this point? To them let us appeal. And we shall here learn, that the day of adversity is for our good, that we may consider in whose hands we are. That we live, and move, and have our being, in a God of love and truth, is quite evident to the intelligent Christian.

The Saviour says, 'As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten.' Rev. iii: 19. St. Paul to his Hebrew brethren has the following remarks, and there are many texts of a similar character in the Bible. 'My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him.—For whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons: for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not? He then goes on to show that we are all partakers of chastisement. And that we have had fathers of our flesh, who corrected us, and we honor them for so doing. 'Shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits and live.' He then states that our fathers of the flesh corrected us 'after their own pleasure,' but God does it for our profit—our benefit—our good—that 'we might be partakers of his holiness.' Here, then, we have one of its objects. 'Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby.' Heb. xii: 5-11.

There are many good people in the world who seem to think that afflictions are designed, mainly as punishment, that adversity is punishment; and they wonder why they are thus punished, while the wicked seem to go unpunished, or escape all affliction. Here is where lies the mistake.—They reason incorrectly, when they suppose that all the afflictions of life are punishments for sins. It is not so. But they are designed to try us. Our Lord tries Peter. He denies his Lord and Master. The Lord wishes to try our faith, and he afflicts us with few or many stripes. He does it to try our strength. If we faint, we may then know that our strength is small. We need spiritual strength, and if we have wisdom, we shall have faith to believe that God is just—and although he afflicts it is for our good—that we may lean upon his arm for support. Why do we need the day of adversity? It is that we may consider on our ways. It is because we live in a world of temptation. We are made subject to vanity, and if we have strength to endure, we shall have a hope which assures us of a happy deliverance from that state of sin and corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God, where sin shall have an end, and death no more hold us in bondage. The Christian who has right views of God and his government, has that strength which will enable him to bear up under the severest trials. He is strong in the Lord, and feels to rejoice with 'joy that is inexpressible.'

We all have heard people complain of life's afflictions. Is it strange? It is not when we realise that they are quite ignorant of God's law and government.

We should seek to learn God's ways, before we call in question his love and goodness. We should bear in mind the words of the poet, when we are pressed down with affliction, or in the day of adversity.

'When darkness and when sorrows rose,
And pressed on every side,
The Lord hath still sustained our steps,
And still hath been our guide.

'Perhaps before the morning dawn,
He will restore our peace;
For he who bade the tempest roar
Can bid the tempest cease.

'Here will we rest, here build our hopes,
Nor murmur at his rod;
He's more to us than all the world,
Our Health, our Life, our God.'

From the fact, that many suppose that afflictions—that adversity, and all life's trials, are designed as punishment for sin; they draw the conclusion that they have more than their part, or share of punishment. But here is one great error into which they have fallen.

The sinner has his punishment for sin—and none but sinners receive punishment. But why does man sin? It is because he yields to temptation. He is drawn away from duty by his own lusts, and enticed. When sin is finished, it bringeth forth death. The Christian is tempted—he is tried—and if he has strength enough to withstand, to encounter, and meet the enemy face to face, he will not give way, and sin. But if he does not possess moral strength enough to overcome, then he will fall, and lose the crown of life.

And there are many, (we are sorry to record it,) who have no right ideas of this matter. They are that class who have known God's love—and the power of the Gospel. But like those spoken of in Job xxxvi: 21, 'Take heed, regard not iniquity: for this hast thou chosen rather than affliction.' We have known even professors of religion, who would flee to the wine cup—and for what? To drown trouble—yes, to drown out adversity—thinking that one evil might offset against another. Let us ponder well, when we are afflicted, before we plunge into the vortex of iniquity.

Christians—we stand in need of more wisdom—that we may have more strength for the day of trial. Our strength is small, if we faint in the day of adversity. Let us all say in truth, 'In the Lord have I righteousness and strength,' for he is clothed with strength and glory.

Let us never forget the words of Solomon. 'A friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity. And there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.'

We have a FRIEND in heaven who has died for us—while on earth he was the friend of sinners.—Let us love our brother man, and strive to make him happy in his adversity. If we are unreconciled to God, let us remember that Jesus shed his blood for us, that we might be 'reconciled in him, to God.'

'This is boundless love indeed,
Jesus is a Friend in need.'

He is all this. Let us love God. As God has promised to give strength to the faint, it is our duty to go to him in a proper way and manner, and ask for wisdom—for spiritual strength, that we may be ready, willing, and able to do our duty, and to walk in the straight and narrow path.

'Sin is the transgression of the law,' and the law is violated because we have not strength sufficient to withstand temptation. We need wisdom to show us the consequences of evil doing. Who that is wise, can rush headlong into vice? No one. It is the simple who pass on and are punished.

There are two kinds of affliction—or what are looked upon as such. 1st. Those which are brought upon us by our own conduct. 2d. Those which are unavoidable so far as we are concerned. The first may be designed as punishment. The second, to try us. Good men and Christians will do right. Bad men and hypocrites will do evil, wrong.—They shall have their reward. Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished.' Let that man who does the will of God, never murmur if the day of adversity comes upon him. Let him not faint, but put on the whole armor of God, and he will receive the crown of life, and reap the reward of his doings. Study the law of God, and implore for assistance, and he who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, will impart all the strength and wisdom which is necessary.

'O my distrustful heart,
How small thy faith appears,
But greater, Lord, thou art
Than all my doubts and fears:
Did Jesus once upon me shine,
Then Jesus is for ever mine.'

Remember, that if thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength is small, and thy faith is weak, and thou hast not that wisdom, which is from above. Ponder well your ways. Reflect on your course, and let the Saviour be your pattern—your guide—and your exemplar. Jesus lives and reigns.

With the above remarks which have been penned amid the dark cloud of adversity, we leave the subject for the present, hoping that the text will be duly considered, and the subject reflected upon in a serious manner.

ROBBING GOD.

'Will a man rob God?' Malachi iii: 8.

The prophet presents a comprehensive summary of the rebellious and idolatrous abominations of the sons of Levi, or the Israelites, in behalf of whom God has given such signal manifestations of mercy and forbearance. When Israel had destroyed themselves by departing from the right ways of the Lord, they found in Him a 'present help in every time of need:' in all their sowings through the wilderness—in all the stenes, both prosperous and adverse, through which they had passed, the Father of mercies changed not in his kindness towards them. Yet notwithstanding the abounding mercies and preserving care of their God and our God, of their Father and our Father, they robbed God 'in tithes and offerings'—in not conforming to the requisitions which Divine Wisdom had seen fit to impose. Who can attentively and reflectingly trace all the career of these very sons of Levi, as also the signal punishment which eventually was meted out to their exceeding wickedness,—and not recognise in the prophetic description of Malachi a pointed regard to the astounding demolition of the Jewish polity,—the destruction of the temple and city of the Jews? That nation robbed God by persisting in a career of abominable wickedness, of hypocrisy, of partialism; by treating with disdain those whom they chose to style 'publicans and sinners,' by continued unrighteous persecution of our blessed Redeemer and his disciples, and by opposing to the extent of their power, God's sublime doctrine of impartial, universal benevolence; and they enacted the acme of their sacriligious and awfully abominable conduct, by crucifying the Lord of glory.

But the unbelieving and disobedient Jews are not the only ones who may, with justice be said to 'rob God:' all those are guilty of this robbery, who give not their hearts to God in hearty faith and consistent obedience; or who, by detracting from the glory of God, would magnify their own goodness and disinterestedness. I. The best evidence we can give of our cordial devotion to the Divine Name, is the discharge, faithfully, of our relative duties; for, he who acts truth, justice, kindness and compassion toward his fellow man, presents to God an oblation more acceptable far than 'all whole-burnt offerings and sacrifices'! He who discharges not with fidelity, the relative duties, can not with any truth be said to have given up his heart to God,—and not to devote the heart and life to the service of him who is Love, is at once robbery of God!

II. According to those who virtually 'deny the Lord that bought them,' our heavenly Father will endlessly torment the creatures of his own hand,—the children of his care! Partialists would save from interminable torture those who are beyond the reach of Divine compassion, but he, whose essence is Love, will not save! All such rob God. When 'professors' represent their own eagerness and burning zeal to save mankind from endless woe, while at the same time they declaim so self-complacently concerning the awful sentence (which according to their vain imaginations) the just Judge of all the earth will pronounce against many of those whom they are so anxious to save,—they are, at the expense of Divine Goodness, boasting of their own 'compassion,' and thus act as though they would steal the affections of God's own children, and place them upon such Pharisees as themselves! We are informed in 2 Samuel xv: that Absalom 'stole the hearts of the men of Israel' from his father David by representing his own superior love for the people. The partialist spirit we are contemplating, has its counterpart in the false and self-complacent representations which this unprincipled young man would make of his readiness to render justice and judgment to the people, beyond what his father would do! All are ready to condemn at once the unfilial conduct of Absalom; and yet, how can any consistently condemn even it, WITHOUT condemning the INFINITELY MORE ABOMINABLE conduct of those who would represent their own willingness to save the world, while they maintain that the Omnipotent God who is Love, will not, or can not effect that blessed result! These affectionate souls would save 'poor sinners' from the hands of Divine Love, and bestow upon them such compassion as their foolish creeds teach, the God of INFINITE compassion will not bestow! How truly do all such vain boasters rob God!

CONFERENCE MEETINGS.

It is with much pleasure that I have seen of late an increased interest manifested in regard to Conference meetings. And the object of these remarks is not to lessen but to increase if possible the interest already manifested in regard to them: for I am of the opinion that their importance is not yet fully realized and their benefits fully appreciated among us. Permit me to say, that, if the importance of the Conference meeting and the benefits to be derived therefrom could be fully estimated, there would not be found one society in our denomination that would try to live any longer without them.

The importance of the Conference meeting is demonstrated by observation and experience.—What society is it that is the most prosperous? Is it not the one that is the oftenest seen to meet together for prayer and praise—the one that attends to the ordinances of God's house—in short, the one that realizes the importance of the conference and the prayer meeting? But the importance of the conference meeting would be seen from the fact that the different Christian sects and the world at large would know whom we recognised and fellowshiped as Universalists. There are many whom our opposers think we recognise and fellowship as such, for whom we have no fellowship whatever: for they would be a disgrace to any profession and almost any cause. But if the conference meeting was instituted, you would not find them there; and they would array themselves under their proper colors and be seen in their truelight. And it would be apparent to all that they are not of us. But so long as they have no means by which to distinguish between those that serve God and those that serve him not, they conclude that all that assume the name are real Universalists, and hence many are prejudiced against us, that might otherwise be brought to believe the truth.

But another reason why conference meetings are important, is because the neglect of them causes our opposers to think we have no relish for spiritual things, but that we believe that if we act on the principles of honesty and fair dealing we do our whole duty and perform all of God's requirements. But I charitably hope for the sake of truth and the cause of Christ, there are few such among us. But if any such there are, I would say in the language of inspiration, 'Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead and Christ shall give thee light.'—And they of the contrary part conclude that, if such are the views of Universalists—if they have got to give up the conference and the prayer meeting, with all of its joys, its blessings and its happiness, and do only what an Atheist might perform, they had better stay where they are! and perhaps they will exclaim, 'my soul come not thou into their secret, and unto their assembly, mine honor, be not thou united.' Thus hundreds oppose, not on account of our doctrines, but our practice. But if we institute and keep up the conference and the prayer meeting among us, and take our stand with other religious sects in this respect, and show to the world that Universalists can praise, and pray, with a better relish and more consistency than other denominations, hundreds and thousands that now stand aloof from us, would come into our ranks, and thus the truth would run and be glorified.

But not only as it regards others, is the conference meeting important; but as it regards our own spiritual welfare and improvement—as it regards our growth in grace and in the knowledge of the truth. The conference meeting of all others, is best calculated to confirm our faith, and perfect us in love. Where is it, my brethren, that the mourner can be comforted, the weak strengthened, and the discon-solate raised up. It is at the conference meeting. Where is it that we can tell each other our desires, our expectations, and our hopes? Where is it that we can confess our faults to our brethren, and resolve to do better for the time to come? Where is it that we can feel a heaven begun below so truly as in the conference meeting? And where is it that we can have 'the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace,' feel strengthened and encouraged to pursue our Christian journey so effectually as here? It is here we can speak of our Father's goodness, and talk of his power, and feel to say with the poet,

'My willing soul would stay
In such a frame as this,
And sit and sing herself away
To everlasting bliss.'

If such, then, my brethren, are some of the benefits arising from conference meetings, shall we longer neglect them, or regard them as of but little importance? Is it not time that we fully awake to this subject, and see if we are doing all that we can to promote peace on earth and good will to man? Have we not, my brethren, in discarding some of the doctrines of orthodoxy, forgotten some of its practices which are highly useful and necessary, and calculated, when directed by enlightened charity, to make us happier and better? Have we not, while looking at the errors and extremes of others, concluded that there is little if any thing good among them, and thus run into the opposite extreme? and in our zeal to root up the tares, have we not in some measure rooted up the wheat also? If so, let us retrace our steps and begin to do works meet for repentance.

Pardon my frankness and my plain dealing with you, my brethren, on this subject; it is because I love the cause I have espoused, and long for its prosperity, that I raise my voice on this subject. I am led to believe, by my observation in regard to this matter, that we have wandered from duty in this respect; while we have endeavored to avoid the errors and extremes of our orthodox brethren, we have unconsciously run into the opposite extreme; and should we retrace our steps in this particular, a different aspect of things would soon be presented. Yes, my brethren, let the conference meeting be instituted in every society in our denomination, and at every meeting of our Associations; and the result would be glorious to behold; and it would fill our hearts with consolation and joy. We would be more zealous, more elevated and more spiritual. Opposition to us, in a great measure, would cease—prejudice would be removed—and the glorious Gospel of the Son of God would take the wings of the morning and fly to the uttermost parts of the earth—superstition would die away—doctrines that dishonor God and degrade man would be swept from the earth—and the wilderness would, ere long, bud and blossom as the rose.

MINUTES

Of the Susquehanna Association of Universalists for 1846.

Met at Brooklyn, Oct. 7, and continued in session two days; Br. C. Leet, Moderator, Br. A. N. Bullard, Clerk. Received into fellowship the society of Sterlingville and Mehoopeny. Voted that the preacher of the next occasional sermon be instructed to give as much of the history of the rise and progress of Universalism within the bounds of the Association as practicable. Approved the undertaking of Br. J. S. Palmer in starting a paper at Montrose for the spread of Universalism in Pa.

Committee on discipline report no complaint—report accepted. Committee on fellowship and ordination. Report in favor of conferring ordination upon Br. J. B. Gilman. Report accepted. Standing Clerk reported that Conference had been held in Montrose and Friendsville.

Resolved, That our delegates to the State Convention be directed to appoint delegates to the U. S. Convention, who will say to them that our Association claims the right of judging of the qualifications of our own preachers, and that the U. S. Convention have no right to reject any one, of Associational appointment or ordination.

Said committee report that Brs. J. S. Palmer, C. Leet, and E. Hoag, be a committee on fellowship and ordination; Brs. G. W. Lewis, J. B. Gilman, and G. W. Palmer, committee of discipline; Br. J. B. Gilman, preacher of the next occasional sermon, with power to appoint substitute; Brs. J. S. Palmer, and E. Hoag, clerical, and Brs. P. Arnold, E. Mowry Jr. and A. N. Bullard, lay, delegates to the State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes; Br. J. B. Gilman, Standing Clerk. Report accepted. Committee on adjournment, reported in favor of Benton, Luzerne county, Pa. Report accepted.

Received letters of fellowship from Brs. O. G. Hemstedt and F. P. Hollister, granted by this body.

Voted, that the Standing Clerk appoint Conferences on application.

Adoted the following preamble and resolutions: Whereas, The object of all good government, is the reformation of the offender, and not his destruction,—and whereas, we believe the law of Capital Punishment to be directly opposed to the letter and spirit of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and calculated to exert a demoralizing influence in society—therefore

Resolved, That we will use all laudable efforts to get this cruel code erased from the statute books of our State, and from every State in the Union; and that we consider the circulation of petitions, (praying our Senators and Representatives to abolish said law,) to be one of the laudable means for the accomplishment of this object.

Resolved, That we hail with pleasure the Washingtonian reformers, and earnestly recommend their principles to the notice, and their examples to the practice, of the people within the bounds of this Association, and throughout the world.

Voted, that these minutes be published in the Gospel Missionary, and that the Magazine and Advocate and Universalist Union be requested to copy.

Adjourned to meet in Benton, Luzerne county, Pa., on the first Wednesday and following Thursday of Oct., 1847. C. LEET, Moderator.

MINUTES.

Of the Proceedings of the Missionary Society of the Chenango Association of Universalists for 1846.

Assembled in North Norwich, Chenango county, September 3d, and performed the business herein specified.

Appointed Brs. Goodrich, Shipman and Hamilton, a committee to nominate the officers of this society for the following year, who named the succeeding, all of whom were unanimously chosen.

Hon. C. Cole, Oxford, Chenango county, President; Rev. C. L. Shipman, Columbus, Vice President; Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Oxford, Secretary; A. Tilloison, Esq., East Greene, Treasurer.

TRUSTEES IN CHENANGO COUNTY.—T. G. Lamb, Columbus; Dr. E. S. Lyman, Sherburne; F. W. Ingersoll, Norwich; Russel Case, Esq., Smyrna; — Dodge, Plymouth; Herrinton Willcox, Oxford; C. L. Bebee, Esq., Lincklaen; H. N. Drew, German; Henry Brown, East Pharsalia; Mason Whipple, McDonough; Lyman Smith, Preston; W. D. Wheeler, Greene; Cornelius Church, South Bainbridge; E. Naramore, New Berlin; Zeba Beardsley, Coventry; A. Hamilton, Esq., Guilford; Eli Thompson, South Otselic; Rev. A. O. Warren, Smithville Flatts.

TRUSTEES IN BROOME COUNTY.—Rev. William M. Delong, Binghamton; P. Hooper, Union; N. Dwight, Windsor; Rev. W. Perry, Upper Lisle; Moses Adams, Lisle; Thomas Karson, Colesville; Isaiah Fuller, Sanford; L. M. Rose, Barker; N. Benjamin, Vestal.

TRUSTEES IN DELAWARE COUNTY.—J. Thompson, Esq., Franklin; Casby Rodgers, Davenport Centre; Stephen Olmstead, East Davenport; John Jay, Kortright; William Woodard, Colchester, Beaverkill P. O., Sullivan county; W. S. Crawford, Delhi; Daniel Odle, Harpersfield; William St. Johns, Walton; Thomas Coon, Tompkins; Aaron Baxster, Hancock; James Adams, Hamden; O. N. Crane, Sidney, (Unadilla P. O., Otsego county); Lyman Beach, Masonville; A. Stephenson, Stamford; Daniel Follet, Roxbury.

The Secretary read the letters he had received from the Trustees.

Br. O. Whiston was re-elected Missionary.—The President and Vice President were both absent a portion of the time, and Br. Smith was appointed President pro tem.

Resolutions passed.—Resolved, That the Missionary shall be entitled to $4 for each sermon on Sunday A. M. and P. M. at the usual hours, and $2 for each week day or week day evening lecture, in places at convenient distances and ordinarily easy of access to and from other places where he labors.

Resolved, That for supplying places unusually remote or difficult of ingress or egress, and for all third discourses upon the Sabbath, the amount shall be fixed upon by the Missionary and the Trustees in the town where he labors.

Resolved, That each Trustee shall be personally responsible to the Missionary for his compensation for such portion of the time as he engages him.

Resolved, That the amount raised in the societies and places where the Missionary does not labor, be appropriated, 1st, to defray the contingent expenses of this society, 2d, to pay Br. Bullard the balance due him on his temporary engagement with this society, which closed two years since, 3d, for missionary service at $2 a lecture in towns where there are no Trustees and it may be considered expedient, and where that sum shall not be received, 4th, to aid such places upon application to the Board, as have raised all the funds they possibly can, but less than they really need.

Resolved, That all fees for membership, and all subscriptions of less than one dollar, be paid down or within three months, and all larger subscriptions within six months from the time of subscribing.

Resolved, That the Missionary shall give an account to the Board, at its next annual meeting, of the number of discourses he delivers in, and the amount he receives from, each place.

Resolved, That the President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer, be a central committee, to converse with the Missionary from time to time upon the best means of advancing the cause; also that they be empowered to supply all places that can not or do not engage Br. Whiston, on such terms as may be mutually agreed.

Resolved, That the Central Committee may appoint individuals to deliver addresses at such times and places as they deem most expedient, and may publish, in such medium as they prefer, whatever is best calculated to advance the Missionary cause.

Public notice having been given of such intended amendment a reasonable time previous, it was unanimously resolved, That the last sentence of the fifth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, be so amended as to read, one sixth of the Board shall constitute a quorum for action.

In accordance with the universal sentiment of the society, it was Resolved, That the thanks of this Board be presented to Br. Whiston, for the able, satisfactory, successful and Christian manner in which he has performed his Missionary labors.

Resolved, That Br. Goodrich be earnestly requested to assist Br. Whiston as much as is necessary; that all the labor the good of the society demands may be performed.

Instructed the Treasurer to order the Trustees in places where they make contracts with Br. Whiston, to pay him for his services when due, and take his receipt for the Treasurer.

Selected the Secretary to prepare so much of the doings of this meeting as are important, for publication in the Universalist papers in this State, attended with such reflections as he thinks required.

Adjourned to meet in Binghamton, Broome county, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday of September, 1846.

LYMAN SMITH, President pro tem.

J. T. GOODRICH, Secretary.

NOTE.—The above minutes were intended to have been sent to the Magazine and Advocate, before my journey to the East; seven or eight weeks since; but were not, owing to an error for which no one is deeply censurable, because it was unintentional; however much myself and others have been disappointed; or seriously regretted their nonappearance. Not seeing the papers during my absence, nor having had time since my return to examine all of them until now, I have but just discovered that the proceedings of our meeting have not been published; and, upon examination, find that they were not mailed. As no one has called my attention to it, I presume the movements of the society have not been materially injured by the delay, and hope the innocent mistake will be excused by all. At this late day it is not deemed advisable to append any remarks upon the business transacted. J. T. G.

N. B. Universalist papers in this State are requested to copy the above.

Oxford, November 19th, 1846.

NEW BOOKS.

We have just received the 'ROSE OF SHARON' for 1847. It is got up in the usual beautiful style, and embellished with seven fine engravings on steel, including the vignette title page. The contents are varied and excellent, and of which a more extended notice will hereafter be given. Price $2.00. Call soon, as we have received but a limited supply.

Br. T. J. Sawyer authorizes us to receive subscriptions or donations to the Theological Institute. Any one who may wish can therefore remit direct to this office, and the receipt of the money will be acknowledged in the Magazine and Advocate.

A MEDITATION.—A GLANCE AT THE GLORIES ON THE OTHER SIDE CREATION.

BY REV. W. D. BRADFORD.

All at once I find myself in an unbounded flood of bliss, a spacious sea of glory; lost in wonder amidst ineffable divinities, and transported with the raptures of seraphic harmony.

The first and reigning glory is, that Jehovah keeps his royal court in person here. His dwelling place is enriched with the richest profusion of his love, with the brightest displays of his goodness; and, while all his ransomed rejoice in his excellent glory, what ardor glows in every soul, what rapture swells in every song! O, the adorable displays of his perfections! the manifestations of his goodness, the outpourings of his love! and the intercourse that is between him and his children—all men! The fulness of the Father, treasured up in the Son, dispensed by the Spirit, is the crown-charter of the kingdom above, where the royal privilege of every inhabitant carries him to the utmost extent of communicable glory.—What buildings are these? They be the palaces of the great King; the mansions of our Immanuel, of which there are many in his Father's house; and they are all magnificent, founded in grace, and furnished with glory.—'The beams of our house are cedar, and the rafters are fir.' Age shall never enter here, and nothing shall decay. 'The King is held in the galleries.' What a beautiful city is the New Jerusalem, 'the mother of us all!' of which the Lord God and the Lamb are the light! How glorious are its gates, where pearls of essential beauty sparkle! and all the attributes of God blaze divinely bright! There trophies of eternal victory lie beneath Immanuel's feet. He is our elder brother, our near kinsman, and our husband. This is the relation from which our grandeur springs, our being married into the high and honorable family of heaven. What a blessing is it to be brethren to the Son of God, and hear him to us in that capacity declare his Father's name!

O the assimilating beams of glory that dart from his eyes, and shoot likeness with the ray! We see him, and are like him; we are like him, and love him, and are eternally happy! No wonder that the world was such a waste and howling wilderness, such a dry and thirsty desert, such a land of heat and drought, compared to the heavenly Canaan, where the rivers of pleasures overflow their banks for ever. Why did we expect joys on earth? Our mortal frames could not borne the transports of eternal day; yea, here it is all we can do to bear the brightness of his beams. O love! O rapture! O ecstatic joys! O everlasting heaven! The general assembly, now meet on the holy Mount Zion, the joy of the whole heaven, is an assembly of god's, all sons of the Highest, and the Lord God of gods, the Lord God of gods, dwell among them! O ineffable glory! to dwell forever in the royal pavilion of heaven, in most intimate communion with the King eternal, immortal, and invisible! What rapturous notes are these I hear? The song of Moses and the Lamb. My soul dissolves in praise, my spirit pours out in sweet hosannas, all heaven is melody, angels accent in song. O the charming anthems of glory! O the high strokes of the harpers round the throne! The song of the redeemed is the song of songs. We will sing to thee while we live, while we have our being we will bless thee. Weeping endured for a little, through the short night of time, but joy is come in the morning of the resurrection; and we have a song in this solemn assembly, and gladness, being come into the house of the Lord.—Our happiness shall utter hallelujahs, our glory sing thy praise, and never be silent. Sing ye inhabitants of eternity, shout from the mountains of myrrh, and hills of frankincense, where ye rest, and are refreshed for ever. And shall these ravishing hosannas never end, these songs of love never cease? O life of angels! O warbles of eternal noon! for we rest not day nor night to sing of all thy glory. Say, was I ever sad? What, although, since now my sackcloth is loosed, and I am girt with gladness. Here, to the glory of the bounteous Giver, we have all things common. This God, this glory, this upmaking all, my fellow brethren, without my loss, is yours, and, without any prejudice to you, is also wholly mine. Here we drink at life's immortalizing stream, and with eternal joy draw water out of the wells of salvation. From the rivers of thy pleasures, O God! thou wilt make us largely drink. 'Eat, O friends! drink, yea, drink abundantly, O belov'd! for in my presence there is fulness of joy, and at my right hand are pleasures evermore.' O thou that art as my brother, I have found thee; not within the promise, not in the ordinances, as in the days of my flesh, but without, in the most ample displays of thy eternal love, in the open fields of glory, and shall bless thee, and not be despised. I have found thee, and shall hold thee, and not let thee go through all eternity.

Here we receive out of his fulness, and grace for grace, and glory for glory. Our possession is worthy of our liberal Giver. We have a kingdom which can not be moved, an inheritance undefiled, and that fadeth not away; a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. We have garments of glory, a crown of righteousness, a crown of life; the tree of life to feed upon, the fountain of life to drink of, and the garden of God to walk in. We have life above the reach of death, health secured from sickness, and pleasure without pain. Our bodies (future bodies) are immortal, our souls immaculate, our senses sanctified, our conceptions spiritualized, our faculties enlarged, and our whole soul replenished with divinity. Our past bliss is present with us in the sweet remembrance, our present bliss entrances in the enjoyment, and our future bliss is present with us in the full assurance of our eternal felicity. Thus we are for ever blessed to the highest degree. We are above all fear, beyond anxiety and doubt, and fixed above all change. Our service is sincere, our adorations ardent, our knowledge profound and satisfying. Rapture rushes in at every part; our eyes are ravished with seeing the King in his beauty, our ears with hearing the songs of the inner temple, our nose with the fragrance of the Rose of Sharon, the Plant of renown; our feet with standing in his holy place; our hands with handling of the word of life; and our mouth with the wine of our Beloved, that goeth down sweetly, causing our souls to shout aloud, and the lips of us who were once silent in death, asleep in the grave, to sing, and never cease.

Our fruition of his fulness, our vision of his perfections and glory, our interest in his offices and relations, our union to the Son, our communion with the beatified angels, and our participation with the divine nature, constitute our most exalted bliss, and are the heaven of heavens. These are the years of the right hand of the Most High. Here He, of whom Solomon in all his majesty was once a languid type, is crowned with all the brightness of his Mediatorial glory; and this is the day of eternal espousals, the day of the gladness of his heart. The Father and the Bridegroom are come, and the Spirit and the Bride are come, and every creature in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, are now come to the marriage supper of the Lamb, for all things are now ready. The banquet is prepared, and the guests are bidden; the table is furnished, and the company set down; and all mankind are to eat the bread of life in the kingdom of God; in that kingdom where 'flesh and blood can not enter.' O, the sweetness of the Lamb of God! O, the honied excellency of the true manna, that came down to earth to feed us there, and is taken up to heaven to feast us here. O, the table discourse of glory! O the melting language of mutual love! we never knew what communion was till here. The banquet shall never be ended, the table never drawn, the guests shall never scatter, they shall go no more out, and come no more in. The Father hath loved the Son, and given all things into his hands; the Son hath loved us, and given us all things richly to enjoy. The Father hath loved us as his own Son! Love is love here indeed! O, the sacred familiarity that is in love! O, the kindness of Immanuel's heart! Father, I will that those whom thou hast brought hither, see all my glory which thou hast given me, for they love me, and delight in my glory. Lord, thou that knowest all things, knowest that we love thee, and that our happiness is in beholding thy glory. O, what torrents of eternal love teem from the throne into our souls! Now, we know that 'God is love,' and in his love he rests towards us. And dost thou delight in the work of thy hands? Art thou charmed with the love of thy creatures? 'Turn away your eyes, for they have overcome me!' Nay, Lord, we have fixed our eyes on thee, O, thou that art fairer than the sons of men, than the angels of God; and there they shall be fixed, and feast for ever. Our eyes shall dwell on thee, and our hearts fly out after thee. Glory is a native of the better country. Glory has her habitation in our land.—Darkness is debarred the regions of eternal day, and sorrow banished the realms of bliss. Our winter is over and gone, our spring is in perpetual verdure, our summer in eternal bloom; our Sun is in his height, our day is at its noon, and there is no night here. Our love is in the flame, and our well-beloved is ours, and we are his; he feedeth among the lilies. The day is broke, and the shadows blown away, and we walk with him in white; yea, we are changed from glory to glory by the Spirit of the Lord that dwells in us, and are called up into the mount of communion, from which we shall never come down; and here we talk and speak face to face, with him, as a man speaketh unto his friend; and our hearts burn within us, while he talks with us, and opens up to us the mystery of redemption, (if a mystery,) the wonders of his love. Here we search with serenity, satisfaction, and joy, into the secrets of eternity, into all the deep things of God. The nonplussing contingencies of our transitory life shine now with harmony, wisdom, and goodness through the whole; and, though we were stumbled at our own afflictions, yet now we adore his conduct, and confess, that we could not wisely inquire concerning the matter below. Now religion triumphs, piety is vested in her honorary robes, and all those that stood boldly up for the honor of the King, when trampled upon by his demented enemies, go forth in his glorious train, clothed in the garments of salvation with a fair crown upon their head, and the royal proclamation made from the throne. Thus shall it be done through eternity to Adam's posterity whom the King delighteth to honor. Blessed is the world whom thou hast thus chosen, and made approach unto thee. Surely they are abundantly satisfied with thy goodness, which thou preparedst for them when they were poor, with the divine bounty of thy temple. Thou hast crowned the year of thy grace, with thine eternity of glory. The hills of glory rejoice on every side, and the heavens shout and sing to thee, for thou hast made them glad. Though our enemies rode over our heads in the days of trouble and turmoil, yet we had power over them in the dawn of glory, in the morning of the resurrection. Though we did pass through the fires of persecution, through the waters of adversity, yea, through the rapid stream of dissolution at last, yet thou hast brought us to a wealthy land, so that we have a goodly heritage; and the lines are fallen to us in pleasant places, being led to the goodly mount which thy right hand had purchased for us, O Immanuel!

Here will I pay my vows through all eternity, which I spake in the day of my trouble, in the land of my pilgrimage. O love! never to be forgot, which has brought me safely through so many winding labyrinths, and crooked paths, in sight of so many enemies, in spite of so many temptations, in spite of the accusation of my sins, the rebellion of my lusts, the carnality of my affections, and the weakness of all my graces, to stand at last for ages on an even place, and bless God in the congregation of sinless adorers. Here our vision is full and assimilating, our fruition satisfying and solacing, and our communion free and uninterrupted. O, how rapturous to begin converse with the God of glory for eternity! We have found him in Bethel, in his own house, in his own heaven, and here we speak with him. Yea, we weep for joy, and pour out acclamations of ecstasy, since he will never go away.—We have power over the uncreated angel, and in the struggles of seraphic love, we wrestle and prevail with him, that he shall never, never, never leave us. O the pleasure that is in his presence! O the exuberant rivers of joy that flow at his right hand! How much better is his love than life, and the light of his countenance than the possession of ten thousand creations!

O, eternity! once the comfort of our longing expectations, now the transport of our enlarged souls! For we are ever with the Lord, seeing his unclouded face, wearing his divine name, drinking at the streams of his pleasures, eating of his hidden manna, sitting beneath the tree of life, basking under the beams of the Sun of righteousness, singing hallelujahs to him that loved us, that washed us in his blood, and brought us hither, sharing in his dominions, and dividing the spoil, for the lame share the prey with the Almighty Conqueror. Here we dwell in God, and he in us; we know his love, are transformed into his glorious likeness, and made partakers of his divine nature. O, state of complete happiness, and consummate bliss, only to be apprehended in the possession, known in the enjoyment, and understood in its eternal duration! Now the day has broken, the shadows fled away, and all is eternal noon! Not a desire we had, but, larger than its dimensions, is fulfilled; not a request, but, more than it contained, is granted; and the whole soul is satisfied and replenished with the divine plentitude of thy superabundant goodness.

Come, my beloved, let us hold the most intimate communion; here will I give thee my love. Blessed I! What glories blaze! what wonders rise! what ardors glow within! All is light and glory, all joy and exultation! all is transport and praise, all astonishment and wonder! all is vision and likeness, all fruition and satisfaction! all is God! God and the Lamb are all in all, to all the nations, families, and kindred of the earth, through ages all. Amen.

A LIMITARIAN'S DESCRIPTION OF A UNIVERSALIST.

The following wonderful article is from the 'Christian Advocate and Journal,' a Methodist paper published in New York city, for which we are indebted to the 'New York Christian Messenger.' A good, honest, Christian Methodist is that Mr. Lesley, the writer of the article, to give to the Methodist public so ingenuous a description of our Universalist brother in the mountains. Here it is—read it with care, and note its most striking features.

'A DAY IN THE MOUNTAINS.'

'The other day I left Tombs on Pine Creek, with Br. Johnson in the waggon, and separating at the first house in the Tombs-Run settlement, he took the waggon over to, and down Lary's Creek, and I the knapsack to the farm houses among the hills and down Canoe creek, and we met again at six o'clock of the second day. After visiting a half dozen houses within a circle of two miles, I set off after dinner to visit a family living alone in the woods to the north. I followed the stoniest sort of a road up the draft in the mountains; ascended about eight hundred feet in about two miles and a half, and heard voices in the wood to the right. These proved to be the father, mother and daughter, picking huckleberries that fairly covered the ground. 'Well, stranger,' said the man, as I approached, 'I reckon your lost, ain't you?' 'No,' said I, 'I reckon you're the man, I've come to find.' 'I reckon not,' said he. I commenced picking berries and putting them into the cup he had half full in his hand—told him who I was, and what I was about; told him I had heard he was a believer in universal salvation, and would be glad to talk about it; and so we did. And we talked nearly four hours straight ahead, a solemn, earnest discussion, Bible in hand, and respect and love on both sides. We picked, and talked, and walked towards his cabin, into which he invited me. It was a shantee built of sapling poles, and wall and roof, and all of shingles. Here they had lived the winter through on the mountain top, two miles from the nearest house—the hard trodden earth for a floor, and the thickness of a shingle between them and the north wind.

'I found him a man of original thought, and indomitable intellectual independence. He had no book but the Bible in his house, and knew it almost by heart. His language was pure and strong, but disuse made him awkward, and often incoherent in argument. He told me his experience. He had been to the anxious bench in youth; the son of Methodist parents, desiring religion, and supposing he had got it. But the fear of hell troubled him.—He studied the Bible uninterruptedly for seven months with his wife, and would often throw it down in terror, saying, 'If I read more I shall be a Universalist.' At last, he said he was taught to see the Saviour, and enabled to receive him as the Saviour of the world, and his heart was filled with peace.

'I asked him how his views of Christ affected his views of duty? He answered, they made him strictly moral and scrupulously just. I asked him how they affected his feelings towards Christians? He answered, but not so decidedly, that they made him sympathise with, and love the brethren. Did he unite with any church? No, he gave to assist all, &c.

'You may suppose I was interested. I had great liberty in using the Scripture, and we were often both reduced to silence by emotion. I seemed to spread the whole word of God out before him from Genesis to John; but he said he could not believe in an eternal hell, or he should go wild with fear. 'Fear,' said I, 'have you not got your Saviour. 'But for others, to think of my friends and the world; I love my fellows too much.'—'And will you be more compassionate than God?' On every other point he spoke like an humble Christian.—How sadly will man's reason spoil God's revelation!

'He gave me supper, would have me stay all night; showed me his little clearing, a rood of wheat, a patch of potatoes, and ten stalks of corn. But when I gave him the only copy of Nelson I had, and insisted upon going, he bade me adieu, saying the man must be a good man who would ascend that mountain two miles and a half to ask him how he stood with heaven. The impression of a single visit like this is permanent upon a neighborhood. The sun set as I emerged from the woods at the foot of the mountain.

'The next day I started at half-past six o'clock, and stopping only to dine, went zigzagging from house to house, over a country at once most beautifully picturesque, and most harassing to the pedestrian. The houses are all located upon streams in deep ravines. A hill of one, two, or three hundred feet must be crossed in passing between almost every two houses. Many of the families were German, but all seemed industrious and kind; very destitute of books, but all supplied with the Bible, and ready to purchase books; and able to attend preaching at least every two weeks. Numbers seemed most excellent, pious people. It was a day of constant and ever varied interest; and I now can thoroughly understand, how it is a colporteur can look forward through an interminable series of days, each to be spent in toil of extraordinary severity, yet show no signs of flinching. The fact is, there is an endless diversity of interesting scenes to destroy that monotony which the human soul can not endure, and there is the same 'sowing in confident hope' that enables the dibbler to step from hill to hill, and drop his four corn grains into each, across a field of fifty acres in extent. No work, perhaps, uses up its own smoke more completely to feed its fires, than colportage.

'P. LESLEY.'

It is hardly necessary that we should offer a word of comment upon the foregoing epistle of Mr. Lesley. The hero of his story was a genuine Universalist indeed; familiarly acquainted with the Scriptures, and a reverent lover of their teaching—having looked in vain for satisfaction in narrow human creeds, he found the needed 'peace of mind' in the reception of Scripture truth, the faith of Christ as the Saviour of the world. He was made pure and obedient by his faith, and he 'loved his fellows too much' to be satisfied with a mere selfish hope.

It appears that Mr. Lesley asked that Bible Christian, 'Will you be more compassionate than God?' This seems to have been an effort to induce him to expunge from his heart that unyielding love for his neighbors, by presenting him with a God who had not compassion for them. But Mr. Lesley's was an idol God, and he could not persuade the Bible Christian to exchange the true for the false. It was in the very spirit of the living God, whose nature 'is love' who is 'good to all' who is 'kind to the unthankful and the evil,' that our brother in the mountains had too much love for his neighbors to rest in peace without a hope for their ultimate welfare. The same hope is indispensable to the comfort of every soul, who fulfils the royal law—'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.'—[Christian Freeman.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1846.

A WORD TO UNIVERSALIST PREACHERS.

Brethren, we wish to have a brief communion with you on the subject of our papers and periodicals. As a publisher of a Universalist paper, experience has taught us, that to you in a very considerable degree, is owing the circulation and prosperity of our papers, and through them the spread and success of Gospel truth—Universalism. We may add that the publisher's pecuniary success is more or less directly or indirectly owing to your efforts, and he ought to be, and doubtless is, (we know we are,) grateful for your assistance.

We hope however, that we shall not be thought to err greatly, when we say that, from the above named causes, all the prosperity and success, does not accrue to the paper and publisher, but that your good and welfare, is somewhat intimately connected with, and in a measure, dependent on the success of our periodicals.

Through them you have a medium to make your views on moral subjects—on subjects connected with the great salvation, known to the public, establishing reputations, moral and intellectual, as writers, and as defenders of the 'faith once delivered to the saints.'

Through such a medium not only are your thoughts and opinions given to the world, but your sojournings and wanderings, your labors and trials in the good cause are chronicled. Your claims, necessities, and rights are made known. Are not the benefits mutual then, as well as individual? And in such view, is it not a duty you owe to God, the cause and yourselves, to use your best endeavors to assist in extending the circulation of our periodicals and publications, and moreover to forward the cause of enlightened Christianity by wielding your pens in its behalf?

We think no one can or will deny the truth of this.—Fulfil that duty then, and rich will be your reward.

We are about to make a proposition, but before doing so, must state a simple fact, which is this. We have noticed as an almost invariable rule, that where our largest and best lists of subscribers are, there our preachers are most active in extending our circulation, are best paid for their services as preachers, have the largest congregations, and most flourishing societies. Such we think might be the case in many more instances than now. And such we hope may soon be the case.

But to the proposition, and while we frankly acknowledge that in making it, we have an eye to our benefit, we hope it will result in a mutual one to all parties concerned. We propose to send the next volume of the Magazine and Advocate, to all the located preachers in this State without charge. If they can aid us with their pens, or by procuring advance paying subscribers, their favors will be thankfully acknowledged.

To preachers in other States, we will send the next volume if they will procure four subscribers, and forward five dollars. Or if they will procure ten subscribers and send ten dollars we will send them the eleventh copy. Or if they will write four or more articles of moderate length, such as will be deemed suitable to our columns by the Editor, shall receive a copy. Or if they neither write or obtain subscribers, shall receive a copy by remitting one dollar free of postage.

We shall be glad to have any and all of our ministering brethren of other States accede to either of these propositions, who may feel disposed, and they, as well as those of our own State, shall be specially welcome to our columns.

In closing, allow us to suggest to all, the propriety of reading the prospectus to your congregations or handing it to some active parishioner, who might feel disposed to increase our circulation. Hoping to hear from many of you ere the commencement and during the progress of the coming year, we take present leave of you, and whether you extend to us your greeting or not—while we return our sincere thanks to those who have bestowed upon us many substantial and valued favors in the past—we invoke heaven's choicest blessings upon you, one and all. THE MODERN HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM.

Br. Thos. Whittemore, the author of the above named work, published, we believe, about sixteen years ago, is about getting out a new edition. For the purpose of procuring the materials for improving the work, he lately visited Clinton, where, in charge of Br. T. J. Sawyer, Secretary, is the Library of the 'Universalist Historical Society.' In a late number of the Trumpet he gives a description of his journey and visit to Clinton, from which we extract the following paragraph.

'Br. Sawyer, as we have said, is the Secretary of the Universalist Historical Society. This society was originally contemplated by himself; and at the session of the General Convention in Albany in 1834, he brought the scheme forward, which met with universal favor. The Society was formed; and from that day until the present, he has been its main spring. The object was to interest the whole body of the Universalist public, but more especially the clergy, in the history of the sect and its doctrine; to create a depository for Universalist books, and publications of every description, but more especially those rare works which are seldom found in this country, and many of which are in foreign languages. Br. Sawyer has devoted no small share of his time, in seeking out works of this description; in doing which he has examined 50,000 pages of European catalogues. Ancient books on the subject of Universalism are found with much difficulty, as the world has been more famous for keeping such things out of sight, than for bringing them forward to public attention. Among other valuable works which we saw, were two volumes of J. W. Petersen's Apokatastasis Pantos, (or 'Restitution of All Things,') which was published in three large folios, about 1700—1710. It is in the German language, and Br. Sawyer hopes yet to obtain the third volume. Petersen appears to have been a man of far more learning, talent and consequence, than he is described as having been in the first edition of the Modern History of Universalism. The Universalist public in this country may feel assured, that they scarcely know one half the history of modern Universalism; and should life and health be spared us, we hope, at no distant day, to bring out an edition of the Modern History of that doctrine, which shall cover a much larger share of the whole ground, than the first edition did. The first edition was the first effort of the kind; and for the advantages which were then had in this country to such an undertaking, it was perhaps respectable. Works of this description are not profitable to those who make them; the first edition never yielded one cent in compensation for the long labor which it cost. But it will not do to neglect the history of our sect and sentiments; and if the labor can not be done for pecuniary reward, it must be done for other considerations. We have the happiness to say, that the materials for the chapter on Germany, for the new edition, will be furnished by Br. Sawyer.'

Br. Whittemore's apology for not calling on us, on account of the increasing inflammation in his wounded limb, is entirely satisfactory; although we should really have been glad of a visit from him, on several accounts. We are not, perhaps, so much given to wooing, and coping, and billing, and puffing, as some of our 'down East' brethren are, or have been of late; but then we are always glad to see our friends, and to entertain them in our homely manner as best we can. Moreover, in this case, our friends in Utica, as well as we, were disappointed.—Learning that Br. W. was in the neighborhood, and expecting him to stay another week, they had anticipated at least a Sunday's preaching from him, in the hope that it might revive them a little if not enable them once more to procure a house of worship.

We are glad Br. W. accomplished the object of his visit, arrived safely at home and is improving in health.

WHICH IS RIGHT?

Modern Orthodoxy represents Christ's death as a sacrifice made to satiate the Divine vengeance and placate the wrath of God. The Bible represents it as a pledge and plenary evidence of God's love to man.

Modern Orthodoxy represents the death of Christ as designed to reconcile God to man. The Bible represents it as designed to reconcile man to God.

Modern Orthodoxy represents God as dreadfully incensed and infinitely wrathful against his creature man, till he cooled his wrath by bathing his glittering sword of justice in the blood of his innocent son. The Bible declares that 'God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son,' &c., and that men, (not a wrathful God) 'with wicked hands, crucified and slew him.'

Modern Orthodoxy represents Christ, the suffering victim of Almighty wrath, as the very being who was so incensed against him, on account of the wickedness of men, as the being who demanded the sacrifice, and offered the sacrifice; who was so wrathful against himself as to take vengeance on himself—to placate his own wrath by absolutely dying! in order that he might live peaceably with himself! The Bible represents God as One, of one mind, immortal, and who therefore can not die, immutable, without variableness or the shadow of turning, whose name, and whose very nature is Love.

Reader, which is right—modern Orthodoxy or the Bible? D. S.

THE DEATH PENALTY IN WISCONSIN.

By a Report just made in the Legislature (or Constitutional Convention we know not which,) of Wisconsin, on the subject of Capital Punishment, and the action of that body thereon we have every reason to believe this relic of barbarism will be utterly and forever abolished in that new State. The Article proposed for adoption reads as follows:

'Sec. 1. Death as a penalty is forever prohibited within the limits of this State.

'Sec. 2. The Legislature shall in cases where the death penalty is ordinarily inflicted, impose instead thereof, close and solitary confinement for life in the State's Prison without the power of pardon, reprieve or commutation.'

The committee reported at length and decidedly against the continuance of the death penalty, and the article recommended by them was read a first and second time, referred to committee of the whole, and ordered printed. We would respectfully inquire if the benighted Wisconsans have no Rev. Mr. Cheever among them to enlighten them as to the great benefits resulting from continuing to hang folks? Where are the enlightened champions of the gallows in Wisconsin? D. S.

COOKING STOVES.

Among the many hundreds of patents now in vogue—scores of which by their respective inventors, or manufacturers, are cried up, each as the very best stove in the world—the me plus ultra—that no one can ever hope to excel or equal, we have examined many, tried a number, and must say that, so far as our own observation and experience go,

DR. CHAUNCEY'S PATENT AIR-TIGHT COOKING STOVE (J. S. & M. Peckham, Manufacturers and Proprietors, Utica, N. Y.) is as good as any, if not the best we have seen. And this is certainly saying much in its favor, when we consider the multitudes of very excellent cooking stoves now in use. Dr. Chauncey's stove, besides being free from most of the defects which attach to nearly all the stoves in use, has two very prominent advantages to recommend it. 1. The plates are thick, heavy, and very little exposed to burn out and thus ruin the stove in one or two years. The iron is good, and the stove is very heavy for one of its size. 2. It is sold at a considerably lower price than good cooking stoves generally are. The stove is a good one, I ween, as you'll find—

For baking and broiling,

For steaming and boiling,

For roasting and toasting all things to your mind
For ironing 'tis good—for Buck-wheats, 'twill bake 'em—
So call, without fail, on J. S. & M. Peckham. D. S.

IMPORTANT QUESTION.

Reader which is the worst—to have a theory of faith which scandalizes the Divine character and outrages the Bible and common sense, and yet live far better than such a faith requires or can justify; or to have a faith the most sublimely glorious imaginable, which represents God as the chiefest among ten thousand and the One altogether lovely, man as his own offspring, and brother to all humanity, and heaven as the blissful home of a holy and redeemed universe, and yet live as bad a life as the worst faith could justify? Or in other words, which is the worst—to embrace modern Orthodoxy in theory, and practice according to Universalism; or to embrace Universalism in theory, and practice according to modern Orthodoxy?—to believe in the Devil and serve God; or believe in God and serve the Devil? D. S.

A CRUMB FOR OUR METHODIST BRETHERN.—We clip from the Daily Gazette of this city the following scrap.

'Mr. Wm. S. Birch was arrested at Baltimore on Monday, as a participant in the recent fraud of Turner on the Mechanics' Bank, and after examination, held to bail in $15,000. He had been a zealous, active Methodist—leader of classes, exhorter, etc., and was the head man of a protracted revival meeting at the time it was discovered that he had overchecked the small sum of $24,000.'

What if this Birch had been a Universalist? His rascality would have been owing entirely to the 'licentious doctrine' in which he believed—of course. Pray, to what shall his dishonesty be attributed now?—all to the weakness of poor human nature without doubt. It can not be possible that the dogma of endless damnation for a portion of humanity, or a belief in the delectable theory that one may wallow in sin during this life and escape his just deserts by repenting five minutes before he dies, had any influence in the matter—oh no.

THE COLUMBIAN MAGAZINE for December has been received at Mr. Beesley's. Mrs. L. Maria Child, L. H. Sigourney, Frances Osgood, Fanny Forrester, Messrs. John Inman, H. T. Tuckerman, and others are its contributors. 'Laying down the Law,' 'The Tiger Hunt,' and fashion plate are its embellishments.

GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE for December is also published, with its usual quota of handsome engravings and reading. In this number is concluded a thrilling tale of the Revolution by Mrs. Ann L. Stevens. This number concludes the 29th volume for which it has an index. 25 cents per number at Beesley's.

THE GAVEL for November is also out and contains matter which can not but be highly interesting to its patrons.

THE MECHANICS' MIRROR for this and next month, (double number) is good. It contains a plan of warming Rail Road cars, with a plate illustrating it, and much useful reading. The 1st volume is now closed and it is hereafter to be published weekly, instead of monthly.

REMOVAL.—Br. D. C. Tomlinson has accepted an invitation to settle with the second Universalist society in Minden, Montgomery county, N. Y., and wishes all papers and letters to be addressed accordingly.

THE TALISMAN and illustrated Odd Fellow's Magazine for November (No. 5) is issued in its usual neat style and is filled with well selected and original reading. It is prefaced with a very correct and handsome engraving of Faneuil Hall, Boston, The Capitol of Virginia, at Richmond, and several other embellishments grace this No.

UNIVERSALIST UNION AND NEW YORK CHRISTIAN MESSENGER.

These publications are in reality but one paper—issued in two forms. The Messenger is an open, folio sheet, (newspaper form,) containing a News Record, embracing a summary of Foreign and Domestic Items, furnishing as late Intelligence as any Weekly Paper from New York city, at $2 per annum, in advance. The Union form embraces the Religious and Literary matter of the Messenger sheet, in a convenient form for Binding, making a handsome volume, yearly 832 large, closely printed octavo pages, at $2.50 per annum in advance. The paper is well established, having entered on its sixteenth volume on the 14th of November instant, 1846. It possesses one of the most valuable lists of any similar publication—being yearly pruned of slack or dilatory subscribers.

Connected with the Paper is a valuable Book Concern, possessing one of the best lists of Standard Publications in the denomination.

Owing to the impaired health of Mr. Price—who first established the paper, and has had the general Editorial direction of it from its commencement—it is desirable on his part to retire from the change of its columns and business. Other engagements rendering it difficult for the present proprietor to give the necessary attention to it, he is induced to offer the whole establishment for sale. It is now in a healthy and prosperous condition; but may be greatly extended; and offers rare inducements to active business men who can give proper attention to it.—The location is not exceeded by any in the country.—Application (post paid) may be made to the undersigned, at the office, (140 Fulton street, New York.)

THE NEW VOLUME.

Until the Establishment is satisfactorily disposed of, the business will be prosecuted with unabated energy.—Mr. Price will continue every attention to its columns which prudence will permit, and with the promised aid of resident clergymen, and a valuable list of general correspondents, patrons may be assured that the paper will not suffer in interest. No efforts, as heretofore, will be spared to make it a creditable advocate of the Great Salvation—an acceptable weekly visitor to the domestic circle; and above all, to make it appeal, in a kind and persuasive spirit, to those 'of the contrary faith.'

A new volume having just commenced, it affords an excellent time for subscribing. Great inducements will be offered to Companies, where a number can go to one address, on application by letter. Specimen numbers cheerfully forwarded.

The attention of the public is particularly invited to its valuable stock of UNIVERSALIST PUBLICATIONS.

PROSPECTUS

FOR PUBLISHING THE SECOND VOLUME OF THE MECHANICS MIRROR.

A weekly paper, devoted to Science, Literature, Art, Mutual Protection, and the interests of the Working-Man. JOHN TANNER, Publisher.

The Mechanics Mirror will be published every Thursday morning, at No. 9, second floor Exchange Building, Albany, at the price of $2 per annum, $1 in advance. Heretofore, the Mechanics Mirror has been published monthly at $1 per annum. It has now become imperative to publish more often. The working-man wants a weekly paper, so that he can sit down on Saturday evening, and read the events of the week, the improvements in science, and also refresh the mind with the choice literature of the day. We would not have taken any steps from publishing monthly, but from every quarter, we have been solicited to do so; and the substance of every letter that we have received on the subject, has been, 'The Mechanics ought to have a weekly paper of their own.' The change is an agreeable one to us. We have been too hampered for want of room. We have felt too often that from this cause, our articles were what might be termed cropped. The Mechanics Mirror will be printed in eight large pages suitable for binding. It will embrace under its separate departments, the choicest selections from the best works, original articles from the pens of eminent Mechanics, Lists of Inventions, and the most important stirring news of the week in a correct and condensed form. It will be a family newspaper, and also a useful Magazine to the young Mechanic.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The EDITOR will preach at Ilion, next Sunday.

Br. T. J. Whitcomb, will preach in Middleville, the 4th Sabbath in November, and every 4th Sabbath in each month, the ensuing year.

MARRIAGES.

On the 8th inst., in Columbus, by Ev. C. L. Shipman, Mr. ALVIN SHIPMAN, of Sherburne, to Miss HARRIET GRITMAN, of Columbus.

In Deerfield, on Wednesday evening, the 11th inst., by the Rev. T. J. Whitcomb, Mr. DANIEL D. TOMPKINS COFFIN, to Miss JANE LOUISA DAVIS.

In Newport, on Tuesday morning, the 10th inst., by the same, Mr. JOSEPH D. HOYT, of Buffalo, N. Y., to Miss LUCIA CAROLINE WHITCOMB, second daughter of Rev. T. J. Whitcomb.

DEATHS.

In Preston, September 25th, after a short but painful illness which he bore with patience, SOLOMON WAIT, Esq., aged 78 years.

The deceased was born in Hatfield, Mass., in 1763—moved to Norwich 53 years ago, and was one of the earliest settlers of this flourishing valley. Since 1806, he has been a resident of Preston. It was then almost an unbroken wilderness. He was ever active in the organization of and the erection of suitable buildings for schools, and in promoting the general welfare of society. He was the father of a large and respectable family of children, who were trained for usefulness and happiness, and are now occupying creditable stations in life. In childhood he was educated under the influence of the religious sentiments which were then almost universally believed; but as his mind expanded, they were too limited and illiberal for the generous feelings of his nature. He embraced the faith of God's impartial grace more than half a century ago, which for years was received by but one man beside, but now is quite prevalent in the town in which he lived. He was awakened to the subject by the teachings of Murray. He was one of the first hearers and supporters of our venerable brother Stacy, in his earliest efforts to proclaim the Gospel throughout the region of the Chenango, and has long been an active and efficient agent for the Magazine and Advocate, which he has taken and paid for from its establishment to the time of his death. He attended the last session of our Association, and was one of the committee of discipline for the present year. For a season he stood somewhat like Elijah of old, surrounded by hundreds of the votaries of error, and almost unaided and alone; but he never despaired of the final triumph of truth. He had long reserved a beautiful site for a meeting house, hoping though at times against hope, that converts would increase until one might be erected. The prospect brightened. With apparently renewed age and vigor, he bestowed his gift to the society, knowing that without it one could not soon if ever be reared, and doubting that it would ever benefit him, but anticipating great good to the rising generation. With thrilling interest he marked its progress; and had he been spared to witness its completion and dedication, like aged Simeon, emphatically he could have departed in peace. But God otherwise ordered, and he resignedly submitted.

Few laymen were as extensively known, and both our aged and younger ministering brethren who have traversed the region of his residence, have always found his house a welcome home. Though firm and decided, yet the violence of party faction, or the madness of sectarian bigotry and intolerance, never questioned his integrity, morality or veracity.

As a husband, father, citizen, magistrate and Christian, his character was above reproach. In every station, public or private, he so discharged his duty as to honor himself and benefit others. He was a friend to the friendless, and a father to the poor and needy, and the stranger never went hungry or naked from his door. He carried out the principles he advocated in life and death, by deeds of kindness, generosity and benevolence; and notwithstanding his advanced age, not only his family and our denomination which he liberally supported, and whose meetings he punctually attended, but community generally, have met with a loss which can not be easily repaired. He lived in peace, and died in reconciliation with God and man. May his surviving partner, and all his remaining friends perceive that,

'By the light of the Gospel, earth's valley of tears,
Is arched o'er with rainbows that smile as they weep;
And evil's dark cloud fades in skies that it clears,
Till death, even death's but a child's peaceful sleep.'

His funeral was attended on the 26th ult., and a discourse was delivered in the Baptist meeting house to a large congregation, by J. T. G.

SUPPLICATION.

Heavenly Father, we adore thee,
 Author of our holy faith;
 We would bow ourselves before thee,
 In devotion's shining path!
 'Tis thy high and holy orders,
 We should serve thee here below;
 And in wisdom's pleasant borders.
 Should our willing footsteps go.
 Hear our humble invocation,
 For thy grace to guide us right;
 Bless our daily avocations,
 And protect us through the night.
 Bless our public institutions,
 And promote our nation's weal;
 Gild the halls of legislation
 With bright Mercy's jewel'd seal.
 Guide us Prince of life eternal,
 Where Truth's sparkling rivers flow,
 And the gems of love supernal,
 In immortal radiance glow.
 Light, O light our mental vision,
 With Religion's holy star;
 Point our souls to peace Elysian,
 In thy paradise afar.
 Smooth at last, our dying pillow,
 With the finger of thy love
 Bear us safely o'er the billow,
 To a fadeless clime above.

ADDRESS OF THE UNIVERSALIST CONVENTION TO GENERAL WASHINGTON.

To the President of the United States:—The Address of the Convention of the Universal Church, assembled in Philadelphia, 1790:

SIR:—Permit us in the name of the Society whom we represent, to concur in the numerous congratulations which have been offered to you since your accession to the Government of the United States.

For an account of our principles, we beg leave to refer you to the pamphlet, which we have now the honor to put into your hands. In this publication it will appear that the peculiar doctrine which we hold, is not less friendly to the order and happiness of society, than it is essential to the perfec-tions of the Deity.

It is a singular circumstance in the history of this doctrine, that it has been preached, and defended in every age, since the promulgation of the Gospel; but we represent the first Society professing this doctrine, that have formed themselves into an independent Church.

Posterity will hardly fail of connecting this memorable event with the auspicious years of peace, liberty, and industry, in the United States, which distinguished the administration of Gen.
 WASHINGTON.

We join thus publicly with our affectionate fellow-citizens, in thanks to Almighty God for the last of his numerous signal acts of goodness to our country, in preserving your valuable life in a late dangerous indisposition, and we assure you, Sir, that duty will not prompt us more than affection, to pray that you may long continue the support and ornament of our country, and that you may hereafter fill a higher station, and enjoy the greater reward of being a king and priest to our God.

Signed in behalf, and by order of the Convention,

JOHN MURRAY,
W. EUGENE INLAY.

REPLY OF GEN. WASHINGTON.

To the Convention of the Universal Church, lately assembled at Philadelphia:

GENTLEMEN:—I thank you cordially for the congratulations which you offer, on my appointment to the office I have the honor to hold in the Government of the United States.

It gives me the most sensible pleasure to find that in our Nation, however different are the sentiments of the citizens on religious doctrines, they generally concur in one thing: for their political professions and practices are almost universally friendly to the order and happiness of our civil institutions.

I am also happy in finding this disposition particularly evinced by your Society. It is, moreover, my earnest desire that all the members of every association or community throughout the United States, may make such use of the auspicious years of peace, liberty and free inquiry, with which they are now favored, as they shall hereafter find occasion to rejoice for having done.

With great satisfaction I embrace this opportunity to express my acknowledgements, for the interest my affectionate fellow-citizens have taken in my recovery from a late dangerous indisposition; and I assure you, gentlemen, that in mentioning my obligations, for the effusions of your benevolent wishes on my behalf, I feel animated with new zeal, that my conduct may ever be worthy of your favorable opinion, as well as such as shall, in every respect, best comport with the character of an inteligent and accountable being.

PROSPECTUS
 OF VOLUME XVIII, FOR 1847,
 OF THE
 EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
 AND
 GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

REV. DOLPHUS SKINNER, EDITOR,
 REVS. S. R. SMITH, J. M. AUSTIN, S. J. GIBSON, AND
 A. C. BARRAY, CORRESPONDING EDITORS.

The many discouragements of two or three years previous to 1846, brought the publisher to the determination about a year since, to discontinue the publication of the Magazine and Advocate, at the close of volume 17, unless sufficient interest of the denomination should manifest itself in the support of the paper to warrant its continuance. It is with heartfelt pleasure that we announce, that the friends of Universalism have shown a proper interest, and that the publisher can now indulge in the hope that that interest will be kept up and increased; and the paper continue to be sent upon its righteous and soul cheering mission, as in times past. It gratifies us to say, that by the commendable exertions of the friends of the paper, its list, which in 1845 only numbered 1700 now numbers 3500—more than double. That is well, yet there is abundant room and need for its further increase, for many reasons which need not here be given, but which will suggest themselves to every thinking Universalist.
 The Magazine we believe is now the only weekly paper in the denomination, devoted exclusively to its matters and interests, without advertisements or extraneous matter, which is within the reach of its patrons by a little exertion, at the low price of ONE DOLLAR. (See terms.)
 This fact ought to secure it double its present circulation, but when considered in regard to the talent employed in contributing to, and conducting it, ten thousand patrons ought reasonably to be expected to contribute their pittance to its support. It is not our custom to promise before hand or boast of what we will do—suffice it, to say, that we intend, to do all that lays within our means, to make the paper pleasing and acceptable to our readers, and useful to the cause. The advocacy and defence of Universalism will be the chief feature. Free, open, and candid discussion, upon all the leading reforms of the age, will be allowed a place in our columns, by our religious opposers, as well as others, provided they are willing to accord us equal privileges with those they may claim for themselves. Bitterness and personal allusions, calculated to create enmity or injure the feelings of any, will be studiously avoided. In short we wish to make the Magazine a Universalist paper.

For the kindness and exertions manifested in behalf of the paper for the past year, by both ministering brethren and laymen, we tender our unfeigned thanks, and hope to deserve a continuance of such kindness. We would now call attention to the terms, and it is hoped that all who may read this prospectus will do what they consistently can to increase our list. Each one who is favorably disposed, can doubtless persuade an acquaintance or neighbor to subscribe, and that one another, and by putting their subscriptions together, can form a club, and get the paper at the lowest rates.

TERMS.—Single subscriptions, or any number less than four, $1.50 as before. Four copies to one post office, with each subscribers name written on his paper, for five dollars, ($1.25 each,) or five copies directed in a package to one person, without the names, for five dollars, and at the same rate to seven. Seven copies with names, for eight dollars, ($1.14 per copy,) or $1 per copy without names to one person and at the same rate to ten. Ten copies with names at one office for ten dollars, or eleven to one person without names. Twenty-one copies with names for $20; or twenty-two copies without names, and so on, or as follows:

For single subscriptions $1 will pay for eight months,
 75 cents for six months, or 50 cents for four months.—
 Postmasters would doubtless, in many instances, have the package directed to them, and cheerfully mark the names of subscribers on the papers and distribute them for a copy. The paper with back numbers if desired, will be sent to any person joining a club, after it is formed, and receiving his paper in the same package, at the same price, as the other members of the club.

ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE. All papers discontinued at the end of the time paid for. All communications should be addressed to A. Walker, No.
 30 Genesee Street, Utica, N. Y., and should be Post
 PAID to receive attention.

It is to be hoped that every friend into whose hands this prospectus may fall, will canvass his neighborhood, obtain all the subscriptions he can, (or if he can not attend to it, hand it to some active and good man who can,) unite with others if any there be, and make returns to the publisher as soon as the middle of December, 1846.

[Original.] SYMPATHY.

'He who hath the most of heart,
Knows the most of sorrow.'—FESTUS.

Whether this remark of the wonderful poet be true or not, few have lived with a heart open to the realities of this lower world, who have not felt its force. It would not seem that God would permit the pure, the humble, and good, to endure sorrows which are unknown to the indifferent, the proud, and selfish; nevertheless, we believe there are many whom it would be difficult to convince, that it is not so. How many noble souls overflowing with love for humanity, with pity for the poor and down-trodden of earth; with affection for all God's children, without distinction of rank or color, have struggled on through the wild storms and changes of this strange life, searching out the by-ways of misery and vice; winding their way from sorrow to sorrow, in the hope of cheering some lone heart, or of brushing a tear from a burning cheek of grief—bending the knee of prayer in the half way hour of night, when the world sleeps. How many such souls have lived and died well trained in sorrow, while others apparently indifferent to the ills and misfortunes of their fellow beings, have looked on without shedding one tear of pity, without giving one heart throb of sympathy; and if they were not happy, they certainly seemed not to be miserable. If we will but read the world's history of the past, we will find that its greatest and kindest reformers, were made subjects of continual trials. Heart's like theirs, filled with love, awakened by every cry of human misery and human wrong, could seldom be merry; for as some poet has remarked,

'He that looketh on the world can not be glad and good.'

Many have commenced the journey of life, full of joy and hope, wearing upon their countenances a lightsome smile, and like the merry bird of spring, bathing its wings in the

'The sun's first gush.'

were happy. But the innocent heart, yet tender and young, being left open to the world's envious gaze, having as yet prepared no fort to shield it from flying darts, some cruel one with strained bow, stood watching his opportunity; the string let fly—the arrow flew, it pierced the heart—it struggled—it gasped, it died! The wretch looked on, and 'smiled upon the wreck he made.' The truth is, whoever makes music with a pure heart, must touch its harp-like strings with care, or they will break. Like Summer's loveliest flowers, they must not be touched except by gentle hands. It is this keen sensibility, this tenderness of thought and feeling, which causes the good and purely benevolent so often to weep and to suffer so much, as they come in contact with the harshness of this existence. But we would not on this account envy the condition of those who have hearts and can not feel, eyes and can not see, ears and can not hear. No, we would not desire to be blind because we sometimes witness that which makes us weep. We would not wish to be deprived of all earth's music, because now and then a note of discord falls harshly upon the ear; nor are we anxious to possess a heart that is indifferent, or so sin-bound and calloused, as not to feel, because some cruel hand sometime shatters it to atoms. That sorrow which the harmless and good are called upon to endure, is of the sweetest kind, and we had rather be as Christ than as Judas. We have seen the mother as she stood beside the breathless form of her child.

We saw her part the locks from its cold white brow, and then bend low and kiss its colorless lips; we saw the tears fall fast, and the bosom heave with emotion; and we exclaimed, 'Ah, mother, if thou hadst not so much of heart thou wouldst have less of sorrow! If thou hadst not permitted its tendrils, to entwine so firmly around that dear one, there would have been none to break!' But again, when we remembered the thrilling emotions of joy with which she had rocked this little one upon her bosom, the more than heavenly smiles that had played upon her countenance, as she bent over its couch, breathing softly that she might not wake its quiet sleep; the aspirations which swelled her heart as it lifted toward her its beaming eyes, and murmured for the first time so lovingly her name—or, as she traced so plainly, the 'Mind's construction in the face;'

we could not for a moment, even through sympathy, deprive her of such a deep fountain of affection. We would rather crave her sorrow than wish to avoid it. If then, it be true that, he who hath the most of heart, knoweth the most of sorrow, I will also add, that he who hath no heart at all, has no true happiness. J. H. T.

[Original.] GOD AS OUR FATHER.

'If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father who is in heaven, give good things to them that ask him.'—Matt. vii: 11.

A sympathy for goodness is innate in man; an admiration for mercy and disinterestedness appears to be an instinctive element in humanity. Even the most unexemplary can in some sort appreciate the tenderness and compassion of a heart overflowing with sympathy. Such a universality of sympathy and affection is no inconsiderable step in the demonstrations which the Scriptures and reason present, of the ultimate reconciliation of all rational beings to the righteous government of the Judge of all the earth! If mortals created 'subject to vanity,' are capable of such extended sympathy—how infinitely far reaching must be the affection for the race, of HIM who is the AUTHOR of all kindnesses and sympathies and mercies!

Some have sought to set at nought the argument in favor of universal reconciliation, drawn from the tender chords which vibrate along the heart of humanity—as though there be no inspirings in relation to goodness—as though there be no natural perceptions of what is tender and lovely. It is in this way, Professor Brown of Newton Theological Institution in his 'Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge,' would set aside the argument drawn from nature and 'the fitness of things' which is conclusive against the dogma of endless misery—at the same time that he annihilates the possibility of ever maintaining from the principle just named, the barbarous idea of immortal anguish! The Professor would utterly reject all aid from nature and 'the fitness of things,' on the great subject of the endless well-being of all humanity, or the ceaseless wretchedness of a portion of the race! But how utterly unfounded are all such assumptions, like those of the Newton Professor; and, how contradictory are they to the experience of mankind! Surely, such 'vain philosophy' is at variance with the views of some of the ablest Moral Philosophers. It strikes me that the argument from 'the fitness of things' was made available, some time since, by our warm hearted and strong headed brother Shehane, from a remarkable concession—perhaps it may be called—of Professor B., in his 'Encyclopedia,' that 'it may safely be affirmed that endless punishment can not be proved from the nature of things' in behalf of the concurrent testimonies of nature and Scripture! Truth is—we feel within ourselves sensibilities and sympathies of themselves utterly subversive of the heathen dogma of endless woe! The beating, warm affections of the parent for the child, and vice versa, are demonstrative evidences that He who implanted in the breast such enduring love, is Himself possessed of an infinitude of mercies and loving kindnesses for the race, which give assurance of the universal Restoration! Indeed, this innate truth is the premise from which our Lord deduces the conclusion that our heavenly Father will give good things to them that ask Him. Those who deny to the argument from instinct or nature and 'the fitness of things,' its just value, should remember that in such procedure, they are disputing the very ground on which our Saviour proceeds! 'If ye, then, being evil,' &c. If parental feeling is so instinctively urgent in the breasts of mortals, how much more—how infinitely more abundant and extensive must be the compassions of God, who is love, and whose grace or favor towards our race, can know no change, world without end!

The Editor of the Encyclopedia, who is no less than Rev. J. Newton Brown of the 'Literary and Theological Institution' near Boston means to say, that arguments deduced from nature, or reason, or as he himself expresses it—'from the nature of the soul, of sin, of God, &c., in distinction from the evidence of Divine Revelation, are not,'* and can not be conclusive in a question of this kind. Prof. B. thinks that this subject 'involves the adjustment of relations too complicated and vast for human decision.' But, how can poor mortal affirm, ex cathedra, that the question of the God of all grace, who is Love, inflicting endless tortures on his creatures, involves the adjustment of such relations? What! Is reason to be hushed? Or, is not the Bible addressed to, and to be understood by human reason? But does not the editorial Professor in, doing so signal injustice to the strength of the rational argument against endless woe, strike vigorously against the fundamental 'principle' of partialism? Here is his language: 'From the nature of things, it may be safely affirmed, that endless punishment can be neither proved on the one hand, nor disproved on the other. The subject involves, &c., &c.' [as before quoted.]

The great truth of universal Paternity—so plainly inculcated in the passage at the head of this article, is altogether demonstrative of the falsehood and wickedness of the dogma of endless misery. Let whoever will, take the view of the worthy editor and Professor, great advantage must by the procedure, be given to the blessed teaching of universal divine grace. Every thing which the Universalist could ask, is virtually given up in the conclusion that 'from the nature of things'—FROM THE NATURE OF GOD, no argument can be deduced in favor of endless misery! To which 'postulate' I most heartily assent, but NOT to the assumption that no argument in favor of the Restitution can be deduced from the NATURE OF GOD, who St. John teaches, is LOVE, and who in the passage we have selected from Matthew, is revealed to be a FATHER. To conclude—Partialism never can be true, as long as the passage in Matthew is true, comparing, or rather contrasting human parents with the Divine Parent. If the former are kind and compassionate to their children,—infinitely more kind and compassionate is the Father of all, to the children of His care.

ORTHODOX CONSISTENCY.

Last evening I listened to a discourse from an Orthodox preacher. His subject was principally about unbelief. After giving a short history of the unbelief of the Jews, he mentioned a number of prominent infidels and gave them all awful deaths. He then commenced exhorting his brethren upon the subject of unbelief in prayer. He told them they should pray in faith, believing, and ask God for nothing they believed they would not get. That it was nonsense for them to pray and ask for things they believed God would not give them. For them to do so would be folly in the extreme, and make them as bad as infidels. Now this is all well, I thought to myself, and this man although an Orthodox seems to have correct notions about prayer, and of the manner we should address the throne of grace. When he comes to pray we shall see an illustration of the truth he has been inculcating, and of his faith in the doctrine of orthodoxy, whose herald and advocate he is. He will pray that the Lord will save a part of the human family, including his brethren of course, with an everlasting salvation, and damn all the rest with eternal damnation in endless torments. I waited with some impatience to see the justness of my conclusions.—Soon he began to exhort his brethren on the duties of faithfulness, and in the midst of his exhortation, he sent up a petition to the throne of the eternal, that his grace would spread until it covered the whole earth with His glory, and that he would save us all in heaven for Jesus' sake. So it would appear that the man could not pray in faith, believing with his creed, and this too after he had just expounded to his brethren the sin of unbelief in prayer.

EXTRACTS FROM THE JOURNAL OF A STUDENT.

Clinton, March 28, '45.

O, what a thing is life! Here I am sitting alone and the tolling of the bell is falling on my ear in all the sadness of the death knell. Indeed it seems as if that bell has done nothing but toll for funerals all the week. It makes me deathly lonely to hear it. What human hearts are now aching with deep palpitation at every stroke of that tongue of time, which seems to reiterate in language too painful to bear, those heart-rending words, 'gone, gone forever.' How often we sit pensive and silent and listen to the sound of the funeral knell, while our own hearts fill with emotion, as memory calls back and revives some solemn scene in which we have once been partakers; when some dear one whom we loved and cherished, and around whom the heart had extended and interwoven its most delicate and sympathetic tendrils, was taken away from us and borne to the cold, dark, and silent tomb, there to be forever hidden from our earthly gaze. And well do we remember how our very heart died within us, as that cold sinking sensation thronged our frame, when, after the coffin was slowly let down into the deep, damp vault, the sound of the first shovel full of earth greeted our ear, and that sound grew fainter and fainter until its hollowness had died away, and we stood, cold and livid, like human beings petrified into statues of marble!—Even then, as the hand of some kind friend took us by the elbow to remind us of our return to that home, now lonely and gloomy, robbed of one, perchance, that was once its joy and animation, we would willingly have laid down our life's weary burden, for a repose like that to which we had just consigned our beloved, and felt that we envied that gentle sleeper his or her calm repose.

O, how the heart thrills with agony at the last look! As the coffin lid is folded down, and those loved and long to be remembered, yet now cold and emaciated features are shut out from our view, it is then we feel the full force of those then two dreadful words, never and forever! Never, O, never, while the sun returns the morning sky, or gilds with gorgeous splendor the purple vault of Eve;—while the rains descend from the summer cloud or the gentle and balmy dews distil from the azure arched canopy of heaven, will that loved voice reanimate our ear with the glad sounds of its music! or the smiles that once lit up and adorned that now fixed and death-sealed countenance, reanimate and enlighten our own! The earth shall roll on in its course, seed time and harvest shall continue to gladden its bosom with their glorious riches; to paint its fields and its woodlands, and to fill the temple of nature with harmonious sounds and glad rejoicings; planets and worlds shall roll on through countless ages; systems and suns shall fade from the sky; the heavens shall wax old as a garment, and the stars be blotted from the blue depths of its infinite space; time, and death, and all things shall cease to be; but never, O NEVER can the thing we loved come back to cheer us with its smile or fling upon us the beamings of its own joy-illuminated eye! Like a halo of spring time, all is now passed away; and a something low and melancholy, whispers to the heart, in a language not to be misunderstood, those pitiless words, gone, gone forever!

Alas, alas! How many hearts, O Death, bath thy past weeks work hereabouts, rendered desolate, gloomy and desponding! I know them not, nor where they are! But it matters not: they are in existence, bearing sadly and heavily, and longing, perchance, to throw off their earthly tabernacle, for a temple and a covering eternal and unfolding in the skies; where they will know not nor fear the changes and desolations wrought by thy never tiring flight, O Time, and thy ruthless hand, O Death!

'Song, beauty, youth, love, virtue, joy! this group
Of bright ideas, flowers of Paradise,
As yet forfeit! in one blaze we bind,
Kneel and present it to the skies, as all
We guess of Heaven!'
'How swift the shuttle flies that weaves our shroud.'

CLERICAL MANNERS.

Such is the heading of an article, in a recent number of the 'Western Evangelist,' in which the talented Editor, good naturedly points out some of those small things, in the daily habits of clergymen, which render them unwelcome visitors at the houses of the genteel. His remarks, are certainly to the point, and it is hoped will be the means of improving the habits, of such as are ever guilty of sinning against the rules of good breeding.

But Br. Everett did not quite finish the work in which he engaged, and I would therefore take the liberty of suggesting, that in his next chapter upon this subject, he briefly touch upon the following points.

1. When a young clergyman is enjoying the hospitality of kind friends, with whom it may be his lot for a time to sojourn; he should, in all practicable cases, find some place in which to deposite his two feet for safe keeping, besides the top of the parlor stove. Especially should he do this, in all cases where the stove is carefully blacked and polished, and his boots are very large and very muddy. It may be established I think as an invariable rule, that a clergyman will lower himself in the opinion of his hostess, just in proportion to the frequency of his using her carefully polished parlor stove for a foot scraper.

2. It is important also, while enjoying the hospitality of friends, and especially of strangers; to make use of the spittoon, if the room affords one, in preference to emptying the contents of one's mouth upon the carpet, in the stove, or even in the wood-box. Let every thing be put to that particular use for which it was designed.

3. When staying with a friend over night, if you are a young and healthy person, be particular and not force the family to wait for you at breakfast, more than half or three quarters of an hour. If it is your first stay with them, you might perhaps risk to be up in the morning by the breakfast hour, or at farthest when you are called the second time.

4. If you are a young preacher, do not labor particularly hard, to convince those with whom you are staying; that all the older portion of the clergy are mere pigmies in intellectual greatness, when compared with the younger, and especially the 'reform portion.' If you do, people will be very likely to suspect you, of a desire to exalt yourself at the expense of others.

There are some other points, to which I shall not allude at present, which I trust some one of our Editors will attend to in due time. If they do not, the absolute necessity of the case, will probably force the duty upon

THE MORN OF SALVATION.

When the glorious advent of Immanuel, the blessed King of kings and Lord of all nations, was announced by a celestial delegation, seraphic voices swelled the loved anthem, and Judea's starry midnight rang with the sweetest melody. The humble shepherds, keeping silent vigil's o'er their fleecy charge in the emerald vales of Bethlehem, were alarmed by the brilliant coruscations of heavenly glory that shone around them. But their fears were quickly dispelled by the celestial minstrel, who exclaims, 'Fear not; for behold, I bring you you glad tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.' And suddenly a celestial choir responds in a thrilling song, of 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men.' And if such glorious declarations are true, which no enlightened mind will presume to contradict, all the gloomy creeds and fear-inspiring songs of Partialism, will ultimately be proved fallacious, the superstitious fables of error, the cruel and malevolent spirit of anti-Christ, which, during the dark ages of paganism and popery, reigned predominant over all Europe. Dark spirit of Error! what has it not done? It has turned earth's fairest Eden into a pandemonium, deluged the earth in blood, raised the crimson banner of persecution, laid waste the beautiful empire of Truth, and blighted the felicity of millions! But thanks be to the Father of mercies, who is love—good unto all—who will have all men to be saved—and who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will; this spirit of error is fast, very fast, losing the ground which it has long occupied. The blessed Gospel of Messiah, the prince of Peace, is now progressing in the moral world. The brilliant rays of the sun of Love are dispelling the sombre clouds of ignorance from the mental horizon.

Sing the loud anthem, for bigotry falters,
And shrinks from the light of the beautiful day;
And holy Religion is rearing her altars,
Where Error's dark fanes are fast crumbling away.

'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men.' This transcendent psalm of the heavenly band, will ultimately be realized: for Jesus will not fail nor be discouraged till he shall have set judgment in the earth: and the isles shall wait for his law. 'He shall have dominion: from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.' 'Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end.' 'Violence shall no more be heard in the land—the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose—and all shall know the Lord, from the least to the greatest.' Yes; the blissful and auspicious era will arrive, when the genius of the Gospel will be felt, and obeyed in every clime—wars shall cease; the falchion, spear, and every instrument of torture and death, shall be transmuted into implements of agriculture, and the whole earth will ultimately become one universal temple, sacred to the God of Love, and Immanuel his well beloved son, from which the glad voice of melody, gratitude and love, will ascend to heaven in ceaseless songs; and the holy name of Jehovah will be one throughout all the earth.

LAURA EGGLESTON.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

To the Editor of the Tribune:

In a former article I claimed that the greatest check which can be adopted for the fearful increase of the crime of murder is, to abolish Capital Punishment. In confirmation of this proposition, I beg the attention of your readers to the following article from the 'National Police Gazette,' a paper which will not be charged with feeling any undue sympathy for the prisoner.

MURDER VS. CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—The alarming increase of murder in all parts of our country during the last two or three years, seems to make but little impression upon those whose delegated duty it is to conserve the public weal; and though instances grow upon instances of the impunity with which the homicide may slay his fellow, through the refusal of jurors to become murderers themselves; still legislators fold their arms and let the work of death rage on, rather than change a rite which finds its only stay in the precedent of a barbaric age.

The ruthless murder of a mother and her babe, the slaughter of a mistress by her paramour, the deliberate and open shooting of a wife, the fiendish destruction of a whole family by the assassin's knife, with the instances that grow on instances of murders unavenged, while they prove the public rejection of the punishment of death, also denounce the gallows as a failure.

It is not adequate as a punishment, and its brutal exhibitions do not teach respect for human life. It strikes no preventive terror to the soul of the offender, and therefore extends from its gory platform no security to that society whose most rational sensibilities it violates. On the contrary, it familiarizes with the commission of violence. It assembles the depraved for a refined improvement in depravity. It excites a false and mischievous interest for those who suffer, and consequently answers no one of the great ends of punishment, in the prevention of crime, the remuneration of the injured, to the reformation of the offender.

These are not the conjectural assumptions of a theory, but the grim substantiations of a melancholy troop of facts. Year by year, nay week by week, the deeds of the homicide increase; and in proportion as the dismal aggregation grows, its brutal ministers escape. The monster, almost too hideous for human contemplation, now finds a protecting refuge in the very horror of his deed, and with his gory locks and blood-imbued hands, creeps into the soft breast or a perverted pity, which should alone have been the sanctuary of his victim's wrongs.

This is the reason why capital crimes increase, and this the reason also that while they increase, the hangman stands almost idle at the scaffold.—These, as we have said before, are not mere conjectures. The records of the country, show a regular addition to crimes of the first degree, while the acquittals of those against whose guilt not half a shadow rests, prove the failure of the rules of punishment which comprehend them.

We are not alone in this adverse solution of the problem of capital punishment. According to Mr. Redgrave's English tables, which are made up from the statistics of the last six years, we find a regular and growing decrease of every specific crime which shuts out the gallows; and while these tables show an increase of all offences that are visited with death, they also show a fearful disproportion of convictions.

There must be some remedy adopted for this state of things, and that remedy must be the repeal of a statute whose impracticable rule has proved to be the encouragement of the very crime which it vainly endeavors to suppress.

OUR PERIODICALS.

BR. WHITTEMORE—I would ask the privilege of saying a few words, in relation to our periodicals in your excellent and widely circulated sheet.

Some two or three years since, Br. T. J. Sawyer, then of New York city, now of Clinton, N. Y., published an article in one of our periodicals on the same subject. Br. Sawyer attempted to show (and I think successfully,) that more papers under the patronage of the denomination were in existence, than could be properly sustained; and notwithstanding new ones were constantly springing up to live a sickly existence, and then be swallowed up in some other, or die a natural death.—That article occasioned something of a stir among the publishers of some of the periodicals in our order, bringing down the ire of several, with considerable bitterness, on the poor head of Br. Sawyer.

That article manifestly did good, but its suggestions were soon forgotten, and newspaper adventurers have become as plenty as ever. I have often wondered myself, why the Editors of old established; well patronized papers, did not speak out; when they see a poor brother about making shipwreck of his means and perhaps of his credit, merely for a few months' glorification as a newspaper editor or publisher. A fear of having their motives misconstrued, I presume was the reason of such silence. Now, Br. W., I am inclined to think, that the welfare of the denomination requires that something should be said or done. Last week I received a Prospectus of a new paper, to be called the 'Denominational Universalist,' and to be published by Br. A. Peck. Now Br. Peck, we have no acquaintance with, but judging from the fate of other adventurers, the multiplicity of papers now in existence, and the unfavorable reception his project received from the United States' Convention, his undertaking seems hazardous, and at best ill advised. Br. Peck's motives doubtless are good, but I am very strongly inclined to question his judgment in this case. If Br. Peck thinks his paper ought to exist, and for the objects named in his Circular, could he not buy out one of the half score or so who are struggling on to live, but who would doubtless be glad to resign their individuality, on condition of their being relieved of all further pecuniary liability? We think we know of a number of this class; some, too, of a very recent birth.

We really hope that the Universalist public will look into this matter of newspaper starting, and when there is no prospect of material usefulness and success, give it their decided disapproval.

We have but three or four papers in the order; if we are correctly informed, that more than pay their expenses, and yet Br. Peck is sanguine that his proposed periodical will become a means of establishing a fund for the relief of widows and orphans of clergymen, purely from its profits. A noble scheme we must confess, but, in our estimation, poorly planned. No one would more heartily rejoice than ourselves, at its success, but, in our view, there is not the most distant prospect of it.

Will not our brethren, everywhere, take more interest in this newspaper matter than they have heretofore done?

D. H. P.

Jersey City, Nov. 4th, 1846.

We copy the above from the Trumpet. Br. D. H. P. says "I have often wondered myself, why the Editors of old established, well patronized (it would have been quite as near the mark if he had said poorly patronized) papers, did not speak out," &c. Now, for Br. D. H. P.'s information, we would say that editors and publishers did and have spoken out on the subject and given their warnings, the sad results of their own experience, and all that, but they were only accused of "selfish motives," "petulant grumbling," etc., and were told that the world was wide and large enough for all. Under such circumstances an editor or publisher has only two horns of a dilemma to hang upon, viz.:—give his advice—speak out; and get at once into a quarrel with his contemporaries, or submit in silence and see his own sphere of usefulness to the cause circumscribed, and himself injured in a pecuniary point of view, ill able as he may be to bear it. We have concluded it the best way to let them take their own course in the matter, and learn its results by the best teacher in the world—experience.

THE CROSS.

BY CHARLES H. CANFIELD.

'But God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.' There is a peculiar propriety in Paul's practice at this time. Christians have left the 'cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.' To them it has become an unmeaning symbol. There are for them other attractions save the cross of Christ; but, if they do not admit this, there is one thing they cannot deny, namely, that they have perverted the true meaning of the cross. To them its power is lost, because it is only capable of exerting an influence for good upon a portion of the human family, while its original design was to direct a wayward world to God. In Colossians it is written: 'And having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven.' No mean attraction has the cross. In it we see a fulness. Beautiful emblem of a Savior's love! May I ever think on this, and then, life shall not be all sorrowful, nor the grave a place of dread. Thou shalt cheer me in life's pilgrimage; through the gloom of the grave—thou shalt direct me to the home of my Father and God.

But the cross has not this attraction alone for me—there are sorrowing ones besides myself—the chambers of sickness and the houses of mourning are many. To them there comes from it a word of consolation. In deep affliction, when the cup is more than full, and words cannot be found to speak the language of their hearts, they are enabled to point to the cross and that directs to God. A beautiful incident is related by a traveler in Mexico, as having occurred at Matamoros, just after a battle between the Americans and Mexicans. 'A man, who had lost one of his legs, was attended by his daughter, a lovely girl of sixteen. I passed by him several times, and always saw the beautiful creature by his side, like a true woman, doing all in her power to assuage his pain, and with a cross in her hand—which she would present now and then to his lips—appeared to be directing his thoughts to a better world.' Sweet girl, how well she understood the true uses of the cross; to her it was no unmeaning symbol! God grant that we all may partake of the spirit that actuated her in that hour of affliction, and then shall we learn more of heaven, and in all our walks in life portray the beauty of religion, as sweetly as it comes to us from Calvary. By remembering the cross we shall be more likely to remember Jesus, for it brings to view those scenes which are so intimately interwoven with it.—[Freeman and Visiter.]

A BEAUTIFUL EXTRACT.—However dark and disconsolate the path of life may seem to any man, there is an hour of deep and undisturbed repose at hand, when the body may sink into a dreamless slumber. Let not the imagination be startled if this resting place, instead of being a bed of down, shall be a bed of gravel, or the rocky pavement of the tomb. No matter where the poor remains of a man may be, the repose is deep and undisturbed; the sorrowful bosom heaves no more; the tears are dried up in their fountains; the aching head is at rest, and the stormy waves of earthly tribulation roll unheeded over the place of graves. Let armies engage in fearful conflict over the very bosom of the dead, not one of the sleepers heed the spirit striving trumpet, or respond to the rending shouts of victory.

'How quiet those countless millions slumber in the arms of their mother earth! The voice of thunder shall not awaken them; the loud cry of elements—the winds—the waves—nor even the giant tread of the earthquake, shall be able to cause an iniquitude in the chamber of death.—They shall rest and pass away; the last great battle shall be fought, and then a silver voice, at first just heard, shall rise to a tempest, and penetrate the voiceless grave. For the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised.'

'I DON'T CARE.'

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

'How could you do so, brother?' asked Helen Lee, as she returned to the sitting room, after having conducted a couple of young ladies to the door, who had called that morning for the first time.

'Do how?' was the reply of the young man, who apparently, deeply absorbed in the book he was reading, sat leaning back in a chair, with his feet resting on the window sill.

'Why to appear so indifferent; and when I reminded you that ladies were present, in the hope that you would lay aside your book, and appear more gentlemanly, you said that you could not help that—if I was more interested with my company than yourself with reading, you were glad of it—but you doubted it.'

'Well and what of that?' asked he, as closing his book, he brushed the waving hair from his beautiful forehead, and with a smile looked up into the flushed face of his sister.

'Why it was absolutely rude, and I know the Misses Cranston felt it to be so, for they each blushed, and do all I could afterward they appeared ill at ease; and I have no doubt that they are at this moment, making remarks about it.'

'And if they are, I don't care.'

'There it is again—do you know Edwin, that I have many fears, that this same 'don't care' principle will yet be your ruin?'

'Indeed! and what would you have me to do?—come Sis, let us hear what would be your rule of conduct.'

'I would have you more guarded in your expressions than you are on some occasions—more attentive and condescending in your intercourse with society—more affable and polite in your demeanor to the ladies; and here Helen smiled at views, which in expression, seemed so much inferior in importance, to what they had done in her previous reflections, 'in a word I would have you more mindful of the opinion which your associates may form of you, and more solicitous for the approbation of your friends.'

'And so you would have me withhold the honest expression of my views, for fear that some conceited fool might differ from me in opinion—you would have me destitute of all independence of character, a bounden and obedient slave to all the heartless and sickening formalities of conventional life; and with all, you would have me a be-perfumed, be-whiskered, and be-fooled ladies' man—bowing at the beck of every silly flirt; smiling approval to all their follies, and repeating false flatteries, and soft nonsense in their hearing to convince them, mayhap, of the exalted idea I entertain of feminine weakness! and all this, that I may secure the good opinion of my associates, and the approbation of my friends!—and is it my sister Helen, that would wish me to become a Harry Benton?'

'Oh Edwin!' exclaimed Helen, at the mention of this conceited fop, gave life to the portraiture her brother had so faithfully drawn, 'Oh Edwin you know I would not have you become like that silly, senseless fellow; but—'

'But what Helen?—you know that I always act, as nature, and my feelings dictate—these dictates you would have me disregard; and not less so, the whisperings of conscience.'

'No it is not so—I do not wish you to assume that you do not feel, much less to violate the promptings of your moral nature; but you could be honest, and yet not be rough; you could dissent from others opinions, and advance your own in all frankness, and yet not give offence; you could study a little more the art of pleasing, and yet not dissimulate; in short, you could conform to the rules of good society, and not enter into all its excesses and vanities; you could seek the approbation of all good persons and virtuous, and yet not make their approval your only incentive to action or restraint, save by avoiding that which to them has an 'appearance of evil.'

'My dear sister,' said Edwin, who had listened with patience, and even with interest, while Helen had appeared so animated; 'I know your kind heart, and can partly appreciate your feelings; you love me, and are desirous that all others should regard me in the same manner; but this will never be, and indeed I have not a care that it should. What you say about acting natural and yet avoiding the evil consequences, I am not constituted to understand; and what you call rules of good society, are to me without soul, and arbitrary—I can not conform to them, without sacrificing my independence; and to be frank with you, I think this is sometimes the fault of sister Helen. It is true, you are called considerate, and pleasant, and agreeable, and all that, but you know I care not for what they say of me, and so on the whole, if it is most convenient for me to conform to my own inclinations, and violate the poor rules of good society, I do so, and the world may make the most of it! So far as the approbation of the good and virtuous is concerned, I don't care a fig, for the approval of but one individual, in the wide world, and she it is most true, is good, virtuous, and pure. On your account, I sometimes hesitate, rather than injure your feelings, but my dear Helen, you even, must not regard appearances—if I so far govern myself, as to regard your feelings, give me credit for it, and let that suffice.'

Helen saw the earnestness with which her brother had spoken, and as she did not doubt the sincerity of the feelings to which he had given expression, she forbore to reply; yet she regretted, more sincerely than she had ever before done, the existence of this one fault in his character. His conversation had revealed it to her in another and far different light, from that in which it had ever before appeared, and she saw the greater danger to which he was exposed. She had never before supposed, that he regarded a desire for approval, and that urbanity of deportment, and kind regard for others views and feelings, which prevents the too severe expression of our own, and which constitute true politeness, as crippling the free exercise of conscience, and therefore condemnatory, or that, what she had ever deemed a fault in him, was commended by his judgment, and sanctioned by his moral powers. She felt that he was wrong, but she felt too, how difficult it would be to convince him of this, and how utterly futile would be all her efforts to dissuade him from a course of conduct in which he felt himself approved.

It is ever thus—that imperfection, which through a false coloring is recommended by judgment to the commendation of its unfortunate possessor, is ever doubly a fault, and doubly to be deplored, for it is, so to speak, surrounded by a fortress impregnable to the assault of censure or reproof; but that individual who is made sensible of his derelictions from the pathway of propriety or rectitude, is already half converted, and kindness and perseverance can not fail to correct and restore him. How necessary then, that all, inasmuch as all are liable to err, should regard with the closest scrutiny their rules of conduct, and motives for action; and if in this scrutiny, ought should be discovered, which marks them as peculiar to themselves, to endeavor to ascertain the true character of such peculiarities. Is it not possible that all of us, by looking carefully into the mirror which self-examination would thus hold up, might discover deformities where we had before thought nothing but beauties shone?

It has been intimated, that this disregard for the opinions of others, was the only fault of Edwin Lee; and strictly it might be said to be so—at least had he been healed of this he would have been as nearly perfect as is the lot of man. Left at early age, without that watchful care and training, of which youth so much stand in need, and which few like a mother will be likely to bestow; and an only son of a kind and indulgent father, who deemed that he evinced sufficiently, the interest and affection he had for his children, by providing amply for their public education, and laboring to secure for them a fortune; without attending to their home instruction, or mental discipline; Edwin was thrown entirely upon himself, and those inclinations and propensities, which with the proper pruning and culture, might have been rendered as beautiful and rare exotics, were allowed to remain rude and uncultivated, and in the native richness of their soil, lost their beauty and fragrance, and became rank in their own wild luxuriance.

Still was he generous, self-sacrificing, and forgiving. Did any of the unfortunate children of humanity suffer in deprivation and distress? his was the tear of sympathy first to flow in their behalf, and his the ever ready and willing aid, which was first put forth to alleviate their wants. Did any suffer unjust persecution, or unmerited disgrace? he was ever their earnest champion, and zealous defender; and it mattered not whether the oppressed were to him, friend or enemy, or how much by the unpopular course he was pursuing, he was made a partaker in their discredit. Or did the intelligent or refined in feeling, seek companionship or congeniality? if it suited his mood, in his society it could be found; but he in this way contributed to their enjoyment, not from any thought, much less any desire to please; but because he was well informed, naturally intelligent and social, and was possessed of a heart overflowing with genuine good feeling and affection.

If it suited his mood—but if not how different was his conduct! No entreaties or expostulations on the part of Helen, could induce him, to treat with common courtesy or civility, those towards whom he felt a repugnance, or in whose society he expected less entertainment, than in pursuits his own inclinations marked out. It would be base hypocrisy he urged, to attempt the agreeable towards such, and he would not do it nor did he care what they thought or said!

And, asks the reader, could this one fault upon which he prided himself as a virtue, result in his ruin and disgrace? We will follow on in his footsteps, for a few short months, and see. He was now at the age of twenty one, but just returned from college with—discredit attached to his name. On account of marked disrespect and insult, to one of the assistant Professors; he had been expelled within three months of the period, when but for this, he had graduated with honor to himself, and credit to the institution. The professor alluded to, was of a truth, arbitrary and tyrannical, and far from being in possession of a noble and exalted mind—he had on numberless occasions, interfered with the innocent amusements and harmless pursuits of the students, and had dictated to them beyond the boundaries of his authority, and when they had failed to act in accordance with his commands, he had in more than one instance procured for them unmerited and severe reprimands. The fearless and independent spirit of Edwin, could not endure this, and when his class had assembled one morning for recitation in this Professor's department they found his desk ornamented with a towering paper cap, bearing devices, which represented him in some of his most ridiculous proceedings, and so life like that they could not be misunderstood; and inscribed with mottoes, significant of the disrespect and detestation in which he was held by the students. Such open lawlessness could not be allowed to pass unnoticed, and as Edwin would not debase himself so much, as to assume the servile and cringing part of disguise, he avowed himself the author, as soon as the investigation was commenced.

'But brother,' said Helen, when on the eve of his unexpected return, he had related to her all the circumstances—could you not have borne with him three months longer?'

'Oh as to that, perhaps I could, but I wished him to know the estimation in which he was held, and the position which he occupied in our feelings; and there was not another of the class, that had the moral courage to reveal it to him, although they would abuse him in his absence, more than I could have a heart to.'

'And did you not fear discovery, and what would most likely be the consequent result?'

'I intended that they should not long seek for the author, and was fully aware of the probable consequences, but little indeed did I care for that.'

'Still you must have known how such things were regarded, and I should have thought that rather than incur the disgrace of being expelled, you would have shrunk from so rash an experiment.'

'Helen, he was a contemptible fellow, notwithstanding his high station, and I was willing to give evidence to the world that I thought so; and now if they despise me, let them do so, I don't care.'

'But I fear it will operate against you—you know that motives, or even acts, are not always taken into consideration, and it not unfrequently happens, that erring persons, are more despised on account of the punishment they endure, than for the errors which they have committed.'

'Strange logic you ladies advance,' said Edwin; but however strange it proved none the less true in his case.

This circumstance led Helen to fear, that the reckless fearlessness which had characterized the earlier youth of her brother, had been deeply strengthened during his absence, nor did the events of a few weeks which followed, serve to lessen this impression. The occurrence which was the subject of the conversation that opens this sketch, was not the first instance of his wide departure from the laws of etiquette, and the result, as has been seen, did not promise amendment. Her fears too, that it would operate against him, were not without foundation, and she ere long had evidence of their being realized. The news that Edwin Lee had been expelled from college, was soon widely circulated, and a set of young men, whose recklessness might bear a harsher epithet, inasmuch as their other conduct showed them to be destitute of many of those higher and more ennobling qualities which characterized him—commended his spirit, and sought to make him one of their number. They were possessed of some good qualities—who is not? and Edwin admiring in them, the opposite of what he so much despised in others, and relying in his own firm conviction of right, as sufficient security against his being led astray, yielded to their courtings, and joined in their meetings, Helen entreated and expostulated, but to no avail—they are not thought respectable,' said she, 'and you will be thought no better than they.'

'And because they are not thought respectable,' said Edwin, 'I must forsooth believe them unworthy my society, and join in the cry against them to earn for myself this appellation. They may have faults, I grant, and grievous ones, but it does not follow that I, of necessity, should copy them, and besides, you may believe me dear Helen, many of those who are smiled upon and courted, and who are called respectable in your society, do not possess half the nobleness and generosity of soul, that do these same young men. We must be charitable one towards another.'

Alas unfortunate young man! he forgot that evil hath sophistry, and sin hath snares; and in seeking to avoid those extremes which we admit, are more frequently the foundation of evil among mankind, he deemed not that he might plunge into their opposites, whose errors were as equally reprehensible.

The winter glided swiftly on, and with it, those long evenings whose hours are so favorable to the amusements and enjoyments of the young. Helen, who really felt herself inferior to her brother, in many of those ennobling qualities which grace the human heart, and who saw that he was welcomed and beloved by those who knew him best, even in the best society, blushed to remind him too frequently of his errors, and had long since desisted. Edwin still continued to meet with the young men, whom he without scarcely being aware of it, felt unwilling to introduce to the society of his sister; and when the common conversation, and pastimes, which at first had served for their entertainment, began to prove less adequate to the longer evenings, he was induced to now and then, join at a game of cards—'merely for amusement!' Ah! he knew not the various plans and schemes which these same associates had employed to accomplish this same step—nor indeed, of the greater strides which they were wont to make when his reproving eye was not upon them. They early learned that wile and craft, could alone ensnare him, but when once ensnared, would they not draw a bit, from the stored coffers of old Lee? 'There certainly can be no harm in playing cards for amusement—it is far better in truth than to meet and slander our neighbors,' were words to which Edwin listened and gave heed; but playing cards for amusement was soon very dull business without any incentive and a small stake would certainly add greater interest and zest, and—need we follow their various steps through that eventful winter?—when Spring again opened Edwin Lee was a gambler; and who that has been taught to gamble, has not learned with that lesson, the additional one, of tasting often of the intoxicating bowl?

But who can portray his feelings, when on a beautiful morning of that spring, he awoke for the first time to a sense of his condition; and that condition, oh how unlike to his, one year previous! On such a morning as this, he had then arose with the first dawns of light, and refreshed by his slumbers, had seated himself with book in hand, by an open window, and inhaling the invigorating air, and listening to the joyful anthems of the newly arrived welcomers of this happy season, his own heart had swelled with emotions of thanksgiving and gratitude, to the great Giver of every good. But now how different! The notes of the birds were as happy and joyful as then; the morning though farther advanced was as bright and balmy, and in himself alone was there a change. He had not yet arisen, nor did he feel that he could. The night before had far advanced ere he had returned, and in what a state the muddled clothes, of which he had not been disrobed, too plainly attested. His limbs were painful, his eyes inflamed, and a confused feeling in his head, joined to a bitter biting remorse at his heart.—For once in his life he had a 'care'—he dreaded to meet his sister, and degraded and debased as he felt himself to be, he hardly dared to lift his thoughts or prayers to that God to whom in his days of innocence and happiness he had at all times turned with feelings of adoration and filial affection. When at last, he summoned resolution to go and confess all to Helen, and ask her counsel, her eyes as red as his with weeping, the kindness with which she administered to his wants, and the visible efforts she made to avoid the subject uppermost in both their minds, at once disarmed him. 'Oh if she would say but one word,' thought he, 'that I might tell her all how much relieved I should feel; but as it is I can not, indeed I can not!'

How wretched was he during that day, and how gloomy and harrowing were his reflections! He had played the evening before and lost, and maddened by his ill luck, he had drank more deeply than ever before; and thus goaded on he had played again on a higher wager, and again lost. And now what was he to do? The knowledge of drunkenness—for Helen had arisen to open the door to him on the preceding evening—was degradation enough for him in her eyes, and how could he voluntarily add that of gambling? But this must soon be known to her, unless he could redeem what was lost; for he had drawn largely upon his father, and with a sense of the heinousness of gambling which he had never before felt, he resolved to try once more.

As the evening came on, he drew his cap over his eyes, and was proceeding softly down from his room to the door, when a quick ear heard his footsteps—a sister's affection was watching over him; and a hand was laid softly upon his arm, while a voice trembling with emotion whispered—'dear brother do not go out to-night.'

Had that hand been leprous, it would not have been dashed from his arm with quicker force, and rushing to the street he was soon beyond the hearing of that voice, which though of entreaty, stung more deeply than would have done the harshest notes of condemnation. 'O, God! said he, hast thou indeed, forsaken me?—yes, it must be, and degraded wretch that I am, my punishment is not greater than my deserts!' He hurried with a rapid and uneven step, through a darkened alley, and ascending the steps of a building whose thickly curtained windows suffered not even a straggling ray of light to escape from within, he placed his hand upon the latch as if to enter. But a shudder passed over him, and for a moment he hesitated. It was here that himself and companions had of late convened, and it is not a wonder, that he should instinctively recoil as he thought of all the wretchedness which these nightly convocations had heaped upon him. But ere the good resolution had time to be formed, he thought again of the kind and indulgent father, who he felt would turn in disgust from the son that had so abused his kindness and indulgence; and of the only and loving sister, who with all her purity, must shrink from him, when made acquainted with his additional transgressions. He must keep it from their knowledge—he must repay and replace, and with desperation in his heart and movements he entered; but ere the hour of midnight, he again rushed forth more nearly frenzied than before. He was hurrying along for he knew not where, and cared not whither, when he was overtaken and hand laid heavily upon his arm.

'Stay,' said the voice of his partner in the losses, 'I have somewhat to say to you,' and he bent his mouth close to the ear of the listener.

The moon shone bright into the face that had once beamed with intelligence, and joyousness, and conscious rectitude; but in its present revealings, oh how different! Now haggard and as pale as marble, with a finger pressed firmly on his lips, and his eyes bent upon the ground, stood Edwin Lee, listening to the schemes of one, who had been a plotter in his ruin.

'You say,' said he 'that his gains have been ill-gotten; that he has oppressed the poor, and—'

'Yes, and more'—

'Well, come then; let me restore to them, and keep it from their knowledge, and I will endure the rest alone—this, this can not add to the weight which already crushes and kills me.'

The next morning a letter was placed in the hands of Edwin's father, informing him that last night his son with another young man, was detected, while in the act of breaking into the house of one of their wealthiest citizens, and having been arrested, they were now in the hands of the police. The respectability and well known integrity of Mr. Lee, the letter continued, had induced his informants to make this communication, that he might if he chose visit his son in his unhappy fall, and evident distress.

The stunning effect which such unexpected tidings produced, may be imagined, but we should fail in attempting to portray the feelings of the wretched father and sister, and the far more wretched and guilty one, who by his wrong doings, had wrought not only his own, but their sufferings.

They went to him with bleeding and aching hearts, but when they saw the pale and haggard look, the glazed and wildly rolling eye, of one they both had so fondly cherished, they forgot to question or to chide him, and with that kindness and soothing tenderness, which that affection that follows its object through all events, ever inspires; they sought to alleviate his greater and more anguished distress. But not long to an agonized mind alone were these kindly attentions necessary. The second day after his arrest, he was seized with a raging delirious fever, and when two weeks had passed—two weeks whose hours had been marked with racking pain, and troubled delirium, on the part of Edwin, and careful, watching solicitude on the part of those who forgot his errors in his sufferings—his pains had ceased, and their watchings had ended, and he was taken from the home of his childhood and borne to that last narrow bed, 'where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary be at rest.'

Our tale is ended; mournfully indeed, and need we point the moral? Let those who are in the habit of making frequent use of 'I don't care,' take heed lest they all; for they are straying from the pathway marked out by the Moulder of minds. They may not indeed pursue the same course or have that career as speedily terminated, as was Edwin Lee's, but let them not deem themselves safe, for a just God reigneth, and righteous are his retributions. A philosopher as well as wit of the present day has remarked, 'for what are our vices but our virtues run to riot;' and when we reflect upon virtue and vice in their gradations, we can not deny the truth of the remark. "The kind Giver of our every blessing has bestowed all our faculties for good, and the enlightened and conscientious exercise of these alone, is what constitutes virtue. If this exercise is neglected or abused; confusion and riot, disgrace and ruin will follow. Let those who scorn to seek the good opinion of their fellow men, and in thus doing set at naught that faculty whose function it is to aim at securing this and the approbation of all—think of these things, and in striving to avoid the more common extreme of base and cringing slavery to 'what will the world say' seek that happy medium which is virtuous and highly to be commended.

MIGHT AND RIGHT.

An oration delivered before the Erosophian Adelphe of Waterville College, August 12, 1846. By E. H. Chapin. Boston: Abel Tompkins. 8vo. 40pp.

The above is the title of a beautifully printed pamphlet, for which we presume we are indebted to the publisher, and which we have read with the most lively and thrilling interest. It is in its well known and popular author's happiest style, and presents an eloquent plea for the superiority of moral power over physical power, money power, and every other kind of power in existence—showing that true power, the mightiest of all power, is always right; and will ultimately supercede or overcome all other power, and Might and Right will eventually be one in the best possible sense. The following is the closing part of the oration:

And what is intellectual culture worth, without the moral. To what end is it pursued, why do we strive after knowledge in the outward universe, or the world of mind? What advantage is it to learn the operations of nature, to win the secrets of the planet and the flower? What to us this endless procession of phenomena, this ebb and flow of action? What to us this subtle analysis, that detects the common law of nature in its meanest atom; this sublime induction that rises from the sands of the sea-shore to the infinitude of worlds, themselves but golden sands on the shores of eternity, inductive evidences of Him around whose throne they burn and worship? What to us this knowledge that rends open the graves of a million years, and reveals to us the secrets of embalmed epochs—strange forms of life that have no use, only as they indicate, in every rigid filament, the Divine Designer, and, through ascending strata, suggest the law of progress, and the development of a beneficent purpose? What to us the use of history, poetry, of all the forms of knowledge; except through largeness of the intellectual vision to purify the heart, and to bring us to spiritual perfection? Without this, knowledge is worse than an abstraction, and, in such a case, we can conceive of a splendid intellect only as we can conceive of a star, drifting through space, without adaptation, without an orbit, without a centripetal law!

In the very nature of things, then the true scholar is one whose mental supremacy is based upon moral excellence, whose intellectual force is inwoven with spiritual life, in whose own soul Might and Right are one. He then, of all men, is fitted with the enthusiasm of knowledge and of love, to make these one in the practical action of humanity at large. Therefore there rests upon him the most stringent obligation to do so. Loving the moral ideal which he sees, he will labor to extend it; reverencing that supreme Right in his own soul, he can not resist the claims of humanity. In whatever sphere he is called upon to act, this will be his prime object—to overcome the wrong, to establish the Good and True, to bring on the new epoch when the highest practical power shall be moral power.

And let him not think that such an age is always to be ideal. He may not see its consummation, but he may do much to hasten it. Let the knowledge, let the intellectual power of the present time, declare themselves for the right, and they must hasten that consummation.—That epoch will come. The poet has already beheld it in celestial allegory, when he saw—

As in a dream sublime
The balance in the hand of Time,
O'er East and West its beam impended;
And day, with all its hours of light,
Was slowly sinking out of sight,
While, opposite, the scale of night,
Silently with the stars ascended.

I saw, with its celestial keys,
Its chords of air, its frets of fire,
The Samian's great Æolian lyre,
Rising through all its seven-fold bars,
From earth unto the fixed stars.
And through the dewy atmosphere,
Not only could I see, but hear,
Its wondrous and harmonious strings,
In sweet vibration, sphere by sphere,
From Dian's circle, light and near,
Onward to vaster, and wider rings,
Where, chanting through his beard of snows,
Majestic, mournful, Saturn goes,
And down the sunless realms of space,
Reverberates the thunder of his bass.

Begirt with many a blazing star,
Stood the giant Algebar
Orion, hunter of the beast!
His sword hung gleaming by his side,
And, on his arm, the lion's hide
Scattered across the midnight air
The golden radiance of its hair.

The moon was pallid, but not faint,
And beautiful as some fair saint,
Serenely moving on her way
In hours of trial and dismay.

Thus moving on, with silent pace
And triumph in her sweet, pale face,
She reached the station of Orion.
Aghast he stood in strange alarm!
And suddenly from his outstretched arm
Down fell the red skin of the lion
Into the river at his feet.
His mighty club no longer bent
The forehead of the bull; but he Reeled as of yore beside the sea,
When blinded by Ænophion,
He sought the blacksmith at his forge,
And climbing up the mountain gorge,
Fixed his blank eyes upon the sun.

Then, through the silence overhead,
An angel with a trumpet said,
'Forevermore, forevermore,
The reign of violence is o'er!'
And, like an instrument that flings
Its music on another's strings,
The trumpet of the angel cast
Upon the heavenly lyre its blast,
And on from sphere to sphere the words
Re-echoed down the burning chords,—
'Forevermore, forevermore,
The reign of violence is o'er!'

* Orion—by Longfellow.

We may not be gifted with so transcendent an illustration; but we too, see the great truth which it symbolizes—the supremacy of moral power over brute force, its sure advancement, and its unaided victory. We see it in that law of human progress, which runs through all God's universe. We see it in that application of means, through the course of ages and the labors of the great and good, which were not meant to be wasted. We see it in the features of the present age, the power which is elevating man above mechanism, the humane ideas, the increasing confidence in moral force, the tendencies to the universal. We see it, above all, in that Christianity, which is the highest fact in the rights of man, whose work is the work of advancement, and whose grand triumph is in the future. And from earth, as from heaven, rises music—

The sweet, sad music of humanity; growing more inspiring, thought, and breaking into wider and wider circles, as we listened. Heard in the clank of the laborer's toil, in the sundering of the bondman's fetters, in the pause that follows the crash of falling institutions, in the song that rises from fields of harvest, growing in the old furrows of violence and blood, breaking out in waste places, murmuring underneath alt thrones. The night is waning, the day is at hand. Happy the toiling and watchful scholar, who, in his position, stands nearest the morning, and, as a gifted oracle, shall, with trumpet-blast, fling upon the quivering hearts that wait to hear it, the prelude to that grand, out-bursting chorus, which shall proclaim that Might and Right are one!

LETTER FROM BR. BARRY.

Our readers will no doubt be glad to hear from Br. Barry, now of Racine, Wisconsin, and to learn that his health, though poor is improving, and the cause of Universalism beginning to assume, under his labors, a promising aspect. His discussion of the subject of capital punishment at this juncture, when Wisconsin is meditating the total and eternal abolition of the death penalty, we doubt not will do much good.

His first article on the resurrection is thankfully received. And as this volume of our paper is so nearly ended and his articles will be continuous and connected, we think it advisable to defer this till the next volume, so as to have them all in the same volume. His article on the seal of Christ's Messiahship, we shall look for with interest.

We heartily wish Br. B. a perfect restoration to health, and abundant success in his new field of labor. Here follows his letter.

Racine, Nov. 15, 1846.

BR. SKINNER—My health is somewhat improving, though since I wrote you, I have had a severe attack of sore throat, and as yet have hardly recovered from it.—My throat is unsound—painful, and bleeds after an exertion at speaking. I have to-day commenced my article on the Resurrection. I will complete it as soon as I can—writing as my health will permit. The other article mentioned will be sent soon.

A discussion between myself and the Presbyterian clergyman of this place, has just closed. It grew out of a lecture delivered by myself to which he replied, followed by arguments in favor of the death penalty. My rejoinder and reply were made at the court house last Sunday evening. The house was densely crowded, and the utmost attention was given.

The public mind was prepared for the discussion, because of the trial of a man here for murder, his conviction, and his sentence to die. I do not believe him guilty of murder; and to hang him, is to hang a man, in my estimation, innocent of the crime with which he is charged. An effort is being made to obtain him a pardon.

I now preach every Sabbath. My meetings are well attended—the number of attendants increasing—a spirit of inquiry is abroad, and we hope to establish our cause permanently in this beautiful and flourishing place. We are about to establish a Sabbath School and a Bible Class. More anon.—Fraternally Yours,

A. C. BARRY.

Oratorio for Sabbath School Exhibitions. By L. J. Fletcher. This is a small pamphlet lately published by Br. J. M. Usher of Boston, containing a variety of pieces in poetry designed to be sung and repeated by Sunday School children at Exhibitions. The subjects are of a sacred and interesting character, designed to instruct, edify and elevate the scholar in those sublime precepts and principles which the Gospel so pre-eminently inculcates. We think it well adapted to the purpose for which it was intended.

MOUNT CÉSAR SEMINARY.—We have received from J. S. Lee, A. B., Principal, a Catalogue of the Officers and Students of the above named Seminary for the Academic year ending Nov. 17th, 1846. This institution is located at Swanzy, N. H., and from the pamphlet before us we judge it is in a flourishing condition. The number of students for the Winter and Spring term was 34 gentlemen and 32 ladies. For the Fall term 44 gentlemen and 26 ladies. The course of studies pursued embraces the sciences generally and the languages usually taught in such seminaries. It is in a healthy and pleasant location.

REMOVAL.—Br. Waggoner has removed from Canton to Troy, N. Y., and wishes all communications addressed to him accordingly.

INSTALLATION AT HARTFORD.—By a late number of the Christian Messenger, we learn that Br. H. B. Soule was installed pastor of the Universalist society in Hartford, Conn., on the 11th of November. There were present at the meeting Bros. O. A. Skinner, T. B. Thayer, L. C. Browne, T. J. Greenwood, T. P. Abell, and — Twiss, who took parts in the interesting services of the occasion. The Installation Sermon was preached by Br. Thayer. The society in Hartford is represented as in a highly prosperous state under the ministry of Br. Soule; and both society and preacher have our best wishes for their continued prosperity and happiness.

Br. H. Jewell late of Exeter, N. H., was installed pastor of the Universalist society at Great Falls, N. H., on Thanksgiving day.

We learn by the Freeman that Br. E. G. Brooks, late of Lowell, Mass., has accepted an invitation to take the pastoral charge of the Universalist society in Bath, Me.

Also, from the same paper, that Br. J. S. Dennis, of Weymouth, has accepted an invitation to take the pastoral charge of the First Universalist society in Salem, Mass.

Br. Price—Credit W. Burton, Cazenovia, N. Y., $2.50 for Union, and charge A. W.

Br. D. Pickering, having removed to Aurora, Erie county, N. Y., desires to be addressed accordingly. As Br. Pickering's health is now much improved, he is able to preach wherever his services may be wanted. Destitute societies will do well to address him on the subject.

We received, some weeks since, and had forgotten or overlooked, an excellent Sermon preached at the funeral of the late father Thomas Jones, of Gloucester, Mass., by Rev. A. D. Mayo, pastor of the society where the deceased so long ministered in word and doctrine. It is an interesting and appropriate discourse neatly printed by Br. A. Tompkins, 38 Cornhill, Boston.

YANKEE DOODLE

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES

The Publishers of YANKEE DOODLE, after watching patiently the result of their efforts to establish A HUMOROUS ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, partaking of the spirit of this country and identifying itself with the interests, sympathies, tastes and progress of the American People, have the pleasure of announcing that their success thus far has been unparalleled in the history of Literature. Having carefully laid and cemented the foundations of our enterprise, we feel now warranted in going on to erect a durable superstructure. Although riding no hobby, nor professing to be the exponent of any narrow school or sect, YANKEE DOODLE is broadly and strictly 'national,' and has no meaner ambition than to embody and reproduce in permanent forms that free spirit, that exuberant life, that creative energy and refining enthusiasm which so eminently characterize us and distinguish the New World from the Old.

In the Editorial and Artistical Departments of YANKEE DOODLE, the Publishers have engaged the most eminent and diversified talent that could be procured. They make no parade of names, but leave him (YANKEE DOODLE) to speak for himself.

The object of this Prospectus is to introduce YANKEE DOODLE to the great body of the American People who reside out of the large cities, and upon whose decision must, at last, rest the fate of any national enterprise. We invite attention, therefore, to the following terms upon which we propose to extend the circulation of our paper.

Any person remitting us $22 by mail or otherwise, shall receive Ten Copies of YANKEE DOODLE for one year—directed to such address as he may designate. For $12 we will send Five Copies for one year. For $5 we will send Two Copies. Single subscriptions $3 per annum.

All orders must be accompanied by the cash.

Address, (post paid,) J. A. FRAETAS & Co.

No. 7 Spruce-street, New York.

YANKEE DOODLE is published in New York every Saturday morning, and will be mailed to country subscribers in time to arrive at its period of destination simultaneously with its issue in the City.

New York, November, 1846.

The publication of a new work by Samuel Lover, author of 'Handy Andy,' 'Rory O'More,' &c., &c., written expressly for Yankee Doodle, and entitled 'HANDY ANDY'S POST-BAG,' is already commenced in its columns.

UNIVERSALIST UNION AND NEW YORK CHRISTIAN MESSENGER.

These publications are in reality but one paper—issued in two forms. The Messenger is an open, folio sheet, (newspaper form,) containing a News Record, embracing a summary of Foreign and Domestic Items, furnishing as late Intelligence as any Weekly Paper from New York city, at $2 per annum, in advance. The Union form embraces the Religious and Literary matter of the Messenger sheet, in a convenient form for Binding, making a handsome volume, yearly 832 large, closely printed octavo pages, at $2.50 per annum in advance. The paper is well established, having entered on its sixteenth volume on the 14th of November instant, 1846. It possesses one of the most valuable lists of any similar publication—being yearly pruned of slack or dilatory subscribers.

Connected with the Paper is a valuable Book Concern, possessing one of the best lists of Standard Publications in the denomination.

Owing to the impaired health of Mr. Price—(who first established the paper, and has had the general Editorial direction of it from its commencement)—it is desirable on his part to retire from the change of its columns and business. Other engagements rendering it difficult for the present proprietor to give the necessary attention to it, he is induced to offer the whole establishment for sale. It is now in a healthy and prosperous condition; but may be greatly extended; and offers rare inducements to active business men who can give proper attention to it. The location is not exceeded by any in the country. Application (post paid) may be made to the undersigned.

THE NEW VOLUME.

Until the Establishment is satisfactorily disposed of, the business will be prosecuted with unabated energy. Mr. Price will continue every attention to its columns which prudence will permit, and with the promised aid of resident clergymen, and a valuable list of general correspondents, patrons may be assured that the paper will not suffer in interest. No efforts, as heretofore, will be spared to make it a creditable advocate of the Great Salvation—an acceptable weekly visitor to the domestic circle; and above all, to make it appeal, in a kind and persuasive spirit, to those 'of the contrary faith.'

A new volume having just commenced, it affords an excellent time for subscribing. Great inducements will be offered to Companies, where a number can go to one address, on application by letter. Specimen numbers cheerfully forwarded.

The attention of the public is particularly invited to its valuable stock of UNIVERSALIST PUBLICATIONS.

New York, November 14, 1846.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. HATHAWAY will preach in Mechanics' Hall (this city) on the fourth Sunday instant, A. M. and P. M. at the usual hours.

Br. J. H. STEWART will preach in South New Berlin, the 2d Sunday in December at such time as the friends may appoint.

Br. T. J. Whitcomb, will preach in Middleville, the 4th Sabbath in November, and every 4th Sabbath in each month, the ensuing year.

MARRIAGES.

At Paris Furnace, on Sunday, 8th ult., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. L. D. WHITING, of Olcott, Niagara county, to Miss LUCRETIA C. CLEMENT, of Bridgewater.

In Auburn, on the 25th ult., by the Rev. D. W. Bristol

MARK PERKINS, Esq., to Miss ELIZA, daughter of David Schweb, both of this city.

In Oxford, August 26th, by the Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Mr. ALFRED LEONARD to Miss MARY A. STATION, all of that place.

In the same place, September 9th, by the same, Mr. LOREN D. BACON, of Norwich, to Miss SARAH REBECCA HUNT, of Oxford.

In the same place, September 24th, by the same, Mr. WILLIAM BALCOM to Miss ROLEY SELINDA LEWIS, both of that place.

In the same place, October 29th, by the same, Mr. EBENEZER R. STRATTON to Miss HANNAH A. SIMONDS, all of that place.

In Smithville, November 4th, by the same, Mr. JAMES HAYES to Miss EMELINE COLE, both Smithville.

In Greene, November 8th, by the same, Mr. JAMES SHOLES to Miss SALLY WHEELER, both of Greene.

In Oxford, November 18th, by the same, Mr. NOYES GRAY to Miss CAROLINE HARTSON, both of Oxford.

DEATHS.

In Stark, Herkimer county, on the 7th of November inst., SARAGAH BURN, aged 73 years, 7 months and 7 days. He died without a struggle, and rejoicing in full assurance of a blessed immortality for all mankind.

The consolation of the Gospel were tendered to the friends and mourning relatives by D. C. T.

In Sweden, N. Y. October 19, Mr. MOSES CHAMBERLIN, in the 61st year of his age. For several years the deceased had been a supporter of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, and a believer in the final holiness and happiness of the whole wanting family of man. This was his hope and trust in the hour of dissolving nature. Several attempts were made during his sickness to shake his faith, but his reply was, he had investigated the subject when in health and made up his mind according to testimony drawn from the Bible, and he had no occasion to altar it while standing upon the confines of the tomb. He was an early settler of Monroe county, and by honest industry he accumulated an abundance of this world's goods. By his death his wife has been deprived of kind and dear partner, a stay and a sun to the aged widow under her bereavement. The funeral was held in the Presbyterian house at Sweden Centre on the 21st ult., and a discourse delivered by Br. S. W. Remington. J. HEWES.

At Forrestville, Chautauque county, N. Y., on the 14th inst., Mrs. BETSEY WASHBURN, aged 61 years.

Also, at the same place, on the 16th inst., Miss LOUISA WASHBURN, aged 25 years, daughter of the above. Both died of the prevailing Fever.

Mrs. W. attached herself in early life to the Baptist Church, but during many years, she has been an exemplary believer and professor in universal salvation. She died, as she lived, resigned and happy in the hope of a glorious life to come, for herself and all the human race.—[Evangelist. S. R. S.]

REMOVAL.—Br. D. C. Tomlinson has accepted an invitation to settle with the second Universalist society in Minden, Montgomery county, N. Y., and wishes all papers and letters to be addressed accordingly.

REGISTER AND ALMANAC FOR 1847.—We have received a supply of the Register for next year, and shall be happy to supply cash orders at the earliest notice. The Register and Almanac is got up in style similar to that for the current year, but contains 12 more pages, and is sold for the same price. Six dollars and a half per hundred, one dollar per dozen, and twelve and a half cents, single. Send in your cash orders early.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street Buffalo.

Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn, keeps a general assortment of Universalist Books for sale. He is also agent for the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist publications generally.

THE CONSERVATIVE.

BY REV. T. L. HARRIS.

Enslaved, down-trodden, spirit-blind he lieth
Within that blood-wet Golgotha, the Past :
Hearing the vulture brood that ever crieth
Amid the shadows in that grave-yard vast.
Nought is from God to him, save that he readeth,
Graven of old upon the mouldered stone :
Though glory beams from far, no ray he heedeth
Save the blue cope-light flickering there alone :
In owling wisdom through the dark he wanders
Raking old creeds from Pagan, Jewish tombs :
O'er worn Tradition reverently he pondereth,
Weaving for night still deeper, darker, glooms :
All living men to him are shadowy seemings,
Like those who o'er Tartarian flame-waves tread :
All present truths and splendors are but dreamings,— Light, Knowledge, Power, all embalmed and dead.
'Blind infidel!' he names the true REFORMER :
'Accursed,' he styles the Great, the Pure, the Free ;
Progress and Light he strives with from his corner,
Like him who with his sceptre fought the sea :
'Down with the Brave who strive to free the bondsman !'
'Tis just that Men like brutes are bought and sold !
He who for Freedom toils is God's doomed foeman,
For slavery was by him ordained of old.
Up with the gallows let it stand forever !
To bless is human, to revenge Divine ;
'Tis right the criminal from life to sever,
Blood cries for blood and crime demandeth crime !
PEACE is no mandate binding on the nation ;
O'er martyred hosts roll on the Battle's car,
In Christ's name speed the flaming desolation,
Our Deity is named the God of War.'
Thus cries the blind Conservative, who drinketh
Blood from the purple vintage of the Past,
And from the love and warmth and splendor shrinketh
Like a cold corpse in coffin-shrouding fast !
The weary Earth, whose broken Heart is bleeding,
Gone to war with Truth, and Hate and Ambition—
Oh, shame, that, blind to his divinest mission,
Should dream and driel so the LIVING MAN,
When worlds and suns of Truth upon his vision
Dawn brighter far than e'er since Time began.
Awake, O Slumberer, in the darkened ages,
Claim thy great birth-right, rise redeemed and free,
The Present's life, the Future's burning pages,
With TRUTH and LOVE are eloquent to thee.
Burst the old dungeons that so dark surround thee,
Like some NEW WORLD that breaks through gloom to light,
And joining with the STRONG and FREE around thee, Toll for the RACE with consecrated might !

ELEGANT EXTRACT.

'But Sir, when you speak of an 'all-wise and all-benevolent Creator' are you aware of the import of your words ! If God is all-benevolent, will not he save the whole world from sin and misery ? Be calm and candid, Sir. Close your eyes and think—think hard—call up all the strength of your mind. Think over the nature and extent of that endless hell which is believed in. Ponder over its blue and scorching waves and seas of fire—the myriads of all nations that are supposed to go there. Listen to their unearthly shrieks and groans, as the corroding flames stream through every vein and pore, swell every nerve, and wreath like burning clouds above, while one untiring sound, eternity, thunders tremendous through the vaulted deep. Think then of a being over all enthroned in terrific and awful majesty, who made this hell, and its victims, ever controlled all things as he pleased. Then open your eyes, lay your hand upon your throbbing heart and say, such a God is all benevolent ! ! ! Do this if you can, if your tongue will not falter, nor your blood chill, to speak it. If not come out from the marble babblings of infinite cruelty, and own yourself a man ; and let us see that you have nature yet in you, and something left of the image of that Being whose very nature and name are love.'

MONTGOMERY'S LAW OF KINDNESS.

This work has had three editions in this country and three in England. The Free Church in Scotland has also made love to the publication, and has issued it as one of its own series. See the following paragraph from the 'Christian World', one of the Unitarian papers of Boston.—[Trumpet.

MONTGOMERY'S LAW OF KINDNESS, which has reached its third edition here, has already done the same in England. And a very interesting circumstance is that the Free Kirk of Scotland has fathered this brochure of an Universalist clergyman, and is now issuing it as one of their publications, with sundry omissions and admissions. A similar fate befell Br. Parkman's Offering of Sympathy—and a far worse one Muzzey's Young Maiden.' It is a little amusing that the original publisher of the 'Law of Kindness' in England, himself a Unitarian, should have objected to its author, unknown to him save by name, that the book had too much of a Socinian taint. Mr. M. has no wish to disown the fact.

The best need afflictions for the trial of their virtue. How can we exercise the grace of contentment, if all things succeed well ? or that of forgiveness, if we have no enemies ?

PROSPECTUS OF VOLUME XVIII, FOR 1847, OF THE EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

REVS. S. R. SMITH, J. M. HOSMAN, B. PASTORS,
A. C. BARRAY, CORRESPONDING EDITORS.

The many discouragements of two or three years previous to 1846, brought the publisher to the determination about a year since, to discontinue the publication of the Magazine and Advocate, at the close of volume 17, unless sufficient interest of the denomination should manifest itself in the support of the paper to warrant its continuance. It is with heartfelt pleasure that we announce, that the friends of Universalism have shown a proper interest, and that the publisher can now indulge in the hope that that interest will be kept up and increased ; and the paper continue to be sent upon its righteous and soul cheering mission, as in times past. It gratifies us to say, that by the commendable exertions of the friends of the paper, its list, which in 1845 only numbered 1700 now numbers 3500—more than double. That is well, yet there is abundant room and need for its further increase, for many reasons which need not here be given, but which will suggest themselves to every thinking Universalist. The Magazine we believe is now the only weekly paper in the denomination, devoted exclusively to its matters, and interests, without advertisements or extraneous matter, which is within the reach of its patrons by a little exertion, at the low price of ONE DOLLAR. (See terms. This fact ought to secure it double its present circulation, but when considered in regard to the talent employed in contributing to, and conducting it, ten thousand patrons ought reasonably to be expected to contribute their pitance to its support. It is not our custom to promise before hand or boast of what we will do—suffice it to say, that we intend to do all that lays within our means, to make the paper pleasing and acceptable to our readers, and useful to the cause. The advocacy and defence of Universalism will be the chief feature. Free, open, and candid discussion, upon all the leading reforms of the age, will be allowed a place in our columns, by our religious opposers, as well as others, provided they are willing to accord us equal privileges with those they may claim for themselves. Bitterness and personal allusions, calculated to create enmity or injure the feelings of any, will be studiously avoided. In short we wish to make the Magazine a Universalist paper.

For the kindness and exertions manifested in behalf of the paper for the past year, by both ministering brethren and laymen, we tender our unfeigned thanks, and hope to deserve a continuance of such kindness. We would now call attention to the terms, and it is hoped that all who may read this prospectus will do what they consistently can to increase our list. Each one who is favorably disposed, can doubtless persuade an acquaintance or neighbor to subscribe, and that one another, and by putting their subscriptions together, can form a club, and get the paper at the lowest rates.

TERMS.—Single subscriptions, or any number less than four, $1.50 as before. Four copies to one post office, with each subscribers name written on his paper, for five dollars, ($1.25 each), or five copies directed in a package to one person, without the names, for five dollars, and at the same rate to seven. Seven copies with names, for eight dollars, ($1.14 per copy,) or $1 per copy without names to one person and at the same rate to ten. Ten copies with names at one office for ten dollars, or eleven to one person without names. Twenty-one copies with names for $20 or twenty-two copies without names, and so on, or as follows :

For single subscriptions $1 will pay for eight months, 75 cents for six months, or 50 cents for four months.—Postmasters would doubtless, in many instances, have the package directed to them, and cheerfully mark the names of subscribers on the papers and distribute them for a copy. The paper with back numbers if desired, will be sent to any person joining a club, after it is formed, and receiving his paper in the same package, at the same price, as the other members of the club.

ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE. All papers discontinued at the end of the time paid for. All communications should be addressed to A. Walker, No. 30 Genesee Street, Utica, N. Y., and should be Post Paid to receive attention.

It is to be hoped that every friend into whose hands this prospectus may fall, will canvass his neighborhood, obtain all the subscriptions he can, (or if he can not attend to it, hand it to some active and good man who can,) unite with others if any there be, and make returns to the publisher as soon as the middle of December, 1846.

EXAMINATION OF ATHENAEUS' REMARKS CONCERNING GREEN'S EXECUTION AT TROY, N. Y.

MR. EDITOR—Though some months have elapsed since Green's execution, yet the following lines may not be too late, as they may profitably awaken renewed attention at this particular time upon the subject of Capital punishment; and it is with this design chiefly that I send them to you for publication, if you deem them of sufficient importance.

The Baptist Register of Oct 10th, 1845, fell into my hands, and I accidentally caught my eye upon an article, in which a man signing his name Athenaeus, and writing upon the subject of Green's execution at Troy, says, 'A strong effort was made by some of the prisoner's friends, and the opposers of capital punishment, with the Universalist minister at their head, to have this sentence of death commuted for perpetual imprisonment, or at least the execution delayed.'

Now I see nothing anti-christian in all this movement—nothing which conflicts with the forgiving disposition of Christ whose whole life was spent in mitigating the sufferings of men. But Athenaeus seems to insinuate that there is something radically wrong, unjust, and insufferable—something at which his heart revolts and he can not approve.—He says, 'A strong effort was made to have the sentence of death commuted, or at least the execution delayed.' Who that has a spark of humanity in his bosom, and acts and thinks untrammelled by creeds and customs, would not make 'a strong effort' to save life, rather than destroy it? This is the first law of our own being, nay, an instinctive principle implanted in the very nature and constitution given us by our Creator, TO PRESERVE LIFE. We would make a strong effort to save our own lives, and no one would think we acted unjustly; but would it be wrong to make 'a strong effort' to save the lives of others? We but act in accordance with the dictates of humanity in so doing, and follow the example of our Saviour who 'came not to destroy men's lives, but to save.' I see, therefore, nothing wrong or unchristian in this effort to save the life of a fallen fellow being. No wrong was intended him or any one else. Love and good will prompted the effort—love of forbearance, of clemency, of forgiveness, of compassion—a love of the sacredness and inviolability of human life as the gift of God.

But who made this 'strong effort,' before spoken of. The prisoner's friends, and the opposers of capital punishment, with the Universalist minister at their head? What an awful deed this was!—Supposing the prisoner's friends had not made this effort—that they had either manifested a cold indifference to his fate, or directly opposed any effort being made to postpone even, or commute his punishment!—would they not have been looked upon hard hearted and unfeeling, destitute of the common sympathies of humanity? Surely. If he had friends, I say let them act the part of friends, and not of fiends. But they had a 'Universalist minister at their head!' That was awful indeed!—None other minister but a Universalist had a deep and moving sympathy for one condemned to die—none to go forth with 'strong effort' to have even a short postponement, or commutation of punishment granted for the benefit of the criminal, and for the gratification of the ardent wishes of afflicted, broken hearted relatives, clad in vestments of mourning! And he at the head of the prisoner's friends! Verily, this was too bad, not too bad for the Universalist minister, but that there was no other minister in the place possessed of humanity enough to go ahead with him in this benevolent 'effort.' This writer, though intending to cast reproach upon the character of the Universalist minister, has nevertheless bestowed upon him the highest commendation. Some, filled with sectarian pride and bigotry, object to the abolishment of the death penalty, because, forsooth, Universalist ministers are engaged in its abolishment!—as though the cause must be wrong where such a hated class of people favor it. But if all are worthy of the same praise and high commendation which this writer himself has bestowed (unwittingly) upon the one at Troy, (C. C. Burr, I suppose,) I should be glad to be a follower of them in this humane cause at least, if in no other.

Again! says he, 'Human law emanates from the Supreme law giver, and there is mildness even in its severity. It is unyielding but not revengeful. It aims only, by inflicting a proper punishment on crime, to strike terror into evil doers, and secure to the utmost the safety of society.' But sir, can not this end be obtained by any other mode of punishment than that of hanging? Must we choke people to death as the only 'proper punishment' on crime to strike terror into evil doers, and secure to the utmost the safety of society? Is society any more secure in consequence of legal butchery? A strange kind of safety has society when the destruction of human life is sanctioned by law! and when that society, itself the law makers, sets the example of coolly and deliberately killing an unfortunate fallen man. Strange safety indeed has that society whose members chiefly are so eagerly bent on taking the life of such, that a great outcry and strong protest is made if one in their midst rises up who is so benevolent and forgiving and Christ-like as to make a 'strong effort' to have the prisoner's punishment 'commuted,' or even so much as to have 'the execution' of the sentence of death 'delayed' but for a short season! Truly with such a Haman-like disposition reigning in the very heart of society and giving character and tone to all its feelings, who that has humanity will flee to such a society for safety.

But says he, 'Human law emanates from the Supreme law giver; and of this law he says, 'Death for death is its awful and just reward—a punishment alike commanded by Scripture, urged by reason, and sanctioned by experience.' What! 'death for death!' and yet 'not revengeful?' And besides, says he, 'There is mildness even in its severity.' What kind of a heart does this man possess! One of adamant! No; but worse than this, one of sensibility, one that feels, but feels too much like that of Nero. The feeling which dictated this sentence, would say that this 'severity' of punishment made severe—this 'awful and just award,' is quite too mild. It would propose still more awful and intense 'severity.' 'There is mildness even in its severity!' Who can believe it? It is true only in a comparative sense, and perhaps he meant to be so understood, having his eye upon that infinitely more awful, eternal, and inconceivably intense suffering, which he believes the God of heaven will inflict upon the wicked hereafter. Compared with this, I confess 'there is mildness even in its severity,' but in no other sense is it true.

But says he, 'Death for death is commanded by Scripture.' I suppose he would refer us for proof to that noted passage, 'Whose sheddeth man's blood,' &c. I do not consider this as containing a command to kill. I view it in the same sense that I do the language of Christ, 'who they that take the sword shall perish with the sword.' Does any one understand this in the light of a command to kill all such as use the sword? No. His law was not 'the law of carnal commandments' a law of 'death for death,' but one that rebukes and not kills the man who uses the sword, and which says, 'put up thy sword into its sheath, 'and,' thou shalt not kill.' How then can it enter into the heart of man to suppose, as Athenaeus says, that that law whose punishment is death for death, is 'urged by reason?' Is reason opposed to the law of Christ? to his very acts and precepts?—and to the spirit and genius of his religion? 'Urged by reason!' What kind of reason is that which urges a man, or body of men, to put a fellow mortal to death in cold blood upon the scaffold? When a man is tried in these days for murder, almost the first thing that is done by his friends, is, to show the court that he had lost his reason. And yet Athenaeus will contend that it is reason which urges the jury to condemn and put to death this murderer! In the one case it was the loss of reason, and in the other, the urgings of reason which occasioned the taking of life. Now it is not difficult to tell which is the worst, the man, who, void of reason, kills, or a judicial body of men, urged on in the possession of reason, to destroy the life of a reasonless man. Notice the case of Freeman, the idiotic murderer of the Van Nest family, as an illustration of this point. Now it appears to me, that, so far as the individual act itself of killing is concerned, the murderer, who is over-excited, hasty; inconsiderate, and enraged with passion, is surely more excusable than the cool, deliberate, calculating body that legislates his case and executes him. So at least reason would urge me to believe; and what is reasonable in this case, is consistent also with the dictates of 'experience.' But says he, this law, of punishment of death for death, is 'sanctioned by experience.' Facts are entirely against him—the history of ages is against him—the best writers of this and all European countries contradict him. And even that most profound thinker and celebrated divine, the Rev. Geo. Harris of England, says, while reasoning against the death penalty, 'The practical experience of the country is in our favor.' The fact is, susceptible of proof also in our own country, showing quite conclusively, that

'Law and terrors do but harden
All the while they work alone.'

It is a fact now established beyond all controversy, that in all countries where the death penalty has been abolished, crimes have decreased. Hence, instead of experience lending its sanction to such a law, it has on the contrary proved that the law is pernicious in its influence on society.—And yet, this writer, as if impatient and vexed with those who would dare to offer word against it, exclaims with a kind of contemptuous sneer, 'Talk of any other punishment than death as the just reward for murder! It is infinite mockery!' Infinite mockery or not, there are many of the best and most philanthropic men in the world, who dare 'talk' of another mode of punishment as being more just and consistent with the dictates of reason and experience. Would this writer stop our mouths, and thus take away our liberty to 'talk of any other punishment?' This would indeed be mocking the designs of the Infinite.

But continues he, 'Every conviction of our reason, every pulsation of our heart, every instinct of our nature, gives the lie to the wretched fallacy by which the disbelievers in the endless punishment threatened by the Scriptures, are endeavoring to extirpate every thing that foreshadows it in the economy of human governments. But just, and righteous, and necessary as is the law which links capital punishment with capital crime, it does not, aggravate the miseries of the guilty by wanton cruelty.' I deny, and call for proof that it is 'just, and righteous, and necessary.' Though that may be a 'wretched fallacy by which the disbelievers in endless punishment are endeavoring to extirpate every thing that foreshadows it in the economy of human governments,' yet there are many believers in that doctrine—men too of noble and true hearts—who are engaged in this 'wretched fallacy.'—This writer seems to think that capital punishment, as incorporated 'in the economy of human government,' foreshadows this doctrine, and on that account he would not have it extirpated, because if it were, men would next come to be disbelievers in endless punishment. Hence the perpetuity of this doctrine depends very much on the perpetuity of the gallows, according to his admission. Now it is my sober conviction that if this doctrine hangs on the gallows, it will very soon expire. So mote it be without a tear. I would go some distance to witness such an execution, believing that it would be 'just, and righteous, and necessary,' since the number of murders this culprit has committed is 'legion'; besides, the amount of misery it has created is beyond all calculation.

If the doctrine of endless punishment depend for its perpetuity on the continuance of the law, 'death for death' as a mode of punishment foreshadowing it, then I say let it henceforth cease from among men, and have no resurrection ad infinitum. If it be threatened in the Scriptures, and can be proved thereby, then let its believers resort thereto for proof, and not cling to a sanguinary law in human government to support it.

There is no doubt in my mind that the law of capital punishment prepares the mind to receive the doctrine with a better relish. It so benumbs the sensibility, so paralyzes the feelings, so brutalizes the moral nature, that any thing in the economy of the divine government represented as taking place which is more awful in suffering, is more readily received and heartily approved as a consequence. This is one of the chief reasons why 'Athenaeus' would have capital punishment perpetuated in human governments, lest men, even Christian men should lose their hold upon the doctrine of endless punishment, and their eternal welfare be endangered.

The Empress Catharine once said, 'Experience demonstrates that the frequent repetition of capital punishment has never yet made men better.' She also said, 'We must punish crime without imitating it; the punishment of death is rarely any thing but a useless barbarity.' And the Rev. Geo. Harris, before mentioned, utters the sentiment that, whatever tends to lessen the sacredness of human life, also tends to encourage crime. Now in the face of these plain and obvious facts, will Athenaeus contend that this death punishment is 'urged by reason, and sanctioned by experience?' If so, that is a 'most wretched fallacy by which the' advocates of capital punishment are endeavoring to maintain a supposed Scripture doctrine, and promote the best interests of society—to show the dictates of reason and the sanctions of experience.

Again he says, 'I have pleasure in saying that the faithful efforts of his spiritual counsellors,* have been crowned with favorable results. Perhaps all the evidence has been given that the nature of the case admitted, that he is sincerely penitent for his awful sin, and has resorted to the Fountain which can cleanse the chief of sinners.' He expresses some uncertainty in his case, but, says he, 'While we leave the veil which only the Omniscient eye can penetrate to rest upon his internal state, we are permitted to rejoice in the fact that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin, and that he who spake consolation to the dying robber (not thief) is still mighty to save.' Yes, we believe it; and there is some consolation in the fact that though we hurry away with noise and tumult 'the dying robber' from among the living, and have very little feeling for him; yet there is One who 'careth for us,' whose 'blood cleanseth from all sin,' and 'is still mighty to save.' And it is our duty as believers in him to 'follow his steps.' Yes, and Athenaeus will not dispute that the voice of reason, of conscience, and of experience calls for the conformity of our lives and actions to that blessed Pattern.—But what mark of forgiveness was shown in the case of Green? He says, 'Perhaps all the evidence has been given that the nature of the case admitted, that he is sincerely penitent for his awful sin,' &c. Sincerely penitent? and yet not forgive him? Supposing Athenaeus were guilty of some criminal act, and I should say to him, though you have sincerely repented and given all the evidence that the nature of the case admitted that your repentance was genuine, yet Christ will not forgive you, you must still suffer the awful penalty of the law which is endless death. Would he believe me? Would he say that I talked Bible doctrine to him, and 'spake consolation' to his heart, which he says Christ did to the penitent thief? No, indeed. Why then not be consistent and do as he would be done by? If not, how is he going to escape that dreadful doom implied in the language of our Saviour, 'If ye forgive not men their trespasses,' &c.? Of Green he says, 'All the evidence has been given that the nature of the case admitted that he was sincerely penitent.' And this was the precept of our Saviour, that 'if thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him.' See Luke xvii: 3, 4. If Mr. Green was 'sincerely penitent,' why execute him? Just as he was prepared to live and be useful, must you kill him? Is it right, is it the dictate of 'reason' for the State to kill good men? and that too after God has forgiven? Is this what 'the law of nature and the sanctions of experience dictate?' If God forgive the criminal, is it not the highest mockery of the goodness of that Being to put him to death? What insufferable mockery is that for a man in priestly garb to kneel on the scaffold beside the criminal, around whose neck the fatal rope has already been tied, and there stretch forth his hands, lifting up his voice in solemn prayer to Almighty God, saying, 'O Father, show mercy and forgiveness to thy sorrowing and penitent child who is about to pay the forfeiture of his life on this scaffold'—and then as soon as the words are pronounced, rise up, and cut the fatal cord and break his neck! Oh, if there is any thing which can be called 'infinite mockery,' this is it in all its chilling power, making the heart of sensibility shudder. Will the good Lord deliver me from such would-be friends of humanity—from such as profess to have mercy and forgiveness in their hearts, and yet are ready to draw the life-blood of their fellow man! May the cause of Christianity ere long cease to be mocked with such hypocritical pretensions to goodness, and soon the gallows and all barbarous laws be buried in the grave of oblivion together.

Again, concerning the effect of Green's execution he says, 'That the general effect was solemn and salutary, none could doubt who witnessed the scene.' What the immediate effects were, or the remote effects will be, occasioned by Green's execution, I am not able to describe. But one thing is very certain, that in general, on such occasions the most corrupt portion of society congregates; and there is much profanity, levity, indecorum and intemperance witnessed, and even crimes are committed, the worst passions are excited and the heart hardened. Said Mr. Dawson in a speech before a late meeting of the Baptist Home Missionary Society in London, Eng., that 'all which is licentious, filthy, and abominable, was under the very gallows tree. Words that disgrace the atmosphere of a Christian land were spoken. These are the people of a Christian and enlightened country!' We have had many cases of fact even in our own country corroborative of the truth just uttered. Who that has taken any pains to acquaint himself with the facts upon this subject will say that the effect of public executions is 'salutary?' How many suppose ye, go away from those scenes of blood, wiser and better?

There seems to be now a sentiment 'pressing on the universal heart' that public executions are pernicious and corrupting; for already have half the States in the Union made them private, or excluded ed them from the public gaze. This is good, and argues a growing improvement in our criminal codes. One more step in improvement will put that relic of barbarism beyond the gaze of mortals, never more to be revived. God speed the time. It is surprising to me how a man possessing a Christian heart, or professing to take Jesus for his example, can for a moment approve of this system of judicial slaughter, and contend for its favorable impression on the public mind. And yet 'Athenaeus,' says, in reference to his leaving the scene of Green's execution, 'I went away a wiser man.... I went away deploring more deeply than ever that wretched infatuation which is laboring to abolish capital punishment, is striking both at the law of God, and the foundation of human government and social order. That must be a 'wretched infatuation' which would lead him after witnessing such a scene, to advocate more earnestly its utility and expediency, and is a poor comment on the increase of his wisdom. The man has proved by his own language that public executions tend directly to harden the heart. For it appears he went away from the scene of Green's execution deploring more deeply than ever any means being resorted to, to abolish capital punishment! It increased his thirst for blood. He would now have no murderer pardoned, no commutation, no postponement, but 'death for death,' or nothing! This man has proved all for which I contend, that putting men to death on the gallows, tends to harden the heart, corrupt the morals of society, and encourage deeds of cruelty.

Lakeville, N. Y., Nov., 1846.

FANATICISM AND BRUTALITY.

One of the saddest cases of brutality and crime occasioned by religious fanaticism, of which we have heard, occurred in China, in this county, a few weeks since. We may not have all the facts correctly, but will give them as nearly as we can remember a statement made to us verbally by the jailor of our county, to whose custody the prisoners were committed.

It seems there are certain religious professors in that town, hitherto connected with different denominations,—such as Baptist, Methodist, Free Will Baptist, &c., who are a little too spiritual to remain in those old churches, and, consequently have come out of them and formed a new order, more enlightened than others by special revelations, and more efficient than they in promoting religion by means of revivals. They are called Come-outers. One such revival, like a wildfire driven before a hurricane in a dry time, has been in progress in China, the past Summer—frightening and converting many ignorant and weak minded persons into a profession of religion.

Amongst the zealous promoters of this revival, is one man—hitherto regarded as respectable—who was exceedingly anxious for the conversion of his own wife, who is described as a sensible, serious minded, rational, and truly worthy woman. Such being her character, indeed, it is not strange that it should be difficult to convert her to such a religion. He warned her, he exhorted her, he threatened her, he howled over her; he called in his minister and other pious leaders to operate upon her; but all to no avail. She believed religion was a reasonable thing, that it had its seat only in reasonable minds and hearts; and therefore could not, in her conscience, say she approved of such unreasonable and insane conduct. But the Holy Spirit had called them to convert her, and convert her they must, if not by fair means, why then it must be done by foul ones. And so the husband and one of the brethren felt called upon one day, in the exercise of their pious concern for her soul, to beat religion into her by 'Apostolic blows and knocks.'—They seized her person and commenced whipping her without mercy. With what success they sought to drive the Holy Spirit into her, we know not; but believe, as a last resort, knives, or other deadly weapons were used. In short, they nearly killed the woman. They then thrust her into a dark room, which they made a prison of, guarded it so that she should not escape, kept her there in her wounds several days without food, and at nights, lest she then make her escape, two men laid on the bed with her, one on each side, to prevent her rising and getting away.

* Mr. Van Kleeck and Mr. Baldwin.

The poor woman could endure such brutality no longer. She finally, as if to save her life, consented to let the minister baptize her; and so her pious converters set up a shout of victory, in their cries of 'glory! glory to God!' and made off, yet in the stillly hour of midnight, to the minister, announced the joyful tidings, and called on him to get up and baptize the woman before her promise should have time to cool off. Up he got and away he went.—The weak and yielding woman was dragged out to the pond and plunged under water in the profaned name of the 'Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost!' One of her spiritual surgeons then took a knife or lance, and bled her, very profusely, to let the devil out; they fearing, as she was baptized in constraint, the devil might yet have been in her.

Such brutality, practiced upon an innocent and worthy woman, could no longer be tolerated by some of the people in the neighborhood who yet were sufficiently destitute of religion to have something of reason and humanity left to influence their conduct. At the risk of being denounced as the enemies of religion and the opponents of a revival, they caused the principal actors in this affair, or one of them at least, to be arrested, and committed to the jail in this town. He obtained bail at last, and is now under bonds to take his trial in court.

We believe these very pious revivalists claim to be on terms of much familiar communication with the Holy Spirit. All they do or say is by the movement of the Spirit. Of course they can not err in doctrine or do wrong in practice. Several anecdotes have been related to us, illustrative of these miraculous pretensions, one of which we will relate. A gentleman in the neighborhood called one day at a house where both husband and wife were subjects of the revival, and both of whom therefore believed in supernatural communications. It was dinner time. All the family were seated at the table. Just at that moment, the wife arose to step down cellar for some vinegar to put upon the table. As she turned to come back, the husband arose from the chair, advanced very gravely to the cellar door, and in a tone of great sanctimony exclaimed—'Mary, my dear, I have just had a revelation!' 'Ah, Jacob—and what has the Lord revealed to thee?' 'He has just told me to meet thee at this door and kick thee down cellar.'—'Well, Jacob, if so the Lord's will be done!' and she put herself in a position to be kicked; and her dear husband lifted the heel of his huge boot, and with one smart kick, pitched her headlong down to the bottom of the cellar stairs. As her head brought up against a stone, and the blood gushed from her nose, she exclaimed, 'Glory to God! Amen!'—That was one step toward heaven.

What shall be thought of such conduct? Of course no serious minded people will consent to call it religion; and yet it is the same religion that appears, ordinarily in common Baptist, and Methodist revivals, in school houses and camp meetings—unrestrained in any degree by common sense, which should restrain them wholly and altogether. It is only an ultimate degree of the same spirit of old fanaticism.—[Gospel Banner and Maine Family Visitor.]

TRUE NOBILITY.

A man's true honor, consists, not so much in the station he occupies in the community, as in the faithfulness with which he fills it. Wealth, and high station, and the world's honor, all put together, and heaped upon the same individual, do not constitute true nobility of character; for some of the greatest scoundrels that ever lived, have enjoyed them all, and yet died at last amid the reproaches and execrations, and curses, of those whom they had wronged.

True nobility is entirely independent of external circumstances, and as often dwells with the peasant as the noble—it is found in the lowly cottage, no less than in the lordly palace. It consists in a heart regulated by correct principle—which adheres unflatteringly to the good and the true, through evil as well as through good report—ever ready to stand up in defence of the friendless and down trodden—scrupulously avoiding all participation in wrong doing—practicing virtue for virtue's sake—and whom no bribe can seduce, nor threat drive, from the path which duty and principle have marked out for him. He who thus acts, though clothed in rags, with a hovel for his shelter, living on the coarsest of fare, and despised by the proud worldlings; is still a nobleman, of nature's truest stamp—a specimen of God's noblest handiwork.

Now, if I am not much mistaken, it is too much the fault with mankind; that in their great anxiety to distinguish themselves, and gain the character of great benefactors; they entirely overlook, those smaller charities and kindnesses, which render the path of life so deeply blessed. And yet, the little private charities of every day life—a mere word in kindness spoken, to some despairing fellow mortal; is better pleasing in the sight of God, and productive of more real happiness, than the great donations of the wealthy. As the poet has beautifully said—

'Tis a little thing,

To give a cup of water—and yet, its draught
Of cool refreshment, drained by fevered lips,
May send a thrill of pleasure to the soul
More exquisite, than when nectared juice,
Renews the life of joy in happiest hours.

'Tis a little thing to speak some common word

Of comfort, which, hath almost lost its use:

And yet, on the ear of him who thought to die
Unmourned, 'twill fall like choicest music.'

Let each of us therefore do good, according to the opportunities that present themselves, and the means which God has placed in our hands.

GOD OUR KIND HELPER IN 'EVERY TIME OF NEED.'

All our wants, physical, mental, and moral, are supplied by the universal Father, who careth for us 'above all we can ask or think.' The rains that refresh the earth; the earth itself that produces bread 'which strengtheneth man's heart'; the air we breathe; the ocean with all its varied treasures—these blessings ALL proceed from Him, whose impartial goodness extendeth to all! All the beauty of holiness—all the graces and glories of the Christian character are derived from the only true God, who is Love. To be acquainted with a truth so fundamental, and so all important to the full development of consistent Christian discipleship, is the TRUE GLORY of man! 'Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord, who exercise loving-kindness, judgment and righteousness in the earth; for in these things I delight, saith the Lord.' He who attains unto this the most valuable of all knowledge, is blessed in deed; he is rich in faith and true wisdom, though his worldly circumstances may be needy, indeed! Having drank of the fountain of all truth, and goodness, and happiness, such a disciple of Jesus, delights to imitate God in extending kindness unto all. Such an one breathes the Christian spirit all around him; kind thoughts, kind tones, and kind expressions are apt to excite in others corresponding results, and thus, the Christian disciple who aims this crowning excellency of the Gospel, is calculated to diffuse blessings wherever he may go, or to the very extent of his influence.—And did our world practice the kind principles, and freely exhibit the peaceful, affectionate dictates of the holy spirit, what a heaven of happiness—of rest and peace, should we enjoy on this earth! Universalism or the Gospel of God's first love to the race, requiring of all men a hearty reciprocation of such IMMORTAL LOVE, is the very teaching, which above all others, is fitted to produce so felicitous a result. The kindness flowing from a knowledge of the only true God, and of Jesus Christ whom he has sent, is what we all stand in need of, none possessing in too great abundance that cardinal Christian virtue! This very knowledge of the original source of all kindness, together with kindness itself and all the virtues of life are supplied by Him, who alone can supply the need of man! We must look up to one who is above us all, to supply our need—to direct our steps; so true is it 'that the way of man is not in himself—it is not in man that walketh, to direct his steps.' Jer. x: 23. It is to God, we must look, to supply our need. In times of prosperity, when every thing goes smoothly on,—when no sickness invades, and trouble is not experienced, men have been known to so far disregard the God of all grace, as to lean upon their own understanding,—thus exhibiting a practical atheism in not acknowledging the kind hand of love and mercy that has supplied their temporal need! When adversity comes, these ungrateful recipients of Heaven's bounty, are apt to call upon the Blessed Name, lamenting their past ingratitude, and praying unto Him, who can supply all our need, to direct their steps. Let us be devoted unto Him at all times, rejoicing ever more, praying without ceasing, in every thing giving thanks. 1 Thess. v. J. L. C. G.

A PICTURE.—Beautiful girl! Her countenance is but an index to her mind. There is no affectation in her movements, no pride in her eyes, no vanity in her heart, no gaudy display in her dress; meek virtue smiles on her brow and her countenance is lit up by a heavenly radiance that emanates from her hallowed affection.

Yes, lady, would you be the original of this picture? Throw away affectation—discard hypocrisy—blush only for guilt—be kind, do good—let industry be the prominent trait in your character, while all the Christian graces reign in your heart. You will be no less beautiful. Good angels will stoop to kiss your cheek. They will attend your steps and protect you, and when you fall asleep in death, they will transplant you to their own glorious paradise to be one of their number.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The Fall Term of this well known School, Male and Female Department, will commence on Wednesday, the 2d of September, proximo. It will continue under the same government and teachers as during the year past, with the exception of teacher of Mathematics.

Rev. T. J. SAWYER, M. A., Principal of the Male Department, and Teacher of the German, and the higher branches of the English language.

J. A. ROUND, M. A., Teacher of the Greek and Latin languages.

Mr. P. A. TOWNE, Teacher of Mathematics and the Natural Sciences.

Miss M. RICHARDS, Principal of the Female Department, and Teacher of French.

THE ROMAN MARTYR.

BY MISS LAURA EGGLESTON.

Within a myrtle bower there stood,
A high born maiden fair;
Italia's moonbeams gleamed amid
The gems in her dark hair.

An heiress of a princely house,
And reared in splendor's arms,
She long had shone a brilliant star,
Unrivalled in her charms.

But now, her destiny had changed;
She was a Christian bold—
A captive maiden in her train,
Of Jesus had her told.

Now on her pale and lofty brow,
A veil of thought was hung;
She gently struck her silvery lute,
And thrillingly she sung:

'The faith, the holy Christian faith,
I love and will avow;
Though dangers cluster round my path
And death is near I know!

'Undaunted I will meet the storm,
That gathers o'er my head;
My soul shall feel no mundane harm,
My risen Lord hath bled.

'With meekness, I will bear the frowns,
My kindred on me cast,
And raise my tearful eyes to heaven,
And hope until the last.

'I would be worthy of my Lord,
His glorious cause maintain;
A fearless band—a holy band,
Have for the Truth been slain.

'Farewell, my home, its princely towers,
Where in the dance I've trod;
My gardens, fountains, and vernal bowers,
I leave ye all for God!

'I'm ready for the fatal block,
To meet the foe's behest;
Christ hath the keys, and will unlock
The golden gates of rest.'

From the Ladies' Repository.

'OH, MY FATHER! THY WILL BE DONE.'

Mrs. B—— is a highly respectable and very amiable lady. She is a person of strong mind and some intellect, and well educated. She is the daughter of parents who were communicants in a Calvinistic Baptist church, and were careful to instil into the minds of their children, the gloomy doctrine of their creed. Of a kind and benevolent disposition, and with a heart formed for love and friendship, and overflowing with kindness, Mrs. B——, though from early teaching supposing the doctrine of endless hell torments must be true, was deeply pained with the conviction; and while from her soul she believed the cruel dogma, she could not reflect on it without bitter anguish. It is somewhat remarkable that she seemed to entertain little or no fears on her own account, but when she looked around her, on brother and sister and friend, and even extended her gaze into the community at large, she was struck with horror at the terrible thought, that those she loved, those she knew, and those she claimed kindred with as fellow beings, or at least numbers of them, were destined to become victims of infinite vengeance. Why should the Almighty suffer the consummation of the dreadful catastrophe, if he has the power to prevent it? Having that power, how can he suffer it, if he is good? All intelligent beings are his children, for he is the father and God of all; and how is it possible that he, with the love of a parent for his offspring, can suffer any one to continue to all eternity in sin, blasphemy, and infinite wretchedness, when he, by a word can redeem them from such an awful fate? Such were her constant inquiries, and to which she could obtain no satisfactory replies.

Mrs. B—— knew nothing of Universalism; she had scarcely heard that such a doctrine was known in the world; and she was told that setting human reason aside, and dismissing the feelings by which she was actuated, she must take the doctrine in question as a revealed truth of God, involved in inscrutable mystery, and humbly acquiesce in the divine decree. To believe the doctrine true, as she had been taught it, she had already learned, in spite of human reason—but to dismiss those tender sympathies and that heartfelt benevolence, which brought the tear of anguish to her eye, and to acquiesce heartily in that decree—to say so mote it be, to the endless torture of any of her species, was more than she could do—more, she thought than she ought to do—more, she thought, than a God of goodness and love required—and her distress increased. Her father was taken from her, and consigned to the house prepared for all the living. Her mother followed; and deep was the anguish of her soul. Meantime Mrs. B—— was surrounded with an interesting family whom she was striving to rear to habits of virtue; and anon, by the ruthless hand of death, she was bereft of brother and sister, till one by one, all had descended to the tomb, and left her to mourn their departure. These bereavements had increased her distress, and added new poignancy to the pangs inflicted by the merciless doctrine of the creed. While in this state of mind, she thought with all the overwhelming force of a mother's love, of the tender offspring God had given her. A new light broke on her mind; but it only served to reveal more fully the darkness and the horrors of what was taught her of the future world. 'My God!' she exclaimed, 'and is it possible that I, with the firm conviction of the existence of a state of infinite and interminable woe should have ushered these tender and helpless beings into life, with, for aught I know, the absolute certainty that every one of them may go down to the regions of the damned! Gracious heavens! the thought is fraught with horrors not to be described! And I, how can I answer for the deed? True, I can use all my efforts to prepare them for a better fate,—but I, what am I? A poor, weak, and impotent worm of the dust; and what can my feeble efforts do, unless blessed and made effectual by God himself, according to his purpose of grace? And will he do this? Alas I know not. Even the dreadful uncertainty is horrid—what must the still more dreadful reality be, should God in his wrath cast them off forever!'

Reader—could the fond parent feel less? Though ten thousand voices should proclaim the certainty of endless torments, and declare it the fiat of the Eternal God, could that fond parent, that mother, cast aside a mother's love, close the avenues of her maternal heart against a mother's tender sympathies, and in anticipation resign her offspring to the eternal flames; could she bow in holy reverence before the throne of Him who alone could save them, whose will is to inflict the horrid penalty and acquiesce in the damning sentence, rendering praise and thanksgiving to him? Perish the thought that should thus assimilate the mother to the furies of the heathen Pandemonium, and rob the Almighty of every attribute that render him worthy of the homage of his children. Thus could not Mrs. B. She roamed in darkness, and suffered intensely from the anguish of her soul. But the glorious light of heaven at length came, and chased away the murky, gloomy cloud.

Providentially there fell into the hands of Mrs. B—— a plain and simple, though forcibly written work, which taught and illustrated the doctrine of God's impartial grace and universal benevolence in the salvation of the world. She perused it with avidity; it gave a new turn to her thoughts; with it she sat down to her Bible, and studied and reflected with prayerful attention. Finally, she obtained farther aids, and was favored with opportunities of hearing the glorious doctrine of the final restitution of all things preached. That doctrine broke upon her mind with clear light, and with such irresistible power, and she found it so fully substantiated in the sacred Scriptures, that the conviction was so overwhelming, and the joy so ecstatic, that it seemed to her she had just awakened to a new life from a night of horrors, and shaken off an incubus that had well nigh bereft her of reason and of life.

Reader,—Mrs. B. is no fictitious personage. She is well known to the writer. She has lain aside sorrow for joy, and arrayed herself in the garment of praise instead of the spirit of heaviness. She is now, what the creed she formerly believed could never make her—a happy Christian. Happy in the boundless love and mercy of God; happy in the sure hope of her soul's salvation; happy in the prospect of the future for her own dear offspring, and for all the human race; happy in the unchangeable purpose of God to bring all home to himself in Jesus Christ. In short, my dear friend, Mrs. B—— is now happy, because she entertains a belief consistent with reason, goodness and Scripture, with Christian prayers, and the Christian spirit; a faith that enables her cheerfully to trust in God, quietly and hopefully to submit to all his dealings, to give up all things to him, and cordially and heartily to exclaim, 'O, MY FATHER, THY WILL BE DONE.'

THE SKEPTICAL LAWYER.

Many considerations might be urged to excite to the diligent study of this law, and to show its perfection and importance. The exposition of the law will discover to us these qualities—but as a preliminary to it, the experience of an eminent lawyer of one of the northern United States may be submitted. Its authenticity may be relied on, as it is published in one of the papers of the American Tract Society.

This lawyer was once a very profane man, and a skeptic. On a certain occasion he asked another lawyer what books he should read on the evidences of Christianity.—He was advised to read, in the first instance, the Bible itself, inasmuch as most infidels are very ignorant of it, and furthermore, in order to reason correctly on any subject, it is necessary to understand what it is that we reason about. It was stated to him also, that the internal evidences of the Bible are even stronger than the external. He was advised to begin his perusal of the Bible with the book of Genesis.

This advice was complied with; the aid of commentaries, and of his legal friend, was employed in solving difficulties.

One evening, some time after this course of study was commenced, the Christian lawyer called on his skeptical friend, and found him walking his room, and so profoundly engaged in thought that his own entrance into the room was not noticed, until he asked his friend what it was that occupied his attention.

The skeptic replied, 'I have been reading the moral law.'

'Well, what do you think of it?' asked the other.

'I will tell you what I used to think of it,' said the skeptic. 'I supposed that Moses was the leader of a horde of banditti; that having a strong mind, he acquired great influence over a superstitious people; and that on Mount Sinai he played off some sort of fire-works, to the amazement of his ignorant followers, who imagined, in their mingled fear and superstition, that the exhibition was supernatural.'

'But what do you think now?' followed his friend.

'I have been looking,' replied the skeptic, 'into the nature of that law. I have been trying to see whether I can add anything to it, or take anything from it, so as to make it better. Sir, I can not. It is perfect.

'The First Commandment,' continued he, 'directs us to make the Creator the object of supreme love and reverence. That is right: if he be our Creator, preserver, and supreme benefactor, we ought to treat him, and no other, as such.

'The Second Commandment forbids idolatry. That precept certainly is right.

'The Third, with equal justness, forbids profanity.

'The Fourth fixes a time for religious worship. If there be a God, he ought certainly to be worshipped. It is suitable that there should be an outward homage, significant of our inward regard. If God is to be worshipped, it is proper that some time should be set apart for that purpose, when all may worship him harmoniously, and without interruption. One day in seven is certainly not too much; and I do not know that it is too little.

'The Fifth defines the peculiar duties arising from family relations.

'Injuries to our neighbor are then classified by the moral law. They are divided into offences against life, chastity, property, and character. And,' said he, applying a legal idea with legal acuteness, 'I notice that the greatest offence in each class is expressly forbidden. Thus, the greatest injury to life is murder; to chastity, adultery; to property, theft; to character, perjury. Now the greatest offence must include the lesser of the same kind. Murder must include every injury to life; adultery every injury to purity; and so of the rest. And the moral code is closed and perfected by a prohibition, forbidding every improper desire in regard to our neighbor.

'I have been thinking,' he proceeded, 'WHERE DID MOSES GET THAT LAW? I have read history. The Egyptians and the adjacent nations were idolaters; so were the Greeks and Romans; and the wisest and best of Greeks or Romans never gave a code of morals like this. Where did Moses get this law, which surpasses the wisdom and philosophy of the most enlightened ages? He lived at a period comparatively barbarous; but he has given a law, in which the learning and sagacity of all subsequent times can detect no flaw. Where did he get it? He could not have soared so far above his age as to have devised it himself. I am satisfied where he obtained it. It must have come from Heaven. I am convinced of the truth of the religion of the Bible.'—[Boyd's Eclectic Moral Philosophy.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1846.

REV. CHARLES BEECHER AGAINST CREEDS—AGAIN.

We can not resist the temptation to copy some further portions of Mr. Beecher's Sermons on creed-making and creed makers. In his 2d Discourse, after showing what he does not mean by substituting creeds for the Bible—that he does not mean 'the publishing in book-form, of a system of doctrines which any man, or body of men, supposed to be contained in the Bible,' * * * nor does he mean 'the mere publication, defence and propagation of a book, by any man, or body of men, as containing the system of doctrines taught in the Bible,' though he thinks this would be 'an unwise presumption,' he asks, 'What then is such substitution?' and answers:

It is, after having presumed to publish such a book, and to say, 'This is the system of doctrines contained in the Word of God,' to go further, and require the acceptance of that book by every candidate for licensure or ordination, as a test of his qualification. It is this which I shall attempt to show is one step in APOSTACY.

I. Because it is a direct contradiction of the unequivocal teaching of the Holy Ghost.

The estimate which God has set upon his word is, the Man of God, who sincerely receives and adopts the Bible in the best exercise of his natural faculties of interpretation, is PERFECT, THOROUGHLY FURNISHED UNTO ALL GOOD WORKS.

We contradict this. We virtually declare, the Man of God, who sincerely receives and adopts the Bible, in the best exercise of his natural faculties of interpretation, is not perfect; nor thoroughly furnished unto all good works. Nay, he is so imperfect, so poorly furnished, that we will not license, nor ordain him. That is to say, he shall suffer the natural inconvenience and penalty that such refusal inevitably will bring.

Having thus virtually annulled God's statute, and affixed a penalty to the obedience of it, we set up our own statute, viz: the Man of God, who sincerely receives and adopts the Bible, and this creed, according to the best of his natural faculties in interpreting them, is perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.

This is what must strike every unprejudiced mind as real apostacy. Let me illustrate. Compare this with a well known feature of the Romish apostacy. The Bible declares that there is one mediator between God and man, Jesus Christ the righteous, and that there is salvation in none other; that his blood cleanseth from all sin, etc.—What, in this cardinal point, is the very gist of Roman apostacy? Denying Christ? No. Denying that he is the Mediator? No. What then? She adds other mediators, the virgin, the saints. This is recognised by all Protestants as the very essence of her apostacy on this point. But, men and brethren, I submit to you whether the case in hand be not precisely parallel. God declares that the Man of God, who sincerely receives and adopts the Bible, is perfect, for certain specified purposes. We declare that the Man of God who sincerely receives and adopts the Bible, and this creed, is perfect for the same specified purposes.

God declares that Christ as a mediator is perfect.—Rome declares that Christ and the saints, as mediators, are perfect. Now, if the latter be apostacy, why not the former? Do not we and Rome, so far, stand on precisely similar ground?

II. But I judge it to be a real step in apostacy, because it has arisen, and is advancing, in the same mysterious, stealthy way, out of the midst of good men, and good motives, that saint-worship arose. The rise of saint-worship was prophesied by St. Paul, as a revival, under a Christian dress, of the ancient pagan worship of good demons. 1 Tim. iv: 1.

Now, how was it brought about in its earliest stages? By bold, bad men? By a general vote of apostacy? Ah, no! These 'hypocritical liars,' with 'consciences seared as with a red-hot iron,' mentioned by the apostle, were the product and the support of the mature, full-grown apostacy, stalking forth a grim and ghastly ghost of defunct paganism, evoked from hell, and clad in the fleecy vestments of the Lamb.

The stupendous mystery of satanic-skill was, that he contrived to have martyrs substituted for discarded demons, by the pious, unsuspecting co-operation of godly men—men, ready in their turn, to become martyrs. They were the unconscious tools, in the hands of that arch-plotter of ruin, to bring about the fatal resurrection of that very old paganism, (under a truly godly form,) from whose fires they had barely escaped.

How did it begin?

In a pious and decent respect for the memory of the martyrs. Nothing more. In cherishing and defending their memories. It was fostered, creeping step by step, from affectionate remembrance to respectful veneration; from respectful veneration to superstitious adoration; by such men as Eusebius, Theodoret, Basil the great, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory Nysen, Chrysostom, and almost all the Fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries.

Innocently it flourished in their unsuspicious hands, and peacefully and piously it passed beyond their day, to a horrid consummation.

So it was with fasting from meats.

So it was with forbidding to marry.

So with every feature of the Romish Apostacy.

Precisely in the same manner, is this feature of what I must call Protestant apostacy, now arising—creeping stealthily through its first innocent stages, among good men, from good motives; and precisely in the same manner will it pass beyond our day to a similar consummation.

Our best, most humble, most devoted servants of Christ, are fostering in their midst what will one day, not long hence, show itself to be of the spawn of the dragon.—They shrink from any rude word against creeds, with the same sensitiveness with which those holy Fathers would have shrunk from a rude word against the rising veneration of saints and martyrs, which they were fostering.—They would have supposed that he who should have plainly remonstrated with them, and told them that they were taking a step in apostacy, was an enemy to religion. They would have told him, perhaps, he was doing the devil's work, just as our holy Fathers, with equal solicitude, say, when one attempts to disclose the necessary tendency of creeds. While, in point of fact, in both cases, it is the holy Fathers themselves, who are doing the devil's work. For,

III. This is a radical feature of Romanism, received under a Protestant form, just as really as saint-worship was a radical feature of paganism, revived under a Christian form.

What has been a radical feature of the Roman apostacy from the first, more marked than this one thing, as admitted by all Protestants, that she claimed the sole right of interpreting the Bible? Has not Rome always either deprived the people of the Bible altogether, or else set up that ineffable Church fog of tradition for an infallible interpreter? And how was it that this celebrated feature of the Romish system took its rise? I answer in the voice of history, by creed-making. It was the creed-making power, which began in the second century, crept slowly and stealthily forward, was first exercised in a general council, in the fourth century, which afterwards centred in the Vatican, and set its veto on the Bible.

After going somewhat at length into the history of the progress of creed-making, and the apostacy attendant thereon, our author proceeds to point out the stealthy steps by which it has progressed among Protestants, and the oppressive and injurious tendency of it, in the following language.

The creed system is now exerting upon the clergy of the Protestant churches, a secret, unsuspected, but tremendous power against the Bible—a power of fear. Yes, while it professes to venerate and defend the Bible, it is virtually undermining it. That is always Satan's way. He revived pagan worship in the midst of men who were fierce against it. How? He cheated them! He baptized it! They thought it was pious. So we. Busy in fighting Rome, wide awake to see she does not snatch our Bibles and burn them, we are yet letting him cheat us out of them in a new way, a pious way. We do not see him.

Oh, that God might unscale our eyes before it be too late! or our Bible will be dead and buried, and hope lost! Do you ask me to explain this mystery? Reflect a moment. Who are our Protestant ministry? How are they ushered on the stage?

They generally go from the bosom of the family to college, without seeing the world at all. There they are secluded for four years, which seem in after-life like an elysian dream. Thence they step directly into the Theological Seminary; and thence, after three years more of seclusion, into the pulpit.

What chance have they to know the world? All they have known is HOME, and seven year's sequestered study. What do they know of business? What do they know of men, and things, and the stern struggles of life? They go forth, in a majority of cases, babes in worldly wisdom; rich, perhaps, in literary lore, in piety and purity; but ah! wholly unaccustomed to buffet the wide world's waves. The severest crisis of their whole life is, when they are beginning the lesson of practical life. They are dependent, hopelessly dependent on their profession. Like new-fledged birds, they have never fairly tried their wings. Sensitive, sincere, timorous, naturally anxious for success, in suspense, the least professional failure strikes like a knell at their heart.

I have heard my father say, that when a situation was first offered him, he felt as though, if he failed in that, he never should have another chance as long as he lived.

And all this, you will perceive, is but the natural effect of their training.

Now, what sort of an ordeal is prepared for them in society? i. e. religious society, for they know no other. Let us see.

The religious world has what is called a public sentiment of its own, and this is formed chiefly by the great evangelical denominations. Other denominations are, owing to their paucity of numbers, less perceived. By one or the other of these denominations, the first fact is, the young candidate is to be licensed; for public sentiment has settled, that an unlicensed preacher is no preacher at all. He must have license, then; all his hopes centre on that. But there is not one of these great evangelical denominations from which he can get license, unless he will subscribe the creed of that denomination. In other words, the Protestant evangelical denominations have so tied up one another's hands, and their own, that, between them all, a man can not become a preacher at all, any where, without accepting some book besides the Bible.

It is true, each denomination says, 'We inflict no penalty—we only decline to receive into our ranks, one who does not agree with us.' And this is so specious, it sounds so reasonable, that it might deceive the very elect; but it is the most consummate stroke of infernal craft, and doubly distilled jesuitism.

It is like Rome, handing over the victims of the Inquisition to the civil arm, charging it to do them no harm, and then piously lauding her own lamb-like disposition. It is true, the denominations do not do the candidate any harm, they only silently leave him to his inevitable fate.

Unlicensed, without moral affinities with the minor sects, alone, before he has formed the self-sustaining habits of a man, before he has yet tried his armor, self-distrustful, generally poor, often in debt, inexperienced, he finds an invisible, intangible Power has entangled and enveloped him in complicate, writhing folds. The frown of society is upon him, public sentiment is against him—the public sentiment of good men, yea, of the best and most devoted! He is whispered to be unsound, unsafe, heretical. He is called by every sectarian name most frightful to ears evangelical, right or wrong; and yet nobody does it. He is smitten; he looks here and there, behind and before; he can see nobody. And thus he is politely, and respectfully, and silently, and invisibly crushed. He is in the religious world, what a broken-down candidate is in the political, dead.

Now, there never was a torture of the Inquisition more exquisitely suited to extort conformity from an agonized victim. Not the body, but the mind, is on the rack.—Every most noble feeling is tried to the utmost. His natural need of livelihood, his care of family and of friends, his sense of reputation, his honest ambition, his tastes, his intellectual habits, his hopes of usefulness, yea, the very inmost, sacred emotions of his devotional experience, are here taken hold of—in the dark—by an unseen relentless, ruthless hand—and are wrung, and racked, and wrenched, to the last extreme of mental torture.—And there is no eye to pity, no arm to save. The public will not hear him. He is nobody; an outcast; a madman.

This, my friends, is the PENALTY, which good men, out of good motives, unconsciously, yet really, are proposing to the eyes of every candidate for the ministry—this intense spiritual martyrdom. During seven years it stares him in the face, during the whole-forming time of his opinions. And for what?

For daring to say, 'I do not receive your creed as containing the system of doctrines contained in the Bible';—for daring to say what God has said, 'With that Bible alone, I am perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.' For repeating and holding on upon this declaration of God, he falls a spiritual martyr. And is not that an apostasy, then, that martyrs him? And is not the Protestant church apostate? Oh, remember, the final form of the apostasy shall rise, not by Rome's aggressive march; not by the Pope's long arm, outstretched to snatch our Bible; not by crosses, processions, baubles.—We understand all that. Apostasy never comes on the outside. It develops. It is an apostasy that shall spring into life within us; an apostasy that shall martyr a man who believes his Bible ever so holily; yea, who may even believe what the creed contains, but who may happen to agree with the Westminster Assembly, that proposed as a test, it is an unwarrantable imposition! That is the apostasy we have to fear, and is it not already formed?

Accept the Bible and the book, and you may put your own private construction on both, as every one does.—Accept the Bible, and put your own private construction on that—the great paw of the Beast is on you. This is what I call taking the Bible out of the hands of the ministry.

Mr. B.'s two closing paragraphs are somewhat ominous, and come with an emphasis that we seldom see exceeded in the quarter from which they emanate. They are as follows:

And what then is to be done? I know not what others may say, but if ever I shrink from declaring that the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible, is the perfect and thorough furniture of the Christian minister, and the Christian church, then may my right hand forget her cunning, and my tongue cleave unto the roof of my mouth.

Brethren, you see the standard that has been unfurled this day. What will you do? It is the standard of the Cross. It is the banner of the Spirit of the Lord! Rally around it. Away with your fears of other denominations! Away with false policy! Rally round this central principle, look to the Lord, and you are impregnable. The waves of the coming conflict which is to convulse Christendom to her centre, are beginning to be felt. The deep heavings begin to swell beneath us. 'All the old signs fail.' 'God answers no more by Urim and Thummin, nor by dream, nor by prophet.' Men's hearts are failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming upon the earth. Thunders mutter in the distance. Winds moan across the surging bosom of the deep. All things betide the rising of that final storm of divine indignation which shall sweep away the vain refuges of lies. When the Lord shall cause his glorious voice to be heard, and shall show the lightning down his arm, with the indignation of his anger, and with the flame of a devouring fire; with scatterings, and tempest, and hail stones: in that day, what shall save us? For judgment will begin at the house of God. What shall be our defence? Put your trust in Him, whose eyes are as a flame of fire, on whose head are many crowns, who is clothed with a vesture dipped in blood, whose name is called THE WORD OF GOD! For behold! a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes rule in judgment, and A MAN shall be as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest! Even so, Lord Jesus! Come quickly! AMEN.

We know not what effect these Discourses will have upon the Orthodox sects, and especially upon Presbyterians, from whom they emanated, to whom they were addressed, and for whose especial benefit they were designed. If they do not produce some 'shaking among the dry bones,' some frowns, grimaces, and grumblings toward their author, why then we shall think they can stand fire better than we have hitherto supposed they could.

THE DENOMINATIONAL UNIVERSALIST.

Sometime in the month of October we saw in the papers, and received also in the form of a Circular, from Adams, Mass. a Prospectus for a new periodical, to be entitled the "Denominational Universalist," to be published, until further arrangements are made, by Alfred Peck. The place of publication not fully determined, but "probably Troy or Utica." The design of Br. Peck, (which he says he presented in a Memorial to the General Convention at Akron, O. three years ago,) as set forth in this prospectus, is this—"to embody and concentrate the talent of our ministry in a periodical paper of the highest order, which should not be ephemeral and lose its interest with the week; a paper which, from the richness of its pages as well as from the united exertions of all our ministers as Agents, should have so extensive a circulation, as to yield a yearly income, which should constitute a fund to be disposed of by an Executive Committee as the appointed instruments of the Convention, for the relief of our disabled ministers and their needy families.

Br. Peck further says, "We fondly anticipated, in the event of the cordial approval and embrace of our scheme by that body (the Convention) that ere this time many sorrowing hearts would have been gladdened and comforted—many pangs embittered by forgetfulness and ingratitude, would have been mitigated by the hand of kindness." But as the denomination has done nothing towards adopting and carrying out the plan proposed, Br. Peck has resolved to commence the work himself, and carry it on until the denomination shall, by taking it off his hands, relieve him of the labor and responsibility of conducting it. He anticipates even more good from the work than simply relieving the necessities of the poor members and families of our ministry. He says, "We hope, when it comes into the hands of the denomination, that it will be able to do more—to support a Theological Professor in the 'Clinton Liberal Institute,' and help more perfectly to qualify our future fellow-laborers for the Gospel Ministry."

The work is proposed to be published "in weekly numbers of 16 pages each of royal octavo, good paper and fair type—at two DOLLARS, in all cases after the first number, paid in advance."

This work we intended to have noticed, and indeed we designed to have copied the prospectus entire, some weeks since, but the crowded state of our columns for the last few weeks prevented. Having now given the substance of it and presented Br. P.'s plan and designs, we deem it unnecessary to copy it entire. Having presented his plan to our readers, it may be expected that we shall express an opinion of its propriety, feasibility and probable success.

With Br. Peck we have long been acquainted. He is possessed of fair talents, an honest heart and devoted zeal in the cause of truth and humanity. We do not doubt the purity of his intentions, the singleness of his purpose, or the generous philanthropy that prompts his new undertaking. And could we believe his plan would succeed and his expectations be realized, we would certainly hold up both hands in its favor and co-operate therein to the extent of our humble ability. But will he, can he, succeed? Is the denomination in a condition, and possessed of the disposition to take hold unitedly, or to any great extent, in aid and support of his undertaking? Will the ablest writers freely furnish matter for the columns of the paper? Will other publishers discontinue their several periodicals, and merge them in the "Denominational Universalist?" If not, can it succeed? Let its location be ever so good and central, will there not be a call for other local papers that will interfere with its circulation and design? Will not a majority of subscribers to Universalist papers prefer taking one published in their own state or vicinity to taking a Denominational paper published out of their own state, and destitute of the particular and local interest which induces them now to take a paper of the kind? These are serious and important questions, on which Br. P. should seriously reflect and ponder before he embarks in so important an enterprise. There may be no question as to the propriety of the measure, per se, or as to its desirableness. But it is a question of grave magnitude for the projector or executor of such a plan—Is it practicable?—Can it succeed?

We have reflected considerably on this subject; and from observation and experience in similar denominational matters, we are persuaded that the undertaking cannot succeed, at present, if ever. The way is not yet sufficiently prepared for it. There are too many denominational papers in existence. Our denomination is not drilled and under the entire control of the clergy, as the Methodists were when they built up their mammoth and money-making paper and book establishment in New York; nor is it probable it ever will be. And if we are not mistaken the glory of that establishment has in a great measure departed. The General Convention having done nothing about the matter, is evidence that that body either considered the obstacles to such an undertaking too great to be readily overcome, or else felt too indifferent to act in the premises.

Br. Peck is of an ardent temperament and often acts more from the impulse of the moment and the stimulus of his glowing philanthropy, than from the dictates of a cool and well matured judgment, enlightened by experience and observation. He will not, we trust, take offence at the freedom of our remarks upon himself and the plan he proposes. We assure him they are dictated by the best of feelings and the purest of friendship. And we should feel that we disregarded these sacred principles if we withheld the free expression of our opinion and judgment in this matter. We would, if possible, save him from disappointment and loss, which we are almost certain he will experience if he commences the publication proposed on his own responsibility. Personally we have no interest in the matter. We are not a publisher nor proprietor, nor a salaried Editor; nor have we had any proprietorship in any paper for about eleven years; nor do we expect ever to be engaged in publishing another paper. We wish that course to be taken with regard to all our periodicals that shall best subserve the interests of all concerned, and especially the interests of truth and our denomination at large. Of this one thing we are abundantly satisfied, that there are too many periodicals published in our denomination, and with a very few exceptions, too meagerly supported.

THE INDEPENDENT UNIVERSALIST.

Another new paper with the above title has just been commenced at Terre Haute, Ind., by J. Kidwell. Its size is about the same as this, but on coarser paper and much larger type than ours. Its price the same. The 'Western Universalist,' formerly published at this place by Br. E. Manford, has been removed to Indianapolis, same State; and if we mistake not its patronage has been quite too limited to afford it the encouragement which it needed. The object of starting a new paper by the side of it we do not rightly understand, unless it is because 'misery likes company,' and it was concluded that it was better for two to starve to death in company than for one to either live or die alone. Br. Kidwell is somewhat advanced in years, and without much polish of style or literary attainments, has long been distinguished for his masculine independence and great combativeness. Both in theory and his notions of discipline he is a latitudinarian; and from his independence of spirit, believes and preaches and writes and acts just as he has a mind to. These characteristics will be obvious to any one, on noticing the grammar and spirit of certain resolutions prepared by him in opposition to Br. T. J. Sawyer's report on the new organization of our denomination, and which resolutions were passed at the Western Union Association in August last and published in his paper of the 21st ult.

Harpers Publications.

ECCLESIASTICAL PHILOSOPHY, prepared for literary institutions and general use, by Rev. J. R. Boyd, A. M., Principal of Jefferson County Institute, New York, &c., pp. 423, 12 mo. The work is divided or classified by Books of which there are six. The being, perfections, and moral government of God, made known by the creation, constitute the subjects of Book I. The active and moral powers of man, and remarks upon their due regulation, constitute Book II. The principles and rule of moral action and obligation are exemplified in Book III. The rights of man, Book IV. Relative importance of natural and revealed morality, Book V. Of the various branches of human duty—of the duties which respect other beings, Book VI. After these from page 213 to 407 the ten commandments are the subjects of dissertation. Many good things are collected from the writings of Dick, Foster, Abercrombie and others. We shall endeavor to give some extracts at convenient opportunities.

ROMAN AND GRECIAN ANTIQUITIES, with a sketch of ancient Mythology, by Joseph Salkeld. The geography and topography, civil and political government and economy, military and naval affairs, religion, public games and amusements, domestic affairs, time, measures, weights and money and mythology of the Romans and Greeks are descanted upon in the above named work. The subjects are systematically arranged and occupy 316 pages 18mo. It is a book containing much useful instruction.

No. 13 of the PICTORIAL ENGLAND, contains the history of the civil and military transactions, religion, constitution, government and laws during the reign of Henry VI. 25 cents.

No. 123-4 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE, contains the tragedy of Richard III, accompanied with the usual number of spirited engravings. 25 cents.

No. 90 of the Library of Select Novels, is LUCRETIA, or the Children of Night, by Bulwer. 25 cents.

No. 8 of MARTIN, or the Foundling, is out. 6 cents. All of the above works at Beesleys.

No. 8 (and the last) of Vol. 2 of the NEW YORK ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE, comes to us with its usual number (4) spirited engravings, and its large amount of reading.—This monthly is without doubt the cheapest of that class of periodicals. One copy is afforded at $3.00 per year—two copies for $5.00 and five copies for $10.00 sent to one address. The number before us has a title page and index to the volume. A new volume commences in January, single numbers or full sets can be had at the publishers prices, of G. N. Beesley, this city.

LEBANON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.—We have received a Catalogue of the officers and students of this Seminary of learning, located at Lebanon, N. H. from which it appears to be in a flourishing condition. John P. Marshall, A. B., Principal of Male Department; Sarah J. Kendall, of Female Department.

A week or two since we published the prospectus of the 'Mechanics Mirror.' The publisher having made new arrangements has issued the following

PROSPECTUS

MECHANIC'S ADVOCATE.

A weekly paper devoted to the elevation of the Mechanic, Art, Science, Mutual Protection, and the interests of the Working-Man.

JOHN TANNER, Editor.

[Late Publisher of the Mechanics Mirror.]

THE MECHANIC'S ADVOCATE will be published every Thursday morning, at No. 24 Commercial Buildings, corner Broadway and Hudson-st., at the low rate of ONE DOLLAR PER ANNUM in advance.

It has now become imperative that the Mechanic should have a weekly paper so that he can sit down on Saturday evening, and read the events of the week, the improvements in science, and also refresh his mind with the choice literature of the day. From every quarter, we have been solicited to do so; and the substance of every letter that we have received on the subject, has been, 'The Mechanics ought to have a weekly paper of their own.'

The MECHANIC'S ADVOCATE, will be printed in eight large pages suitable for binding. It will embrace under its separate departments the choicest selections from the best works, original articles from the pens of eminent Mechanics, Lists of Inventions, and the most important and stirring news of the week in a correct and condensed form.

We have engaged many of the most distinguished Mechanics in the U. S. as Contributors to our columns. It will be emphatically the Mechanic's Advocate and Fireside Companion. From repeated assurances we have no doubt that the Mechanics of our State and County will give us a hearty and united support. We would therefore ask our friends to interest themselves in our behalf, and in the elevation of their fellow craftsmen.

All communications must be addressed to JOHN TANNER, No. 24 Commercial Buildings, Albany.

DEDICATION.—The new Universalist meeting-house lately erected at Brentwood, N. H., was dedicated to the worship of God on Wednesday, 18th ult. Sermon by Br. M. Ballou of Portsmouth.

Br. Geo. H. Clark, of Lockport, has commenced preaching the Gospel of a world's salvation.

REMOVALS.—Br. J. H. Campbell, late of the Theological School at Clinton, has accepted an invitation to take the pastoral charge of the Universalist society in Cleveland, Ohio, and wishes to be addressed at that place.

Br. S. S. Fletcher has removed from New Bedford, Mass., to Bridgeport, Conn., as we learn by the Trumpet.

Br. H. Burr, late of Conn., we learn by the Messenger, has removed to Easton, Pa., and was installed pastor of the Universalist society in that place on the 12th ult.—Sermon by Br. Asher Moore. Brs. Grosh and Hecht took parts in the service.

THE POPE AND CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—By the N. Y. Tribune we learn that the Pope of Rome intends to substitute imprisonment for life for the punishment of death, which he intends to totally abolish. The Pope is certainly ahead of many Protestants in this respect, who still cling with desperate tenacity to the gallows, that relic of the dark ages.

What has become of our Corresponding Editor at Auburn? Is he so much enamored of the new and splendid church now being erected by his society that he forgets us? Say, Br. Austin, will you give us an account of that structure and its progress, or of something else as good?

THE SOUL OF THE LATE BISHOP FENWICK.—A late number of the Boston (Roman Catholic) Pilot announces another Requiem Mass to be celebrated on Tuesday morning 'for the repose of the soul of the late Bishop Fenwick.' What! is not the soul of the good Bishop, for whom so many Masses have already been celebrated, at rest yet? If not how can our Catholic brethren know that it ever will be?

DEDICATION AND CONFERENCE.

A Conference of the Chenango Association will be held in Binghamton, Broome county, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 23d and 24th inst. On the first day the Universalist meeting-house just completed in that place, will be dedicated to the worship of God. All the friends in Broome and the neighboring region, and ministering brethren generally, are urgently invited to attend. Come, brothers and sisters, come.

J. T. GOODRICH, Standing Clerk.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. HATHAWAY will preach in Mechanics' Hall (this city) on the fourth Sunday instant, A. M. and P. M. at the usual hours.

Br. J. H. STEWART will preach in South New Berlin, the 2d Sunday in December at such time as the friends may appoint.

Br. T. J. Whitcomb, will preach in Middleville, the 4th Sabbath in November, and every 4th Sabbath in each month, the ensuing year.

MARRIAGES.

In Lockport, Saturday morning, the 28th ult., by the Rev. Geo. H. Clark, Mr. JOSIAH L. BREYFOGLE, of Petersburg, Ohio, to Miss CATHERINE E. CHRYSLER, of the former place.

At New Hartford, on the 4th of November, by Rev. T. J. Sawyer, of Clinton, Mr. GEORGE HUBBEL, of Frankfort, to Miss SARAH M. SMITH, of New Hartford.

In Harmony, Chautauque county, November 5th, by Rev. E. W. Reynolds, Mr. WM. W. COVEL, to Miss ELLEN E. BARBER, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Deerfield, on the 12th of November, Miss BEDORA BOWEN, aged 41 years. The deceased endured a protracted illness with great fortitude and becoming resignation to the divine will; and has left a large circle of relatives and friends to mourn the loss of her society. She was an intelligent Universalist, and lived and died in the enjoyment of that hope, 'which is like an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth within the vail whither our forerunner hath for us entered in triumph.' Thus leaving another evidence, that Universalism is both good to live and die by. The consolations of the Gospel were administered to the relatives, and a numerous circle of sympathizing friends by the writer, in the Presbyterian church at Deerfield, on the 13th inst. T. J. W.

In Pompey, Nov. 18, JAMES COOK, in the 26th year of his age. Mr. Cook was a very respectable young man, beloved by all who knew him. He was an unwavering believer in the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. He read and understood for himself, made no profession, but lived a good moral life—he was a dutiful son, an affectionate brother, and a constant friend. M. CARPENTER.

In Butternuts, October 5th, ADELAIDE AUGUSTA, youngest daughter of Jason and Elizabeth Cook, aged 2 years, 4 months and 2 days.

'As the sweet flower, which scents the morn,
But withers in the rising day,
Thus lovely seemed the infant's dawn,
Thus swiftly fled its life away.
Ere sin could blight, or sorrow fade,
Death timely came with friendly care,
The opening bud to heaven conveyed,
And bade it bloom forever there.'

Sermon on the occasion by the writer. J. H. S.

At South Hill, Onondaga county, Oct. 12, Mrs. POLLY CLARKE, wife of Capt. John Clarke, and mother of J. F. Clarke, Esq., aged 73 years. Mrs. C. had for 20 years or more been a Universalist in faith and practice. Even the most bigoted of the 'contrary part' were constrained to acknowledge that she lived and died a Christian indeed.—The Gospel of unbounded grace was her joy in life, and her comfort and triumph in death. She was formerly a member of the close communion Baptist denomination; but here she found but little true Gospel liberty to the mind, or true enjoyment to her benevolent heart. The Gospel of a full salvation in Jesus, alone brought true and substantial peace to her soul, and fully satisfied its holy desires. She bore her sickness with much patience, and died in the triumphs of her blessed faith, which alone can rob death of its sting, and the grave of its victory! May her surviving companion be comforted by the Gospel of Jesus which assures him that the 'dead shall be raised incorruptible,' and that in the resurrection all shall be like the angels of God in heaven.

Her funeral was attended by the writer, and a discourse preached from 2 Cor. v: 1, (by her request) to a large congregation of sympathizing friends. N. BROWN.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street Buffalo.

LINES TO M. L. B.

For thee, in years which yet do shroud
The future from the eye,
I could not wish a single cloud,
Should veil thy prospect sky;
But ever bright—aye, full of bloom,
Be all thy journey to the tomb.

And yet, when years, with hurried flight,
Far down the march of time,
Shall fling their shadows o'er the light,
So true in youthful prime,— Methinks thou 'lt learn, through mists and tears,
A truth unknown in early years.

But 'mid the cares—the storms of life,
Which sweep the page of time,
May hope, shield thee from gath'ring strife,
With gleamings all divine—
A hope wilt from earth's ruins rise,
To a bright home, high in the skies.

C. S. M.

WOULD N'T MARRY A MECHANIC.

Let every young lady read the following, and learn wisdom. Those who suppose they were made to live without work, must, of course, suppose that somebody else was made to work for them—to be (for it amounts to this) their slave. Such persons, ten to one, will sooner or later, take practical lessons in their error, as did the young woman mentioned below. She who marries an honest, industrious mechanic, or other laborer, marries well. And if she have sense enough to think so, her husband marries well.—[Gospel Fountain.]

'A young man commenced visiting a young woman, and appeared to be well pleased. One evening he called when it was quite late, which led the girl to enquire where he had been.

'I had to work to-night,' he replied.
'Do you work for a living?' inquired the astonished girl.

'Certainly,' replied the young man; 'I am a mechanic.'

'My brother does n't work, and I dislike the name of a mechanic;' and she turned up her pretty nose.

This was the last time the young mechanic visited the young woman. He is now a wealthy man, and has one of the best of women for his wife. The young lady who disliked the name of a mechanic, is now the wife of a miserable fool—a regular vagrant about grog-shops—and she, poor, miserable woman, is obliged to take in washing, in order to support herself and children.

Ye who dislike the name of a mechanic—whose brothers do nothing but loaf and dress—beware how you treat young men who work for a living. Far better discard the well-fed pauper, with all his rings, jewelry, brazenness and pomposity, and take to your affection the callous-handed, intelligent and industrious mechanic. Thousands have bitterly regretted the folly, who have turned their backs to honest industry. A few years of bitter experience have taught them a severe lesson. In this country no man or woman should be respected, in our way of thinking, who will not work bodily or mentally, and who curl their lips with scorn when introduced to a hard working man.'

KIND WORDS.—The destiny, temporal and eternal, of individuals, often turns upon a single word spoken in kindness or unkindness, at particular crises of their existence. The celebrated Dr. Adam Clark, was, till about nine years of age, the perfection of dullness in the estimation of his teachers. As such, when at this age, he was pointed out by his teacher to a stranger of respectability who visited the school. The stranger, with great interest and affection, replied, that he thought the teacher had mistaken the genius of the boy; that he had talents, and might yet attain to eminence in the literary world. That kind word struck a spark in the mind of the child, which made the future man one of the lights of earth.

On the other hand, an unkind or discouraging word spoken just at such a crisis, may affectually break the spirits, or turn the heart into bitterness, and render the object ever after the companion of the foul spirits of earth and hell.—With what feelings do we all remember words of kindness or unkindness spoken to us at those periods of our existence, when our hearts were made of tenderness, and spoken by those whose words were as life and death, to our spirits.

'Then deem it not an idle thing,
A pleasant word to speak;
The face you wear, the thoughts you bring,
A heart may heal or break.'

EXPOSURE TO THE SUN.—There are few points which seem less generally understood or more clearly proved than the fact, that exposure to the sun, without exercise sufficient to create free perspiration, will produce illness, and that the same exposure to the sun, with sufficient exercise, will not produce illness. Let any man sleep in the sun, he will awake perspiring, and very ill, perhaps he will die. Let the same man dig in the sun for the same length of time, and he will perspire ten times as much, and be quite well. The fact is, that not only the direct rays of the sun, but the heat of the atmosphere, produces abundance of bile, and powerful exercise alone will carry off that bile.

A man's desire always disappoint him, for though he meets with something that gives him satisfaction, yet it never thoroughly answers his expectation.

PROSPECTUS
OF VOLUME XVIII, FOR 1847,
OF THE
EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND
GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

REV. DOLPHUS SKINNER, EDITOR,
REVS. S. R. SMITH, J. M. AUSTIN, S. J. GIBSON, AND
A. C. BARRAY, CORRESPONDING EDITORS.

The many discouragements of two or three years previous to 1846, brought the publisher to the determination about a year since, to discontinue the publication of the Magazine and Advocate, at the close of volume 17, unless sufficient interest of the denomination should manifest itself in the support of the paper to warrant its continuance. It is with heartfelt pleasure that we announce, that the friends of Universalism have shown a proper interest, and that the publisher can now indulge in the hope that that interest will be kept up and increased; and the paper continue to be sent upon its righteous and soul cheering mission, as in times past. It gratifies us to say, that by the commendable exertions of the friends of the paper, its list, which in 1845 only numbered 1700 now numbers 3500—more than double. That is well, yet there is abundant room and need for its further increase, for many reasons which need not here be given, but which will suggest themselves to every thinking Universalist. The Magazine we believe is now the only weekly paper in the denomination, devoted exclusively to its matters and interests, without advertisements or extraneous matter, which is within the reach of its patrons by a little exertion, at the low price of ONE DOLLAR. (See terms. This fact ought to secure it double its present circulation, but when considered in regard to the talent employed in contributing to, and conducting it, ten thousand patrons ought reasonably to be expected to contribute their pitance to its support. It is not our custom to promise before hand or boast of what we will do—suffice it to say, that we intend to do all that lays within our means, to make the paper pleasing and acceptable to our readers, and useful to the cause. The advocacy and defence of Universalism will be the chief feature. Free, open, and candid discussion, upon all the leading reforms of the age, will be allowed a place in our columns, by our religious opposers, as well as others, provided they are willing to accord us equal privileges with those they may claim for themselves. Bitterness and personal allusions, calculated to create enmity or injure the feelings of any, will be studiously avoided. In short we wish to make the Magazine a Universalist paper.

For the kindness and exertions manifested in behalf of the paper for the past year, by both ministering brethren and laymen, we tender our unfeigned thanks, and hope to deserve a continuance of such kindness. We would now call attention to the terms, and it is hoped that all who may read this prospectus will do what they consistently can to increase our list. Each one who is favorably disposed, can doubtless persuade an acquaintance or neighbor to subscribe, and that one another, and by putting their subscriptions together, can form a club, and get the paper at the lowest rates.

TERMS.—Single subscriptions, or any number less than four, $1.50 as before. Four copies to one post office, with each subscribers name written on his paper, for five dollars, ($1.25 each,) or five copies directed in a package to one person, without the names, for five dollars, and at the same rate to seven. Seven copies with names, for eight dollars, ($1.14 per copy,) or $1 per copy without names to one person and at the same rate to ten. Ten copies with names at one office for ten dollars, or eleven to one person without names. Twenty-one copies with names for $20 or twenty-two copies without names, and so on, or as follows:

4 copies to one office with names	$5.00
7 " " " "	8.00
10 " " " "	10.00
21 " " " "	20.00
42 " " " "	40.00

Or 11 copies to one person without names,	$10.00
22 " " " "	20.00
33 " " " "	30.00
44 " " " "	40.00
55 " " " "	50.00

For single subscriptions $1 will pay for eight months, 75 cents for six months, or 50 cents for four months.—Postmasters would doubtless, in many instances, have the package directed to them, and cheerfully mark the names of subscribers on the papers and distribute them for a copy. The paper with back numbers if desired, will be sent to any person joining a club, after it is formed, and receiving his paper in the same package, at the same price, as the other members of the club.

ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE. [All papers discontinued at the end of the time paid for. All communications should be addressed to A. Walker, No. 30 Genesee Street, Utica, N. Y., and should be Post Paid to receive attention.]

It is to be hoped that every friend into whose hands this prospectus may fall, will canvass his neighborhood, obtain all the subscriptions he can, (or if he can not attend to it, hand it to some active and good man who can,) unite with others if any there be, and make returns to the publisher as soon as the middle of December, 1846.

BY REV. W. PERRY.

'I am set for the defence of the Gospel.' Philippians i: 17.

Paul whose history abounds with examples of self-denial, generous sacrifices and noble darings, was the author of my text. After his miraculous conversion to Christianity, we behold him on all occasions, and in every place speaking in defence of the glorious Gospel. Faith, hope, charity, and the resurrection, were themes that employed his lips. Paul's fearless and impassioned eloquence inspired his followers with so much confidence that some were prompted to preach the Gospel publicly. Some through enmity, some of good will toward Paul. Says the apostle, 'the one preach Christ of contention, not sincerely supposing to add affliction to my bonds; the other of love, knowing that I am set for the defence of the Gospel.' Those who become preachers through enmity, were anxious to detract from the personal popularity of the apostle. They could not bear to see Paul monopolize the favor of all the disciples. And straightway they commenced preaching, filled with envy and strife; indifferent about the prosperity of the Gospel. The apostle was certain their intentions would be frustrated; for says he, what they mean for evil, will fall out to my advantage, to the furtherance of the Gospel. My friends, the enemies of our cause can not do any thing to impede its onward progress, if those who love it will prove true to it.

I now propose to speak more definitely of this Gospel, which Paul so earnestly and eloquently proclaimed before Agrippa and on Mars Hill, and wherever a door was opened for its proclamation and defence, and which you and I, here, are bound to promulgate and defend. First, I shall tell what the Gospel is. Secondly, I shall hint at the means which may be successfully employed in defending it.

I. First—What is the Gospel? A distinguished writer observes, that among the Saxon scholars, the word Gospel has been variously explained. Some have called it the mystic word of God, the history of God, or God's history. While according to others, it means, God-spell, a word anciently used, and still signifies incantation or a charm, produced through the powerful preaching of the death and resurrection of our Lord and Saviour.* To me this exposition appears improbable. We are to understand by it, that the charm produced through preaching the resurrection, is the Gospel. What I understand the Apostle to say in the text, is that he had been chosen to preach and defend the doctrines or principles Christ had revealed.—The Gospel is nothing more nor less than the history of the birth, life, actions, death, resurrection, ascension, and doctrines of the man Christ Jesus; in other words it may be called, that system of divinity which he embodied, gave to the world and defended.

There is one important injunction contained in the Gospel, which it may not be out of place to mention here. 'Love thy neighbor as thyself.' We are commanded to do this. But do we love our neighbor as we do ourselves? Are we as careful of his reputation as we are of our own? Are our dealings with him always open and fair? When we are guilty of some indiscretion, we would like to have our neighbor chastise us to the face, instead of blazoning our faults before the world. As ye would that others should do unto you, do ye even so unto them. We shall do these things when we love our neighbor as we do ourselves; when we become genuine disciples of the blessed Jesus. The Gospel imposes stern duties upon us. And God knows there is need of our performing them. Look abroad and behold the misery that floods this land! Behold the poor inmates of our prisons, our jails, our county houses. Want and starvation drove many of those brothers of ours to crime. They are our brothers and sisters—crime does not absolve the relationship God has established by creating us out of one blood.—Why are the poor neglected? Why are the poor Lazaruses turned away from the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table? There is a vast amount of suffering in the world, and even in this country, in the immediate vicinity of those who fare sumptuously, and robe themselves in purple and fine linen. The poet's language is to the point:

'I do not mourn my friends are false;
I do not grieve for sins of mine;
I weep for those who pine to death,
Great God! in this rich world of thine.

'So many fields there are to see,
And fields go waving broad with grain;
And yet what utter misery!
Our very brothers lie in pain.

'These by the darkened hearth-stone sit,
Their children shivering idly 'round;
As true as liveth God, 'twere fit
For these poor men to curse the ground.

'And those who daily bread have none,
Half starved the live long winter's day,
Fond parents gazing on their young,
Too wholly sad one word to say.

'To them it seems their God has cursed
This race of ours since they were born;
Willing to toil, and yet deprived
Of common good, or store of corn.

'I do not weep for my own woes;
For they are nothing in my eyes;
I weep for them, who starved and froze,
Do curse their God, and long to die.'

Christians! go forth and give the fruits ye have received; ye have received freely and freely dispense to the poor. Cast your bread upon the waters, and after many days, that Providence which takes notice of a cup of cold water given freely, which sanctified the widow's mite, will return it with thirty fold. Go forth, and be instrumental in alleviating the sorrows of humanity, in lifting up the bowed down; in carrying consolation to the abodes of virtuous wretchedness; and in causing the widow's heart to sing for joy. In doing which men will see your good works and be led to glorify your father which is in heaven. In this way, ye can add a lustre to religion, joy to your heart, glory to human nature, and above all, a living and abiding defence of the Gospel.

II. Secondly. It is necessary toward the successful defence of the Gospel, to have a place where we can meet and answer the objections brought against it. This is of the utmost importance, of the highest necessity and utility. It is practicable and can be attained in almost every village in this broad union. This is an essential step, because there are thousands in this country who are aiming a death stab at Christianity, who are dedicating their time, their talents, and their money, toward the accomplishment of that object. Shall we who are constituted the defenders of the Gospel, remain idle, while these wily enemies are assiduously at work? Shall we remain inactive, while the disciples of Paine, Voltaire and Gibbon, are demolishing the fair temple of Christianity? These are not the only enemies we have to contend with—those who have unguardedly and wrongfully interpreted its predictions and teachings—thereby involving the Scriptures in contradictions, and inconsistencies are among its worst foes.

And who are they? I am sure 'you will not think me invidious after the world has obstinately refused to burn, if I say Father Miller and his followers.' Against all religious enthusiasts, against all insinuating infidels, against all open and avowed atheists, we must array ourselves, not with carnal weapons; but with God's great truths, in the spirit of love. Let the minister, furnished with the shield of faith, the armor of the Gospel, preach steadily; and see that you give him your countenance, your hearty sanction, by a constant attention on his ministrations. Give the Gospel an open field, and fair play, and we have no fears about the result. Then should the ridicule of earth, and the blasphemy of hell assail it, it remains transcendentally beautiful! No, I am not alarmed about Christianity. The waves of infidelity may beat with all their might against her—as the storm against the pyramids of Egypt—and she would remain unharmed and steadily point heavenward. Christianity does not depend upon fortuitous circumstances for success. She is enshrined in the human soul—and will remain there until its noblest powers are crushed, and its conscience stifled. Talk not about that system of ethics, which even the skeptic acknowledges to be pure. But rather talk about raising its banner aloft, and planting it on the outer walls of Zion. Talk about pushing her conquests to the ends of the earth—talk about fearlessly defending it—talk about supporting its heralds—do not say, 'we are not able.' 'If you have a will, there is always a way.' Let there be unity in your midst—unity of sentiment—unity of purpose—unity of action—it is a godly sight to see brethren dwell together, in unity, and a glorious one to behold them unitedly engaged in promoting the progress of the Gospel. Do not suppose you are doing all you can, when you subscribe liberally for spreading the Gospel—this notion is false. You can encourage—you can lift mightily with the tongue, and more mightily still with the life. Do not say 'we can not.' The spirit that breathes it never accomplished anything. Say 'I will try,' and when you say so, be as good as your word. Let each individual say 'I will try.' Let them press into the service of the Gospel all the surplus means Providence has put into their possession. By doing this you can make a grateful return for the countless blessings Heaven is pouring around your path.

The Gospel is the word of God. If we neglect the word of that great and good Being, if we permit it to suffer violence and be trampled upon, will he regard us as dutiful children? Nay; we should feel it our privilege, as well as our duty to extend God's word and a true knowledge of his character. By what means can this be effected? God in the plenitude of his wisdom, has ordained a ministry and enjoined it upon us to sustain that ministry. The press, the religious press, is a mighty instrument in his hands for the extension of his word. Support these two agents, and success will ultimately crown the blessed Gospel! How can that be done unless we open both our hearts and our purses? We may hesitate about opening them; we may flatter ourselves that we get nothing in return.—Close your churches abandon the ministers, destroy the Bible, extinguish the light of the glorious printing press, and see how long your persons would be secure, or your property remain unmolested. Do not lightly esteem the privileges secured to you by the ministry of this country. Do not lightly esteem the Gospel. Do not hang back where there is an opportunity to carry it forward. We owe all that we are and all we hope to be, to the chastening influence of the Gospel. A nation without it is like a ship on the ocean without chart or compass. Look back to France in the days of her boasted revolution. What produced that melancholy explosion? What reared the guillotine, and filled Paris with blood? Was it brought about by the mild precepts of Jesus; or the infidel writings of Voltaire, Raynal, Helvetius, Paine, Condorcet and Volney? These were men of great parts; still they were not able to govern the French people, after their Bibles were burnt, their churches razed to the ground, their King deposed, and the great God of the universe blasphemously abjured! Do you want a similar scene enacted in this country? If you do, hold on to your gold, stay at home on the Sabbath, withdraw your support from the churches, and discourage your ministers. Robespierre, the master spirit of the French revolution, 'believed the prophets and apostles to be a cheat.' He could not believe in Jesus Christ; but he adored Paine. He cast himself upon the broad ocean of skepticism. He did not recognise the eternal laws God has printed upon the moral nature of man; consequently he was not governed by any fixed principles. 'He juggled thousands out of their existence with a most revolting ease and facility.' To be suspected of favoring the Bourbons was a signal of death.

* The word God spel among the Saxons, signifying God's speech, or good speech, corresponds precisely in signification with the Greek Evangelion rendered Gospel, a compound word composed of the adverb eu, signifying well, goodly, heavenly, or divinely, and the substantive, angelia, signifying a message. Hence, good news, glad tidings, a heavenly message, or divine communication, is the legitimate and true definition of the word Gospel.

'The reign of terrors witnessed an indiscriminate massacre: men and women of the highest rank, along with the rabble, were hurried into the eternal world with an awful precipitancy.' Do you wish to look upon the sanguinary conflicts which will be entered into after men have thrown off the restraints of the Gospel? What have we to hold in check the wild passions of men, except the Gospel?

And does not every great moral movement of the age find a sanction in the Gospel? What was it but the Gospel that transformed the once rude and uncultivated inhabitant of the British isle into polite and refined men and women? What else besides the Gospel is capable of securing to that opulent nation, the blessings of civilization? What else is it but the Gospel that can sanctify our government and institutions, and enable us to transmit to posterity the ark of civil and religious freedom? When you overthrow the Gospel, you overthrow every thing that is worth living for. You take away the brightest luminary the world ever had. We then sink with infidelity into the dust. We then sink to a level with the brutes; we are then deprived of the greatest sanction to virtue. The transcendent glories of heaven and immortality would recede from our vision, and nothing would be left for us to contemplate but a gloomy and cheerless sleep forever in the grave. Oh, my friends, are you willing to exchange the blessings of peace and stability for civil discord and anarchy? Are you willing to extinguish that light God has given to scatter the midnight darkness of the grave, and clothe it with the beauties and joys of the resurrection? You must choose one or the other.—You must choose the Gospel with its heaven-born consolations, its immortality, its commands to live righteously in this present world, or you must choose infidelity and its attendant consequences, its everlasting sleep, its misrule and confusion. Which will you have? The Gospel! Oh, the Gospel! I am sure you will choose the Gospel! So big with every thing that can cheer our existence, so full of that which is pure, peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated; so full of mercy, without partiality, so devoid of hypocrisy, so full of glad news and joyful tidings. I know you will discard skepticism, the offspring of that wisdom that is from beneath, earthly, sensual, devilish. If you choose the Gospel, you lay yourselves under obligations to defend it—to support it. To support it as becometh men, to support it as becometh the dignity of God's word. Oh, shame on the miser, that clenches the money he holds by the tenure of the Gospel, and yet refuses to contribute to its spread and defence!—Shame on him, I say.

Again. You must persevere in those ways which are calculated to advance the Gospel. Perseverance is essential to success. How did Newton succeed in his great undertakings? Was he discouraged after his numerous attempts to analyze light? Did he say it can't be done? No. He was not made of that material; there was too much soul about him to shrink before the mighty obstacles reared up in his path. Other minds of less capacity might perceive the subject, might conceive the possibility of analyzing light; but it is one thing to conceive, and quite another to execute new projects. The conception and execution were the same with Newton. His capacious mind was adequate to all the practice necessary to demonstrate his theories. What was the secret of his greatness and success? How did he attain to that elevation which you behold him occupying? He went on step by step until he 'eclipsed the brightest of the ascendants,' and filled the world with the glory of his genius. But how did he do it? you are ready again to ask. Was it because he was humble and teachable? No. Though such he was, you have not learned the secret yet. It was because he persevered. If he excelled other men, it was only in perseverance according to his own acknowledgment. We repeat, perseverance is essential to success in every undertaking. I care not what object you wish to accomplish, or what arduous enterprise you engage in, if among the practicable; persevere, and you will succeed.—While on the other hand, you may have a very small task to perform, and unless you persevere you will not succeed. Robert Bruce, a Scottish chieftain, who fought and bled for the soil and fire-side of 'old Scotland,' had been defeated on many a well contested field: until his brave companions were either killed or captured, and he was left single handed and alone. He awoke one morning and beheld an insect make sixty nine attempts to climb upon a board: the seventieth time it succeeded! There, said Bruce, is a lesson for me. That is a lesson for us and for all men. Perseverance! what has it not done? Every achievement in art, in science, in revolutions is a symbol of its power. It has bridged the mightiest rivers, made a highway over the Alps, and brought up from the ocean's bed the most brilliant gems that ever wreathed a monarch's brow. Civilization is the result of perseverance; civilized nations have clung perseveringly to those virtues which refine and elevate our ideas and our manners, while the heathen world have looked upon them for a moment, and turned away. Had the great mass of civilized countries hit upon some plan to raise themselves above indigence, and adhered to that plan, their sufferings would have ceased long since. But they seem to be devoid of energy and perseverance, they have settled down contented with present attainments. If they have originated measures to effect that object, they have abandoned them too soon to be successful. Herein is where thousands fail, not so much for want of ability, as for want of a will, a mind to do, a soul to dare and overcome difficulties. It is not the part of a persevering mind to enlist and then turn back. The high minded courageous man goes forward; if difficulties meet him, he does not run away from them; he calls forth the latent energies of his soul; he plants his feet and there he maintains his firm position. The elements of opposition may play around him with fearful majesty: destruction and death in their most alarming character may grin him in the face. But there he stands erect; greatness of purpose is exhibited in his every movement; the majesty of the God-head seems to be concentrated in his being. ***

Once behold what perseverance has done! Cast your eyes back upon that period of time when this country was a vast unbroken wilderness; when, as yet, the pilgrims have not fled from oppression. You behold the Indian's wigwam standing secure perhaps in your own peaceful valley. Traverse this continent; examine its physiognomy. Stand on Bunker Hill and look abroad! where is Boston? where is Charlestown? where is Bunker Hill Monument, the pride of this great nation, the glory and boast of this people, that stupendous pile which is destined to transmit to posterity the most incontestible evidence of the patriotic ardor of our revolutionary sires?—that lofty pile which aptly represents the course of a free and enlightened people cherishing the Gospel? Behold it now planted on a foundation as durable as the everlasting hills, bathed in the light of the uprisen sun, proudly pointing toward heaven the final home of the great brotherhood of man. Go back with me in imagination again. Is the hum of industry heard? Do you behold the stir and strife of a great city? Do men hurry past in the hot pursuit of wealth?—Where are the flocks and herds of the European? Where are the mighty ships that spread their sails before the winds and 'move like a thing of life'? No city with her hundred glittering spires greets your eye—no herds and flocks are on a thousand hills—no restless money making men are there to jostle against you—no column towers throne-like and heaven-ward to speak of the brave spirits who dared to strike for freedom in times that tried men's souls! One vast wilderness is there, with its awful solitude! Now look once more, after 200 years have rolled away. You behold tides of busy and impatient men, heaving along the thoroughfares of a great city. The wilderness has disappeared; the hills have been levelled, the valleys lifted up.—Commerce with her snowy sails and busy crafts cover those bays and rivers over whose bosom the Indian's frail bark once carelessly glided. Life and animation are around on every hand! How great the contrast! What has wrought this change? Oh, my friends, the potent arm of perseverance has been here. Lion-hearted men with active hands have felled the mighty forest, built up their dwellings, and spread around you the many works of civilization.

Persevere then, my friends, and you will meet no works too great—no obstacles that are unconquerable—no misfortune that can overwhelm you. On, persevere my brethren, in the cause of humanity—the cause of God—the cause of angels—which is none other than the cause of Universalism. Do not relax your efforts—do not be discouraged. You toil, and sweat, and die, to accumulate sheep, and oxen, and horses, and land and money; then labor, oh, labor to spread the Gospel. Do not ballance the Gospel with treasures that perish with the using; do not choose that which rust will corrupt, instead of that pearl which will never dissolve.

Once more, and the last time, I urge you to act in unity, energetically, and perseveringly for the Gospel. Lift it up above the vile sneer of the skeptic. Lift up your tongue, your purse and all the means God has placed under your control; and Zion will enlarge her borders, and stretch out her hands to God. Her waste places shall be reclaimed, and the wilderness will blossom as the rose; and ultimately the hills shall clap their hands for joy, the whole earth shall sing, 'Hosanna to the son of David; blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, hosanna in the highest, God be blessed forever more. Amen and amen.'

ELDER JOHN ROSS—AGAIN.

Br. SKINNER—The following is an extract from another private letter of Elder John Ross, dated, 'Charleston 4 Corners, Nov. 26, 1846.' Will you have the 'courtesy' to send him those numbers of your paper which he desires. It seems that we are not only under the necessity of writing for his special benefit, but that, in his opinion, the 'charity' and 'courtesy' of our faith require that we should also furnish him with 'the privilege of access to' our writings; notwithstanding it appears, from his course, that the courtesy and charity of his doctrine consists, in not only withholding his papers and communications from us, but in excluding from the former all replies to the latter. Quite a compliment this to the doctrine of universal salvation, and a very true delineation indeed of the spirit and feature of endless misery in its conduct towards its opposers! Should Elder Ross feel grieved at the publication of another specimen of his 'private confidential correspondence,' he may remember that we are much more liberal in publishing his articles, than he ours, and that with him, under present circumstances, we wish no 'private confidential correspondence.' But here is the extract.

'I understand from report that 'Mr. Worden' and the Editor of the EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE, have honored me with a notice, and that brother Perry has published my private correspondence with him, this may be all very well. But it looks to me as though that charity which embraces all men as brethren, and that courtesy which is due to brethren, would have permitted, at least, one of the writers to have favored me with a copy, or copies of the paper containing articles referring to me. But such courtesy has, as yet, been withheld. And as I do not know of a subscriber to one of those papers within six miles of me, I have not the privilege of access to them. If it is not too much trouble, I wish you would send me per mail, the numbers in which reference is made to me, and I pledge myself to do as much for you should you ever desire it. I would like to know what others think of me, especially to see how my private confidential correspondence written in great haste looks in print.'

EXTRACTS FROM THE JOURNAL OF A STUDENT.

Chin'on, March 18th, '45.

O, what a lovely and charming morning!—The sun comes gloriing up the morning sky in all the splendors of early spring; and the cool and refreshing air of a March morning, invigorates and braces up the constitution with an unusual glow of cheerfulness and buoyancy of feeling. Yet nevertheless, I feel sad, I went to say 'good bye,' this morning to Mrs. S. and Carry B. Mrs. S. has gone to New York on a visit to her friends, and C. to Boston to attend Seminary during the ensuing Spring and Summer months.

'Farewell, farewell to thee Araby's daughter!

No pearl ever slept beneath Oman's green water

More pure in its shell than thy spirit in thee!

Alas, alas! Why do ever make friends in this transitory world! We meet one another, we converse, smile and are happy. We learn to love, admire and esteem. But this is but the sunshine on the bosom of the unruddied wave. The next moment comes a cloud: a wind succeeds, and the bosom of the wave curls up with a rude embrace, and carries with it as it sweeps away, our companion, our lover, or our friend, and we see them no more forever. They become lost in, and coalesce with the great world's crowd; and we turn with a sorrowful look and heavy heart to repent the same hopes, renew the same anticipations, and meet with the same disappointments with others. Thus the heart is continually sacrificing its richest pearls, and fairest treasures. Thus is it continually bringing forth its brightest hopes and most hallowed emotions, to bury them in the shades of disappointment, or entwine them in the wreath that binds the brow of that victorious conqueror Death. Good bye C. good bye Mrs. S.

How often do Partialists present 1 Peter iv: 17, 18, as argument against 'the faith one delivered unto the saints,'—but how unjust to the beauty of the Scriptures, is such a perversion of the Scripture? Why, in the passage adverted to, Peter would deduce by the 'indirect' method of logicians, the awfulness of the punishment of the disobedient: if judgment first begin at the house of God, what may not the aliens, the disobedient expect! The same process is employed in the next link of the text: if the righteous may scarcely expect deliverance from these devastating calamities, much more may the unbelieving, the disobedient Jews, expect the destruction of their temple, city and nation.—To refer such perspicuous representations of what afterwards took place, to be the future existence, is at once to do violence to the Scriptures, by destroying the harmony subsisting between the text, and the accounts of the Evangelists! WHO ARE UNIVERSALISTS?

Who are Universalists? Be patient, and hear us! Those are Universalists who understand, believe, profess and practice the Doctrines of Universalism.—This answer is a comprehensive one, and admits of a brief enlargement. And,

First: No person can be a Universalist until he fully understands the doctrine. It is, emphatically, a system of faith. It must be investigated; its parts must be examined: it must be scrutinized closely—in a word it must be studied. In this respect it differs, essentially, from all other systems of religion. Based as it is upon the sound principles of a divine philosophy, it demands an exercise of the intellectual faculties. Being reasonable, the mind must reason upon it. It cannot be understood in any other way. Other religions may be taken by inoculation—some of them are communicated by contagion—not so with ours.

Second: No person can be a Universalist, until he fully believes the doctrine. His mind must understandingly embrace the various parts of the system, and receive it, without wrath or doubting, as a whole. To say that a person is a Universalist who does not fully and understandingly believe the doctrine, is to use words without meaning. Nor is there the least propriety in calling a man a Universalist simply because he sometimes says he is one. Not every one that says Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils, has entered into the kingdom. The mere accidental, or even habitual 'say so' of an individual, is no evidence that he is any thing more than a mere pretender. For we affirm, Thirdly: That no person should be regarded as a Universalist, until, in some suitable way, he has made a profession of his belief. We do not say that there are no Universalists who have never joined the Church; but it is unquestionably wrong, to hold the deomination responsible for the conduct of others than those who have voluntarily identified their interests, in some way, with the interests of the cause, and have been recognized, in a proper manner, as members of the body. It is, however, the custom with our opponents, to hold us responsible for the conduct of every man, woman, and child, who has ever been known to attend one of our meetings, or think at all favorably of our views.—With how much propriety might we say to all concerned, wait until we receive people as members of our societies and churches, before you make us accountable for their sins, or give us credit for their virtues. And for one we are free to say, that we know none as Universalists, who are either afraid, or ashamed, to own themselves such before the world.

Fourthly: None are, or can be Universalists, but those who govern themselves, so far as in them lies, by the rules and teachings of the doctrine.—How can it be proper to say that a man is a convert to a doctrine, unless he conforms his life to its requirements? Let men, therefore, understand our doctrine—let them believe our doctrine—let them profess our doctrine—let them live our doctrine; and then we will joyfully acknowledge that they are Universalists.

Now, it so happens, that the cause of our Master has been greatly injured by those who sometimes say they are Universalists, but who neither understand nor practice the doctrine. They have no just conceptions of the sentiment,—much less do they feel its power, its consolations, or its restraints.—They know but little and care less about a religion which they pretend to respect and love. There are, hanging on the skirts of our cause—so to speak—hundreds who would be puzzled to tell what are the cardinal principles of our religion. All such, without fear, favor or affection, should be told, and plainly too, that they are not of our Israel.

But, of all the dead weights to our cause, none equal those who pretend to be Universalists, and at the same time do all they can to retard the progress of our cause. Such persons are always doubtful about the expediency of our measures—they think the time has not come for action—they are a little troubled about the unpopularity of our cause; and, while they are waiting for the world to come round, they are sure to lend their influence and support to the promulgators of God's concentrated and ever-blazing wrath. Such persons ought to be told that they have no valid claim to the name of Universalist. They belong, body and soul, to the orthodox—so called.—[Western Evangelist.]

THE POETRY OF SWEARING.

'There is a poetic and unpoetic way,' says Mrs. Child, 'of viewing all subjects. Who but Emerson, for instance, would recognize in common street swearing, "the popular recognition of the Infinite?"

Who, indeed? For my own part—it may be because I am not poetical—I can see in profanity no sort of 'recognition of the Infinite'; on the contrary, the reverse appears to me to be true, that the swearer does not 'recognize the Infinite' at all. The 'common street swearer,' as well as he who is more 'gentlemanly' in his 'indulgences,' or who is profane only under excitement or in a forgetful frame of mind, is, when taking the Divine name in vain, for the time being, totally unconscious of the existence and attributes of the Deity; If it were not so, he would be filled with reverence and love, and these are sufficient to prevent all swearing. In this consist the peculiar sin of profanity—namely, in the reckless, thoughtless mention of the name of God, and its use when one 'means nothing by it.'

If Emerson's idea is 'poetry,' do not let us encourage it. There might be some danger, that for the 'poetry' of the thing, some poor soul would get the notion that even 'common street swearing' is a very religious affair, and much to be commended, as a sort of Confession of Faith for those people who desire to 'recognize the Infinite,' but whose peculiar habits render them unfit for a more stringent profession.

Out upon such 'poetry.' There is only one way to 'recognize the Infinite,' by acting as if we were ever in his presence—by walking before him in love and humility—and by laboring, as we may be able, for the benefit of his children. No poetry is like that of a holy and beneficent life—there is no 'unpoetic way' of viewing that subject. May it be ours to strive to exemplify its beauty.

INFLUENCE OF TEMPER UPON OUR HAPPINESS.

Our happiness is influenced by our temper, imaginations, opinions, and habits.

The word temper is here used to denote the habitual state of a man's mind in point of irascibility, or, in other words, to mark the habitual predominance of the benevolent or malevolent affections in his intercourse with his fellow creatures.

There is a secret charm annexed by the Creator to every exercise of good-will and of kindness; while He has imposed a check on all the discordant passions, by connecting with them agitation and disquietude. Hence our happiness must very much depend on which of these kinds of affection we most indulge.

There is nothing in which our temporal happiness is so much in our power as in the formation of temper, and nothing will more conduce to our future welfare than wise exertions on this point.

A proud, irritable, discontented, and quarrelsome person can never be happy. He has within himself, and he employs, sure means to imbitter life, whatever may be his external circumstances.

Some persons render themselves wretched by dwelling too much on the follies and vices of the age; by censorious thoughts and feelings in respect to others; by a jealous and suspicious examination of the motives which influence the conduct of their neighbors. That favorable opinions of our species, and those benevolent affections toward them which such opinions produce, are sources of exquisite enjoyment to those who entertain them, can not be disputed. While we do what we can to reform mankind, our chief business is to watch over our own characters. The great secret of present happiness is, to study to accommodate our own minds to things external, rather than to accommodate things external to ourselves, especially in our intercourse with our fellow creatures. So far as we fail in our endeavors to make them what they should be, we must accommodate our views and feelings to the order of Providence. It is of great importance also that we do not imagine mankind worse than they really are, and thereby bring upon ourselves a temper full of suspicion, hatred, anger, and contempt toward others, which is a constant state of misery, much worse than all the evils to be feared from credulity.

It is not an uncommon error to imagine that temper is as little dependent on the will as the length of the arm or the color of the skin. But this imagination is an unfounded prejudice, and produces the most unhappy effects.—Persons first permit themselves to think they can do nothing in the formation of temper, and then they attempt nothing, but allow it to grow up in wild luxuriance. Notwithstanding all that may be said about natural constitution, and the influence of organic tendencies, it may be proved that we can subject temper to the discipline of reason, and form it any mould according to our pleasure. The irascible passions appear as early, and are as difficult to subjugate, as any others; but we see that the most fretful and impatient persons, who are perpetually harassing their dependents with their peevishness and their intemperate sallies, are able to restrain their ebullitions when in the presence of a superior, or in the company of an equal who would chastise them for outrageous conduct.

Expedients for improving our Temper, and thus promoting our Happiness.—(1.) We should cultivate that candor with respect to the motives of others which results from attending to our own infirmities, and from considering the numerous circumstances which, independently of criminal intention, may produce the appearance of vice in human conduct.

(2.) We should suppress, as far as possible, the external signs of peevishness or of violence. It is said of Socrates, that, whenever he felt resentment rising in his mind, he became instantly silent; and by observing this practice, he doubtless avoided many an occasion of giving offence to others, and added much to the comfort of his own life, by killing the seeds of those malignant affections which are the great bane of human happiness. Next to silence, 'a soft answer turneth away wrath,' not only in the hearer, but in the speaker.

The saint causes which alienate our affections from our fellow creatures are apt to suggest unfavorable views of the course of human affairs, and lead the mind, by an easy transition, to gloomy conceptions of the general order of the universe. In this state of mind, when, in the language of Hamlet, 'man delights us not,' the sentiment of misanthropy is transferred to other objects. 'This goodly frame, the earth, appears a sterile promontory; this majestical roof, fretted with golden fires; a foul and pestilential congregation of vapors; and man himself—noble in reason, infinite in faculties—this beauty of the world—this paragon of animals, seems but the quintessence of dust.'

It is important here to add the caution, however, that we must not, for the sake of our own quietude, form an erroneously favorable view of human character or affairs, but rather cultivate that benevolence of heart which does not rejoice or fret at the iniquities of men, but seeks to reform men for their good, and in obedience to their Maker and Sovereign.—[Boyd's Eclectic Moral Philosophy.]

From the Ladie's Repository.
TRIUMPHS OF TIME.

I have sometimes transported myself, in imagination, to the ancient world—the vast charnel house of many nations. I have taken my flight from this new-found hemisphere, whose history appears to be wholly lost, and have alighted on the land of Story—in the climes of which human generations have left their records. I have passed swiftly away from the busy hum of living men, whose cities are of recent date, and have sought, by moonlight, the broken pillars, the marble basins, and crumbling statues of some antique metropolis, over which the wheels of desolating Time have passed. While I have seemed to stand between two of those broken and ivy-clad columns, and look forth upon the piles of ruin which surrounded me, I have half imagined myself to be the disturbed and wandering spirit of one of those ancient inhabitants of whom history may be silent, but who, nevertheless, walked those streets some centuries ago in the vigor of health, and dreamed not of being visited by an American citizen.

As little as those forgotten men dreamed of the republic of the United States, do we now think of those states which the lapse of a dozen centuries may bring to light on our globe. It is in looking at mankind through the vista of ages, that we become persuaded of the mutability of human things. How little room is there for us to glory when so soon every thing upon which our hearts were set becomes a mass of ruins—when the very laws, religions, and customs which are now our pride, may be doomed to perish when a few ages have circled away, and the pleasant places which we now know, will be overgrown with weeds and remembered no more. How many a moralizing sage has passed through these deserted and ruined streets! Perhaps the hand of a prophet of the Lord has rested upon this marble tablet, and where the cry of the bitter now comes up from that stagnant pool, some mighty miracle may have been wrought—a token from the changeless and ever enduring Maker that he had not forgotten his creatures!

From yon prostrate rostrum what burning eloquence has not once flowed; and how have the roaring thousands that thronged about it shaken and throbbed with answering enthusiasm, like the deep bosom of the ocean stirred by the midnight storm! Where now are all those signs of life—where now the busy step of the circumventing merchant, the haughty eye and proud head of the centurion, the clamorous cry of the importunate beggar? The night wind whistles unheard around their tombs, and the serpent hisses in the chambers of the lofty patrician. Did they know they should come to this? Was it in all their thoughts when with mailed foot they trod the marble floor of their aristocratic halls, and bade the world to tremble as they issued their mighty mandates to their crouching slaves? Slave and noble have now gone to one place—their ashes have mingled and the winds have swept them into the sea.

Earth has had her proud ones, since the creation, and vain has been the greatness of man. The same pompous pretensions have been made, the same professions of heroism, dignity and grace, by king, false prophet, and magician, but where has it all ended? The dust covers them and their deeds. They have warred successfully with every enemy but Time. He is the universal conqueror. That which hath an end is the bride of Ruin. It was, but is not.

Not only do individuals pass away, but nations become extinct. A remnant in the form of wandering beggars may struggle, without a name into peopled countries—trampled on by the rich, and despised by the poor—and, at length even they are seen no more. They act a part in some wild legend—they are endowed by the romancer with extraordinary gifts; they are enshrined in mystery—they are the last of a nation. The world knows them no more. So pass away the nations of the earth; and this should those people who now rejoice in their national strength and prosperity learn humility. Let them not suppose they are the favored of Heaven above all men, for they shall likewise perish from the earth in their turn. The great mind is humble, but the foolish are lifted up with pride. The unwise are without thought, and they do not consider that the same thing which has happened to others, must happen to them. It must be a little mind that can solace itself with the fading glories of this transitory world.

'SOCIAL EVILS—ODD-FELLOWSHIP.'

DEAR SIR—While perusing an article under the above title from the pen of T. B. Thayer, I was not a little surprised to find so much importance attached to an Association—confessedly of human origin—and such an one as the father of our country warned us against. Man is indeed exposed to many evils in making the pilgrimage of life, and there is much room for the exercise of love and charity. But I have not yet learned that Odd Fellowship is the thing that is needed to bring men into a more perfect obedience to the great law of brotherhood and love.

2. Is not the Gospel what it claims to be? Are not its doctrines such as heaven approves? In short, is not the word of God a perfect rule for the regulation of our feelings and conduct? And are not the means there prescribed for the cure of all man's curable diseases and afflictions?

3. Then why intimate that 'Odd Fellowship,' which is no more or less than a 'secret human organization,' is paramount to every thing else—eclipsing the glory of Christ's kingdom, and throwing the Gospel into the shade?

4. If it is so good why not let all the world know it? Christ not only gave good things to his friends but to his enemies. If ye love them who love you what is your reward? And if you pledge yourself to do good things for those who have pledged themselves to do the same for you, what do ye more than others? The Bible teaches us to do good to all men. To love our enemies. Does Odd Fellowship more than this? And are its means for benefiting man superior to those instituted in the Gospel and sanctioned by our all wise and benevolent Creator. If so, pray tell us what these means are.

Busti, N. Y.

J. PALMETER.

REMARKS.—1. Odd Fellowship may be called an association of human origin. Few associations among men can be called otherwise. Its very basis, the very pillars of its support, Friendship, Love, and Truth, and Benevolence and Charity, are among the fundamental teachings of the glorious Gospel—are of Divine origin, and the institution under these principles, is one of the means of bringing men to a more perfect obedience to the great law of brotherhood and love, and consequently is one of the things needed for that purpose. Do churches and religious associations claim to be based upon any thing better?

Is our friend quite sure that the institution of Odd Fellowship is such an one as the Father of our country warned us against? Much stress has been laid upon the words 'Beware of secret societies,' which the great and good Washington is said to have uttered. But is the association of Odd Fellowship a secret one? Far from it. The existence of the institution is well known to every one, and its objects, end and aim, is as open to the scrutinizing gaze of the world as the broad noon day light. Publications advocating the principles of the order can be had and read by any one who will take the trouble to procure and read them.

All that can be found to bear the stamp of secrecy are the meetings of the order, and the signs and tokens by which the members recognize each other. The deliberations of the meetings which are kept from the public gaze, would do the world at large no more good to know, and are no more necessary to be known than the deliberations of a private meeting of the members of any religious or benevolent society, who wish to carry out or perfect a benevolent or charitable plan, in their own peculiar way. It is sufficient that the result proves to the world that the object was a good one.

The signs and tokens are instituted so that a member being among strangers and in need of assistance, can obtain that assistance without any mistake, by proving himself a member in good standing. Again, these signs and tokens are only known to Odd Fellows, to prevent imposition upon the order by the selfish and unworthy.

2. Odd fellowship does not deny that the Gospel is what it claims to be, but seeks to confirm those claims by using the very means therein prescribed for the 'cure of all men's curable diseases and afflictions.'

3. We think Br. P. is mistaken in supposing that Br. Thayer intended to 'intimate that Odd Fellowship was paramount to every thing else—or of eclipsing the glory of Christ's kingdom.' &c. In showing the benefits resulting from the practice of the principles of Odd Fellowship, he was only making manifest the good results of a practice of the very principles and precepts laid down by the Saviour—benevolence and charity. This would only add beauty and lustre to the Gospel kingdom, instead of eclipsing and throwing it into the shade.

4. All the world can know the objects and aims of Odd Fellowship if they choose to inform themselves. Its benefits are not confined to its members alone. It only makes those benefits sure to them when they are in need, and entitled to them. After their charities are extended to the needy without its limits, as we might testify by naming instances that have come under our own immediate observation.

Odd Fellowship does not claim to do more than the Bible teaches, as Br. P.'s question would seem to imply. Nor are its means for benefiting mankind superior to those instituted in the Gospel, for they are identical with, and drawn from the Gospel.

We would add in conclusion, although our remarks are already extended farther than we intended, that the principal objection urged against the institution of Odd Fellowship is, that it is a 'secret society,' and this objection is the result of a prejudice arising from a want of knowledge of its principles and objects. If this is the case with Br. P., we hope he will take some pains to acquaint himself with the system before he utterly condemns it.—We are sure that a thorough investigation will satisfy him that it is one that is doing much to ameliorate the social condition of mankind, by doing away its evils.

THE NEWLY DISCOVERED PLANET AND A. J. DAVIS.

In a late number of the New York Tribune we noticed an article from Professor George Bush, stating some remarkable facts in relation to young Davis, the Clairvoyant of New York, who is preparing a course of lectures for publication, containing some astonishing discoveries and revelations said to be of vast moment to the world. The Professor says that Davis, in the clairvoyant state; last winter, discovered and announced the existence of a new planet in our system beyond the orbit of Uranus. Le Verrier, a French philosopher, some months since, inferred the existence of such planet from certain disturbances in the motion of Uranus. The planet has lately been seen by the aid of the telescope, thus confirming the conjectures of Le Verrier and the announcement of Davis. Prof. B. also says that Davis, in discoursing on the spiritual world, in several instances uses almost the identical language employed by Emmanuel Swedenborg in his various works on the same subject, some of which have never been published in this country, and which works he is confident young Davis has never seen. These things, if so, are certainly very remarkable, and to us unaccountable.

And here again is another announcement of the same fact of Davis' discovery of the new planet, or rather of two new planets, contained in a communication from Rev. Wm. Fishbough to the Editor of the New York Christian Messenger, and which we copy from that paper of the 28th ult. We say, with Br. Price, 'we do not, and can not, pretend to fathom the subject.' We merely give the article to our readers for their information. They must judge for themselves of the verity of the revelations or facts stated. We think Br. Fishbough is rather too severe, in his closing paragraph, on those who can not as yet see sufficient evidence to convince them of the truth of all which Davis and other clairvoyants announce. Unbelief at present, may not be properly characterised as 'stupid conservatism.' But let evidence sufficient to convince all, be adduced, and all will ultimately be convinced. The forthcoming volume of revelations from young Davis will by many be looked for with engrossing interest. But till we see it—and we think long after that—we shall still adhere to and firmly believe the older revelations contained in the Bible. If the new revelations be true, we are confident they will not conflict with the old. But here follows the article:

NEW PLANETS DISCOVERED BY SPIRITUAL SIGHT!

Br. PRICE—The papers are teeming with accounts of the interesting discovery of an eighth or new planet. Its orbit is beyond that of Uranus. The existence of this body was inferred some months since by Le Verrier, a French mathematician, from certain disturbances of the motion of Uranus. The telescope was directed to a point in the heavens by him indicated, and to a new world! How overwhelming the works of the Creator! How wonderful the powers of the human mind, and the perfection of mathematical science! Immortality to the name of LE VERRIER!

But would you believe that this and another and still more remote planet, were discovered and described by spiritual vision, two or three months at least before the announcement of Le Verrier's inference was made known in this country! Let us explain:

Many of your readers are aware, from a previous announcement in your columns, that A. J. Davis, whilst in a state analogous to physical death and spiritual elevation, into which he is thrown by the manipulations of Dr. S. S. Lyon, is engaged in the dictation of a book, explanatory, in a general way, of the origins, nature and laws of all things. Please read the following extracts from lectures delivered by him on the 16th and 17th of March last, on the sun and the original production and present existence of an 8th and 9th planet. It should be borne in mind that Le Verrier's inference was not announced in this country until the following June after these lectures were delivered:

'The wonderful sun or centre to which our solar system belongs, may be understood as being a distant and extreme planet of another system, existing prior to its formation. And in accordance with the general plan of suns and worlds in the universe, its planets and satellites may be considered as satellites and asteroids belonging to a planet, and the planet as belonging to a sun.

'The constitution of the sun is an accumulation and agglomeration of particles thrown from other spheres; and these became united according to the law of mutual gravity and inherent and mutual attraction. Its igneous composition contains heat, light and electricity, the successive developments of all primeval matter existing in an agglomerated condition, and subjected to the general and universal law governing all matter.'

After explaining the rotary and oblique motion of the sun, (for the causes of which he accounts,) he proceeds:

'Therefore the great internal portion or centre of the sun, is an immense body of liquid fire, evolving successively heat, light and electricity, as developed and purified particles of the interior composition. The evolved atmosphere may be understood as being a part of the great body—still an emanation of the internal by reason of its own constitution. This atmosphere or immense zone of nebulous and accumulated particles, extended to the circumference of the orbit that the immense planet occupies and traverses as a cometary body. This is one more planet than is now known, or has yet been detected by the observations made through the agency of the most powerful symbol of the human eye. [The Telescope.]

'Eight planets have been recognised and determined as nearly beyond all doubt. Still the 8th and 9th are not recognized as bodies or planets belonging to our solar system. But the orbit that the last one occupies, was the extreme circumference of the atmospheric emanation from the sun.'

After proceeding with various remarks upon the laws of emanation, condensation, the origin of rotary and oblique motions, the progression of primeval planetary matter to the development of the various (so called) elementary substances, &c., he continues:

'The ninth planet, or cometary body, being composed of particles accumulated by the motion of the great sun, observed the same plane by the same specific force, but assumed a station in accordance with its magnitude; and obeying the laws of reciprocal gravitation, it occupied its assumed orbit at a distance proportionate to its rarity, and in accordance with its peculiar constitution.

'The eight planet was next evolved, observing the same general law of motion, and the same principles of formation; and was situated within the outer merely because its constitution was more dense than the first one evolved. Its occupying therefore the station and sphere thus described, is only in harmony with the established principles of gravitation, and general and rotary motions.

'By virtue of the great motions which the sun has, the successive formations of the planetary bodies were produced. As the eight and ninth planets have not yet been recognized as belonging to our solar system, there can be no conception of the original magnitude and diameter of the sun, as including its extended atmosphere.'

After farther philosophical remarks upon the peculiar elements, conditions, circumstances, &c., &c., as engaged in the formation of celestial spheres, he says:

'But let it be deeply impressed, that the peculiar circumstances and conditions under which these elements may be situated will produce corresponding effects according to the cause which occasions the manifestation of such consequences. This observation will lead to a proper understanding of the amount of heat and light which the eighth planet receives from the sun. The ultimate discovery of this celestial body, and its revolution and diameter being specified, will contribute greatly to the interesting subject of astronomy, particularly when the aberrations and refractions of light are known as they occur between it and the sun around which it revolves.

'Its density is four-fifths that of water. Its diameter is unnecessary to determine. Its rotation and period of revolution can be inferred analogically from the period that Uranus observes in its elliptical and almost inconceivable orbit. The atmosphere of the eighth planet, is exceedingly rare, containing little oxygen but being almost composed of fluorine and nitrogen. No organic constitution that exists upon the human eye would be a useless organ: for light there is of such a nature as to render its darkness, even at the darkest period, several hundred degrees above the present light emanating from the sun! It has, like Uranus, six satellites. These were evolved and formed by the two motions given this planet: the furthest from the primary being the extent of its original composition, and the nearest satellite being the accumulation of dense atoms near the planet. * * * * * It is wholly unfitted for the habitation of any organic constitution: yet life will ultimately cover its now undisturbed surfaces.'

That the above extracts are genuine, satisfactory demonstration can be given to any one who may require it. Their existence in manuscript, as a part of Mr. Davis' course, has been known by many persons, and whose testimony will not be denied by any who know them. The lectures have, at promiscuous times been witnessed by I. Kinsman, No. 1 New-st., T. Lea Smith, M. D. 9 Murray-st. (now in Bermuda,) H. G. Cox, 73 White-st., Theron R. Lapham, 308 Stanton-st., B. S. Horner, 9 Murray-st., and others.

Let it now it be observed that Mr. Davis' acquirements while in the normal state, are exceedingly limited. Indeed, his school tuition was confined to about five months. He is almost totally unacquainted with books, and is only about twenty years of age! Yet whilst in the abnormal state, when the interior or spiritual senses and faculties are unfolded, his knowledge and powers of reasoning and generalization are almost unbounded. He demonstrates the existence of an infinitely intelligent First Cause; spiritual identity, the mode of which he is to explain; the doctrine of a universal correspondence; of a universal and eternal progression; of the absolute unity of all material things, as the body of which the Divine Intelligence is the soul! etc., etc. He reveals the process of creation from the beginning of all things, and the general and successive evolutions of the untold millions of systems, of suns and of worlds, from the Great Sun of the 'Universe,' (to use his own invented expression,) or the universal heavens—and which Sun he describes as the Throne or Centre of Divine Power and Intelligence.—The geological history of the earth is also explained, from the first agglomeration of nebulous or vapory matter, to the production of man; after which the generals of all primitive human history are unfolded, the flood explained, etc., etc., etc.

The object of Mr. Davis' work is to establish that knowledge of the eternal laws and principles of the universe, and that system of correspondential reasoning which will lead to that inexpressible harmony and united and reciprocal action in all human society, as is exemplified in the movements of all planets and worlds, and in every department of universal, physical creation. Then will be accomplished the period concerning which Isaiah sung, and which all true prophets since the world began have had in cheering anticipation—when swords shall be beaten into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks, and the veil of the covering cast over all nations, shall be taken away!

What conservatism so stupid as to throw obstacles in the way even of any plausible efforts for the accomplishment of a result in contemplation of which all the angels in heaven must rejoice with unspeakable joy? Who will shrink from any light on such a subject, or having such objects and tendencies, in a blind and bigoted affection for some paltry, despicable, sectarian twaddledum or twaddleddee? And what folly so foolish as to close the mental eye to the almost demonstrative evidence which this very phenomenon presents, of future and immortal existence, the goal of the highest and holiest hopes of man?

Reader, let TRUTH prevail, though all hereditary and conventional forms of belief be sacrificed!

QUESTIONS FOR AGENTS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Brethren, are you prepared for the commencement of the next volume? for the time is near at hand. Have you obtained the renewal of all the old subscriptions to this paper that it is possible to do? Have you got all the new subscribers in your respective neighborhoods that you can? Is there not a neighbor who lives just down the street, a little from your residence, or just up the street, or across it, or on a neighboring street, or over on yonder hill, or down in that valley, or in that neighborhood or town hard by, that you have not asked to subscribe, and who would probably do so if invited? You know that neighbor who you invited last year to subscribe, who was just about half a Universalist and half partialist—who hesitated, and balanced his pros and cons, so evenly, and was just on the point of subscribing, when a partialist neighbor came along and dissuaded him—have you seen and again invited him to subscribe? He may have gotten over his fears of men, and the doubts he then had, and his half-way-ism that were so troublesome to him then. Suppose you see and ascertain the facts in his case.

And then again, there was that brother who had an Orthodox wife, and for whose benefit or gratification he was taking an Orthodox paper, and didn't dare take the Mag. and Adv.—have you seen him, and ascertained whether the prejudices of his "better half" have abated any, or he has acquired any more moral courage than he had a year ago, or whether he thinks it right any longer for a man to support error and falsehood, and withhold his aid from the cause of truth?

Then too, there was that other brother, that, owing to a little bad luck, felt himself too poor to subscribe when the last volume commenced, that he thought that he should do so before the year run out, but never has—have you seen him to put him in mind of his delayed good purpose, and inquire whether he does not feel able this year to join the club and pay the small sum of one dollar for a whole year's subscription to a good paper?

Have you asked that wealthy brother to subscribe for an extra copy to keep for binding, to enable him to lend one to his Orthodox neighbors, or to give to that poor widow who, unable to pay, would rejoice in the privilege of reading, or to that family who, halting between two opinions, cannot yet be persuaded to subscribe, but yet would read the paper if given them? Have you shown that rich brother how much good can be done by thus scattering gratuitously and broad-cast the seeds of truth? Have you spoken to all with whom you might have influence, and shown them the necessity and importance of sustaining our periodicals—the bounties of Divine Providence to them in the plentiful harvests of the past season, the general prosperity of the country, the great ease with which they can save more than enough out of their needless expenditures to pay for the paper, the great advantages to the cause of truth and humanity, to themselves and their families, to the rising generation and to posterity, arising from the liberal support and wide circulation of our paper? Are there not many families who do not now take the Mag. and Adv. to whom, by subscribing for it, the long winter evenings and hours of leisure would pass far more happily and far more profitably?

Finally, brethren, have you increased the lists of subscribers in your respective neighborhoods, and got your long catalogues of ten, twenty, thirty, forty and fifty, paid subscriptions, to send on to the publisher on the first of January, 1847, thus enabling all to read their own papers through the year, instead of either going without or reading papers that are not their own, because not paid for?—Brethren, an answer to the above questions is "respectfully solicited" at this office.

UNPARALLELLED GENEROSITY—A NEW PAPER.

A few months since a clergyman from a neighboring state came into this state, and notwithstanding there were then three Universalist papers published within its boundaries, he started a fourth; (a $2 weekly paper) on the ground, professedly, that, however good and ably conducted those in existence were, they did not meet the wants of the denomination—a larger sheet, a $2 paper, was needed. Well, he went ahead with his new paper, and soon obtained the proprietorship of two of the smaller, or dollar papers, and merged them into his own larger sheet so that he was enabled to circulate a very respectable number of his new paper. But still, the field of his operations was not sufficiently large for the full display of his philanthropy and generous liberality. He has just discovered, as we are about commencing a new volume, that there is great need of another smaller and cheaper paper than his, about the size and price of our own humble sheet, and now very generously offers to supply all those who may want such a paper, by making it up weekly with extracts from his larger sheet! What generosity is here! Besides supplying his $2 subscribers with his larger sheet, the great desideratum of our denomination in the state of New York, he would generously relieve us and all other such humble wights as we are, who have to labor hard for a scanty living, from the labor of sending out our paper, and thus take the whole burden on himself!

Who can doubt his generous, self-sacrificing philanthropy? We doubt not the Universalist public will duly appreciate his generous exertions to supply its every want, (especially in the paper line,) and award him the deserved meed.

By the by, the specimen number of his new paper has come to hand, and he has taken particular pains to announce to his readers that it is to be "the size of the Magazine and Advocate," and moreover "the cheapest publication ever issued by the Universalist denomination." On examining it, however, we find its columns are both shorter and narrower than ours, and its type for the corresponding parts of the paper much coarser, as any one can see by comparing the two, so that it contains at least one fourth LESS amount of reading matter than ours. The Mag. and Adv. is almost as cheap at $1 50, as his is at $1. But as the Mag. and Adv. is furnished to clubs or companies at $1, and to large companies even at less, it will be seen that ours is far the cheapest. And then, again, as the composition, or type-setting of the new paper costs the publisher nothing, it being transferred from the columns of his larger paper, it will readily appear that he can better afford his at 50 cents than we can ours at $1 00, as the type setting is the chief expense.

That's all reader. We have no further comments to make. Justice to oneself, only, called forth the few we have made. We will, in no case, engage in a quarrel with so disinterested and generous a neighbor. W.

We copy from the last week's Evangelist the following article of Br. Smith, on the subject of the Clinton Liberal Institute & Theological Seminary, and commend it to the careful attention of all who may feel an interest in either.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE AND THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

It will be seen by a notice in another place of this paper, that the undersigned has proposed a method by which a fund of $10,000 may be at once raised and invested for the Universalist Theological Seminary; and that he has pledged $100 towards that amount. He has not done this because he felt individually able to do so, but because he believes that he will be sustained in it, and also because he wishes to convince those interested, that there is at least one Universalist who is in earnest. He has looked on for months, and witnessed, with deep mortification—not so much the want, as the stagnation of denominational sympathy, with an enterprise that nearly all approve; and which is admitted to be of vital moment to our prosperity. And donations of ten dollars from one, and five dollars from another, have come in like 'Angel's visits, few and far between.' Why, brethren, this will never do. For, as Byron said, in quite another matter, it would 'stretch our immortality,' to attain any respectable object in this way. The clergymen of the denomination in this State, can raise the sum proposed—if they were but to set themselves about it; and certainly we are not to suppose that there is not one hundred laymen among us who cannot and will not give $100 each. Let those therefore, who can not give more, than that amount, limit the application to the Theological Fund; and those who can give more, apply their donations to the endowment of the Liberal Institute. In this way, both objects may be simultaneously attained.

With few exceptions, the donations made to the Institute, have been made by those who were unable to be more liberal. For it is not to be imagined, that men worth from fifty thousand, up to half a million of dollars, could offer for a high and useful object, merely a few shillings. We entertain more respect for their liberality, than to seriously believe that they have yet seen the time of action. That time has now come; and we expect to see them act up to the genius of their religion, and to the full standard of their self-respect. One of their number in the city of New York has already offered $1000,—where are forty-nine more? With permission, these matters will be kept 'before the people,' until the object is attained—viz: the endowment of the Liberal Institute, and the establishment of a permanent fund for the Theological Seminary. Dr. Hoopers PHYSICIANS VADE-MECUM, or Manual of the Principles and Practice of Physic, by W. Augustus Guy, M. B., author of 'Medical Jurisprudence,' etc., with additions by James Stewart, A. M., M. D., etc.—This is a 12mo. volume of 570 closely printed pages, exclusive of a formulae and alphabetical index of the names of diseases. The author's object, as he states in his preface has been 'to compress within a smaller compass than has hitherto been done consistently with the utility, every thing which more specially deserves attention with a view to the treatment of diseases. In pursuing this design, he has discarded all theory, and retained only those leading facts with which it is absolutely necessary for a practitioner to be acquainted when he approaches the bedside of his patient. Under distinct heads are arranged 1. The characteristic symptoms by which diseases are known. 2. The causes from which they most frequently have their origin. 3. The circumstances that more especially point out the difference between diseases which resemble one another. 4. The signs which influence the judgment in forming a prognosis of their event, and 5. That mode of treatment which in the present improved state of medicine, is deemed most appropriate, and which experience has sanctioned.' A valuable work for physicians.

BEAUTIES OF ENGLISH HISTORY, a neat volume of 252 pages, presenting 'a connected view of the most pleasing and striking points in English history, in such style as was deemed most likely to interest and instruct the young reader.' Explanations are given of whatever might seem obscure to the inexperienced reader of history; and a few appropriate embellishments are scattered through the volume, by J. Frost, LL. D., author of 'Pictorial history of the United States,' etc.

BEAUTIES OF FRENCH HISTORY, by the same author, is a similar volume to the above, containing short and interesting sketches of the history of France from its earliest period to the return of Napoleon Bonaparte from his war in Egypt.

Nos. 125-126 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE, contains the residue of Richard III with notes.

No. 9 of the Library of Select Novels, is BEAUCHAMP or the Error, by James. 25 cents. All the above works for sale at Beesley's.

SHARON, N. Y.

We are happy to learn that the friends of truth in Sharon, have made arrangements to have the preached word once more among them, and that Br. J. D. HICKS, supplies their desk every other Sabbath; the friends there feel encouraged, and trust that brighter days are before them. May Br. Hicks' efforts be seconded by the members of his society, and may abundant prosperity be their reward. Why may not other similar societies 'arise and be doing?' 'Go, and do likewise.'

A DROLL KIND OF SICKNESS.

The 'Trumpet' copies the following from a late number of the 'Orthodox Preacher.' It purports to be from the editor of the latter work. Br. Whittemore thinks that a call to preach orthodox divinity is enough to make any man sick.

'On one occasion I passed through Central Ohio, I think in 1838 or '39, and had, along with Br. John Read, a little brush, with a very big-headed young preacher of 'the Christian connexion'; but his name I have forgotten. I recollect his telling me that when he was called to preach, he did not know what was the matter with him—he thought he was sick, and actually took medicine to work off the disease! After a while, however, he discovered by some means that the whole derangement proceeded from a very heavy or loud call to the ministry!—This was the first time that I had ever known a call to the ministry attempted to be worked off by doses of jalap; and the thing was so new to me that I have never forgotten it.'

CLINTON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

It is proposed that one hundred persons pledge themselves forthwith to pay $100 each, to the Treasurer of the Theological Seminary, at Clinton, N. Y., by the first day of May next, as the basis of a fund for the permanent support of that institution. And that the Trustees of said Theological School set the example—having the privilege that all the others may claim, of obtaining aid from their friends, to enable them to redeem their pledges to the above named amount. On these conditions, the undersigned tenders his name as one of said Board of Trustees. Buffalo, Dec. 5, 1846. S. R. SMITH.

To the above pledge of Br. Smith, I respond by pledging another $100 towards the sum wanted.

Utica, Dec. 15th, 1846. D. SKINNER.

Who will speak next? Let us hear.

THE FIRST CONFERENCE

Of the Cayuga Association will be held at Groton Hollow, the fifth Wednesday and Thursday, in December, (30th and 31st.) A cordial invitation is extended to all friends, laymen and ministering brethren to be present, that they may mutually feast on the good things of the kingdom. It is furthermore hoped that the famed author of 'The Home upon the Sand,' will favor us with an attendance, as he did some two years since, at a Conference held there. Let him that hath ears to hear come and hear. J. M. PEEBLES, Standing Clerk.

ONTARIO ASSOCIATION.

A Conference of the Ontario Association will be held at Bristol, in the Universalist meeting-house, on the second Wednesday and following Thursday, in January next. Ministering brethren, and others, are cordially invited to attend. C. HAMMOND, Standing Clerk.

DEDICATION AND CONFERENCE.

A Conference of the Chenango Association will be held in Binghamton, Broome county, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 23d and 24th inst. On the first day the Universalist meeting-house just completed in that place, will be dedicated to the worship of God. All the friends in Broome and the neighboring region, and ministering brethren generally, are urgently invited to attend. Come, brothers and sisters, come. J. T. GOODRICH, Clerk.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be religious services in the Unitarian church, in Vernon, on Christmas Eve.

Br. HATHAWAY will preach in Mechanics' Hall (this city) on the fourth Sunday instant, A. M. and P. M. at the usual hours.

The EDITOR will preach at Little Falls next Sunday Afternoon and Evening, and at Ilion the Sunday after.

CHRISTMAS EVE will be celebrated at Lee Centre in the usual manner. Sermon by Br. P. Hathaway.

CHRISTMAS EVE will be celebrated by appropriate religious services, in the Universalist church at Newport, N. Y.

Br. J. M. PEEBLES will preach at Genoa Hollow Christmas Eve. The church will be illuminated. He will also preach there the Sabbath following.

MARRIAGES.

In Warren, on Wednesday morning last, (Dec. 9th,) by Rev. J. D. Hicks of St. Johnsville, Rev. M. B. NEWELL, of Brewster, Mass., and Mrs. MARGARETTE M. ATKINS, of Warren.

DEATHS.

In Onondaga, of consumption, Mrs. ORRILLA EVANS, aged 47 years. She joined the Presbyterian church in 1822, and was in full communion with the church until about 13 years previous to her death. She then began to search the Scriptures, to see if all her minister told her was truth; and on a strict and diligent search, she found naught but universal salvation between its leaves. But she never came out and expressed her full belief until about 4 years past. She was often asked during her long illness, if her faith had not weakened, but her answer was always in the negative; and that it grew stronger every day, as her spirit neared its goal. The morning her spirit took its flight to the place of heavenly rest she expressed a wish that the Rev. D. Skinner should preach her funeral sermon. But through the inclemency of the weather, it was deferred until a more convenient time. In her death a husband has lost a kind wife; three promising sons a kind and affectionate mother; and a large circle of relatives and friends mourn her loss deeply. She died as she lived, resigned and happy in the hope of a glorious life to come for herself and all the human race. Her funeral was attended at the Presbyterian house on the 29th, the service attended by the Rev. Mr. Machin pastor of the Onondaga church. MARY M. HOUSE.

At Talcottville, June 13, 1846, in the 70th year of his age, Mr. JESSE TALCOTT. Br. Talcott was a practical Universalist, firm in faith, upright in practice, beloved in life, and lamented in death. His funeral was attended in the Universalist church at Talcottville, and the consolations of the Gospel were administered to a respectable congregation, and extensive circle of mourning friends by the writer. P. H.

In Preston, August 20, 1845, Miss SARAH SMITH, daughter of Lyman and Sarah Smith, aged 17 years.

Thus fell in the morning of life, one who was active, amiable and intelligent, the joy of her parents and all her relatives, and the pride of the circle in which she moved. The universal gloom that pervaded the immense concourse who attended her funeral proved that her departure is deeply regretted and will long be deplored. Funeral on the 23d, sermon in the Baptist meeting-house by J. T. G.

OUR OLD HOME TREES.

There's something about these trees at eventide
That makes my heart stir differently than Aught else within the world! The breathings of Fancy's pictures upon canvas—the chaste,
Delicate beauty of marble sculpturing—
The meekness of the little blossoms, that Grow out in the fields—the breaking of bubbles.
Upon silver waters—the light of stars,
Or the low, delicious music of a
Dreamy voice,—the lustre of a deep, dark Eye—the sunshine of a pleasant smile—the Chiseling of form and feature—the strength
Of intellect, or all the glories of
The universe; can never bring unto
My heart that strange, wild feeling of delight,
That comes there, when the winds have sunk to sleep
Upon the bosom of the trees, and the
And the evening star sets smilingly above the Delicate limbs, that reach their little fingers
Out toward the sky; as though in thankfulness
For the many blessings heaven hath lavished
On them!

Oh! I have loved these

Glad companions of my home, with a strong Feeling, that the heart doth ever give unto
The friends it deems most pure! There are linked
With them so many holy memories,—
So many bright and sunny eyes look from Their leafy, hiding places,—so many Kindred voices sound, within their deepened Snade, that I have sat, night after night, beneath Their heavy branches, and listened to the Meeting of their leaves, and dreamed bright, beautiful Dreams; that the soul's life can never utter Unto mortal ear.

Oh! there are hours, when we forget the world. And
The spirit, in its strong yearnings for communion, Goes back and reads the lessons learned in Paradise.

It can not always bend toward the earth!

It hath a stronger hold upon the skies!

And, filled with its own high remembrances,
And a mysterious longing it can

Not recall, heareth, in the sweet music
Of this sunny world, but a faint and broken
Strain of melody it loved of yore.

There are hours—when a veil is thrown o'er life
And all its cares! And the departed furl
Their rainbow pinions, and come back, to tell Us of a beauty that lieth on, beyond

The stars. 'Till weary with a strange, delicious Sense of what the soul may yet attain, we Press our hands upon our hearts, as though to Sear away the flesh that shrouds them, and reach Them up, unto the realization of
Our brightest dreams—into the balmy atmosphere Of Heaven.

LYRA.

A MOTHER'S DEVOTION.

About six years ago, an aged widow, poorly clad,
with staff in hand, and umbrella under her arm, might any morning, be seen wending her way to the old city grave yard, at Frenchtown. Her walk appeared to be a daily duty, and rain or shine, she performed the sad pilgrimage without fail. From one who knew her story, we learned that, some twelve years previous, her only son, a promising young man, had suddenly died and been entombed at this spot. The shock of seperation inflicted a blow upon the mother's reason, which time has no wholly healed; and since the time she saw his remains consigned to the earth, her footsteps have almost daily been directed towards his resting place, her hands have picked up the weeds which grew upon his grave, and the small stone which marked the spot has been worn smooth by her careful efforts to keep it clean and comely.

The progress of improvement which with a species of fatality, invades sacred precincts of the grave, threatened to disturb the ashes of the widow's son, and her affliction became heart-rending. The fact being made known to a wealthy and benevolent citizen, he had them removed to a graveyard more remote from the city's hum, and to this spot her walks were now directed. A few years more passed and we again met her in our walks,—time appeared to have worked a rapid change in her appearance; her form was more bent, her eyes more sunk, and her steps less vigorous, but her devotion for the spot where rested the bones of the boy was unabated; and though the way was more weary heeded it not—her old umbrella hung in tatters, but though useless, it had so long been the companion of her walks, that it had grown into a necessary habit to bear it along. Again we met her, a few days since; her step has become feeble and slow, her head is bowed to the earth, as though looking for that resting place which is near at hand;

the sometimes shelter and then companion of her walks—the old umbrella—has fallen to pieces, and been laid aside, but yet the wearied mother toters to her dead boy's tomb, removes the weeds which gather there, and with her handkerchief, wipes the dust from the mournful record of his departure.—
Surely the devotion of a mother is undying.—[St. Louis Reveille.]

There is no true glory, no true greatness, without virtue; without which we do but abuse all the good things we have, whether they be great or little, false or real. Riches make us either covetous or prodigal; fine palaces make us despise the poor and poverty; a great number of domestics flatter human pride, which uses them like slaves; valor oftentimes turns brutal and unjust; and a high pedigree makes a man take up with the virtues of his ancestors, without endeavoring to acquire any himself. M. Scudery.

PROSPECTUS OF VOLUME XVIII, FOR 1847, OF THE EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

REV. DOLPHUS SKINNER, EDITOR,
REVS. J. M. AUSTIN, S. J. GIBSON, AND A. C. BARRY,
CORRESPONDING EDITORS.

The many discouragements of two or three years previous to 1846, brought the publisher to the determination about a year since, to discontinue the publication of the Magazine and Advocate, at the close of volume 17, unless sufficient interest of the denomination should manifest itself in the support of the paper to warrant its continuance. It is with heartfelt pleasure that we announce, that the friends of Universalism have shown a proper interest, and that the publisher can now indulge in the hope that that interest will be kept up and increased; and the paper continue to be sent upon its righteous and soul
cheering mission, as in times past. It gratifies us to say, that by the commendable exertions of the friends of the paper, its list, which in 1845 only numbered 1700 now numbers 3500—more than double. That is, well, yet there is abundant room and need for its further increase,
for many reasons which need not here be given, but which will suggest themselves to every thinking Universalist.
The Magazine we believe is now the only weekly paper
in the denomination, devoted exclusively to its matters
and interests, without advertisements or extraneous matter, which is within the reach of its patrons by a little exertion, at the low price of ONE DOLLAR. (See terms.)
This fact ought to secure it double its present circulation,
but when considered in regard to the talent employed in contributing to, and conducting it, ten thousand patrons
ought reasonably to be expected to contribute their pittance to its support. It is not our custom to promise before hand or boast of what we will do—suffice it to say, that we intend to do all that lays within our means, to make the paper pleasing, and acceptable to our readers,
and useful to the cause. The advocacy and defence of Universalism will be the chief feature. Free, open, and candid discussion, upon all the leading reforms of the age, will be allowed a place in our columns, by our religious opposers, as well as others, provided they are willing to accord us equal privileges with those they may claim for themselves. Bitterness and personal allusions, calculated to create enmity or injure the feelings of any, will be studiously avoided. In short we wish to make the Magazine a Universalist paper.

For the kindness and exertions manifested in behalf of the paper for the past year, by both ministering brethren and laymen, we tender our unfeigned thanks, and hope to deserve a continuance of such kindness. We would now call attention to the terms, and it is hoped that a
who may read this prospectus will do what they consistently can to increase our list. Each one who is favorably disposed, can doubtless persuade an acquaintance or neighbor to subscribe, and that one another, and by putting their subscriptions together, can form a club, and get the paper at the lowest rates.

TERMS.—Single subscriptions, or any number less than four, $1.50 as before. Four copies to one post office, with each subscribers name written on his paper, for five dollars, ($1.25 each,) or five copies directed in a package to one person, without the names, for five dollars; and at the same rate to seven. Seven copies with names, for eight dollars, ($1.14 per copy,) or $1 per copy without names to one person and at the same rate to ten. Ten copies with names at one office for ten dollars, or eleven to one person without names. Twenty-one copies with names for $20 or twenty-two copies without names, and
so on, or as follows:

4 copies to one office with names	$5.00
7 " " " "	8.00
10 " " " "	10.00
21 " " " "	20.00
42 " " " "	40.00

22 " " " "	20.00
33 " " " "	30.00
44 " " " "	40.00
55 " " " "	50.00

For single subscriptions $1 will pay for eight months,
75 cents for six months, or 50 cents for four months.—
Postmasters would doubtless, in many instances, have the package directed to them, and cheerfully mark the names of subscribers on the papers and distribute them for a copy. The paper with back numbers if desired, will be sent to any person joining a club, after it is formed, and receiving his paper in the same package, at the same price, as the other members of the club.

ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE. [All papers discontinued at the end of the time paid for. All communications should be addressed to A. Walker, No.
30 Genesee Street, Utica, N. Y., and should be Post
Paid to receive attention.]

It is to be hoped that every friend into whose hands this prospectus may fall, will canvass his neighborhood, obtain all the subscriptions he can, (or if he can not attend to it, hand it to some active and good man who can,) unite with others if any there be, and make returns to the publisher as soon as the middle of December, 1846.

'AN ATTEMPT TO CHEAT A DEAD MAN OUT OF SIX DOLLARS.'

MR. EDITOR.—There appeared an article, under the above head, in your paper dated Sept. 18th, which has caused no little excitement among its readers, as well as much wonder among the friends of those whom it makes appear so uncharitable; viz. those denominated by Mr. Worden (whose name is appended to the article) 'the saintly Methodist preachers,' who were present on the occasion to which he refers. In all kindness and love, I wish to present to your readers, the abusive misrepresentations contained in that article, as requested to do by some of our Universalist friends, being assured that I should have a place in your columns to state the facts. There would have been no need of this so far as the town of Louisville is concerned; but where the facts are not known, the question arises, 'If it is not true, why do they not contradict it?' In defence of truth I must say, that there is much of the article, which is not true. Not that I would be so uncharitable, as to say that Mr. Worden intentionally stated falsehoods; but I do wish to be understood as saying, that most of his statements were hearsays, and he presents them as facts and takes the responsibility upon himself by subscribing them.

It would have been kind and friendly, not to say gentlemanly, for him to have conversed even with those 'pious Methodist divines,' before accusing them of 'falsehood.' As for my own veracity, being but a youth in a strange land, almost any impression could have been made upon public mind concerning me, a stranger; but, when Mr. W. accuses of 'falsehood,' the venerable and most respected father Miller, whose character has long since been established, and still stands good, he (Mr. W.) was placing his own reputation, in a situation which, at the time, I think he did not realize.—But to the article.

The meeting house was not only 'built under the control of the Methodists,' (as Mr. W. states) but, as a Methodist house. The town house (the basement) was built for the town generally.—This was an object which induces some to assist who would not have done so otherwise. It was not understood that any other denominations were to have a claim in the house. If any encouragement was given (which is doubted, for surely, there was nothing of the kind in the subscription) to other denominations, to occupy the house when the Methodists did not wish to; such were not the existing circumstances. The Methodists had an appointment in the house at the time when they wanted it. And further according to the Methodistical interpretation of things, the Universalists are not considered among the Orthodox denominations. In kindness, sir, I speak 'freely and without reserve.' Another claim was, that Mr. Bennett had paid $6.00 toward building the house. He had subscribed $2.50 and worked out the same upon the town hall. Mr. W. says, that we denied them the house at any time during the day. This is not true. Hark to truth.

Application being made to father Miller for the house at 10.1-2 o'clock, he remarked that Br. White had an appointment at that hour, and it would be necessary to see him. He came with Mr. Taylor (as I was informed this was his name) to me and inquired if I would withdraw my appointment for the funeral. I answered in the affirmative. Then being informed, that Mr. W. was going to preach, I remarked that I had supposed that some one was going to preach who preaches salvation, by faith and repentance, but, as this was not so, and there being such entire opposition in Universalism, to Methodism, I could not take the responsibility of withdrawing the appointment; but, if the brethren wished it, I should have nothing more to say.

We proposed at the same time, that they should defer their funeral until 2 o'clock P. M., as they had not yet given out the time when it would be. Shortly after this the father-in-law of the departed friend came to one of our brethren, who came to us, to see if they could have the house at 9 o'clock. As I had two other appointments to fill that day; it was going to make our services so late that we could not give way. We did not 'refuse them the house entirely.' We then offered to defer our class-meeting and accommodate our friends with the house between 11 and 12 o'clock. But this would not do. The gentleman replied (I am informed by one who will certify to the same) that if we can't have the house when we want it we won't have it at all. Having some of that love burning in our souls which taketh away the fear of man; and not feeling it duty to make any farther offers, neither to be menaced into any thing, there were no further offers made.

It appears that there was a determination to break up our appointment. Preparation was made, for holding the funeral in the street before the church, when they might just as well have had it by the house of the deceased. They finally occupied the house. Not because there was 'but four persons left above,' (this was not a fact) but, because they, who were so strenuous crowded things along until (in consequence of a tremendous shower which frustrated them in their plans) had got the mourning friends down into the unfinished town hall, into which, the water was running so fast as to make it very disagreeable. Besides it was made so dark by the thick clouds which intervened between us and the sun, pouring their contents, torrent like, upon the earth, that Mr. W. could neither see (as I am informed) to read his hymn or sermon which should have been committed to memory for such an emergency. In conclusion upon this point none dare affirm that we refused them the house entirely.

Mr. W. says our excuse, for not letting them have the house was, that we were afraid of the judgment. I did, and still say, that if Methuism is true, Universalism is tending to the damnation of the souls of men; and inasmuch as I believe both the former and the latter statements, if I should give way to the promulgation of the principles of Universalism, I should be accountable for it at the judgment. I would to God, that there were more of my fellow mortals, who acted as if they expected to give an account of their stewardship. He says that we denied saying that which the best members of our society are ready to testify we did say. This is another mistake. I can find no member that has any such thoughts or feelings. If we have any such members, as are willing to be menaced out of their rights and privileges, I should be constrained to say that they would have needed a little more moral courage to have lived in the days of the apostles. Finally Mr. W. says that the use of the house was the last act of kindness that could be bestowed upon the memory of the deceased.—Truly so. And it gave my brethren and myself much pain to see them so obstinate, as not to defer the funeral one hour, so that we could have been accommodated as well as they.

My object in wishing to fill my own appointment was not to 'cheat the dead' but to do good, to the living, and also to avoid having a Methodist appointment filled by a man, who a short time previous, had from certain premises, deduced the following conclusion, viz., that if any man ever got to hell he would have to bind God Almighty. I want to assure you, Mr. Editor, that I entertain no feeling but love, toward any of my Universalist friends. And I praise God, whom I love with all my heart that I never found any other principle than love, in the religion of Jesus Christ. But my acknowledging the title of an M. E. preacher is enough, to give all to understand, that while I love the Universalist I hate his doctrine, and shall use all lawful means for its overthrow.

Waddington, Dec. 8th, 1846.

L. D. WHITE.

REMARKS.—We willingly give place to the foregoing article, although we seldom or never receive similar acts of justice from the hands of the denomination who claim a place for it in our columns. We know nothing of the circumstances alluded to, and concerning which the statements of Br. Worden and the writer conflict with each other. If Mr. White is correct, Br. Worden was probably misinformed, and in our opinion the Universalists were more to blame than the Methodists. For if the house belonged exclusively to the latter, and they were willing, notwithstanding this fact, that the former should occupy it after their previously published appointment, had been fulfilled, the hour for the funeral not having yet been fixed, they certainly did all that could reasonably be expected or asked of them. And we think the Universalists should have thankfully acquiesced in the arrangement. This querulousness and attempt at dictation on the part of those dependent on others should be discountenanced and rebuked. Christian denominations should not only avoid intruding on each other's rights, but try to accommodate themselves to each other's convenience as far as possible.

But though Mr. White undoubtedly acted conscientiously, in the matter, if his statement be true, he was evidently grossly ignorant and in the dark concerning the doctrine which Br. Worden preaches. For he says that, before knowing who was to preach, he 'had supposed that some one was going to preach who preaches salvation by faith and repentance; but this was not so.' Now, we are not personally acquainted with Br. Worden; but we supposed him to be a Universalist preacher, and if so, he must preach 'salvation by, (or through) faith and repentance.' For Universalism teaches that Christ is both, 'the author and finisher of our faith,' and that 'him hath God exalted with his right hand, to give repentance and forgiveness of sins.' So far from rejecting salvation by faith and repentance, Universalists believe faith and repentance will be given to all, and hence salvation become the portion of all. Whether Br. Worden ever uttered the expression attributed to him in Mr. White's last paragraph we know not, but we do not believe he ever did, without qualification. A garbled portion of a sentence, quoted from a writer or speaker, often does the author great injustice. Moreover, Br. Worden, we think, does not and can not deny that men have got to hell, and do often get there. But then, he would probably differ from Mr. White as to the meaning of the term hell.

If Mr. White honestly thinks Universalism a total and dangerous error, we do not blame him for doing what he can to oppose and prevent its spread; and on this ground we admire his closing sentence, that while he loves the Universalist, he hates his doctrine and shall use all lawful means for its overthrow. That is right; we do not object to it at all, Br. White. But are you not mistaken, totally mistaken, in regard to the doctrine of Universalism?—Have you not substituted a figment of your own imagination in room of Universalism? We are very confident you have. And as proof of it we cite your own language. You say, 'I entertain no feeling but love toward any of my Universalist friends. And I praise God, whom I love with all my heart, that I never found any other principle than love in the religion of Jesus Christ.' Amen, Br. White, with all my heart! Give me your hand.—That is Universalism as strong as I can write it. If there is no other principle than love in the religion of Jesus Christ, then certainly Jesus Christ can never doom a soul for whom he tasted death (and you believe he did for all) to unending torments. It would not be love, but hatred, to do this. For hatred, almighty hatred itself, could do nothing worse than this. But you say you 'hate the Universalists' doctrine.' No you don't though: you are mistaken here again. You only hate what you erroneously thought to be our doctrine. You love the doctrine itself, if you speak the truth when you say you love Universalists, and love God with all your heart. You must then love God's image wherever you see it. And you must love sinners as Christ loved them and died for them: and you pray, I know you do, that God would bring every sinner to repentance and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. Well, this is exactly our doctrine—we believe God will do this very thing that you pray for. You do not then hate it—you pray for its truth: and when you come to believe with us, you will, with us, rejoice in the 'restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.'—(See Dr. A. Clarke on Acts iii: 21.)

In conclusion, we remark, that we shall object to any long controversy in our columns about the circumstances of the funeral mentioned in the above communication. It is too local, or sectional to interest our readers generally. Any short note of explanation from either party, if respectfully written, will find a place. But if Br. White wishes the opportunity of 'overthrowing our doctrine by lawful means,' our columns are at his service. Ed.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1846.

CLOSE OF THE YEAR.

As the old are constantly dropping off the stage of action, and the middle aged grow old, and the young arrive at middle age, and infants to youth, and new comers are constantly being ushered into life; and thus one generation pushes the preceding before it; so hours push hours, and days urge days before them; each week drives the preceding out of being, months roll on after months, and year successively follows year, without any pause between—on—on—on—forever they move—nothing on earth or in the universe of God is stationary—all is moving and we are moving with all, whether we will or not—so the hours, and days, and weeks, and months, that go to make up the present year, are nearly numbered and about to take their departure forever. Eighteen hundred forty six will soon expire and be buried in the fathomless flood of past eternity, to live no more forever, save in the memory of the past.

It becomes us then, readers, one and all, to pause for a brief space, at least in the imagination, in the midst of this uncensured flight, and ponder on the past, the present, and the future; to commune with our own hearts and with high Heaven; to ask ourselves if we are better and happier—for if we are one we are also the other—than we were when the present year began. Have we done our duty truly and faithfully to ourselves, our families, our kindred, our race, to our Saviour, our God, and to the cause of his everlasting truth? Have we been diligent in our appropriate spheres, our incumbent business?—Have we been 'temperate in all things,' 'keeping under our body and subduing and controlling all its inordinate desires and unhallowed passions. Have we allowed no anger, or pride, or selfishness to obtain ascendancy over us, and blind us to our real good, our truest interest?—Have we families? and have we done our duty to them? Have we treated them with kindness and affection—supplied the wants of body and mind to the extent of our ability—setting before them, at all times, such examples in practice as would enforce the precepts of our lips, and such as we would wish them to follow? Have we sheltered the houseless, fed the hungry with our bread, clothed the naked with our garments, visited the sick and administered the cordial to their anguished bodies; the widow in her solitude, and cheered her lone heart?—Have we wronged no one, defrauded no one, spoken evil of no one, envied no one? Have we done good to all as we had opportunity? If so, then can we truly say, with the pious man of Uz, 'When the ear heard me, then it blessed me; when the eye saw, it gave witness unto me, because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help; the blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.'

Have we done our duty to the cause of God and religion? Have we obeyed the precepts, and followed the example, and possessed the spirit of our divine Master? Have we 'prayed to God always'—looking to him with humble and devout gratitude, as the author and giver of 'every good and perfect gift'? Have we never profaned his sacred name, or taken it upon a thoughtless tongue? Have we done all we consistently could to spread his truth in the world—to upbuild the gospel kingdom on earth—to dissipate error and darkness from the minds of men—to lead them to the knowledge of that truth that 'maketh free indeed'? Have we attended regularly, when opportunity allowed, on the preaching of the word of truth? Have we contributed of our substance, according to our ability, for sustaining and encouraging those who are engaged in its propagation? Have we sustained and encouraged properly those [winged and silent, yet effectual messengers of truth, our religious papers and periodicals devoted to its promulgation? Have we subscribed and paid for one or more of them ourselves? and have we invited and urged our neighbors to do the same, that thus the influence and effectiveness of these periodicals might be as extensive in the world as possible, and contribute to hasten the glorious era when darkness and doubt, error and superstition, shall flee from the abodes of men, and the knowledge of God shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea? In short have we done what we could for the cause of God, of truth, and of humanity? If so, then conscience sweetly whispers to our hearts, 'Well done, good and faithful servants, enter ye into the joy of your Lord.' But if not, O let the firm resolve be taken that another year shall not pass thus—that with the commencement of another year we will commence more vigilantly and faithfully the discharge of our every duty, and cling to that resolve and that duty forever.

We have but a few more years to remain on earth, at longest; perhaps not one! We desire to be happy while we live, and to die the death of the righteous and have our last end like his. The only way to secure either—a happy life or a happy death—is to live the life of the righteous. Then, 'to live is Christ; to die is gain.'

With the closing year closes another volume of this paper, and our labors editorial and communion with our readers for 1846. With some of our readers we probably part now forever. But with many—may we not say most—of them we hope to renew or continue our intercourse and communion for another fleeting year. Shall we have your sympathy and cordial co-operation in the great cause of truth and humanity? May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God the Father, be with you with you all. Amen.

THE LAST WORD.

Like a woman we must have it. Have our friends and patrons been well pleased enough with the Magazine the past year to induce them to continue to patronize it; and to induce others to subscribe? Although we can not hope to have pleased each one of 3500 patrons in every respect, yet we trust we have seriously offended none, and if we have been so unfortunate as to have done so, in all truth and sincerity we can say it was purely unintentional. We trust in their forgiving spirit.

The system (payment strictly in advance) upon which the paper is conducted, we hope has been satisfactory. It certainly has been so to us. It has saved us any quantity of vexation, trouble and expense, and our friends several columns of duns, which would have been quite as unpleasant for us to write and publish, as disagreeable for them to read. Will it be necessary to say that we shall strictly adhere to this system? We trust not.

We hope the subscription price of the paper has been placed low enough to be satisfactory. It certainly is as low as we can afford it, and it appears to us that the actual quantity of original reading matter, from the small size of the type upon which the paper is printed, renders it in fact the cheapest weekly paper in the denomination. Is it not so?

✂ The first number of the next volume will be sent to all of our subscribers of the present year, who have not renewed their subscriptions, in hopes they will be induced to send in their subscription money immediately. If any should conclude not to renew, will they hand that number to some friend who they think will subscribe, or return it by mail immediately addressed to the 'Magazine and Advocate,' Utica, N. Y.

✂ If any one has failed to receive any numbers during the past year, by giving us notice they will be cheerfully supplied with the missing numbers. Mistakes can hardly fail to happen sometime during the year by which subscribers do not receive their papers—it may be in the publishing office or through carelessness in the Post Office department.

Finally, we shall greet with pleasure and thankfulness the renewal of the subscriptions of all our present patrons and as many additional new ones as may be pleased to favor us with their patronage—and that a due meed of the blessings of a kind Providence may rest upon one and all is the sincere wish of the

PUBLISHER.

HON. HUGH WHITE.

The following should have been inserted in the volume of 'Historical Sketches and incidents illustrating the establishment and progress of Universalism in the State of New York'—under the year 1812; but was unfortunately overlooked at the time that work was prepared.

The Hon. HUGH WHITE, the first of the pioneers from New England, that ventured west of the Dutch settlements on the Mohawk river, and whose name is impressed upon the town of Whitestown—WAS A UNIVERSALIST. He was from its organization connected with the Universalist society in that town, (now known as New Hartford society,) and lived and died one of its members. After his death, it was ascertained that he had left by his will a valuable legacy to the society. It consisted of about four acres of ground on the principal street in Whitesboro' village—its estimated value, being one thousand dollars; and was intended by the donor as the site for the church and parsonage house of the Universalist congregation.

The will was drawn by a lawyer of distinction, who was remotely connected with the family of Judge White. And either from some technical informality in the will itself, or from neglect of adopting proper measures on the part of the society—this valuable legacy was lost, and reverted to the family heirs. The probability is, that the society was defrauded, and the aged donor imposed upon, by a legal quibble; and that for the sordid purpose of securing to the family a share which was but the 'dust of the balance' to the whole—the benevolent offering of a sincere friend of truth was turned aside from its religious destination. It was never doubted that had the bequest been made to some other—or almost any other religious society, than that of Universalists, the favored congregation would have received it without opposition. The loss of this legacy changed the central location of the society, and no doubt gave a new and very different direction to its destiny.

S. R. S.

The following inscription on the monument erected to the memory of Judge White, will be interesting as showing the early date of his settlement in Whitestown.

'Here sleep the mortal remains of Hugh White, who was born 5 February 1733, at Middletown, Conn., and died 16 April 1812. In the year 1784, he removed to Sedaghtate, now Whitesboro' where he was the first white inhabitant in the state of New York, west of the German settlers on the Mohawk. He was distinguished for energy and decision of character; and may justly be regarded as a patriarch who led the children of New England into the wilderness. As a magistrate, a citizen, and a man, his character for truth and integrity was proverbial. This humble monument is reared and inscribed by the affectionate partner of his joys and sorrows, May 15, 1826.'

WHY DOES INTEMPERANCE INCREASE.

The Rev. M. H. Smith recently preached a sermon in Boston, which is printed in the Recorder, in which he gives the following reasons for the apparent increase of intemperance. We think the reasons, so far as they go, are sound, just and worthy of serious consideration.—[N. Y. Observer.

Why does intemperance increase? I answer. Temperance has been divorced from religion, and has lost its power. It has been the handmaid of impiety. In the house of its friend it has been wounded. The tree has been girdled by those who have sat under its shade. At the door of professed friends, much of this evil will be found. The cause of temperance in this country began in principle and in the fear of God. While God was acknowledged, wonders were wrought. The cup was banished, and habits, and customs, riveted by years, gave way in a day. But the cause has changed hands, and its tone and temper have gradually but surely changed. Old friends and tried have been pushed back; and by insolence, censoriousness and denunciation, they have been assured that they were no longer needed in the field.—Under the plea of no sectarianism, a Universalist preacher would be allowed to go the whole length of his creed, and tell all that he believed about the evils of drunkenness; while another man who believed more than he, who believed that the drunkard would go to hell, would be cut short in his speech, because he was sectarian. I have known a speaker called to order, in a so-called temperance meeting, because he repeated the text, 'No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God.' Temperance has been identified with Sabbath desecration. Washingtonianism has been Christianity, and said to be Gospel enough for men. It has been substituted for the preaching of Jesus Christ upon the Sabbath. Crowds have been collected upon church steps during divine service, and gatherings held in the streets and on the wharves, during the hours of public worship. Meetings are held on Sabbath evening on the principle of a shilling theatre, to which admittance is gained at 12 1-2 cents per head, to hear glees, jokes, and noise.

The cause has been divorced from religion; and yet the leaders of this movement affect to be surprised that clergymen and churches stand aloof from the present organization. At a public meeting in Faneuil Hall last week, a public rebuke was administered to the clergy of the city, for their want of boldness. But do these men suppose that the friends of religion will endorse this yoking of temperance and impiety together? and that when the alternative is intemperance or Sabbath desecration, they will hesitate one moment which to choose? Intemperance destroys the man; Sabbath desecrates the nation. These people need not to be told that we are unwilling to help cast out one devil, if the only thing to be gained is the introduction of seven others more wicked than he.

It is not true that the many stand back, who once were active, because they are afraid of their popularity. The ministry and the church, in the infancy of this cause, before public favor was secured, when there was something to be afraid of, when some sacrifice and toil were necessary, were not afraid to speak and suffer for humanity.—Nor do I believe that the love of gain lies at the basis of this unwillingness to act. That men will sell rum while it is profitable to do so, I have no doubt. But it is not true of the citizens of Boston, that they love gain more than principle. Let them know what humanity demands. The spirit of Hancock yet lives. When it became necessary to burn Boston, as it was thought, to save the country, Hancock assured his friends that such an act would leave him in poverty. But, said he, if the country demands the sacrifice, let the torch be applied. To other causes you must look.

You must come back to principles. You must divorce the temperance movement from impiety. It must cease to be a platform on which reckless persons can insult religious instructions; and cease to be an engine by which evil men can assail the good. Till then temperance must languish; intemperance triumph. There is not moral power enough in evil men to sustain a good cause. Satan can not cast out devils.

Ah, Matthew! at your old tricks again? Can you not rest easy a moment in any spot on earth without assailing and misrepresenting men of more liberal minds and honest hearts than your own? Solomon says of the wicked, 'they sleep not, except they have done mischief; and their sleep is taken away unless they cause some to fall. For they eat the bread of wickedness and drink the wine of violence.' Matthew seems to verify this proverb with respect to himself. And even after he has done the meditated 'mischief,' he can't sleep till he has hatched up some new subject in order to commit more. 'The wicked are like the troubled sea which can not rest.'

But what is the purport and amount of what he says on the subject in hand? Why, this, that the Orthodox clergy are the only real and true friends of Temperance; and they only have a right to work in the cause! They only are entitled to all the honor due for what has been done; and unless they can have the sole management and entire control of the matter, they will not and ought not to do any thing about it! Nobody else has ever done, or ever can do any thing effectually; and nobody else is entitled to any honor for what has been done! Really, Matthew H. Smith is a knowing one, and ought to be canonized among the Orthodox. And the New York Observer, by endorsing what he says, evidently means to do what it can to canonize or apotheosise him?

Matthew tells some truths, in order to make his falsehoods go down; but the former are few and far between, and so mixed up and colored with the latter that he might better have told none at all. He says, 'Temperance has been wounded in the house of its friends—the tree has been girdled by those who have sat under its shade—at the door of its professed friends much of this evil will be found.' This is true, but not in the sense that he would have the public believe. He intimates that old (Orthodox) friends have been pushed aside by the insolence, censoriousness and denunciation of Universalists—that the latter have been allowed to go the whole length of their creed, while the former were called to order for repeating the text, 'No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God.' And then immediately adds, 'Temperance has been identified with Sabbath desecration. Washingtonianism has been called Christianity, and said to be Gospel enough for men.'

Now, any one, with half an eye, can see that the above was intended to slander and misrepresent Universalists. For it is well known that Universalists have been and are among the most active, zealous and successful advocates and defenders of the Temperance cause; and that they have abstained from inculcating their peculiar doctrinal and religious tents in temperance meetings. Moreover they believe as truly as the Orthodox do that 'no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God.' The Orthodox believe that a drunkard may reform, cease to be a drunkard, become a sober, pious man, and go to heaven. Universalists believe the same, and that 'in the dispensation of the fulness of times' all will be thus reformed and saved. For in the very text where the apostle says, of 'drunkards' and other vile characters, they 'shall not inherit the kingdom of God,' he also says, 'And such were some of you; but ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the spirit of our God.' (See 1 Cor. vi: 10, 11.) But if Orthodox preachers quoted a part of the text only, putting the popular and erroneous construction on it, with a view of inculcating the horrid doctrine of endless misery, in a temperance meeting, where they knew the Universalists would not enter the field of debate on controversial theology, it was right they should be called to order.

The truth is, the Orthodox, many of them, (though we rejoice in knowing there were many honorable exceptions,) in the first onset of the temperance reformation, seized upon it at once, as a most convenient and efficient means of promoting their own sectarian ends and personal aggrandizement. They chose temperance meetings for teaching endless misery and other (so called) Orthodox notions; and seeing multitudes, interested in Temperance, flock to the meetings, to whom they could not gain access in any other way, they eagerly sought to turn temperance meetings into sectarian engines for the upbuilding of Orthodoxy. But when Universalists and others equally as friendly or more so to real temperance, spoke against this course, and resisted every effort to turn temperance meetings into nurseries, and hot-beds of sectarianism, why, the Orthodox cry out 'persecution,' accuse us of attempting to thrust them back, as 'no longer needed in the field,' retire in disgust from the cause, and then falsely accuse all that will not adopt their theological opinions of being desecrators of the Sabbath, as substituting Washingtonianism for the Gospel, as being possessed of seven devils worse than that of intemperance, etc., etc.! And these accusations and this kind of treatment from Matthew Hale Smith are the fruits of his present religion! We can well spare such a man from the temperance ranks. His presence would obviously do more harm than good; as it has done to every cause he ever espoused.

We know nothing of the desecration of the Sabbath by temperance meetings, of the substitution of Washingtonianism for the preaching of Jesus, of crowds collected upon church steps during divine service, gatherings held in the streets and on the wharves, of meetings held on Sabbath evenings on the principle of a shilling theatre, etc., etc. of which he speaks. They have not come under our observation. But even if such gatherings have been held in Boston, and drawn out the inmates of grogeries and other infamous and wicked retreats to listen to earnest and eloquent pleas for temperance, we can not, after all, see but what it was quite as well for them to do this as to have remained in their dens of vice. For in worse places they could not be; and if they will not go to a religious meeting for religion's sake, we say, for humanity's sake deny them not the privilege of attending a temperance meeting that will draw them from their dens of vice for an hour or too, and may do them some, yea possibly much good.

We close this notice by parodizing Matthew's last paragraph.

You must come back to true temperance principles.—You must divorce the temperance movement from the impiety of sectarianism. It must cease to be a platform on which the narrow-minded bigot and hot-headed sectarian can insult the honest believer in a more liberal creed; and cease to be an engine by which evil men, real Judases, can assail good men and true. Till then temperance must languish; intemperance triumph. There is not moral power enough in evil men, even in all the Matthew Hale Smiths the world contains, to sustain a good cause. Satan can not cast out devils.

¶ We hope our friends in writing to us will not forget our terms with regard to postage. It must be paid to insure attention. Our regular correspondents who write for publication in our columns are excepted of course. They would do well however to write their names, or at least their initials, on the outside of their letters, so that we may know who they are from. It is true, that the postage on a single letter is but little, but when it is considered that the publisher receives from one to two thousand, and perhaps more, during the year, the postage amounts to a handsome sum. At the five cent rate, it would cost from $50, to $100, while if paid by each writer would cost him but five cents.

As nearly all of our subscribers by clubbing, get the paper at the low price of one dollar, we can not afford to pay so much for postage.

THE DAYS THAT ARE GONE.

BY THE PRIVATE SCHOLAR.

Oh, the days that are gone! and the hopes that are past!
When life in its spring time was new;
When earth seemed an Eden that always would last,
And the heart's young affections were true!

Who—who has not turned to the days that are gone,
With a longing and longing regret;
And wept in his fulness of soul, as the tone
And the light of his childhood were met?

But no more shall return the bright sun-shiny days,
That season of smiles and of tears;
When the spirit rejoiced in its juvenile ways,
When it wept, but o'er innocent fears.

As the warm rain in Summer that feeds the young flower,
So fresh passes youth to its goal;
As the rain-bow that beams in the train of the shower,
Is the memory of youth to the soul.

There's a sensitive chord in the spirit's deep tone,
Round which the affections e'er cling;
That responds with a magical thrill of its own,
When memory touches the string.

When the sun of prosperity brightens around,
And the mind is delighted and gay;
It sweetly vibrates with a musical sound,
When moved by a juvenile lay.

But when darkness and labor the spirit enchain,
And the hopes of the future o'ercast,
Oh, then with a low and a sorrowful strain,
It replies to the days that are past!

And now, since the Past is forevermore gone,
And the future is oft a disguise;
Let us cling to the Present which now is our own,
And learn to be happy and wise.

THE MIRACULOUS CONCEPTION, AGAIN.

Br. Skinner—In No. 37 an attempt is made to refute my argument in No. 32 in favor of the miraculous conception, so called, as based upon the doctrine of hereditary descent. Want of time has hitherto prevented me from replying to Br. McAdam; and, even now, at this late date, I can find only time for a few brief remarks.

In stating the doctrine of hereditary descent, I inserted in my definition the qualifying expression 'as I understand it; and from the doctrine thus understood and stated, I argued the extreme probability of the actual occurrence of the miracle in question. Br. McAdam does not at all object to the correctness of my conclusion as drawn from the premises; but he proceeds to say positively and authoritatively that 'the phrenological doctrine of hereditary descent is so and so, altogether different from what I stated it'; and hence argues that it affords no proof of the truth of the alleged miracle. Now just as I understood the doctrine then, just so I understand it now; hence my faith in relation to the miracle remains in statu quo.

The doctrine of hereditary descent, as I view it, is distinct from the fact that each race of animals, man included, reproduces its kind. This view I attempted to express and illustrate at some length in the article reviewed by Br. McAdam—it is, in brief, that physical, mental, and moral qualities and peculiarities, are transmissible to offspring through a limited number of generations; in most cases quite distinctly to children; in fewer cases, and, for the most part, less distinctly, grandchildren; sometimes, and in some degree, to great grandchildren; and perhaps in a like decreasing ratio to an other generation; but not further, so far as we are enabled to perceive. And this view of the subject accords admirably with the statement in the decalogue as to God's 'visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation.' With this view of the subject it was that I said I did not learn from the history of the age in which Jesus lived, that he had any prototype in his own nation, &c. And I do not consider it any answer to this to say as does my reviewer, that Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and David, 'have in all time past been considered as types of Jesus; for surely they did not live in the age of which I spoke.

It may be the case, for aught I know, that some phrenologists have explained the doctrine of hereditary descent as Br. McAdam does, namely that 'peculiar characteristics unfold themselves in a family in one age, and then lie buried, or at least unobserved, during several succeeding ages, and then burst forth 'in some individual in full perfection. According to this, if a man should become a wine-bibber, whose progenitors for a few generations back, or as far as we can trace his lineage, were all of sober temperate habits, it would be needless to inquire into the immediate causes and influences which have operated to render him such—it would be quite sufficient to advert to the fact that Noah, the sole progenitor of all now on earth, 'made himself drunken' and that this characteristic which unfolded itself in the age immediately succeeding the deluge, and which was then entirely 'peculiar,' had lain buried through the several ages succeeding that age, and had now 'burst forth in a distant succession of the line into a perfect and full personification of the ancient family attributes.' But I imagine it might be difficult to adduce any great amount of very respectable proof in support of such a theory.

It is my design to write, so soon as I can get time, an other article upon the subject in hand, mainly for the purpose of answering the objections brought against the miracle in question. The remaining objections urged by Br. McAdam, I shall then examine along with others. Till then, I must bid the subject adieu.

JASON LEWIS.

P. S. I was particularly unfortunate in regard to the mechanical execution of that article on page 250. Not only was there a number of serious typographical errors, which I pointed out, and which you promptly published as such, for which you have my thanks, but one rather important one eluded not only the eye of the proof-reader, but by means of a fold in my copy of the paper, escaped my observation, until after I had written to you respecting the others. A little below the middle of the middle column, second line of the paragraph, leave out the word 'like,' and read 'would have been * * * the father of Jesus.'

REV. DOLPHUS SKINNER, EDITOR,
REVS. J. M. AUSTIN, S. J. GIBSON, AND A. C. BARRAY, CORRESPONDING EDITORS.

The many discouragements of two or three years previous to 1846, brought the publisher to the determination, about a year since, to discontinue the publication of the Magazine and Advocate, at the close of volume 17, unless sufficient interest of the denomination should manifest itself in the support of the paper to warrant its continuance. It is with heartfelt pleasure that we announce, that the friends of Universalism have shown a proper interest, and that the publisher can now indulge in the hope, that that interest will be kept up and increased; and the paper continue to be sent upon its righteous and soul-cheering mission, as in times past. It gratifies us to say, that by the commendable exertions of the friends of the paper, its list, which in 1845 only numbered 1700 now numbers 3500—more than double. That is well, yet there is abundant room and need for its further increase, for many reasons which need not here be given, but which will suggest themselves to every thinking Universalist. The Magazine, we believe is now the only weekly paper in the denomination, devoted exclusively to its matters and interests, without advertisements or extraneous matter, which is within the reach of its patrons by a little exertion, at the low price of ONE DOLLAR. (See terms. This fact ought to secure it double its present circulation, but then considered in regard to the talent employed in contributing to, and conducting it, ten thousand patrons ought reasonably to be expected to contribute their pitance to its support. It is not our custom to promise before hand or boast of what we will do—suffice it to say, that we intend to do all that lays within our means, to make the paper pleasing and acceptable to our readers, and useful to the cause. The advocacy and defence of Universalism will be the chief feature. Free, open, and candid discussion, upon all the leading reforms of the age, will be allowed a place in our columns, by our religious opposers, as well as others, provided they are willing to accord us equal privileges with those they may claim for themselves. Bitterness and personal allusions, calculated to create enmity or injure the feelings of any, will be studiously avoided. In short we wish to make the Magazine a Universalist paper.

For the kindness and exertions manifested in behalf of the paper for the past year, by both ministering brethren and laymen, we tender our unfeigned thanks, and hope to deserve a continuance of such kindness. We would now call attention to the terms, and it is hoped that all who may read this prospectus will do what they consistently can to increase our list. Each one who is favorably disposed, can doubtless persuade an acquaintance or neighbor to subscribe, and that one another, and by putting their subscriptions together, can form a club, and get the paper at the lowest rates.

TERMS.—Single subscriptions, or any number less than four, $1.50 as before. Four copies to one post office, with each subscribers name written on his paper, for five dollars, ($1.25 each,) or five copies directed in a package to one person, without the names, for five dollars, and at the same rate to seven. Seven copies with names, for eight dollars, ($1.14 per copy,) or $1 per copy without names to one person and at the same rate to ten. Ten copies with names at one office for ten dollars, or eleven to one person without names. Twenty-one copies with names for $26 or twenty-two copies without names, and so on, or as follows:

4 copies to one office with names	$5.00
7 " " "	8.00
10 " " "	10.00
21 " " "	20.00
42 " " "	40.00
53 " " "	50.00
Or 11 copies to one person without names,	$10.00
22 " " "	20.00
33 " " "	30.00
44 " " "	40.00
55 " " "	50.00

For single subscriptions $1 will pay for eight months, 75 cents for six months, or 50 cents for four months. Postmasters would doubtless, in many instances, have the package directed to them, and cheerfully mark the names of subscribers on the papers and distribute them for a copy. The paper with back numbers if desired, will be sent to any person joining a club, after it is formed, and receiving his paper in the same package, at the same price, as the other members of the club.

ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE. All papers discontinued at the end of the time paid for. All communications should be addressed to A. Walker, No. 30. Genesee Street, Utica, N. Y., and should be POSTPAID to receive attention.

It is to be hoped that every friend into whose hands this prospectus may fall, will canvass his neighborhood, obtain all the subscriptions he can, (or if he can not attend to it, hand it to some active and good man who can,) unite with others if any there be, and make returns to the publisher as soon as the middle of December, 1846.

N. B. Notes of good banks of other States received at par.
